†This sum allows only 26 2-3 dollars for the subsistence of each person, a whole year,—and includes also the subsistence and value of the horses, (immediately derived from agriculture), employed at the furnaces, forges, &c. The calculation would then seem to be a very moderate one. The number of persons employed and subsisted does not include those who obtain their living, or support, by the various transportations or handlings of the iron after leaving the furnaces and forges,—nor others who, in the cities or other places of sale, derive profits on the manufacture. But all these should be added to shew the whole market which the

The capital vested in lands—forests, mines and water-rights, buildings, machinery, &c. is not estimated—but we shall seek some information on this point, for our own satisfaction.

Round numbers are used in several of the preceding sums, because the facts stated in a supplementary report of the committee, containing further information received after the general aggregates had been made up—were not added; and there is not time allowed the editor to bring them out precisely, according to the data given—but they are sufficiently near the true sums.

The effect of the domestic manufacture, or COMPETITION, in reducing the cost of iron to consumers, is admirably shewn in several tables—as well in the reduced price of the article on the sea-board, as in those parts of our country where foreign iron is not used at all. The facts, as to the latter, are conclusive on this point—AND THEY CANNOT BE MISTAKEN.

We have not room to say more—and if we had, should feel unwilling to lessen the interest of this report when laid before the public, by anticipating its contents.

THE FOREIGN NEWS noticed this week, is highly interesting. The republic of Poland is finished; and the bill for the reform of the British parliament has been rejected in the house of lords. What next?

Some speculate on a revolution in England—or, at least, calculate dangerous proceedings of the people, to obtain by force what the "hospital of incurables" has denied them: but the king, if resolved to carry the point, may easily manufacture "a batch of peers," and settle the affair at once. And then will come the discontents of the old nobility, the grumblings of their retainers, (not few in number, and having great power)—sustained by a high-fied and imperious clergy,* trembling for the thirty millions of dollars which they annually exact of the people, by the sword;—for it is manifest that reform will not end in the house of commons, and the poor-houses continue to be filled with £3 millions of wretched beings—that the great landholders, through the corn laws, the clergy by their tythes, and the immense army of sinecurists and pensioners remain, to fasten on those means which a half-starved populace demands for immediate subsistence. England must,—inevitably must,—one day, pass through a series of events hardly less terrible than those of the French revolution—for the public debt, and the host of exactions of labor, must be done away; but whether things are ripe for revolution, we venture not to assert. A trade as free as that of the United States, would capsize the king, lords and commons, and extinguish the bench of bishops, in twelve months—and the British systems are so rotten, and the diseased parts bear so closely upon one another,—that to remove any part endangers the whole concern. The reform of parliament, in itself, would render no service to the people. The vaunted emancipation of the catholics of Ireland has done nothing to keep the people from starving, or to protect them from barbarous murderings of one another. But a beginning must be made somewhere—however dark the ending may appear. There is a point at which suffering will stop—when the majority, even in the most enslaved countries, must assert their natural right to rule, and build up a dominion, though based on the slaughtered bodies of their fellow men.

Iron manufacture creates for the production of the farmers, and we must believe that the entire aggregate is fully equal to the whole value of flour exported to foreign places.

*Only one of the bench of bishops, (Chichester), voted for the reform bill.

THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES AND INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS. We should have, indeed, a difficult business, were constructions of the constitution left to the determination of those who talk so much about "state rights." From 1807 to 1815, to have doubted the right and duty of congress to encourage and protect domestic manufactures, would have been regarded as TOXIC, in the first degree, by the starbuck politicians of Virginia—as numerous matters on record plainly shew us; Mr. Jefferson himself going so far as to suggest "PROHIBITIONS" that such encouragement and protection might be effectual! This was the ne plus ultra of what has since been called the "American System." Indeed, few of us are willing to go so far—except to prevent frauds on the revenue, and assure to DOMESTIC INDUSTRY the whole benefit of the laws enacted that it may prosper, and advance the population and wealth of our country, both which are mightily promoted by its success. FRANKLIN would have called such acts population laws; and his notion was that a "virtuous populace" was the first element of national power—as some, in the loss of it, have fearful reasons to admit, though a false pride, gathering to itself increasing evils and husbanding new causes of adversity, may prevent an acknowledgment of the principles still it goes on, and will go on, whether admitted or not. But let this pass. We would rather hold up a happy future than prophesy misery.

So it was in respect to internal improvements. The books are filled with proceedings of Virginia, (that paladium of the constitution!) favoring their progress, at the national expense. On the 26th February 1816, a resolution passed the house of delegates soliciting the co-operation of the senators and representatives in congress from that state, for the purpose of engaging the aid of the national government, to effect a communication between the waters of the James and Ohio rivers; and on the 16th Dec. in the same year, the executive of the state, (Mr. Tazewell being one of the members), communicated to the legislature a recommendation of the board of works, warmly urging that the assistance of the general government might be solicited, for the improvement of the interior of Virginia! On the 22d Feb. 1817, a resolution passed both branches of the legislature, in pursuance of the preceding recommendation of the board of works, that a correspondence should be opened with the government of the United States, concerning the extension and improvement of certain roads and rivers. See REGISTER, vol. XXX, page 282, for these things more at length. Really, the constitution would be a queer thing—a strange compound of erudition—if it fit to the never-ending changes of opinion in the "orthodox," which, as Dr. Fothergill said, means "uppermost"—as "the wind blows!"

And how has it been with the now frantic "state-rights" politicians of South Carolina, and the present head-men of nullification? What was it that Messrs. Calhoun, Hamilton, McDuffie, &c. could not find constitution for, in 1823-3? Were they not at daggers-points, almost literally, with Mr. Crawford and his party, the radicals in red-jackets, because they would limit the powers of the general government, or, as Mr. Calhoun and his school preferred to say, the national government? Did not this latter party, with a high hand, throw Judge Smith, "neck and heels" out of the senate of the United States, because that he spoke of "state rights?"—and have not the same persons, under a new organization of principles (!!!), again cast the same Judge Smith out of the same senate, because he thought that all power was not vested in the states? Politics, like the wand of Prospero, conjures up storms and tempests, spirits of the air and imps of hell; and the senses of men are so bewildered, that the spear of Ithuriel touches things in vain, to shew their delusions! But this state of society cannot last. The whirlwind will not always feed itself. Passion must yield to the soberness of reason. "Truth is mighty and will prevail."

There is no earthly thing better established in its principle than the right of congress to protect the industry of the people. The chain of evidence in its favor, is perfect—from 1765 to 1831. An hundred consecutive proceedings of the freemen of our country in their primary assemblies, and an hundred consecutive acts of their representatives, while the revolution was preparing, proceeding, or accomplishing, establish this right as a "natural and unalienable" one, being the "pursuit of happiness"—without which the gift of life is valueless, and that of liberty nullified. The master-spirits of the revolution—the giants of the days when "struggling nature" gave birth to our republic—all, all, asserted and proclaimed and defended this right. There was only one Arnold among them. British gold had its solitary influence then. FRANKLIN, and the rest, regarded and encouraged domestic industry as the pioneer and shield of independence—so had all the British statesmen, from CHATHAM, who would not have allowed us to "manufacture a hob-nail," down to the meanest of the set that demanded unqualified obedience and abject submission of our fathers. We have the record of these things, and the record is true. The primary meetings of the people, and the assemblies of their delegates, previous to and during the revolution, were not made up of liars—nor of fools. Look at the testimony presented in the address of the late convention at New York, Mr. Brown's speech, inserted in the present number, and Mr. Everett's able and eloquent oration, delivered before the American Institute—and the multitude of testimony that might be referred to. And when the war at arms was ended, the people soon found that the "REVOLUTION WAS NOT OVER." They were politically independent—but personally chained to a support of the paupers and profligates, civil and ecclesiastic, of Great Britain. They essayed, in their respective states, to relieve themselves of this oppression, which was grinding them to the bone—but essayed in vain. Each state, surely, then had the power to "REGULATE COMMERCE"—but there was no harmony in operation; and Lord Sheffield, and others of his loud school, exulted that the profits of American labor would centre in the "mother country" without the expense and trouble of governing it! But he and they were doomed to see the establishment of a FEDERAL ADMINISTRATION, the leading object of which, (we have the best possible authority for saying—the statement of Mr. MADISON, and as far back as 1795)—was to condense and direct the power to "regulate" trade (which the states had inefficiently exerted), for the "general welfare"—the states yielding every claim to such power; nay, going so far as to prohibit the exercise of it by themselves, individually, for each was smarting under the ruinous effects of this misguided and distracted, yet vital power. And how was the ratification of this federal compact received by the people—how was it celebrated? By numerous and splendid processions of MECHANICS and ARTIZANS, hauling the result as accruing to them a reasonable enjoyment, through labor—by checking the influx of the productions of foreign labor, coming into competition with their own. And yet further—the very first petition presented to the first congress under the constitution was from Baltimore, praying the establishment of an "American System;" which Mr. JEFFERSON afterwards first clearly designated, and Mr. CLAY first reduced to method and gave a body to. Charleston, S. C. and New York, and many other places, followed close upon the heels of the people of Baltimore. Indeed, the whole free laboring population of the United States looked to the first congress for encouragement, support, PROTECTION; and the first legislation of that congress was to "encourage manufactures." And what has happened since? No congress, nor president, nor chief justice, has ever rejected this power. The statute books are filled with acts to foster agriculture, encourage manufactures, and protect commerce—and they all rest on the same principle—the same yielding of "sovereignty" by the several states,

*In one of his letters in 1817, Mr. J. said, "The history of the last twenty years has been a sufficient lesson to us all to depend for necessities on OURSELVES ALONE; and I hope that twenty years more will place the American hemisphere under a SYSTEM OF ITS OWN, essentially peaceful and industrious, and not needing to extract its comforts out of the eternal fires raging in the old world."

the same prohibition of a resumption of it by them.* Every precedent and practice is in favor of the principles for which we contend, and every state has repeatedly acknowledged them, even nullificatory South Carolina. Who doubted this power when WILLIAM LOWMYER, and a majority of the delegation of South Carolina, voted for the tariff law of 1816? Nobody!—No voice had even been raised to question it. But it was reserved, and at a recent date, for some men to discover that those who made the constitution did not understand its meaning—that every congress was composed of a majority of fools, and that all the presidents of the United States, and all the chief justices, were arrant blockheads! This is the true state of the case, and notwithstanding at least four-fifths of the people admit or cleave to that power, as indispensable to the prosperity and duration of the American republic. I might say, ninety-nine hundredths of the people—for he that admits a right in the general government to protect the fruits of our soil, or the products of our workshops, in their transit to market, by vessels of war cruising even at the antipodes,—surely must grant a power in the same government to protect the farmers and others in the growth or manufacture of these very articles, located within the body and forming an integral part of the government, and reposing, as it were, immediately under the wings of the eagle—the emblem of this land of the free.† And it should be always recollected, that every bale of cotton goods, cask of nails, case of hats, trunk of boots or shoes, package of cabinet furniture, exported, as much, and as faithfully, represents flour and beef or pork exported, as the barrels of those last named articles, duly inspected and branded and entered on the custom house books, can possi-

*By the 3rd art. of the 7th sec. congress has power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations," &c. and by the 2nd art. of the 10th sec. the states are prohibited from laying duties on imports or tonnage, &c. By the embargo laws, the power to "regulate commerce" was so far extended as to cover its entire destruction, if thought expedient. If there is a right to destroy, the right to restrict cannot be doubted. The greater inevitably includes the lesser power.

†It is not worth while to mince the word—I regard that American merchant as a sheer knave, who calls upon the United States to protect him in his pursuits, and guard his ship and her cargo at the cannon's mouth, that he may make profit on his capital—and denies a right in the government of the United States to protect weavers, hatters and shoe-makers, peacefully employing their capital, which is labor, (the source of all capital,) at home, by which their wives and little ones are fed and clothed. If these "free trade" merchants are gods, let them shew their patents—let them fight their own battles—LET THEM PROTECT THEMSELVES. If a piracy happens at sea, though it affects property only, a vessel of war goes off with a hurrah to catch the villains!—but if a fraud is committed at the custom house, by which the property of a manufacturer is spoiled, no sensibility is roused, and the gentleman who commits it has credit for his sagacity—perhaps, even for his PERJURIES!

It is time to speak plainly about these things—and we will do it. We may as well employ British merchants as consume British cloths—and the people will soon say so.—IMPERATIVELY SAY SO.

[There has lately been a mighty out-ery among the ambassadors from the manufacturers of Yorkshire, who "lie abroad" for the benefit of those who pay them, because that the collector at New York has ordered all packages of cloths, reported at the dollar minimum, to the public stores, for examination. They, forsooth, complain of the proceeding as being tyrannical, injurious and unjust! THAT are a pretty set to make such complaints. How many thousand barrels of American flour are locked up in the English warehouses—because of English "regulations of trade" as to their own market? What package of American goods may pass into the hands of English merchants, previous to its special examination by English custom-house officers? Whatever so American may say in respect to this matter we can easily bear with—but it is sheer impudence in Englishmen to utter one word about it—impudence of supreme magnitude, and should be checked.]

bly do. It may be generally said, that every 100 dollars worth of goods manufactured in the United States, whether for the domestic or foreign demand, have, in the materials of which they are composed or the subsistence of the persons employed in making them, not less than 75 dollars worth of the products of our fields, forests and mines. Thus, if the manufactures of the United States have a general value of 500 millions a year (and I feel certain that this is less than the ultimate price of the various commodities of our mechanics, manufacturers and handicrafts), 375 millions of that value has its origin and resting place in lands and their productions. These things are not said slightly. Let no one be startled at the magnitude of the amounts suggested, but divide them among the 13 millions of persons to be supplied,—from anvil to skillets—ships to shav- ing boxes, from great coats to buttons at 2 cents per dozen,* and so on, through all the trades and manufactures, and it will not appear that I have adopted extravagant sums.

But we are called upon to cast away this mighty home-market and take up "free trade!" Do we not already export all that other nations will take from us? What American commodity is there that commands a high profit, to the American producer, in a foreign country? All are as prohibited, unless in small quantities or at particular places, except cotton. Grain or flour is virtually excluded—so are beef, pork, fish and all the rich products of the sea, as well as those of our forests and workshops; tobacco is taxed 1,000, and rice 100 per cent. The foreign market cannot be enlarged; yet some would embarrass and destroy the home demand! Were the ports of Cuba shut against our flour (though not more than 100,000 barrels have been annually received), the price would be diminished 25 cents per barrel; but ruin the market of New England for a million of barrels of flour from the middle and western states, and what would be the consequent reduction in price of all and every commodity of our farmers? whether could this then surplus million of barrels be sent? To "free trade" Great Britain?—that land of "philosophers," who theorize for our benefit and practice for their own!

There is no such thing as "free trade"—nor can there be, until nations are brought under the same standard of subsistence. If the United States were blessed with about two and an half millions of paupers—free white men hired out like black slaves, perhaps a system of free trade might be arranged between us and Great Britain, that would work to the yet further making of paupers in both countries! But Britain thinks she has enough of these already—and hence denies free trade to other nations, that they may assist in supporting them; and holds fast to her restrictive system, that foreign competition may not multiply her own wants! Generous John Bull!!!—Look at the facts stated concerning the whale fishery, in another part of this sheet. If our eastern brethren had free trade with England only in that, they would turn the balance of trade in our favor, and sweep every British ship engaged in the fisheries from every sea, by their superior patience, perseverance, and skill; and their fields "in the deep" might become nearly as valuable to our country as the fields of cotton. Aye, and thousands of MEN, (rocked on the wave), be reared, that would firmly grasp, and unconquerably uphold, the "starry banner," wherever a keel might proceed on the ocean.

There is a great excitement at the south against the protecting system. Why, we do not understand, except in that spirit which envies what it has not the virtue to imitate. The partisans of the new doctrines will not condescend to enlighten us—they must admit a reduced price of all the articles which they have to purchase, and yet charge extortion and monopoly on those who mainly supply them. They will not go into particulars. Like "I TUE KING" of Spain, they say, we are oppressed—and if not, we have a right to think so—and thinking so, THE MINORITY OUGHT TO GOVERN! South Carolina, urged on by a few mad politicians, seems half-ready to venture upon an experiment which certain British politicians have long thought that they themselves might succeed in—a dissolution of our union, and a return of the southern states to their ancient allegiance; and such, in fact, must be the irresistible result of present designs, if nullification triumphs—and other circumstances shall not render such allegiance nearly worthless.

That the "will of the majority to be rightful should be reasonable," is cheerfully admitted; but if the judgment of this rightfulness belongs exclusively to the minority, as claimed by the mail-caps of South Carolina, the ultima ratio, or an appeal to force, must decide the question; and to this the people of that state (though divided among themselves, and having within themselves a most fearful agent of decolation), are furiously urged. No objection is offered to a revision of the protecting laws—to a reduction of the "taxes" on the people, as pertaining to duties levied on certain goods imported—but these deny the right of the whole protecting system, and will prescribe all the articles on which duties may be levied, either for revenue or the "regulation of commerce." And who are they that pretend to this construction of the constitution and power of legislation, and claim an authority to enforce their decision?—About one half of the 257,873 people of the United States located in South Carolina, against more than ten millions of the people inhabiting other states! We in the majority would do much for the sake of harmony—yield much, even of our undoubted rights, (without abandoning principles) in a spirit of conciliation; but it must not be demanded that we shall give up the power to protect ourselves! And here the point is at issue. We will go far to accommodate, but cannot offer sacrifices to learn; and if the minority is to determine as well the expediency as the constitutionality of ALL public measures—(and for such South Carolina really contends), the sooner we know it the better! If South Carolina may nullify the tariff laws—Mississippi may do away the judiciary act—Delaware nullify the appropriation to the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, and take possession of the property—Missouri, under the guidance of col. Benton, make it a felony for any man to pay his honest debts in a solvent currency—Illinois, on the suggestion of gov. Edwards, nullify the land laws, and seize upon the property of the United States for the benefit of that state—Maine put a stop to all negotiations with England, and make war on New Brunswick—and Virginia, especially Virginia, splendidly led on by Mr. Randolph, make it a capital offence to count values by dollars and cents—tobacco, glorious tobacco, being the only just measure of worth in the "ancient dominion," even wherewith to purchase wives, as was the practice in those days which Mr. Randolph so dolefully laments have passed away, and never will return. In this state of things, nullification must end in the extinguishment of all power in the general government—fierce contests between the states—the victory of the strong, and the enslavement of the weak. AND IS SO IT MUST BE—IT MUST!

OLD TIMES. When George Washington, the father of his country, was installed president of the United States in 1789, he was clothed in American cloth. When John Hancock and Samuel Adams, the "rebels" excluded from the royal mercy and grace, were installed governor and lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, at the cradle of the revolution, in 1789, they were both dressed in homespun.* When James Madison, the father of the constitution, took his oath of office as president of the United States, in 1809, he was also clothed in the products of American labor. And it was just about this time that John Randolph disavowed the use of home-made goods, because it was thought "patriotic" to prefer them.

The last named, it is stated, attended to make his late speech to his "dear constituents," in a British built coach, drawn by four horses.

*The buttons on the coat of John Hancock were of silver, and of American manufacture—the device, a shepherd shearing his sheep—the motto, "you gain more by our lives than by our deaths."

MONEY has become excessively "scarce," and will be scarcer, unless some diversion in our favor should kindly be made by the people of Europe—a small thing, like a general war, a complete "row" in England, or a brisk and bloody civil contention in France. But the revenue is flourishing—and if its excess of 8 or 10 millions causes bankruptcies to the amount of 100 millions, or depreciations in property equal to the value of hundreds of millions, unhinging all the relations of society that England may have a market for her goods in America, may we not glory that the public debt is paying off, and that persons, who do not want money, will be forced to take it?

To be serious—the prospect of the coming winter is a grave one, and a serious depression will be extensively felt, unless on account of some fortunate incident. The product of the pauper-labor of England has been pressed into the United States to a ruinous extent, and every class of society, except office-holders, and others living on fixed revenues, will feel it. There is a doubt about the necessity of protecting the home industry, and yet all that we have to export—or, rather, all that other nations will receive, will not pay for even the manufactures of leather, hats, caps and bonnets that we use. We are glad however to observe that there is some advance in the price of flour—for the home demand. This will increase the circulation of values, and help to settle balances between individuals.

THE DUTY on coffee will be one cent per lb. on bohea tea 4 cents, souchong 10, hyson 12, imperial, &c. 25—on the 1st of January next. It is estimated that these reduced duties will affect the revenue in the sum of about 1,500,000 dollars, and yet the products of the duties on imports are enormous.

SUGAR. If a writer in the "Salem Gazette" had referred to the 38th or 39th vol. of "Niles' Register," for his facts concerning sugar, instead the 9th [1816],—he would have seen that protection, (or something else, I care not what), had mightily reduced the profits of the planters, and caused a supply of the commodity at a reduction in price, as compared with that of 1816, equal to the whole amount of the duty or "tax" imposed on the foreign article. The calculations then of what has been might as well have been "let alone." "Things as they are" most interest us.

TANNERIES. The capital invested in the tanneries of New York, is estimated at five millions of dollars. Their annual production is pretty nearly in the same sum.

BRITISH IRON TRADE. In addition to the facts stated in our last, we now learn that such is the ruinous depression in this branch of manufacture at the present time, that pig iron, which cannot be sold for less than £4 per ton, so as to remunerate the manufacturer, may now be bought in any quantities at £2 10s. per ton. The principal cause of the depression is the excessive quantity manufactured.

RESTITUTION. Treasury department, November 16, 1831.—The secretary of the treasury has received one hundred and seventy-five dollars, transmitted anonymously through the post office, as "a balance acknowledged at the confessionals, to be due unto the United States, by a member of the Catholic church."

[The drag-gaitered gentry who have long infested N. York, have defrauded us of millions—but there is little hope of reaching the consciences of these men, except through a swiftly-expected consumption of hemp. Is it not a shame, that three fourths of the whole importation of goods from England, at that port, is in the hands of men who are aliens to the United States.]

RAIL ROADS VERSUS CANALS. Among the selections from foreign newspapers in the National Gazette, we find the following—

"The Liverpool Albion relates a singular fact in relation to rail roads and canals. A bill has passed the British parliament during the present session, and received the royal assent, for converting the Manchester, Bolton and Bury canal into a rail road. This canal is eleven miles in length, and runs through one of the most populous, wealthy and important manufacturing districts in the country. It forms a part of the line intended for the proposed rail road from Liverpool to Leeds. The majority of the stockholders in the canal have spontaneously acquiesced in the change."

GOLD has been found, in considerable quantities in Indiana—and rich deposits have been discovered in parts of the low country of North Carolina, near Ransom's Bridge, about 200 miles east of the western mines in that state.

VERMONT. Mr. Slade, formerly a clerk in the department of state, and rejected by Mr. Van Buren, has been elected to congress from the district lately represented by the lamented Mallory—after many trials to make a choice. Mr. Slade was the anti-masonic candidate.

MASSACHUSETTS. The annual election for governor, lieutenant governor, and members of the legislature, took place last week. Three candidates were run for governor, and the latest return of votes stands thus:

For Mr. Lincoln (Nat. R. publican),	22,622
Lathrop, (Anti-Mason),	10,585
Morton, (Jackson),	9,038

It was thought by many that, after the publication of Mr. Lincoln's letter, the anti-masonic would not have offered a candidate—Mr. L. never having had any connection with the society to which they are opposed.

Yet another attempt to elect a member of congress from the Bristol district has failed—for Mr. Hodge 3,143, Mr. Ruggles 3,085, and 184 "scattering." Mr. H. wanting 54 votes of an election. So in the Essex North district—for Mr. Cushing 2,050, Mr. Kirtledge 1,591, Mr. Osgood 1,463, and 25 scattering—"no choice."

NEW YORK. The contest at the late general election in this state, seems to have rested almost wholly between the "Jackson" party and the anti-masonic. Of the assembly, the former has elected 93 members—and the whole "opposition" is put down at 35. The result is nearly the same as it was last year, when the Jackson party had 95 members. The senate has the same political character. The number of votes taken was small—no great deal of interest having been excited.

GEORGIA. Warm work seems to have been expected in this state, because it was feared that certain returns of votes for governor, not being altogether in the forms required by law, would not be handed over by the then governor to be counted. A correspondence was opened with Mr. Gilmer on the subject, but he declined to answer certain letters addressed to him, and "down with the usurper" was already the cry. But so it was that, whether these votes were counted or not, Mr. Lumpkin was declared to have the majority, and duly installed. Parties are exceedingly hot in Georgia—though, as we have more than once remarked, we do not know what the people are differing about. Perhaps they are touched with the old politics of New York, by which persons were transformed from democrats to federalists, or vice versa, while sleeping in their beds—the test sometimes suddenly changing from an opposition to a support of Messrs. Clinton, King, or other distinguished individuals—as the magician worked his wand. It seems that the political party opposed to gov. Lumpkin, has a small majority in both branches of the legislature.

KENTUCKY. The following is a statement of the vote for senator in congress, in the legislature of Kentucky:

In the senate.

For Henry Clay,	18
R. M. Johnson,	19
Warden Pope,	1

38

In the house of delegates.

Henry Clay,	55
R. M. Johnson,	45

Mr. Clay, with col. Johnson, and Mr. Rowan, the late senator, were all at Frankfort at the time of the election. When general Jackson, under the same circumstances, was elected a senator of the United States from Tennessee, he had a majority of 10 votes over Mr. Williams.

The Washington Globe uses the following language, in anticipation of the election of Mr. Clay. It suggested perjury and fraud in advance, on the legislature of Kentucky!

"It under these circumstances, Mr. Clay should come to the senate, he will but consummate his ruin. He will stand in that body, not as the representative of Kentucky, but of a few base men rendered infamous by the fraud perpetrated in electing him. He will be but the shadow of what he was once in congress, when he stood upon the basis of the democratic principles which he then avowed, and which the people of Kentucky still maintain. He will no longer represent his countrymen—but like an Irish patriot become an English pensioner, he will represent an odious oligarchy; and owing his station altogether to chicanery and management, he will be stripped of the dignity of his character, and will gradually sink into insignificance."

Since the election of a senator from Kentucky—the editors of the "Globe" are not any better pleased. Why not suffer the gentleman preferred to slide into "insignificance," as it is authoritatively said by the Globe that he "will?" We wish a truce to such rough impenchments.

STATE BANK OF TENNESSEE. The following is an extract from governor Carroll's message to the legislature of Tennessee, transmitted on the 19th ult.

"In the communication which I made at the commencement of the last session of the general assembly, I urged the propriety of a strict examination of the state bank, from a conviction that many of its officers and agents had disregarded the trust reposed in them, by using the public funds for their own private advantage. The joint committee to whom was referred the duty of enquiring into the condition of the bank, discovered that the officers of the principal institution at Nashville were defaulters to a large amount; but the near approach of the termination of the session, when this information was obtained, rendered it impracticable, at that time, to ascertain the precise deficiency. The new directory, however, were authorized to bring the business to a close as soon as possible; this they have not yet entirely accomplished, although great diligence has been used for that purpose. Nearly two hundred thousand dollars have been obtained from the cashier and clerk, and it is still to be feared that there is still a considerable sum in default. When it shall be accurately known, a hope is entertained, that the securities of the cashier will be disposed to settle, in a manner satisfactory to the state. Although there is every reason to apprehend, that a loss will be sustained at the principal bank in Nashville, yet it is believed that a much greater proportional deficiency will be found to exist at the agencies. The report of gen. Smith, of the examination which he has made of the agencies in West Tennessee, is now before me, and it exhibits extensive insolvencies on the part of the debtors, and great maceracies in the transaction of the public business by most of the agents. The amount due at the agencies in West Tennessee is about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and of this sum at least sixty thousand dollars, and probably more, will be certainly lost. The gentleman appointed to examine the East Tennessee agencies has not reported; but it cannot be otherwise than that some loss will also be sustained in that end of the state. From this view of the subject it is palpable, that the state has already incurred a heavy injury, and that most of its funds are in great jeopardy. What then can be done to secure the interest of the country? The answer is obvious. Measures must be immediately adopted to close the affairs of the bank with as little delay as possible, taking care not to oppress the debtor part of society."

MISSOURI. General Ashley, the independent candidate, has been elected to congress in the place of the late Mr. Pettis—beating Mr. Wells, the "regularly nominated Jackson candidate" by a very decided majority.

The general is in favor of internal improvements, the protection of domestic industry, the judiciary, and the bank of the United States. The people of no state have better reason to value a sound currency than those of Missouri, for the doings of the "rag barons" there were exceedingly oppressive—and then came the "loan office" scheme, to gnaw at what the "barons" had failed to obtain—and waste. Gen. Ashley is a decided supporter of the "American System."

MASONS. The Globe publishes with approbation a paragraph from the Anti-Masonic Star—which concludes by saying—"Mark our prediction. A majority of the Baltimore convention, in December, will be actual masons or their relatives."

The delegates from Baltimore are not masons. How their "relations" stand we do not know. But the nearest relations of one, we happen to know, are Episcopalians, and of the other Roman Catholics.

A letter published in the "Globe" from Indiana, says that the design of the opponents of the present administration in that state, is to prefer Mr. Clay for the presidency and Mr. Wirt, for the vice-presidency, and "thus puts down anti-masonry by electing two masons."

COTTON. From the Charleston Courier of Nov. 12. A friend, now on a visit to the eastern states, has sent to us, by the ship Dover, from Boston, a specimen of what is called "Peyta cotton," a small portion of which is in the seed, and a portion ginned; together with the seed taken from the latter, which may be examined at our office. It is stated to grow spontaneously on the coast of Peru, and that any quantity may be had in the seed, at one cent per pound. Two parcels have been imported into Boston, one of which, amounting to about 200 bales, has been ginned out by a common saw gin, and some of it sold at 15 cents per pound. The other parcel is in the process of being cleaned by hand. It was found to lose about 2-3ds of its weight in the process of cleaning. The merchants interested in these importations, according to the statement of our correspondent, seem to think if the duty on imported cottons were removed, that a good business may be done in the article. The staple is so long, that none of the machinery at present in use in the neighborhood of Boston can work it advantageously. Our correspondent also states, that there is a quantity of the seed which might be procured, should any of our planters be inclined to try it. The plant is a perennial one.

CANADIAN COMMERCE—free trade. The Montreal Gazette of Nov. 8, says, we mentioned some months ago, that a mercantile house in this city had made a shipment of flour to England, manufactured at the Gananoque mills in the upper province, from wheat imported from the U. States. The certificate of the custom house in this city, which accompanied the flour, stated these facts concerning its origin; and we are pleased to learn from the shippers of the flour, that they have received intelligence from Liverpool of its having been admitted on the same terms as colonial flour. Upon this point we now have the concurring opinions of the highest law officer in Upper Canada, of our custom house department, and of that in Great Britain, so that all doubts that may have been entertained on the subject, must be dissipated.

"SCARCITY AND SUPPLY." The small comparative reduction of four millions, in the circulation of the bank of England, has caused a most severe pressure for money in that country—for even that amount assesses a value, as it were, on all sorts of commodities.

The London Herald says—According to the governor of the bank of England the amount of the notes in circulation at present is, as near as can be ascertained, 17,600,000. Thus, within a short period, it appears that the currency has been reduced about four millions. No wonder that the prices of produce and manufactured goods are falling, or that the nation, in general, is in a state of distress. We do not blame the directors of the bank for withdrawing their issues—it might have been necessary for the safety of their establishment; nor do we blame them for keeping secret their affairs—that indeed is the work of the proprietors; but we say that no company should possess the power that this does—a power by which the directors are enabled to raise or depress the price of every thing at their pleasure. It is, however, quite clear to us that one of two things must be done—either the currency must be increased by the issue of one pound notes, or the expenditure of the state must be reduced at least one-third.

ENGLAND AND CHINA. By the brig Osprey, captain Caldwell, arriving at Charleston from St. Helena, intelligence is received that, on the 16th September, the East India company's sloop of war Cootie, arrived at St. Helena, with despatches for England, announcing that the English factories at Canton had been broken up by the Chinese, the servants attached to the factories had had their hands taken off, the likeness of King George torn down and trampled under foot, the trees in front of the factories torn up, &c. All commerce between the English and Chinese ceased after the 10th August, and the British ships had all left Macao.

[If the ports of the "celestial empire" should be blockaded by the English, as it is possible that they may be, what suffering will there be in all the world for the want of those things which the emperor has been graciously pleased to let the barbarians carry away, (in exchange for silver), that they might not perish—such as tea, porcelain and fans!

[Other accounts say that things had not proceeded to such extremities, between the British and Chinese—but speak of serious difficulties between them.]

COLONY OF LIBERIA. In the town of Monrovia, 55 new wood and stone houses were erected; Caldwell and Millsburg, and some towns for recaptured negroes, share in the general prosperity. Francis Devanny, an emancipated slave, has accumulated a property worth $20,000. Mr. Warring, another colonist, sold goods to the amount of $70,000; two of the colonists own vessels, and would trade with the United States, had they a national flag. Net profits on ivory and dye woods, passing through the hands of the settlers in one year, was $30,756; eight vessels traded to the colony last year, from Philadelphia.

In agriculture, every thing grows spontaneously; there is no winter; one continual spring blooming. There are six schools in successful operation. It is calculated that every child in the colony shall be educated; 100 from the neighboring clans now attend the schools in Liberia. Divine service and Sunday schools are regularly attended. There are three religious societies, Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian. Meetings on the Sabbath and week day evenings. Three Swiss missionaries reside there. The Christian religion appears to have some influence on the surrounding tribes. The population is 2,000—they have 6 militia companies, a fort, 20 pieces of cannon, and arms enough to arm 1,000 men. [N. Y. Evan.

MR. BARBOUR. We met with the following in a letter from the Washington correspondent of the "United States Gazette," and give it a place the more readily, because we have heard the same facts stated by persons who were present at the discussion spoken of—and the like of which, with a complete overthrow of Mr. Barbour's theories, we had the pleasure to witness at Washington in 1828, in an argument between him and our late valued and dear friend, Abraham H. Schenck, of Matteawan, New York. Never was the mastery of a practical man more fully shewn than on the occasion alluded to.

While the anti-masons were in Baltimore, Mr. P. P. Barbour arrived at Barnum's, on his way to Philadelphia. He was very eager to come in conflict with some of the tariff men from the eastward, and threw himself out for that purpose. After some skirmishing about, he encountered a Rhode Islander, a merchant from Providence, who at once entered the lists against him. Mr. Barbour commenced with a pretty vigorous attack on the tariff, as productive of ruinous consequences to the south. He was requested to come down from generalities, and specify the articles on which the tariff operated with such a destructive effect. He selected accordingly, and ran through his list with his accustomed volubility. The Rhode Islander then produced a comparative price-current, from which he demonstrated that the articles which had been specified, are now to be obtained in the south at a lower rate than before the tariff was imposed. Mr. Barbour referred to some other articles, but he was again met with the same plain matter of fact refutation. Driven from all these points, he discharged a tremendous volley of theories and abstractions, and pushed off with a declaration that, if the southern people believed themselves to be oppressed it amounted to the same thing as if they were oppressed; and that, if by the repeal of the tariff, which they solicited, they injured themselves, it was nobody's business but their own.—But he was not permitted to enjoy even this position. His opponent steadily denied that the southern citizens had any right to the gratification of a mere caprice, when that gratification was to be attained by the ruin of so large a portion of the country—it must be ruined by a repeal of the tariff. Millions of capital suddenly thrown out of employ, and splendid establishments overthrown in an instant, and thousands of citizens rendered at once poor and without a vocation, were considerations too weighty to be invoked for no other purpose than to satisfy a few restless politicians and enthusiastic theorists that they were in an error. The triumph of the eastern merchant over the southern lawyer, was considered by the auditors as complete; and several were solicitous to find out the pedigree and profession of the victor. They were informed that he was a man of no proud pretensions, but was a fair specimen of the average population of the section of country from which he came. His knowledge was practical; and the superiority of practical knowledge over high-sounding theory, was never more perfectly demonstrated.

THE FREE TRADE CONVENTION. The correspondent of the New York Enquirer, who professes to have been a spectator of the proceedings of this body, gives the following ludicrous caricature in one of his letters*—

After the proposition of Mr. Gallatin was quietly disposed of—and it was a difficult task to do so—Mr. Johnson, of South Carolina, made a motion which again excited the deepest expectations of the crowd. "Now for a fight! now for a fight!" "Here comes the thunder and lightning at last!" He objected to the clause which recognised the incidental power to protect manufactures. This motion almost led to a complete disruption of harmony. The clouds lowered and mutters of the thunder were heard. I never saw any assembly so near plunging into a fiery debate which might last for days. Mr. Sherman, of Connecticut, and Theodore Sedgwick, had almost broken down every feeling of caution. Happily, Mr. Sedgwick threw into his speech some eccentric views, which created a general smile over the convention. His views of the tariff were quite original. He believed it to be perfectly constitutional but radically unjust. His objections to it rested on a higher ground than unconstitutionality—the tariff laws were contrary to the laws of God and nature, and that was the reason of his opposition. He appeared to believe free trade was a God-Almighty principle; and, therefore, all tariff men were abominable sinners, and irrecoverably damned. This made the southern nullifiers smile and others laugh outright. You will be surprised when I tell you that the South Carolina nullifiers are sane, reasonable men, when compared with those from Boston. During this latter debate, it was the greatest difficulty in the world to prevent one of these Boston gentlemen from getting up and "letting slip the dogs of war"—opening the very chambers of the tempest and hurricane. There is a comical anecdote told of three true blue southern nullifiers laying hold—one on each arm, a third by the tail of his coat—and keeping one of the red-hot Boston nullifiers quietly in his seat, in spite of his attempts to make a flaming speech. A southern nullifier only believes that a single state has a right to nullify a tariff law—the Boston nullifier goes much further—"damn the union," says he, "who's afraid? Not only has a state, but a town—a county—nay, a single man, has a right to nullify a law of congress and secede from the union."

THE MILITIA SYSTEM. Many extravagancies have been exhibited at New York, Albany, &c. to destroy the present militia system, by ridicule. Falstaff's account of his recruits, is a moderate thing compared with these parades! The descriptions of the dresses and equipments of the "soldiers," shew that, in inventive talents, our people are not confined to the discovery of the quadrant, the cotton gin, the application of steam to boats and land carriages, the making of machine cards, and other "notions."

FASHIONS COME ROUND. In 1663, the legislature of Massachusetts passed the following law:

"And hereafter, no person whatever shall make any garment for women with sleeves more than an ell wide."

Sleeves a yard and a quarter wide! No small latitude this for the daughters of the first settlers. If this law was deemed necessary, the fashion must have far exceeded an ell. The dresses of the "charming creatures" of those times, probably rivalled the exquisite amplitude of the bishops of the present day.

[Boston Centinel.]

DOMESTIC SLAVE TRADE. According to the New Orleans papers, there were imported into that port during the week commencing on the 16th ult. from the various ports of the U. States, 371 slaves, principally from Virginia—as follows:

By the Tribune, from Alexandria,	141
Sarah, from Baltimore,	4
United States, from Norfolk,	150
James Ramsay, from Baltimore,	2
Atlas, from Charleston,	60

Mr. JEFFERS, of New Jersey, who, as we thought was in Guatemala, having charge of the affairs of the U. States, very unexpectedly returned to New Jersey, and proceeded to Washington, "to explain (says the account) certain charges of forgery brought against him." And the Cincinnati Gazette of the 15th inst. says that the department of state had sent to the clerk of the court in that city, and obtained a copy of the indictment for forgery,—with a certificate that Mr. Jeffers had forfeited his recognizance. The last that we had heard of this gentleman until now, was that he had embarked at Pensacola, on the 11th October, in the U. S. schooner Porpoise, for the republic of Central America.

A QUESTION STARTED! In a laborious examination of old papers, to gather facts for an interesting purpose,—I oftentimes meet with things that amuse, and some that astonish me—among them many queer sayings of my old friend, Thomas Richee—which are valuable, seeing that a file of his paper cannot be obtained for reference to his vagaries; and thus, as has been severely said of medical gentlemen, his works are covered—almost by oblivion. What a fate for the great autocrat of "orthodoxy!"

The following, however, amused me,—and I thought that it ought to have a renewed and full publication, for the benefit of all men, and the Hebrews in particular! But this "I, MORDECAI MANUEL NOAH," (I always thought his middle name was "Manasseh"), now holds a high and responsible office under the United States—and I must needs think that the fact never occurred to president Jackson when he appointed him, that the said MORDECAI stands before us as a SOVEREIGN PRINCE, in command of a whole nation, making laws and assessing taxes, without the jurisdiction of the U. States, as well as within the same! The great question then is—is this sovereign prince, the said "MORDECAI"—deriving his title, as he gives us to understand, from

*We wish to be considered, however, as placing little faith in what is stated in the New York Courier, except when speaking against itself, or the party that it happens, for the time being, to adhere to. (Ed. Rzs.)

"JEHOVAH," eligible to the office of surveyor of the port of New York? Will the judge of the United States court, (who lately volunteered an opinion that certain of the most important acts of congress were unconstitutional), examine this matter and give us his decision? If Mordecai's office as "judge of Israel," is valid—the title of gen. Jackson to the presidency would appear somewhat questionable!

Ceremonies at the laying of the corner stone of the city of Ararat!!

BY M. M. NOAH.

[Extract from the order of procession.]

"Rev. clergy, stewards with corn, wine and oil.

"Bible, square and compass, borne by a master mason, the rod of Israel in black, wearing the judicial robes of crimson silk, trimmed with ermine, and a richly embossed gold medal suspended from the neck."

The procession enters the church. On the communion table lay the corner stone of ARARAT, with the following inscription in Hebrew:

"Hear, O Israel! The Lord is our God.—The Lord is one." Ararat, the Hebrew refuge, founded by MORDECAI MANUEL NOAH, in the month of Tisri, 5585, corresponding with September, 1825, and in the 50th of American Independence."

"PROCLAMATION."

[Extracts.]

"Whereas it has pleased ALMIGHTY GOD to manifest to his chosen people the approach of that period when, in fulfilment of the promises made to the race of Jacob, and as a reward for their pious constancy and triumphant fidelity, they are to be gathered from the four quarters of the globe, and to resume their rank and character among the governments of the earth."

"I, MORDECAI MANUEL NOAH, citizen of the United States of America, late consul of the said states for the city and kingdom of Tunis, high sheriff of New York, counsellor at law, and by the GRACE OF GOD, GOVERNOR AND JUDGE OF ISRAEL, have issued this MY proclamation."

"The desired spot in the state of New York, to which I hereby invite my beloved people throughout the world, in common with those of every religious denomination, is called GRAND ISLAND, and on which I shall lay the foundation of a city of refuge, to be called ARARAT."

"In His (JEHOVAH'S) name do I revive, renew and re-establish the government of the Jewish nation, under the auspices and protection of the constitution and laws of the United States of America. Confirming and perpetuating all our rights and privileges, our name, our rank, and our power, among the nations of the earth, as they existed and were recognized under the governments of the judges. And I HEREBY ENJOIN it upon all our pious and venerable rabbis; our presidents and elders of synagogues, chiefs of colleges, and brethren in authority, throughout the world, to circulate and make known this my proclamation, and to give it full publicity, credence, and effect."

"It is my will, that a census of the Jews throughout the world be taken, and returns of persons together with their age and occupation, be registered in the archives of the synagogue where they are accustomed to worship."

"Those of our people who, from age, local attachments, or from any other cause, prefer remaining in the several parts of the world which they now respectively inhabit, and who are treated with liberality by the public authorities, are permitted to do so."

"Those Jews who are in the military employment of the different sovereigns of Europe, are enjoined to keep in their ranks until further orders, and conduct themselves with bravery and fidelity."

"I command that a strict neutrality be observed in the pending war between the Greeks and the Turks, enjoined by considerations of safety towards a numerous population of Jews now under the oppressive dominions of the Ottoman porte."

"I abolish, forever, polygamy among the Jews."

"I prohibit marriages or giving Keduction, without both parties are of a suitable age, and can read and write the language of the country which they respectively inhabit."

"Prayers shall forever be said in the Hebrew language, but it is recommended that occasional discourses on the principles of the Jewish faith, and the doctrines of morality generally, be delivered in the language of the country, together with such reforms which, without departing from the ancient faith, may add greater solemnity to our worship."

"A capitation tax of three shekels in silver per annum, or one Spanish dollar, is hereby levied upon each Jew throughout the world."

"I do hereby name as commissioners" [there follows a list of commissioners] "to aid and assist in carrying into effect the provisions of this my proclamation, with powers to appoint the necessary agents in the several parts of the world, and to establish emigrating societies, in order that the Jews may be concentrated and capacitated as a distinct body, living at the head of each kingdom or republic such presiding officers as I shall, upon their recommendations, appoint."

"I entreat to be remembered in your prayer, and lastly and most earnestly. I do enjoin you to—"keep the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in His ways, to keep His statutes and His commandments and His judgments and His testimonies, as it is written in the laws of Moses, that thou mayest prosper in all thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest thyself."

"Given at Buffalo, in the state of New York, this second day of Tisri, in the year of the world 5585, corresponding with the fifteenth day of September, 1825, and in the fiftieth year of American Independence."

By the judge "A. B. SEIXAS, sec'y pro tem."

BRIEF NOTICES.

Mr. Adams, late president of the United States, after the close of the literary convention at New York, proceeded to Washington, and arrived there last week.

Convictions. Many convictions of slaves have recently taken place in North Carolina, and execution swiftly followed. Several free negroes had been tried, and were acquitted.

Very important! Anderson, the English singer, who was driven off the stage in New York, has had the like calamity at Boston. A little more civility as to the people among whom he was coming to get money, would have prevented these things. The songster seems to have been very free with his tongue about the "Yankees."

Mrs. Chapman. This miserable woman, charged with being the accomplice of the Spaniard Mina in the murder of her husband—(immediately after whose decease she married the adventurer), has been arrested in western Pennsylvania, in the midst of her relatives, and lodged in the jail at Erie, by Mr. Blaney, high constable at Philadelphia, who thus obtains the reward of $300 offered for her apprehension, by the governor of the state.

Sing Sing. There are in this state prison of New York, 1013 criminals—chiefly employed in quarrying and dressing marble. Only 12 were in the hospital.

Steamboats in the West. It appears from published documents on the subject, that from 1811, when the first western steamboat was launched, to the spring of 1831, there had been employed on those waters 402 steam boats, of which 220 were in use last year, and 182 not in existence. Of these, 66 were worn out, 37 snagged, 16 burnt, 3 run down by other boats, 4 or 5 stove by ice, sand bars, rocks, &c. and 30 destroyed by causes not exactly known. No less than 60 boats, within the writer's knowledge, have been building or contracted for within the present year.

Cavalry. The journal des Haras, published at Copenhagen, says, 15,000 Danish horses were sold in the first eight months of that year to Prussia, France, and Belgium, which produced a sum of two millions of thalers.

Broom Corn. It is said that 50,000 bushels of the seed of this corn were raised in Northampton, Mass. in the present year, and it will sell for 50 cents a bushel, to make whiskey. The manufacture of corn brooms is a large business.

Explosions. The principals and their seconds in a late affair of "honor," who crossed from Kentucky to Indiana in a steam ferry boat, to settle their dispute, in which one of them was slightly wounded, being on their return to Louisville—both boilers of the boat burst, and at least four persons were killed—among them the engineer and one of the firemen. Those who had escaped the explosion of gun powder, also escaped that of steam.

Dimensions of the capitol and its grounds. The ground within the iron railing is 2½ acres; length of foot walk, outside of railing, ½ of a mile and 185 feet.—The building is as follows: length of front 352 feet 4 inches, depth of wings 121 feet 6 inches, east projection and steps 65 feet, west do. do. 83 feet—covering 1½ acre and 1,820 feet. Height of wings to top of balustrade 70 feet, height to top of centre dome 145 feet; representatives' room (greatest length) 95 feet, representatives' room (greatest height) 60 feet, senate chamber (greatest length) 74 feet, senate chamber (greatest height) 42 feet; great central rotunda 96 feet in diameter and 96 feet high.

The north wing was commenced in 1792, finished in 1800, and cost $480,262 57; the south wing was commenced in 1803, finished in 1808, and cost $308,808 41; centre building was commenced in 1818, finished in 1827, and cost $957,647 35.

New Orleans. A considerable excitement prevailed in this city, and a part of the presbytery of the church of St. Louis was partially demolished, because that the rector had refused to inter, with the rites of the Catholic church, the remains of a person who had committed suicide. Such is one of the canons of that church.

Cholera morbus. It appears that twelve of the crew of the U. S. ship John Adams, (lately at Constantinople), have died of diarrhoea, or cholera morbus—but that the health of the ship had been restored.

A powder magazine at Savannah, lately exploded, and five persons, employed in removing some powder, were instantly killed, and three others, near the premises, soon died of the wounds they received. The bodies of all were horribly mangled.

Unnatural marriage. A good deal is said in the Philadelphia papers of a brother and sister, natives of England, who have been recently married—also uttering suspicions that they had made way with the man's late wife—having coupled a short time after her decease.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrivals at New York from England and France, bring London advices to the 11th, and Paris to the 12th October.

FRANCE.

In the chamber of deputies, on the 10th October, the bill providing for the abolition of hereditary peerage, passed by a majority of 238. The king had granted permission to all the Belgian officers in the service of France, to return to the service of their country—those who have been three years imprisoned to be promoted a grade higher.

ENGLAND.

The reform bill had been rejected in the house of lords by a majority of 41. This decision has thrown the whole country into a state of fearful excitement.—The debate on the night of its rejection, was carried on with great animation. While the opposition deprecated its passage as an infraction so serious that it was calculated to destroy the constitution, the ministers, and others friendly to its passage, advocated it as a measure called for by present abuses, and intended to preserve the constitution, itself; that it, or some other measure of similar character, must be adopted, or the people would resort to the alternative of revolution. It was supposed that the king would create new peers, by conferring titles on the eldest sons of lords friendly to the bill, and thus secure a majority in the house of lords. Supported, as the ministry are, both by the king and the people, it is supposed that they will remain in power, notwithstanding their defeat. Earl Grey, the premier, had declared to that effect prior to the defeat of the bill.

POLAND AND RUSSIA.

As was to have been anticipated, the army of Poland has been dispersed, and the triumph of her oppressor may be said to be complete. Ruzski retreated from Modlin into Galicia, being unable to keep his army together. The troops at Modlin had surrendered, so that all hope of Polish liberty, for the present, must be deferred. The emperor of Russia had organized a provisional government at Warsaw, and placed field marshal Pukewitch at its head. Upwards of 1,500 of the most distinguished leaders of the Polish revolution had been arrested and imprisoned at Warsaw—and, to complete the picture of oppression, the Russian troops had fired upon the prisoners confined in one of the wings of the prison, under pretence of revolt among the malefactors, though it was known that three-fourths of those there were imprisoned for political offences. The cholera continued to spread.

PORTUGAL.

Don Miguel still refused to punish the Portuguese sailor who attempted to assassinate the commander of a French man of war, notwithstanding the agent of France had demanded it.

The British fleet had been so arranged as to give them the possession of the ports of Oporto, Lisbon and Figueira, and the English residents had become more at ease than they had been.

The appearance of the British fleet in the Tagus had thrown Don Miguel and his ministers into the utmost consternation, for fear they were intended to co-operate with Don Pedro. The garrison of Madeira had been reinforced. Another insurrectionary movement in one of the regiments, had been suppressed.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.

The king of Belgium had instructed his minister at London to obtain a prolongation of the armistice with Holland, Achille Murat, who recently entered into the Belgian army, has been dismissed, in consequence of a requisition to that effect from the French king, who grounded his demand upon the fact of young Murat's being one of the Bonaparte family. Both governments are continuing their preparations to resume hostilities should it be necessary, at the expiration of the armistice.

It was said that the Swedish consul at Antwerp had been directed to do no act which could be construed into an acknowledgment of king Leopold.

ITALY.

This country is in a very feverish condition, and every precaution taken by the police to repress the insurrectionary spirit, which every where manifests itself.

SPAIN.

The government had increased its army from 20 to 30,000 men, and were despatching them to the frontiers of Portugal. They were to be commanded by gen. Morillo. Ferdinand seems to manifest a disposition to take sides with Don Miguel, if he dare do so.

GREECE.

Admiral Miaulis and his associates in the late revolutionary movement against the power of the president, Capo d'Istria, were blockaded, by the admirals of the three powers, in the port of Hydra; where, it is said, the people had arrested them, and that they had sued for pardon of the president.

NEW YORK CONVENTION.

The following communication, forwarded to the chairman of the permanent committee by the member to whom it was addressed, was laid before the executive committee, and ordered to be published.

Boston, Nov. 11, 1831.

SIR:—I noticed among the statements made to the tariff convention recently held in N. York, that every branch of American industry was protected, with but few exceptions; and among these exceptions the fisheries were mentioned. This would appear to be the case to most persons—but to a practical man, who is connected with the business, and has looked to the continuance of the inn-act protection with deep solicitude, (so far as regards the whale fishery), it appears quite the contrary; and from the following statements it will be made manifest, that, if the cotton and woollen factories are not sustained by an adequate protection, a large proportion of the ships engaged in the sperm whale fishery must go out of employment, or be thrown upon the freighting business—thus destroying a vast nursery of seamen, and, at the same time, creating a ruinous competition in a branch of industry already represented, by many who are engaged in it, as not worth pursuing. It is a well established fact, that from one-fourth to one-third of all the sperm oil imported, is used in the factories of cotton and woollen goods—averaging about half a gallon to each cotton and woollen spindle; besides what is used by the numerous mechanics connected with factories. By the statement herewith handed, you will perceive the vast increase in the importation of sperm oil since 1815; and the continued increase or diminution is entirely dependent on the protection afforded to the manufactures of the country, and the duty now existing on the importation of olive oil. Of the last mentioned oil, considerable quantities are used in the woollen factories, giving employment to a considerable amount of tonnage—which quantity, no doubt, would be much increased if the duty were taken off; but this reduction of duty on olive oil would be very fatal to a considerable portion of the interest engaged in that valuable branch of domestic industry, the sperm whale fishery,—supposing that protection to the woollen manufacture is continued. It, however, that protection be withdrawn, the duty on olive oil may as well be removed as not, as but little will be wanted in the country, (excepting salad oil), and the law will be a dead letter. To give you an idea of the value of the protecting laws to the ship-builders, rope makers, sail makers, coopers, coasting trade, farmers, &c., as well as to the country generally, I herewith furnish you with some of the principal articles which are used by the present fleet of three hundred ships, as often as they are fitted for sea—Viz:

30,000 barrels of beet and pork,
18,000 bolts of duck,
3,000 tons of iron hoops,

6,000,000 staves,

2,000 tons cordage and whale warp, with large quantities of iron for harpoons, lances, spades, blubber-hooks and camboose grates; much molasses, rice, beans, peas, corn, tea, coffee, sugar, &c. and not less than 6,500 officers and men to man the ships. These ships give more employment to mechanics, of various descriptions,—I should think twice as much, as the same number of tons engaged in any other trade. The sperm oil ships require to be coppered every voyage, and the quantity of copper consumed by the 300 ships will average annually 700,000 pounds, which, with the nails used to put it on, will be equal to three quarters of a million pounds, annually. The quantity of sperm oil imported for 1815 was 3,944 bbls. of 31½ gal. each and, for 1831, the import of sperm oil will be about one hundred and ten thousand barrels, and the consumption is equal to the supply: ninety-seven thousand barrels have already arrived. The quantity of the common whale oil, annually imported, has been about equal to the import of sperm oil, till this year; when it will exceed that of sperm oil. The whale oil already imported, since Jan. 1, 1831, is one hundred and twelve thousand barrels, and there probably will be a further import of 5 or 6 thousand barrels before the 31st December 1831. The whale oil is chiefly exported to Europe, as well as the whale bone—the latter amounting to over one hundred thousand pounds. This article is taken exclusively from the common or black whale. The sperm oil is consumed within the United States, as no other country excepting Great Britain, makes much use of it—and she, by her protective laws, excludes the sperm oil from this country by a duty of about 45 cts on the gallon. But for such duty we should drive the British from the whale fishery, [generally] notwithstanding the bounty paid by their government for its protection. We should also destroy the French fishery, but for like protection afforded by the French government, in duties and bounties.

The United States is the only government where the people are extensively engaged in the whale fishery, which does not encourage this branch of industry by a bounty.

I have not been able to condense my remarks on this very important subject, within a narrower compass. It is a branch of great magnitude in a national point of view; but, I regret to say, that it is very imperfectly understood. It is a better nursery for seamen than any other; as almost every ship carries out from 5 to 10 green hands—whereas, in the merchant service, the ships carry so few men that they are necessarily obliged to take able bodied seamen, to the exclusion of green hands.

Yours, very respectfully,

C. W. CARTWRIGHT.

The quantity of sperm candles, manufactured from 100,000 bbls. sperm oil, is rising two and a half millions of pounds. This part of the business came near escaping my recollection.

C. W. C.

The editor of the REGISTER takes leave to add a few particulars and remarks.

Great Britain allows a bounty of one pound per ton on every vessel that shall proceed and return from the whale fishery in the Greenland sea or Davis Straits, or the seas adjacent.

Special bounties, some as high as six hundred pounds on a vessel, engaged in the southern, or sperm whale fishery, and bringing home not less than 30 tons of oil, or head matter, have been allowed. The details are too extensive for insertion—but the preceding shows the spirit of the British laws, as to bounties on the whale fisheries.

The protection is in the duties imposed on oil, Train oil, &c. if imported in British vessels, owned in Europe, and navigated according to law, pays a duty of 5s. per tun of 252 galls.—if in vessels owned in certain plantations, from 13s. 4d. to 5l. 10s. 10d.—per tun—but if the product of foreign fishing, 22l. 3s. 4d. per tun. And on sperm oil, there is paid on the first class of British vessels, 1s. 3s. 3d. per tun, and, if of foreign fishing, 34l. 18s. 3d. per tun. So that the British market is completely shut against American competition. There is no doubt, if the trade were free, that no British ship would be employed in the whale fishery. The industry and perseverance, economy and skill of our fishermen, is without rivalry.

Another gentleman computes the annual product of our whale fishery at 3,500,000 dollars, and the value of the ships at $7,500,000.

The importance of this employment, as a nursery for seamen, may be partially conjectured from the fact—(communicated soon after the event by a distinguished officer of the navy), that among the crew of the Constitution frigate, when she captured the Cyane and Levant, were more than two hundred free holders. They had been fishermen; and the matter stated shews the character of this people.

The communication of Mr. Cartwright passed to the permanent committee through the hands of a woollen manufacturer. He says that he uses 4000 gallons of olive oil annually, and that, if the duty on that article be a tax, he would save $1000 a year by taking it off. But he regards such duty as indispensable to the success of the whale fishery, and will not agree to abandon it.

But, if the writer of these additional remarks is not misinformed by those who ought to know all the facts, (and he hopes to shew them by references to prices current, at a future period), the price of olive oil has always advanced or declined with the price of sperm oil; the competition of the latter having the usual tendency of increased supply, to keep down the cost of the former.

SPEECHES IN THE N. Y. CONVENTION.

There was not much speaking in this body. The members were far more disposed to do than to talk—though there was an abundance of talent present to have done the latter, and well. We have inserted the plain and practical illustrations of Mr. Ellsworth, of New York, and Mr. Brown, of Massachusetts, as to frauds on the revenue, &c. and it will not be an easy thing to set any of their statements aside. We shall now present a sketch of the speech of Mr. P. A. Brown, of Pennsylvania, which is a clear and distinct account of the early views of the American people, and of their representatives, as to the right and necessity of protecting the domestic industry—no doubt of the power having been entertained. We shall yet add sketches of a few other speeches to show the spirit that prevailed in this great assembly, and pre-act, perhaps, some new facts to inquirers after truth.

Thursday, October 27.

Mr. Brown, of Pennsylvania, submitted a resolution to the effect that the committee appointed to prepare an address to the people should be instructed to present a clear and comprehensive view of the tariff, or American System; showing that it is not only constitutional, but a part of the plan of our government; that it has been at all times studiously cherished, and that it was the principal cause of the abrogation of the act of confederation, and of the adoption of the present constitution.

In supporting this resolution, Mr. Brown called the attention of the convention to three propositions laid down by the convention lately assembled in Philadelphia, in their address to the people of the union, viz: First, the government of this country is a government of opinion—secondly, that the constitutionality of an act of congress does not depend on any decision of the judiciary; and thirdly, that the people have a right to resist any act of congress which they may consider unconstitutional. He thought that every member of the convention would at once pronounce such doctrines wholly unfounded, and it generally received, of dangerous tendency. The first of these propositions was in direct contradiction to the opinion of the best writers and speakers with whom he was acquainted, all of whom concurred in declaring that ours was a government not of opinions, but of laws. The second proposition was equally unsound—and as to the last, which asserted the right of the people, under this government of opinion, not only to decide on the constitutionality of an act of congress, but also to resist it if deemed unconstitutional, he presumed its object would readily be seen by every member of this body. It would have been going too far for the Philadelphia convention to recommend, in terms, the resistance of any law that might be deemed merely impolitic. It was necessary first to pronounce it unconstitutional, before they could countenance resistance to its authority, and a consequent separation of the states. This assertion of the unconstitutionality of the existing revenue laws, must be met, and that not by mere counter assertion, but by shewing that those laws were in strict accordance with the constitution. This could readily be done; and it was his wish that it might be done by the committee in plain and simple terms, such as might readily be understood by every citizen of the union, without the necessity of a legal education to comprehend it. It was necessary that this important truth should be put in a plain, distinct, and conspicuous view before the people.

The reasons he had to offer in support of his views of the subject, would consist chiefly, Mr. Brown said, in hints and references to documents which he had sought for with a view to lay them before this convention; and he thought they would show conclusively that the doctrine of the constitutionality of our tariff laws was well founded.

He would in the first place refer to the remarkable language employed by the body in Philadelphia—who declares that a numerous and respectable party in the union question the right to establish a system of protecting duties, and deny the constitutional power of congress to enact it. They did not assert that the tariff of 1828, or that of 1824, or that of 1816, was unconstitutional; but they put forth a round assertion that the entire system of our tariff laws, in other words that what is usually designated as the American System, is so. In ordinary cases the absurdity of such a position would of itself be a sufficient refutation—for he begged gentlemen to consider, that as it was not pretended that a power to regulate trade existed in the legislature of the states, nor contended for, that the people possessed that power individually and personally—when the ground was taken that congress did not possess power to enact such a system, as that called the protecting or American System it was tantamount to a declaration that the United States must remain without any tariff system: it was advancing the anomaly of a government without power to collect a revenue, or to protect the property, trade and manufactures of its people. This surely was too absurd to need refutation under any ordinary circumstances: but the occasion now called for it.

Mr. B. begged the indulgence of the convention while he should occupy a few moments in considering the arguments brought to support such extravagant and absurd propositions as those he had quoted.

The assertion that a law is unconstitutional, was the easiest of all things to be made: but, fortunately, if not true, it was the easiest of all things to refute: because these states enjoyed the blessing of a written constitution: we were not situated as some of the states in the old world were, who though they boasted of a free constitution, had to seek it as laid down in a number of different elementary books. Ours was in a single instrument: The doctrine was the easiest to refute, because, happily, the country had a tribunal independent of the power which enacted the laws, whose especial, and, (as he hoped in the end to shew), whose exclusive duty it was to decide the question, whether any act of congress was constitutional or otherwise. Under such circumstances, enjoying a written constitution, and a tribunal clothed with competent authority to decide whether the laws were in contravention of it or not, it seemed strange that for the last forty-two years, there should have been tariff laws enacted, and certain portions of the country said to be suffering under them, and yet none of the sufferers, though able and intelligent, should once have thought of bringing the question of their constitutionality before the proper tribunal established for the very purpose of passing upon it. Why was this? Why must it have been? The answer was easy. It was perfectly well known to those individuals, that the tribunal in question would at once and without hesitation, have pronounced those laws to be in conformity with the constitution.

But the very learned gentleman whom he had quoted endeavored to escape from so obvious a difficulty, and by a mode that was very ingenious. They held that the constitutional validity or invalidity of a law did not depend on the question whether the judiciary affirmed it or not, because a law might, in its effects, be subversive of the constitution, and yet, on its face, in apparent conformity with it, and superior to all legal exceptions. Now, Mr. B. said, he referred to the understandings of all whom he addressed to say whether any thing could be more unsound than the doctrine of this evasion. A law, surely must be either constitutional or unconstitutional. It could not be both constitutional and unconstitutional at one time. If unconstitutional, it was null and void, and had no effect on any department of government, nor on any individual in the community—it was not constitutional for any purpose whatever. If null at all, it was null for all purposes whatever. What did they tell us? that a law might be constitutional in its form, and yet unconstitutional in its effects, and of this the people were to judge; and if they deemed its effects unconstitutional, they might resist the law, because this is a government of opinion. But such a doctrine contravened that sound and important one that the judiciary was provided as a check upon the legislative power. If their doctrine should prevail, the judiciary might as well be extinct. Fortunately, however, for the people of the union, if opinion was to settle this matter, the question had already come before the supreme court, consisting of no less men than Marshall, Cushman, Patterson, Chase, Washington and Moore. The opinion of these men might be found in 1 Cranch, p. 176, and it was so directly in point, and went so fully to put the question at rest that he begged leave to read a part of it to the convention. [Here Mr. B. quoted the opinion at some length.]

This doctrine, which these judges pronounced too extravagant to be seriously asserted, was nevertheless not too extravagant for the convention which met at Philadelphia grately to put forth in an address to the people of the United States.

Mr. B. here again quoted the address, in which it was affirmed that congress might with a view to support a system increase the duties even to a prohibition; and yet their act be conformed in terms to the letter of the constitution, and the courts would consequently affirm the law; but the constitutional obligation bound all parts of the government alike, and a violation of it was no less a violation, because the forms of the constitution were preserved. The doctrine was manifestly unsound.—According to this the question whether a law was constitutional or not, depended on the motives of members of congress in passing it. Could this possibly be the true criterion? How could the motives of congress be collected? If the judiciary did not possess the exclusive power of deciding, they would, of course, maintain that it had no concurrent power, and then it would become a question what were the motives of congress in passing a particular act; and how were these motives to be gotten at? Would gentlemen call on the members individually and put them on their oaths? Would they call witnesses to testify what speeches they heard in congress or what declarations by members out of doors? This would be a violation of the privileges of membership it attempted before any tribunal but that of the people in their elective capacity. The motives, too, of different members might be very various: so might those of the two houses of congress. Were they to take the motives of the whole, or only of a part? or those of a majority? He need urge this no further. The proposition was manifestly as unsound as the other: there was no stability in such assertions. They must, therefore, return to the only sound rule of judgment.—the decision of the judiciary. They were appointed the sole judges whether a law was or was not in conformity with the constitution. That a law might be constitutional in court and unconstitutional out of court, was a notion he had never seen or heard of in any decision or any dictum of any court whatever: and did he not cherish great personal respect for many of the gentlemen who composed the body who had published it to the world, he should say that such a conception could not enter the head of any sane man. The reasoning, (if reasoning it might be called), by which they sought to maintain their doctrine was no less absurd than the propositions they had laid down. Having quoted the opinion of Mr. Rawle, Mr. B. said that there he might pause; for if those gentlemen declared the tariff laws to be unconstitutional, it was for them to prove their assertion, and the laboring oar might fairly be thrown upon them. But this was not a time in which to shrink from the task of advancing further, and proceeding to shew, positively, that those laws are not only not unconstitutional, but that the protecting system formed a part of the plan of our forefathers in adopting the constitution, and that the want of it formed the prominent objection against the old confederation, and was the operative reason why that instrument was abrogated and the federal constitution brought into existence: this he should endeavor now to show, and further, that the legislative construction of the constitution had been uniform for nearly half a century, and that the people had concurred in it.

On the first point, he should chiefly refer to documents.—The first congress met on the 5th September, 1774. On the 6th, a committee was appointed to examine and report on the existing statutes, (the British statutes namely, what were then in form), affecting the trade and manufactures of the colonies. This was the first act of the first congress—to enquire what laws affected the manufactures, as well as the trade of the colonies. On the 19th of September, it was unanimously resolved that the merchants be requested not to send any further orders, and to suspend those already sent, for goods from the mother country. On the 27th of September, congress unanimously resolved that after the 1st of December following, no more goods should be imported, nor used if they were; and on the 30th, it was further resolved, that after the 1st of September, 1775, the exportation of goods from the colonies to Great Britain and the West Indies, should cease, unless the grievances of the country should before then have been redressed. On the 6th of October following, a resolution was adopted excluding molasses, wines and indigo; and on the 30th of the same month, the celebrated non-importation law was adopted and signed, and here he begged leave to remind the convention that the declared objects of that association were to suppress luxury, to promote frugality, and to encourage American manufactures. Here, then, was the very first congress held in the country looking to the protection of our own manufactures as one of its avowed objects; and they began the system on the day after they first assembled.

A second committee was appointed in May, 1775; and on the 31st July they were ordered to enquire respecting the manufacture of salt, and the search for lead ore—declaring also that the non-importation system should extend to the islands of Jersey, Alderney, Man, and other dependencies of Great Britain then enumerated. The congress, therefore, at its second session, so far from departing from the principles it had first assumed, carried them farther than before. On the 23d November, 1775, a committee was appointed to report a plan to regulate our trade with the Indians. They reported, and on the 27th January, 1776, the plan was adopted. On the 21st March, congress recommended to the provisional assemblies to promote the cultivation of hemp, flax and cotton and the growth of wool. Societies were recommended for the promotion of agriculture, arts and manufactures, and forthwith to introduce the manufactures of duck, sail-cloth and steel. On the 7th of June, 1776, the first resolution was offered on the subject of independence, and on the 12th, a committee was appointed to draft a Declaration of the Independence of these United States.

Mr. Brown said he had thus redeemed the pledge he had given, by shewing affirmatively that so far from the protecting system's being a new thing, it had formed a part of the original plan of those exalted men to whom the country was so deeply indebted for its happiness, and particularly for its emancipation from those rules which had been adopted with the express purpose of preventing us from manufacturing for ourselves, and thus advancing to that degree of national prosperity for which our national advantages so eminently fitted us.

By the Declaration of Independence the thirteen colonies were separated from the mother country, and the right to regulate trade and manufactures was thrown on the legislatures of the respective states; a right inherent in all governments.

But the framers of the constitution clearly perceived that it was impossible that power could be exercised by the legislatures of the states; the attempt to exercise it could lead only to conflict and anarchy. They were not so short sighted as to be unaware of the dangers which threatened the country from this source. They had on the 11th of June, 1776, resolved that a committee be appointed to draw up articles of a confederacy, and on the day following one member from each colony was appointed, and the committee thus constituted prepared and reported the act of confederation. The subject was warmly debated until the 15th of July, 1777—when a circular letter was addressed to the respective state legislatures, urging the ratification of the plan. Here Mr. B. referred particularly to two sections of that act, the 6th and the 9th, the former of which prohibits the states from laying any duties which should interfere with treaties entered into by the colonies; and the latter confers on congress the exclusive power of declaring war and making peace, provided that no treaty should be entered into going to restrain the legislation of the states in taxing foreigners as much as our own citizens, or prohibiting the exportation of our produce: it preserves to the legislatures of the states the power to regulate trade and manufactures—and this was the clause which led to the abrogation of the confederation itself—New Jersey made remonstrance against such a doctrine, and declared that the whole power of regulating trade and manufactures ought to reside in congress alone.

In the meantime, the patriots of the revolution were strenuously urging a union of the states. The confederation, though it did good service, had its faults. It was generally acknowledged that the 9th article was exceptionable—but the article was, we want union—the confederation has its faults, and this argument had its effect. It was no argument at this day to say that the old confederation gave the power to the states—because the delegates from the states were called to express the opinions of their constituents and by their authority the new constitution was adopted, the last state (Maryland), ratifying it on the 30th June, 1781. To show what were the true grounds of its ratification, Mr. B. referred to the language of Mr. Jay in the Federalist, which he quoted at considerable length.

He then proceeded to observe, that on the 26th of April, 1783, Mr. Madison, Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Hamilton were appointed a committee to address the people of the United States in behalf of the new constitution, and in the same month Mr. Gerry and others reported a recommendation to the several states to invest congress with the power of restricting commerce except in American vessels. On the 21st of January, 1786, a proposition was received from the Virginia house of delegates, and on the 11th September, 1786, a convention was held at Annapolis, to form the new constitution. They adjourned and met a second time, and they then drew up that instrument under which we live, and which so expressly gives to congress those powers by the exercise of which, the tariff system has been built up. On the 4th March, 1789, congress adopted it, and it went into operation on the 4th of July, 1789. At the very first congress which assembled under it, this preamble was prefixed to the act regulating commerce. Here Mr. B. read the preamble: but his speech was suspended for the report of a committee, after which he resumed, and observed that he had gone through the brief history he had given with the purpose of shewing that the men who had commenced and gone through with the revolution, themselves the very men who formed the first confederation, and who were present when the objections to it were all fully discussed, were many of them members of congress in 1789, when the preamble was adopted which he had read, and which expressly declares one object of passing the act to be the protection of manufactures. They had come then fresh from the making of the constitution—the oath they had taken to support it was yet warm upon their lips, and was still resounding in the ears of the people when they passed it—and he would ask if these facts were laid in a plain and distinct manner before the people of these states, whether any man in the country would believe that these men perjured themselves? To incorporate this statement of facts in the address to be presented by this convention would go to show the people not merely that they have the right to pass laws for the protection of their industry, but that this was a part, and an important part of the original plan of those who framed the constitution—and they would have been traitors to their country and their oaths had they refused to enact a tariff for such a purpose,—and as it was in 1789, so it was in 1828.

Mr. B. concluded by reminding the convention that from that early day to the present time, there had not been one president of the United States who had not, in one way or another, recommended the adoption of the tariff system—that twenty-one successive congresses had recognized the same system—that there never had been a public meeting in any one state or district, which had ever before called in question the right of congress to pass a tariff law; and that the same members of congress who had voted in favor of the system, had been returned by the people to pass new tariff laws, as they might become needful. Let these things be clearly placed before them, and the people of these states would see that the system was constitutional, and would themselves admit that the government was not a government of opinions, but of laws, and that the laws might not be resisted by any one who might choose to pronounce them contrary to the constitution.

Mr. Sharp, of N. York, hoped that the resolutions would not be adopted. A committee had been appointed consisting of one member from each state here represented, and charged with the duty of addressing the people of the United States on the subjects which had convened this body: the appointment of its members had not been hastily made, but after due deliberation, above fifteen of the first men in the country had been selected for the duty required. And now before they had even met, a member rose in his place and proposed to instruct them how it was to be performed. What if each member should do the same? For all had equal right. What would follow but the greatest embarrassment—and probably no report would be gotten at all. He wished first to hear the report the committee might prepare; and then if any thing was omitted, the gentleman could move to have it inserted. The committee had had the benefit of his remarks, and he hoped the gentleman would withdraw the resolutions, if not, he should move to lay them upon the table.

The question being taken on laying the resolutions on the table, it was negatived by a very great majority.

MR. MIDDLETON'S LETTER.

Philadelphia, Oct. 15th, 1831.

DEAR SIR: I had the pleasure of receiving your letter of the 14th ultimo, at this place, just at the opening of the Free Trade convention, and I immediately registered myself as delegate from St. George's parish, Colleton district, South Carolina.

I beg leave in the first place to tender my grateful acknowledgments to my fellow citizens of the district, for their kind recollection of me after so long an absence; and I assure them that I heartily reciprocate the kind greetings expressed in your letter; for the rest, I do most sincerely sympathize with them in deprecating the spread of the baneful doctrine of nullification, to which you allude, and which has made so alarming a progress in some parts of the state. I trust, however, that the good sense of the sound majority of our people will be shortly evinced and manifested by public meetings and anti-nullification resolutions throughout our state, the only one in the union infected with this political heresy.

I am sorry to say that I do think I perceive, upon my return home, after an absence of several years, that much has been done, as you state with a design to prepare the minds of our people for a revolution. However difficult the task might appear to be, of weaning the affections of a free and happy people from a government of their own choice, administered by their own agents, removable at stated periods—a government, too, which has done so much for the national glory and prosperity—still I think I see that considerable progress has been made in attaining the desired end by means of the undue perseverance on the part of congress in a system of taxation which, having for its object the protection of manufacturing industry, (an object highly laudable in itself), seems to bear hard upon agriculture and navigation, and which has, by manifold and repeated exaggeration, been made to put on the appearance of a deliberate and wilful violation of the constitution.

Were this the case, I trust that no man would be found more ready than myself to oppose an open and determined resistance. Oppression apart, I am ever disposed to resist any exercise of unauthorized power. Where there is oppression, I should scarce stop to inquire by what quirk of law it might be authorized. I utterly deny the right of any man or of any majority to oppress, even under color of law.

But such is not in reality the case, under the tariff law. The law of 1828 is, indeed, by its excessively high import duties, impolitic and inexpedient, in the highest degree, and in some measure insufficient, as encouraging smuggling as well as manufacturing. We may feel satisfied that, experience having shown that it is nearly as useless as unpopular, it must shortly be abandoned, or in a great degree modified.

If it be thought, however, that a bare repeal of all tariff laws would restore our agricultural products to their pristine value, it is a great error. In order to produce that desirable effect, (which indeed I conceive to be the great object which the plantation states have at present in view), other means besides must be brought into operation.

To accomplish this purpose, the amount of consumption must be increased, or that of production diminished, in all cases. These two objects are frequently unattainable by direct legal interposition. Recourse must then be had to subsidiary means.

To give an example of this—as one means of supporting the price of cotton and rice, the impost upon sugar must be maintained. If that were taken off, the sugar plantations of Louisiana could no longer compete in the production of that article, with the more favored climate of the West India islands. The 45,000 laborers occupied in that culture, would be then probably turned to raising cotton and rice, whereby additional quantities o those articles would be thrown upon a market already glutted, and in such case the prices would inevitably be reduced.

The same example will serve to shew the necessity there is for congress to keep in view other objects beside the bare amount of revenue in the impositions of duties upon imports. The power of protecting home fabrics and productions, (incidental as it is), was under our present government exerted at a very early period of its existence, and has been attended as it may well be supposed by the most beneficial effects.

The first revenue law passed by the first congress, under the existing constitution, was approved by president Washington, on the 4th July, 1789. It is declared, in its preamble, to be intended "for the support of government, to pay the public debt, and for the encouragement of manufactures." By this law duties were laid on imported sugars, teas, coffee, cocoa, candles, soap, cheese, cordage, indigo, coal, pickled and dried fish, manufactured leather, manufactured tobaccos, on hats of beaver or wool, on China, on coarse and earthen ware, on military and ready made clothes, on cabinet wares, riding carriages, and on many other articles, now abundantly manufactured in the United States, cheaper and better than they can be obtained from abroad. It must be evident to every careful observer that by means of the wise policy then adopted, we have risen from the state of colonial dependence, in which lord Chatham declared, "that we ought not to be permitted to manufacture a hob-nail," to the condition of real independence in that respect, which we now enjoy, and which is a source of countless riches to the nation. It must not be forgotten, that this act was passed by a congress, in which sat many of the framers of the constitution, and that the opposition never thought of objecting to it, on the grounds of its unconstitutionality.

The high duties imposed by the act of 1816, to which I lent my humble support in common with several distinguished members from our state, were graduated with a view principally to the protection of certain manufacturing establishments which had arisen without the bounds of our state, under shelter of double duties laid solely with a view to revenue, wanted to carry on the war of 1812. This generous and just feeling did honor to the south, which had no immediate interest in the question, and no accusation of unconstitutionality was ever brought against the act.

The course of time can have effected no change in the powers vested in congress by the constitution of the United States; neither has any amendment thereto been proposed or adopted in reference to this power. All the sound opinions entertained at that time upon this point, must therefore remain the same, however individuals may have changed their views.

It can therefore only be on account of the abuse of a legitimate power on the part of congress, that the present tariff can be justly termed unconstitutional. That it is clothed in the due legal forms, no one can deny.

To say that it is fraught with oppression, is a mere exaggeration, which cannot avail to justify resistance.—Peaceable and reasonable remonstrance is our safe and sure resort against a simple grievance.

Such, as it appears to me, should be the feelings and reasonings of all those who bear a sincere attachment to our entire system of government, in the divided way the people have ordained between our national and state governments. Whoever shall endeavor to mislead our state authorities, and induce them to infringe the rights of congress by legislating on matters not within their competency, must be deemed the enemy of the happy institutions under which we live.

God grant that we may, one and all, be induced with wisdom sufficient to know how to place a just value on the good we possess; and may we be ever careful so to use the high privilege of self-government, as to avoid civil discord, which might, in its results, be the means of substituting governments of force for those of law and reason!

It is the misfortune of our peaceful and happy era, to have produced, in its hot-beds of ease and luxury, a fungus growth of state doctors, ever ready to drug the most robust with their nostrums. Unquestionably did the framers of our organic laws devise, for this widely extended empire, the wisest plan of government which mankind has ever seen reduced to practice; and one too, which, in practice, has far exceeded the most sanguine expectations which could have been formed of its success at the time of its adoption. Yet we daily witness the empyrics, above spoken of, gravely putting on their glass eyes, (like Shakespeare's servy politician), and pretending to discover defects for which they propose to administer the most preposterous remedies.

The nullifying theory is not only incompatible with our existing institutions, but it may be doubted whether the professors of the new light, or the would-be fathers of new confederacies, if they were indulged in their projects, and still adhered to nullification; (a political jack o' the lantern, leading the steps of its bewildered followers "o'er bog and quagmire," until "where'er they tread they sink!") It may be doubted, did I say?—any more, it may be boldly denied, that they could, with this principle, form a durable confederacy of three or more states, however contiguous in territory, or identical in interests such states might be—two conditions which they appear to require for the formation of a perfect confederacy.

It must always be borne in mind that men will differ in opinion, howsoever identical their interests, or proximate their habits. Passion and prejudice, of one kind or another, frequently sever the nearest neighbors and associates, however great the benefits they might otherwise derive from concord. If they were not to be bound by the decision of the majority, (where there is no common tribunal), there is no appeal but to the sword.

The principle of obedience to the will of the majority, wisely adopted in a republican government, is grounded upon the high probability that such will is enlightened and just; and upon the certainty that it is backed by the physical force of the community. For the reason last mentioned, it may be laid down as a general rule that an appeal to the sword is, in such case, more hopeless than under a despotism or aristocracy where the one, or the few, have imposed their law upon the many.

The new fangled doctrine of nullification in matters of general concern,* by a small portion of those who are associated under the engagement, tacit or express, to abide by the decisions of a majority in such matters, is a solacium in politics, in its nature suicidal, and must infallibly produce self-destruction in any body-politic which admits it as an elementary principle.

We can only wonder at those who honestly entertain the opinion, that such doctrine is compatible with our existing institutions. Let us pay their delusions. But let us call down the maledictions of heaven on such as willingly would practise a deceit on others, to promote their favorite project of disunion.

I shall not detail to you the proceedings of the convention, which you may see in the gazette. One great object was accomplished in avoiding debate upon questions on which there might be a diversity of opinion; and an undivided attention was given to the all-absorbing interest of opposition to the tariff, which was sustained throughout, in a manner which it may be hoped will lead to final success.

The address to the American people (of which a copy is inclosed) was voted by a large majority. I wished myself to have omitted a portion of it, but having found myself in a minority, I am, upon the whole, better satisfied that the address should go before the public in its original form, as containing the expressions of a large portion of the inhabitants of these United States, as well as of a part of the convention. The effect on public opinion will, I think, be salutary.

*Let it not be urged that a sister state has successfully nullified treaties, (abusively so called!), and acts emanating from the general government. Georgia is about to abate a nuisance growing up within her own territory, and effecting the interest of no other state. This is strictly a domestic question, and those acts are perfectly justifiable on principles of the law of nature and nations.—There is a wide difference between this case and that of the abrogation of a general revenue law having universal application in all the states.

A memorial to congress is to be drawn up and presented to that body by a committee, of which Mr. Galatin is chairman. That it will contain all that can be urged in favor of a revision of the tariff, I have the strongest persuasion. It most assuredly will obtain the favorable consideration of congress.

A certain benefit I regard as having already resulted from this meeting, is the strong conviction impressed on the minds of those who assisted at it, that an extravagant system of protection to manufactures, injurious to the more important interests of agriculture and navigation, will always find adversaries in every part of our union; while gentlemen who came with the hope (if any such there were) of others sympathizing in the doctrines of nullification, or mayhap with the expectation of winning over the assent of some portion of the south to plans of secession, must have been sorely disappointed at finding her sons generally too patriotic, and too proud of a union of which they have ever formed so conspicuous a portion, to listen for a moment to propositions tending to its dissolution upon frivolous or factious pretences.

Having been honored by nominations as a delegate to the anti-tariff convention at several meetings of the friends of union in different parts of our state, I ask to be permitted, through your interposition, as my immediate neighbors and fellow parishioners, to tender them my best acknowledgments, and to beg the favor of having this missive considered as addressed to all the friends of union.

I am, dear sir, very faithfully, your obedient friend and servant,
HENRY MIDDLETON.

JOSEPH KNOX, jr. esq. chairman of the democratic republican meeting held at the house of Mr. Geo. Sistrunk, St. George's Parish, Colleton district, 24th September, 1831.

AN EXTRAORDINARY CASE.

Crim. con.—The annals of this species of crime do not present a cause more singular than is presented in the case noticed below. The offence—the admission—the circumstances attending it—the agreement of the offender to leave the county—his murder by the party injured—and the decision of the jury, are altogether extraordinary and surprising.

From the Frankfort, Ky. Commentator.

The recent death of Ebenezer N. Robertson, esq. a former member of the assembly from Russell county, at the hand of Dr. Pierce, the last and present member, has been mentioned in the papers, with some allusion to the enormities which produced a catastrophe so appalling. The chief incident in this tragedy, was awfully sudden and striking: the county court was sitting in the village where the parties resided. Some business called Pierce into court. The first object which fixed his eye, was Robertson—who by agreement had left the county, never to return—now there, writing at the clerk's table. Pierce gazed upon him, for a moment, in mute astonishment; then suddenly turned, and retiring by the door, re-appeared presently at the window, beneath which Robertson sat, in the presence of the court. Resching in, with a pistol, near to the head of his victim, Pierce fired, and lodged the contents in his brain—a fatal shot! What could have moved a gentleman, till then ever mild, patient and conciliatory in his deportment, to a deed of such singular daring?—Robertson had violated the marriage bed of Pierce, his friend—struck at his honor—ruined his family—planted daggers in his bosom!—And, with humility be it spoken, there was no law in the land for the adequate punishment of such an outrage! The fact was notorious; not denied even by the offender himself. 'Satisfaction,' in the way called 'honorable,' had been demanded; but not rendered. The wrong was irreparable; no adequate amends could be made. The destroyer of his neighbors' peace—whose unprincipled indiscretion has cast a deep shade over virtues which might otherwise have brightly shone, as some concession, had agreed to go forth from that part of the country, to return no more. Yet he did return; he was there—the consequences have been seen—Dr. Pierce was required, by the judgment of two magistrates, to give bail for his appearance at the next circuit court in that county, to answer what might then be presented against him in relation to this matter. That court was in session last week; and Pierce was in attendance. One indictment against him for murder, and another for manslaughter, were laid before the grand jury. Having made such investigation, as they, under their oaths, deemed proper, they returned both indictments into court with their finding endorsed upon each—'not a true bill,'—'not a true bill,' and whatever opinion, made up upon views merely technical, might be; upon the sheer justice of the case, and upon the diligent enquiry of the grand inquest of his county, the accused stands justified—acquitted. He appeared in the assembly yesterday, and was qualified as the representative of his county; and notwithstanding all that has happened, may yet be, as he has heretofore been, a faithful representative, and a useful member.

COLONIZATION OF THE BLACKS.

The following letter from Mr. JEFFERSON to Mr. Lynd, has been several times published—but there seems a peculiar fitness in again presenting it to consideration.

Monticello, Jan. 21, 1811.

"SIR:—You have asked my opinion on the proposition of Anne Milfin, to take measures for procuring, on the coast of Africa, an establishment to which the people of color of these states might, from time to time, be colonized, under the auspices of different governments. Having long ago made up my mind on this subject, I have no hesitation in saying, that I have ever thought that the most desirable measure which could be adopted for gradually drawing off this part of our population. Most advantageous for themselves as well as for us; going from a country possessing all the useful arts, they might be the means of transplanting them among the inhabitants of Africa; and would thus carry back to the country of their origin the seeds of civilization, which might render their journey here a blessing in the end, to that country.

"I received, in the first year of my entering into the administration of the general government, a letter from the governor of Virginia, consulting me, at the request of the legislature of the state, on the means of procuring some such asylum to which these people might be occasionally sent. I proposed to him the establishment of Sierra Leone, in which a private company in England had already colonized a number of negroes, and particularly the fugitives from these states during the revolutionary war; and at the same time suggested, if that could not be obtained, some of the Portuguese possessions in South America as most desirable.

"The subsequent legislature approving these ideas, I wrote the ensuing year (1802) to Mr. King, our minister in London, to endeavor to negotiate with the Sierra Leone company, and induce them to receive such of these people as might be colonized thither. He opened a correspondence with Mr. W— and Mr. Thornton, secretary of the company, on the subject; and in 1803 I received, through Mr. King, the result, &c.

"The effort which I made with Portugal to obtain an establishment from them, within their colonies in South America, proved also abortive.

"You inquired further, whether I would use my endeavors to procure such an establishment secure against violence, from other powers, and particularly the French. Certainly, I shall be willing to do any thing that I can to give it effect and safety.

"But I am but a private individual, and could only use endeavors with individuals. Whereas the national government can address themselves at once to those of Europe to obtain the desired security, and will unquestionably be ready to exert its influence over those nations to effect an object so benevolent in itself, and so important to a great portion of its constituents. Indeed nothing is more to be wished than that the United States would themselves undertake to make such an establishment on the coast of Africa.

"Exclusive of motives of humanity, the commercial advantages to be derived from it might defray all its expenses: but for this the national mind is not prepared. It may perhaps be doubted whether many of these people would voluntarily consent to such an exchange of situation, and but few of those who are advanced to a certain age in habits of slavery would be capable of governing themselves. This should not, however, discourage the experiment, nor the early trial of it. And propositions should be made with all the prudent caution and attention requisite to reconcile it to the interest, the safety, and prejudice of all parties."

THE FAYETTEVILLE SUFFERERS.

The address of the town committee of Fayetteville, to the contributors to their relief is so appropriate, and even affecting, that it should be preserved.

CIRCULAR.

Addressed to the contributors to the fund for the relief of the Fayetteville sufferers, by the committee appointed for the purpose.

Fayetteville, Nov. 14, 1831.

The undersigned have been deputed by their fellow citizens to lay before you the annexed statements of the amount of the fund for the relief of the sufferers by the desolating calamity of the 29th of May last, and of the manner in which it has been disposed of. They submit them, with the hope, that the proceedings of those to whom the distribution was entrusted, will meet with the same approbation from the donors, so cordially awarded to them by the recipients.

Another duty with which they are charged cannot be so easily and so satisfactorily performed. The feelings with which they have witnessed the spontaneous outpourings of the benevolence of their fellow citizens, from one end of this vast republic to the other, cannot be uttered. The accumulation of such a fund as that exhibited by the subjoined statement, unsolicited by us, and coming, in great part, from those upon whom the citizens of our town had no claims but those of suffering humanity and a common national origin, presents a spectacle honorable to the character of a great people, doubly grateful to the feelings of the recipients, and calculated to impress us more deeply with a sense of the blessings of the happy union under which we live.

As many of the contributors to this fund may never have an opportunity of witnessing the effects of their bounty, we cannot better express our thanks, and those of the people whom we represent, than by faintly sketching some of its blessings. The calamity with which we were visited was of an appalling extent. It swept from existence the fairest, the richest, and by far the larger portion of our flourishing town. It left poverty and despair where opulence and content had long reigned. None altogether escaped its ravages; and few were left with ability to relieve even the pressing wants of the suffering destitute. Under these circumstances were the liberal hands of our countrymen opened; and the heart of the widow and the orphan was made glad. Instead of the ruin which seemed to impend over so many, and to paralyze their hopes, confidence and energy succeeded; and each one has been enabled again to enter into the competition with his neighbors for the emoluments of his wonted vocation. Extraordinary progress has been made in rebuilding our town; and every thing wears the appearance of activity, and a determination to rise with new vigor from our ashes. To you, and to those who united with you in this labor of love, is this happy state of things mainly owing; and to you, and to them, we render the homage of grateful hearts.

Be pleased to convey to the community with which you are connected, our sense of the blessings they have, in part, conferred upon us. And that they may be spared from all similar visitations, is the earnest hope of your obedient servants,

JOHN HUSKE,

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 13—VOL. V.

BALTIMORE, DEC. 3, 1831.

[VOL. XLII. WHOLE No. 1,034]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ The address of the New York convention is receiving a most extensive circulation, and works with power. It has convinced many.

☞ Our rail road was opened on Thursday to the city of Frederick, sixty miles, with considerable ceremony and many interesting occurrences—of which we shall give some account hereafter. The passages over the inclined planes excited the deepest interest. The triumph of science was shown to be complete.

☞ A great many articles intended for this sheet, have been omitted—some, perhaps, that we should have preferred to others inserted, had not [mechanical] necessity interposed.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF. The "Richmond Enquirer" presents the views of the New York convention, set forth in the address to the people of the United States, as to a reduction of duties on such foreign goods as do not come into conflict with the products of American labor, and adds—This project is anticipated and re-tulated in the following remarks made by Mr. McDuffie, at a late meeting of "the South Carolina state rights and free trade association," held at Charleston—governor Hamilton in the chair.

"Mr. McDuffie proceeded to praise the magnanimous spirit of forbearance and conciliation which had marked the course of our delegates at the Philadelphia anti-tariff convention. Of the convention he said that he entertained no hope that its efforts would operate a change in the measures of the manufacturing majority in congress. —It might, in connection with other causes, serve to induce the manufacturers to propose a modification of the tariff, but what would be the nature of this modification? It would probably consist in a reduction of the duties on imports consumed but not manufactured at the north; but with regard to the imports consumed by the south, and received in exchange for southern productions, he felt assured there would be no reduction of duties,—that these would not only be left fully as much burdened by taxation as they now are, but that eventually the effort would be made to throw the whole burthen of taxation exclusively upon them. He thought it likely that there would be a small reduction made of the duty on sugar—that, in fact, the north never had any interest in this duty.—It was originally made to influence the vote of Louisiana, but that her vote was no longer necessary to the views of the manufacturers.—If this reduction should be made, it would be used by the tariff party in this state as an argument that the whole system would be given up, and thus to paralyze the efforts of the state. He conjured the friends of the state not to suffer themselves to be cheated in this manner. He implored them, as they valued their liberties, to inquire for themselves—to exercise a severe scrutiny over the measures of the manufacturing majority in congress—to regard, with the most careful jealousy, all overtures of apparent concession or liberality from that quarter."

The new light "philosophers" deal so much in abstractions—"in the clouds," and so seldom descend to the homeliness of practical results, that it is not often we can grapple them. The "non-committal" doctrine, if started by contemptible politicians of the north, has been so "reformed" in the south with respect to the tariff question, that few venture upon any position whence the ground which they stand upon can be seen—always looking it with high-sounding words and immodest assumptions. But in the present case we shall shew—that if Mr. McDuffie said what is reported of him—he said strange things!

He gives us to understand that a reduction of duties would not be permitted on articles "received in exchange for southern productions."

Vol. XLII.—No. 18.

Let us see. Two of the leading articles, (I call them so because of their aggregate values), on which a reduction of duties suggests itself, are silks and wines. These are mainly imported from France. I shall give the figures.

Value of silks imported in 1830—

From India	$1,398,316
all other places, except France	827,316
France	3,548,378

Total silks 5,774,010

The value of wines was $1,535,102

of which from France, 447,588

These are two of the principal imports from France: Now for the exports.

Gross amount of our domestic exports to France in 1830 $9,901,148

Of which there was in cotton 7,646,147

Cotton, cotton, only, forming 3-4ths of the whole. The entire value of the imports from France for the year, was only 7,722,198 dollars. In silks and wines $3,995,966.

On the other hand—The duties which we desire to have generally retained are no manufactures of England—because they come into direct competition with the products of our own labor. We shall shew how—and again by figures.

The whole value of domestic products exported to England, Scotland and Ireland, in 1830

of which there was in cotton 20,687,642

Leaving for all other agricultural products, including tobacco and rice, (mirabile dictu!)—all the products of the forest, of the sea, and of manufactures, the pitiful sum of 4,812,276 dollars—being all which all the people of the United States, except the few engaged in cotton-planting, have to exchange, (or rather all that Great Britain will receive), for the hundreds of millions in value that they require of those manufactures which the British directly come into competition with! Now, if "southern productions"—always meaning cotton, cotton, COTTON, though not worth so much as our manufactures of leather by several millions, are worthy, of such high and tender regard,—may not forty nine fifths of the people of the United States, who have no direct interest in the making of cotton, cotton, COTTON, look a little to themselves, in the application of Mr. McDuffie's own principles? and we see that France, on whose products it seems probable a large amount of reduction in the duties will be made, chiefly receives cotton in payment for them? What is the proportion of the cotton planters to the rest of the people of the United States—the farmers, mechanics, manufacturers, tobacco, and rice, and sugar planters? We have supposed one out of fifty. It is a large allowance! What is this cotton of the south? Why, of hardly superior value to the crisp of raw wool in the north, for which there is NO MARKET EXCEPT AT HOME! Yes—and those of the people interested in the growth of wool are many times, twenty times, more numerous than those interested in the growth of cotton. Will Mr. McDuffie's principles—(his "reluctation" as Mr. Ritchie says!) apply only to favor a small minority of the people? Have the MAJORITY no discretion—no rights? Are we only to eat, drink and sleep upon cotton—to build houses and clothe ourselves with cotton—to "enjoy life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," in making and selling cotton—to marry wives of cotton; and have cotton children! It won't do—we must have something besides cotton! And, Mr.

McDuffie's rule being right for the south, must be suitable for the north? There is an old saying that "what is good for the goose is good for the gander;" and I guess that the saying is just as true as it was in "Mother Goose's" time—or, "Mrs. Grunty's."

But what justice is there in the gentleman's declaration? To the island of Cuba, alone, we exported last year, to the value of 3,459,000 dollars, or only in the small sum of 1,573,000 dollars less than we exported to England, Scotland and Ireland, except in the article of cotton. These supplies are almost exclusively the products of farmers, manufacturers and fishermen; yet Mr. McDuffie will be disappointed in his expectation that the duty on sugar will be reduced, unless the whole "system" shall fall—that being the chief production of Cuba which remains subject to a high rate of duty. The friends of the tariff believe that even sugar (like all other commodities), has declined in its cost to consumers because of the protection afforded to domestic makers of it; and that the sugar planters create a very valuable and highly important home market for the corn, pork, &c. of the farmers, and for the manufacturers of iron and other materials. They know that coffee has not fallen in price since the least duty upon it, and that its value advanced in the West Indies on the instant that our duty declined! We might extend these remarks, and bring many other cases—but enough, perhaps, has been said to show the whole merit of Mr. McDuffie's "retutation!"

The gentleman says, the duty on sugar was made "to influence the vote of Louisiana." Well—it may be so! But Messrs. JOHN C. CALHOUN, WILLIAM LOWMEDES, William Mayrant, and William Woodward, of the South Carolina delegation, in the house of representatives, voted for the bill of 1816, which raised the duty from 2 to 3 cents per lb.—its present rate; and only Messrs. Huger, Moore and Taylor, of the same delegation, voted against it—the other members, Messrs. Chappell and Middleton, being absent. In the senate, Mr. GALLARD voted for it, Mr. Taylor being absent. So did Mr. Mason, of Virginia, Tait, of Georgia, Campbell and Williams, of Tennessee, &c. It prevailed in the senate 23 to 7! Can any man believe that there were only seven members in that most honorable body, [for so it was then, though since disgraced by scenes better fitted for the bar-room at a cross-roads whiskey-shop] resisted this MANTRA for the "vote of Louisiana?" Credat Sulpicius Appellat!

Mr. McDuffie will have no modification of the tariff except himself and his friends—the cotton-men, shall controul it! This is very moderate—and modest! What then shall be done with the surplus revenue after the debt is paid? Why—we must take up some of Mr. Calhoun's splendid schemes of internal improvement, or practise upon Mr. McDuffie's own deliriums of 1821, that it may be returned to the people, and have a wholesome circulation among them! See his essays signed "One of the people," in reply to the Georgia Trio of "radicals," republished in pamphlet form by James Hamilton, present governor of South Carolina, Oct. 1, 1821, in "just homage," as the now governor Hamilton then said, "to the sacred principles they inculcate." Then, the South Carolina politicians were ultra liberal. One of the most consistent and real friends of the tariff that ever represented a part of the people of Pennsylvania, used to say, "they went so far that he could not reach them with a long pole." Then they had constitution for every thing—for any thing. The national government was the palladium of our rights—the only safe depository of power: now the states are the only asylums of our liberties, and all power is in them! The clowns at the circus might learn many changes of position, by studying the movements of the multifaceted of the day!—and make the "groundings" laugh.

We here feel it right to give an opinion—speaking only for ourselves—that the friends of the "American System" will agree to no modification of the tariff that shall place foreign labor in opposition to our own—unless ON STRICT TERMS OF RECIPROCITY; such as exists in navigation between us and England. When the latter freely admits the products of our fields, forests, workshops and fisheries, we will think about freely admitting her manufactures; but never, while the name of an American is a proud one, till then. We go for this—some what may—and will not make any concession which has for its issue, an abandonment of the power to preserve our own independence.

As the moral effect produced by manufacturing establishments of our country, have excited some speculation on the subject—allow a subscriber to mention a few facts, which have occurred under his notice. In a recent visit to Walden, Orange county, state of New York, (probably well remembered by you from the due respect manifested in a late visit made by you to that place). This location is one of the best in this country, for the purpose of manufacturing, with an increasing population—all dependent on its factories; and, what is extraordinary, not a dissolute (in the general acceptation of the word) person of either sex is to be found in the place. Ardent spirit is entirely abandoned. Many of the inmates of the buildings were originally from the city of New York. Some from the most depraved parents. What is the result in a few years? They have been taught reading, writing, arithmetic—acquired a due knowledge of their business, and are now receiving from $5 to $7 per week. Contrast their situation, if they had remained in New York. Possibly some dearhearted eva might have awaited them, and now they are respectable. So it is with those from the adjoining counties. Without the knowledge, or the means of obtaining a livelihood, we find them educated, and strictly moral; and among from 300 to 400 females, no instance has ever occurred which warranted the least reproach. They have many domestic comforts, and no want of society; they have their bells and private parades, are highly respected, and participate with the inhabitants in every social intercourse. The Sunday schools are well attended, and the most distinguished inhabitants give them their personal attention, and, what is morally better than all, marriage connections have most generally proved satisfactory. Among other suggestions, it has been seriously thought of establishing a beneficial society—for each member to deposit a certain amount weekly, for the purpose of mutual relief in case of sickness—also a savings bank, where the respective persons who think fit may deposit their earnings, under the care of certain trustees, who shall invest it in such manner that they may draw a handsome interest for the same. In this place there are no idlers—no drunkards—all are well employed. It has a healthy situation, morals are attended to, and the proprietors, men of humanity, exercising a parental reg-rd. In fact, they are a happy community. So much for the manufacturing interest of our country!!

[The editor is entirely satisfied that the state of society at Walden, is not colored too highly; and he is equally assured that the same happy condition of things belongs to many—to nearly all, the manufacturing villages of the United States.]

NORTH CAROLINA. This state, from the happy adaptation of its varied soil, production and climate to manufacturing industry, should be among the strongest advocates of the "American System"—and the fact is, that a large proportion of her most valuable citizens decidedly favor it. Her gold mines are causing a great demand, and opening a new market, for the produce of her farmers. Corn, bacon, &c. instead of seeking the sea-board, for uncertain sale or at least uncertain prices, now proceed westward, in large quantities, and meet with fair prices. But N. Carolina has iron mines more valuable than those of gold, with ample water-power and fuel to work them advantageously. Her lower country supplies abundance of cotton, rice, and other important articles, in the way of materials—and her upper lands may feed millions of sheep, and furnish almost any quantity of bread-stuffs and meats. Her people, in the country last mentioned, are as well fitted for manufacturing as those of any other, and in every respect; and the two parts of the state are bountifully conditioned to carry on an immensely valuable interior trade—the safest and the best, under any possibility of circumstances.

*Aye—and for slaves! more is the pity!

†Nor has molasses or salt.

Many—very many, letters which I have received, at different times, from North Carolina, entirely satisfy me, that the people of this state have a clear view of their deep interest in the success of domestic industry—with a well defined knowledge of the manner in which the various branches interlock with and support one another; and I have no manner of doubt, that this state will become a leading one in behalf of the home market, by encouraging domestic manufactures and internal improvement, which so admirably work together to give value to lands and their products, while lessening the price of all sorts of commodities to consumers.

The following is an extract from a letter recently addressed to me by a distinguished citizen of North Carolina:

"In this place we have but a few men of information—the country around is but thinly inhabited; but out of — I do not know of one anti-tariff man. For myself, I am a consumer—buying all I eat, drink, and wear in my family—producing by labor, nothing. And yet I am, and have been, well satisfied that I live at as little cost as I should have done, if no duties had ever been imposed on foreign imports: and I pity that man—the AMERICAN—who, if he ever had any patriotism or national pride, has lost all feeling of independence, or is willing to barter and truckle it with foreigners in a traffic about a few shillings."

BANK U. S. The Charleston "Mercury" is under the "apprehension" that a branch of the bank of the United States is about to be established at Columbia; and talks about "federal usurpation," and considers the proceeding as the "greatest outrage that has been meditated on the feelings of our people"—adding, they "cannot permit its establishment," "except they recognize the right of congress to establish corporations"—unless willing to "sacrifice the liberties of South Carolina, and give up the bank of the state" as an unresisting victim to its power; and many other like moderate words and smooth sentences. Now, the best of the joke is,—that the people of South Carolina hold more of the stock of the bank of the United States than those of any other state, Pennsylvania excepted! Pennsylvania 52,638 shares, South Carolina 40,674, Maryland 34,503, New York 32,903, &c. This is a fine comment also, upon the poverty of South Carolina, about which the "Mercury" has so feelingly spoken "daily and every day," for a long time past. And, if the branch at Columbia is to become some sort of a tax, the state will receive an extra proportion for what it pays in the dividends made.

BOSTON—ruined by the tariff. The bargain for the lease of the city wharf was concluded this morning on the following terms. Ten thousand dollars per annum for 20 years; the lessees to erect on the wharf ten substantial brick stores, to cost not less than $3,000 each, to revert to the city of Boston at the expiration of the lease.

[Boston Transcript.]

☞ The heaps of ruins which have appeared in all the old business parts of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, in the present year, were enough to make a lover of his country feel quite "awful!" We have seen the ruins of whole ranges of houses—but were comforted with also seeing materials present for building new and better ones, in their stead. Mr. Randolph, though in a great hurry to get home, must have felt delighted with the small opportunity afforded, of seeing that Philadelphia was not in a "state of atrophy," nor Baltimore "deserted!"

SNOW ON THE RAIL-ROAD. The snow storm of last week covered some parts of our rail-road a foot deep. Though no calculation had been made on such an occurrence so early in the season, such were the resources and activity of the officers and agents of the company, that only a few hours delay happened in travelling the whole forty miles; as well as in removing many obstructions, such as trees blown down, which had been cast upon the road by the great violence of the storm—a very extraordinary one, for the season of the year.

"THE PENNSYLVANIA SOCIETY, for the promotion of manufactures and the mechanic arts" has been revived—Joseph Hemphill, president; Mathew Carey, P. S. Duponceau, Charles J. Ingersoll, Robert Wain and Daniel W. Cox, vice presidents, &c. W. H. Keating is the corresponding secretary.

"WOLF, or ANTI WOLF," are the battle cries of politicians in Pennsylvania. The majority seems to be Wolf ites. But some insist that the support of gov. Wolf is opposition to president Jackson. The doctors disagree.

WOOL. New York Nov. 21. The demand continues for low and middling wools, at nearly former rates—in some instances purchases have been made for each a trifle lower. The market continues well supplied of both foreign and domestic. Since our last, we note foreign arrivals as follows, 1,483 bales from Lisbon, 133 from Smyrna, 16 from Liverpool, at this port; 176 from Smyrna, 36 from Cronstadt, at Boston—400 bales are advertised to be sold on the 29th, of Spanish and Portuguese, at this place.

CONSUMPTION OF SILK. The quantity of this material used in England alone amounts in each year to more than four millions of pounds weight, for the production of which myriads upon myriads of insects are required. Fourteen thousand millions of animated creatures annually live and die to supply this little corner of the world with an article of luxury! If astonishment be excited at this fact, let us extend our view into China, and survey the dense population of its widely spread region, whose inhabitants, from the emperor on his throne to the peasant in the lowly hut, are indebted for their clothing to the labor of the silk-worm. The imagination, fatigued with the flight, is lost and bewildered in contemplating the countless numbers which every successive year spin their slender threads for the service of man. Dr. Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopaedia, vol. xxii. Treatise on the silk manufacture.

LIBERIA. The November number of the "African Repository," published at Washington by order of the managers of the American Colonization Society, contains a good deal of highly interesting information from Liberia. The general health of the settlement has much improved—as most persons believed that it would, in the progress of population and comforts. The residents, indeed, now seem in the full enjoyment of health—and, the accommodations for emigrants being better, and a knowledge of the course which they ought to pursue ascertained, the seasoning, if it may be so called, passes off much easier than heretofore. After this, the climate seems very congenial to the colored people. It is suggested, however, that emigrants from those parts of the United States which are not mountainous, should be preferred.

The matter of health being in this improved state, we refer with pleasure to the general affairs of the colony, which are quite prosperous. But it is complained, that the people are more disposed to make a living by traffic, than through agricultural labor. This evil will regulate itself, as the amount of population advances and makes a ready market for the productions of the soil. And it is probable also, that the class of persons hereafter chiefly to be sent out, will be of those better fitted, by their habits, for labor in the field.

During the past year 46 vessels arrived at the colony, 21 were American, the majority of the remainder English—and the exports were valued at $85,911 25. A considerable and increasing trade has been opened with the interior, and it is hoped that a powerful moral influence will be obtained over the native inhabitants—some of whom already seek the advice of the agent for the adjustment of their disputes with one another, and certain of the tribes appear disposed to form an immediate connection with the colonists. There are many particulars related which we cannot detail.

The schools are in a very flourishing condition—126 children are now reaping the benefits of education. Other school houses are about to be built, and the number will be increased.

The chief articles received of the natives in barter are ivory, camwood and rice—of all which they have much advanced the comparative value.

The agent expresses a fear that too many emigrants will be sent out in the ensuing 12 months—means not being adequate to their proper reception and wholesome accommodation. This evil, however, with previous preparation, may be alleviated; and, as the colony gains strength in itself, accommodation and employment will increase. It seems probable that the cultivation of coffee will chiefly accomplish these things.

New sites for settlements and towns have been fixed on—and there now seems no doubt, that, if this colony is faithfully cherished a few years, (yet not too rapidly forced onward), it will become all that has been reasonably expected of it—a happy asylum for free persons of color from the United States; a country with a large population and trade, having a powerful effect, in various ways, on the native inhabitants, and possibly become the means of altogether abolishing the infamous traffic in the blood of human beings, which has so much afflicted Africa and cursed other parts of the world.

THE INDIANS. From the Cincinnati Gazette. Two weeks ago a deputation from the Wyandot Indians proceeded from this place to Missouri, for the purpose of exploring the country, as preliminary to a treaty for the sale of their reserves, and a removal west of the Mississippi. The whole tribe of Senecas, upwards of 200 in number, passed through here yesterday, on their way, we understand, to Arkansas, having sold their lands in Ohio, to the United States, and taken a final farewell of the homes of their fathers. A few years ago, and there would have been but one sentiment here upon their case. Party feeling now converts sympathy for them into opposition to the administration; consequently, any expression of sensibility is carried to an evil account, and creates nothing but prejudice. "Tis true, 'tis pity and pity 'tis 'tis true!"

RHODE ISLAND. The following in the aggregate from the sums total, of the returns from the fifty-one banks in this state, made to the general assembly, at the October session, agreeably to law:—

Capital stock,	$6,732,296 53
Deposits,	1,290,603 17
Profits on hand,	179,552 97
Due from banks,	112,261 49
Bills in circulation,	1,342,356 59
Debts due from directors,	853,298 69
" other stockholders,	697,921 13
" from all others,	6,695,505 74
Specie,	425,692 38
Bills of other banks,	257,792 95
Deposited in other banks,	233,935 66
Bank and other stocks,	345,775 60
U. S. stock,	28,025 59
Real estate,	252,163 14
Personal estate,	8,455 08

From the above aggregate, it appears that the increase of bank capital in this state, since the report of October, 1830, is $743,485—and since June last of $32,625.

[Herald of the Times.]

ROBERT POTTER has resigned his seat as a representative to congress from the state of North Carolina, as appears from the following, which we copy from the Oxford Examiner:

"On Saturday last, a number of gentlemen presented to Mr. Potter a written request to resign his seat in congress, to which he returned the following reply:

Oxford, N. C. 12th Nov. 1831.

To Messrs. J. M. Wiggins, David Winston, and others.

Gentlemen—I have just received your communication upon the subject of my present relation to this congressional district, and I thank you for the generous and friendly motives which induced you to send it.

You may be well assured that a seat in congress or any other public appointment could have no value in my eyes, the moment I should perceive I had lost, however, unjustly, the confidence of those who had bestowed it. With these sentiments I should, at once, on being sent here, have returned to the people the commission with which they had honored me, if I had been assured that a majority of them desired it. Placed, however, out of the view of the community, and deprived of all opportunity of standing up before the people in defence of my rights, I thought it became me to occupy a position purely passive, and not to recognize any fact in relation to the will of the community unless it were distinctly intimated to me. Having now received such intimation as to justify this step, I cheerfully return to my constituents the appointment to which they had advanced me in the public service. I have this moment forwarded my resignation to the governor, in order that an election may be forthwith held for my successor.

I am, with great regard, your friend and obedient servant,
R. B. POTTER.

[Mr. Potter, it will be recollected, is imprisoned for a violent assault upon, and cruel maiming of a youth, and is yet to be tried for a like assault and maim of an aged gentleman.]

MADAWASKA. From the Journal of Commerce. We learn from the eastern papers, that Barnabas Hunnewell, Daniel Savage and Jesse Wheelock, the Madawaska settlers imprisoned in Frederickton jail, have been released by the governor of New Brunswick, in consequence of representations made to him by the British minister at Washington. Having been convicted of "a conspiracy to subvert his majesty's authority in that province," they were sentenced to three months imprisonment and a fine of £50 each. They are now pardoned and "discharged out of custody, upon their respectively entering into recognizances to his majesty, for the payment of the said fines, so imposed upon them, when thereto requested;" an accident, says the Portland Advertiser, which it is understood will never happen.

As to the right of jurisdiction over these men by the governor of New Brunswick, and the right of arresting them at the Madawaska settlement, all will depend upon the situation of the boundary line and the state of the boundary question. It is alleged, and we presume truly, that they resided and were captured on this side of the line as defined by the king of Holland, though, of course, on land in dispute between the two countries prior to that decision.

Such being the case, the authorities of New Brunswick, without any great stretch of forbearance, might have waived, for the time, their claims to jurisdiction,—the "conspiracy" being in fact nothing more than a conspiracy to become what the decision of the king of Holland makes them, American citizens.

But is it not a fact that the state of Maine, pending the ratification of the decision by the British and American governments, still exercises jurisdiction over the same territory as before the decision was made? If so, she cannot so well complain that the government of New Brunswick does likewise.

AMHERST COLLEGE. The catalogue of this flourishing institution for October 1831, shews 7 professors, 3 tutors, 2 resident graduates, 59 minors, 46 juniors, 50 sophomores, and 60 freshmen. The college bills and boarding amount to 93 or 118 dollars a year, varying with the circumstances or habits of the student.

THE CONSTITUTION. Extract from a speech in the senate of the United States, by Gouverneur Morris, January 8, 1802.

"There are some honorable gentlemen now present, who sat in the convention which formed this constitution. I appeal to their recollection, have they not seen the time when the fate of America was suspended by a hair? My life for it if another convention be assembled, that they will part without doing any thing. Never in the flow of time was there a moment so propitious as that in which the convention assembled. The states had been convinced, by melancholy experience, how inadequate they were to the management of our national concerns. The passions of the people were lulled to sleep—state pride slumbered—the constitution was promulgated—and then it awoke, and opposition was formed—but it was in vain. The people of America bound the states down by this compact."

Gov. METCALFE's recommendations of works of internal improvement appear to be judicious. The general face of the country, and the course of its waters, forbid the construction of canals in Kentucky; and the attention of the legislature is therefore directed to the improvement of roads and rivers. In the following paragraph the governor evinces a just sense of the true sources of national wealth:

"It is believed to be a sound maxim in political economy, that national wealth consists in the most enlarged and varied capacity to acquire the necessities and comforts of life. The ancient, but lugubrious theory, by which the minds of many have been bewildered, that national wealth consisted in accumulations over and above the annual consumption, has long since been exploded. All practical statesmen now admit that hoarded accumulations, without a market, or the means of transportation to market, are valueless, and will soon perish. Whatever saves labor or time is admitted to be productive of wealth. Whatever facilitates and cheapens the process of exchanging one commodity for another, increases the capacity to produce; enriches the nation; adds to her offensive and defensive strength; diffuses happiness and comfort and joy amongst her own citizens; increases their love of home; affords them leisure for the cultivation of the mind; enables them to mingle without defined limit in the affairs of active practical life; exalts their character, and that of the state, to the loftiest summit of human elevation."

HORRY DISTRICT. At a general meeting of the citizens of Horry district, S. C. held on the 31st ult. to declare their sentiments, in relation to the doctrine of nullification, it was

Resolved, "That we do not recognise the right of a state to annul a law of the general government; on the contrary, we view the new coined doctrine of nullification in its real character as revolutionary, and therefore abjure it as a gross political heresy."

It was also resolved, that "should a proposition be made at the ensuing session to nullify any of the laws passed by the congress of the U. States, our senator and representative are hereby expressly instructed to vote against, and to use their utmost endeavors in opposing it. But should their efforts prove unavailing, and such a measure shall receive the sanction of both branches of the legislature, we shall view it as a 'deliberate, palpable and dangerous exercise of undelegated power,'—unauthoritative, void, and of no binding force upon the citizens of this state."

TENNESSEE. The house of representatives have adopted the following resolution, which has been transmitted to the senate for their concurrence:

"Resolved, That our senators in congress be instructed, and our representatives be requested, to use their best exertions to procure such a revision and reduction of the existing tariff duties of the United States, as will, on the payment and discharge of the national debt, reduce the same to the standard of necessary revenue, and the encouragement of such domestic manufactures alone, as are indispensable to our national independence."

[This is all well enough—it submits the expediency of a protecting tariff to those whose right and duty it is to select such manufactures as should be "encouraged."]

THE BRITISH WEST INDIES are exceedingly agitated. In Jamaica, very plain language is used with respect to certain contemplated proceedings of the "mother country," to affect the products and population of the islands.* In Grenada, Tortola, &c. fearful apprehensions existed of a siege of the cities. Barbadoes is, on several accounts, in a very distressed state. There are many reasons, we think, to believe that a great crisis in the affairs of the British West Indies, is at hand. With all the advantages which they possess in a monopoly for the British consumption of their sugar—by protecting duties levied on the product even of the British East India colonies, the planters do not realize two per cent. on their capital; and the whole property in the islands would not pay the debts to which it is subject. Nearly every one wishes to sell out, and nobody wants to purchase, lands and slaves—the tenure of both being very uncertain; and their own lives, in some cases, hardly thought secure against midnight acts of violence.

CUBA. The New York Reclator contains an official tabular view of the population, commerce, &c. of the island of Cuba, from which it appears that the island contains 804,487 inhabitants, of which 112,032 reside in Havana. In addition to these numbers, the military forces in garrison amount to 26,075. The ratio of population is 20½ to the square league. The amount of exports is $10,063,761. And the revenue amounts to $8,553,895; the expenses of the government to 9,140,559.

THE BONAPARTE FAMILY. It appears that Achille Murat who lately left this country, son of the late king of Naples, had obtained a commission in the Belgic army, which, being known to the French king, the latter immediately requested his dismissal (because he belonged to the Bonaparte family) which was complied with by Leopold.

[A later statement in a Paris paper says that king Leopold had reconsidered this decision, and had, on the 5th of October, signed a decree for organizing a foreign legion, of which Achille Murat was appointed colonel.] [Ed. N. Y. Am.]

EXTRAVAGANCE. A London paper, describing the dresses of some ladies on a public occasion in that city, makes the following statements:

"The duchess of Argyll, in a dress of massive gold tissue, her raven locks, and a prodigious plume of feathers of the same color, produced a contrast with her diamonds, equaled only by "The duchess of Bedford, whose jewelry astonished all by its glitter and glare. The latter made a prodigious display indeed. Independently of the necklace, which cost fifty thousand guineas, ($233,000), chains of diamonds, with amethysts in the centre, decorated her grave's dress, from the thick velvet Spanish tail, to the girdle or restus, below the stomach.

The hon. Mrs. Hope, was a meteor in the throng; that lady was a moving firmament, and it was said that the cost in brilliant alone in a dress of sombre magnificence, (crimson), exceeded seven hundred thousand pounds!" or three millions one hundred and eight thousand dollars.

This single sum is more than sufficient to pay the salaries of all the governors in the United States, for fifty-five years! and, if divided among the people of this country, would be about $8 to every person, both white and black, in the state of Georgia, and nearly $518 to every person in the city of Augusta. It is also about one-sixth of the expense of our national government for a year.

[While such things were exhibiting in England, 150,000 persons, in one county of Ireland, were almost starving, though potatoes were only 4 cents per stone of 14lbs.]

*A pretty brisk quarrel took place between the governor and the house of assembly—but the governor retired from certain expressions in his opening speech which were deemed offensive, and a seeming peace followed. The temper of the house, however, is manifestly bad, and the "disputa with the mother country" will go on.

SARDINIA. It appears that the standing army of this petty kingdom—(now however, in a sort of vassalage to Austria), consists of 80 or 90,000 men! Hence the people are, as they must needs be, severely ruled and miserably fed.

BRIEF NOTICES.

An aged woman. There is at present living near Riverstown, in this county, in the perfect possession of her mental faculties, and with a degree of bodily activity that is really surprising, a respectable woman named Waugh, who has attained the extraordinary age of 117! She has, therefore, lived in the reigns of Queen Ann, George I. George II. George III. George IV. and is now in lively existence in that of William IV.

[Sligo Journal.]

Died, on the 17th November at Orwigsburg, Penn. Peter Frailey, esq. in the 73d year of his age—a venerable and valued man, a soldier of the revolution, and who afterwards filled many important offices in Pennsylvania with great benefit to the public and honor to himself. He was warm-hearted and kind—intelligent, liberal and just; and his decease must cause a sensible void in the society of Schuylkill county, of which he has been aptly called "the father."

Married. Last evening, by the rev. Mr. Barnes, Andrew Jackson, jr. esq. son of the president of the U. States, to Miss Sarah, daughter of the late Peter Yorke, esq. of this city.

[The preceding is from the Philadelphia Sentinel of Nov. 25. The gentleman married is the adopted son of the president.]

Missusquets (we might almost say Boston), had the first printing press, the first college, the first canal, the first rail-road, the first Sunday school, and the first fighting for independence, in America. [Trans.]

A bite. In "a rough and tumble fight" between two persons at Philadelphia, one of them bit off the others lip, and attempted also to bite off his nose!

Constantinople. The publication of a new paper which the sultan has for some time past been endeavoring to organize, is now likely soon to take place. The paper is to be published partly in Turkish and partly in French. The Turkish portion is to be edited by Fuad Effendi, the historiographer of the porte, and the French portion by M. Blacque, late editor of the Courier de Smyrne, which paper has for some time past ceased to appear.

Mr. Anderson. We learn from the Boston Transcript, that the committee of the board of aldermen on the communication of the manager of the Tremont theatre, transmitting $302, the proceeds of Mr. and Mrs. Anderson's charity concert, have reported, as their opinion, that the money was presented under a misapprehension of public sentiment. The board have voted to replace the funds at the disposal of Mr. Barrett, the manager.

Infamous. Certain young men, in New York, well dressed and having the appearance of gentlemen, have recently assaulted respectable ladies in the streets, if unprotected, in the evening, in a way that decency forbids a description of. One of them, however, having thus assaulted a young lady, was seized by her companion, (a married one), who held on until assistance came and secured the scoundrel. He has been held to bail in the sum of 1,000 dollars; but should be taught the art and mystery of sawing stone at Sing-Sing, for at least ten years—if guilty as charged.

Great slaughter of seals. A late English paper says—A number of seals have been in the habit of passing up the Tyne with the tide, for the purpose of preying on the salmon. Several sportsmen repaired in consequence to the mouth of the river on Friday week, at high water, and put down a quantity of nets, at which the seals were stopped. They then raised their heads to the surface, and were instantly fired at by a number of good shots. The flopping of the wounded, the progressive accession of fresh numbers, the constant salutes of the sportsmen, and the shouts of about 300 spectators, presented a singular scene. A melon was caught hold of a seal which rose near the brink of the river, by one of the hind membranes, but suffered for his temerity by being dragged heels over head into the water, in consequence of a desperate plunge of the poor phoca. The water was dyed with blood, and the returns give 32 killed; but how many were wounded does not appear.

Bank of England. It appears by official documents, that in Great Britain there are no fewer than 264,000 holders of stock in the bank of England, whose dividends do not exceed £200 a year.

A snug birth. In the discussion in the House of Lords on the evening of the 20th of September, Lord Brougham had occasion to speak of certain securities in his gift, and he remarked of one, worth £9,000 per annum, that it was once held by the celebrated "Nell Gwynne."

Good news. A paragraph in one of the French papers postpones the fatal visit of the comet of 1832 to the year 87, 832!

Bonaparte. At a ball given by the city of Paris to Bonaparte, was a madame Cardon. In general, he was not very fond of people who had become rich by any means but his own favour. He had never seen madame Cardon, whose name even he had never known before; but he had been told that her husband was possessed of great wealth. He walked towards her with a peevish sort of air, and said to her very abruptly—"Are you madame Cardon?" She made a profound courtesy to this question. Bonaparte continued his discourse. "You are very rich?" "Yes sir," she replied, "I have ten children." Bonaparte, struck with the delicate force of this reply, walked away quickly.

Gamblers. A lot of about sixty were lately disturbed by the police in Philadelphia—but all escaped by jumping out of the windows, &c. except nine, who were conducted to prison. The regular establishment has thus been broken up—it was snugly fitted for cecds of darkness.

Counsellor Sampson, in the course of an eloquent reply to a toast drank to his health and happiness, at a dinner lately given him in Philadelphia, expressed himself thus—"I might have risen to higher fortunes, and, had I stooped as low as others did, I might have worn a coronet, and left, in dying, to my posterity, a high and sounding title to hereditary infamy."

A Frenchman, meeting an English soldier with a Waterloo medal, began anxiously to animadvert on the English government for bestowing such a trifle, which did not cost them three francs. "That is true, to be sure," replied the hero; it did not cost the English government three francs, but it cost the French a Napoleon."

The Legion of Honor. The number of members created last year was 180; but during the first six months of the present year, it has amounted to 2,457; viz: 8 grand crosses, 36 great officers, 121 commanders, 362 officers, and 2,950 legionaries. The expenses of the mere insignia of these nominations will not be short of £5,400.

Sunday schools. The number of those institutions in the United States is 7,244—teachers 63,216—pupils 451,075.

Rat snake. A man at Person Court House, N. C. died as stated below a few days since. He had a rattle-snake in keeping, of whose "tameness" he unhappily had too high an opinion—for he was accustomed to handle it.

"The deceased was not bitten by the snake as was at first supposed, by those who were not present; he told our informant, at the time when his mouth and tongue were so much swollen that he could scarcely articulate, 'that the snake did not do it intentionally.' Those who were present say that Mr. Bobbit had the snake out showing it to them, holding it in his left hand, rather loosely, that by an effort of the snake to draw his head back, one of its fangs came in contact with one of Mr. B's fore fingers about half an inch below the upper joint; he dropped the snake, but immediately picked it up, put it in the cage and commenced sucking the wound. A physician was called in and saw the deceased in three minutes after the accident; his eyes were then red—his lips swollen and quivering—he said he should die, and was in the act of falling, when he was assisted to bed. In ten minutes afterwards, every muscle in the system appeared affected with a twitching which continued until he died. Vomiting commenced in ten min nates after the accident, and continued for an hour. No pulse was discovered after thirty minutes from the time the occurrence took place. He appeared to be sensible of all that was passing until about two hours before his death, at which time his breathing became more difficult, which continued to increase until he breathed his last. He died in six and a half hours from the time the poisonous gas entered his flesh—a melancholy instance of human folly.

One of the "giants." Married recently at Federalburg, Md. Mr. William Ward, a soldier of the revolution, aged 106 years, to Mrs. Catharine Wright, aged about 48.

BRITISH AFFAIRS.

From Bell's London Weekly Messenger.

Distresses and difficulties in general trade, and the causes explained.

It is impossible to look around us, and not perceive that great distress exists in every branch of trade, commerce and manufacture. From the years 1821 to 1824, agriculture labored under the heaviest pressure. It has partially revived, though it experienced a slight relapse last year; but trade and commerce, since the fatal blow which they experienced in 1826, have never recovered; fresh embarrassments have arisen, and new ones are every day thickening over them.

We have been accustomed of late to see names in the Gazette, which every man deemed as firmly fixed in their counting-houses as our native oaks in their forests. But the tempest has torn them up, and many of them now lie prostrate on the highway, whose names have been long embossed in the first walks of commerce and opulence. It has been with great regret that we have seen such names as those of M'ning, Palmer, and others, formerly East India and bank directors, added to the list of bankrupts.

If we seek the causes of these extensive misfortunes, we find many of them sufficiently apparent. The bank circulation has diminished two millions within little more than a year. If we take the period of the late revolution in France, we find that its circulation has been contracted within that time from £19,200,000, to £7,200,000. The funds within the same period have declined from 92 to 82. All the great staples of the country have been diminished in the same proportion. Wool and woollen yarn, notwithstanding their rise in the beginning of the year, much owing we believe to the speculations of American dealers, have fallen back to their usual stagnation. Cotton was scarcely ever lower; and this cannot be ascribed to the excess of importation. Iron, both in Wales and Staffordshire, is at a most ruinous price. Lead is so low in our own market, and so depressed abroad by the competition of the Spanish mines,—where it is picked up upon the surface of the soil, and requires little more than smelting,—as to afford no remunerating price. Colonial produce, not excepting that which is grasped by the monopoly of the East India company, is reduced to an unparalleled extent.

The state of things which we have above sketched, depends upon documents which we cannot alter, viz. the price currents, and therefore we cannot be suspected of exaggeration. But these disasters, confined in the beginning to the wholesale dealer, have at length passed into the retail trade.

It was observed by sir R. Peel, in his speech on the reform bill, that, notwithstanding the longest season ever known in London, the pressure on all shop-keepers had been most severe, and retail trade had been cut to the quick; and at a late interview between lord Grey and a deputation from Birmingham, lord G. admitted that manufactured goods had fallen fifty per cent. since the alteration of the currency.

But there is further evidence of the appalling distress of the times in the number of writs issued during the last two years and a half. By the report of the law commissioners, it appears, that seventy thousand affidavits have been filed for holding debtors to bail within that period. In all manufacturing districts, at this moment, legal process is sued out to a frightful extent, and more particularly in the potteries, and hardware districts.

Having made this short and melancholy statement, and with no purpose of infusing gloom, where it is our duty to prompt to energy and exertion, we propose shortly to point out the two main causes of the present stagnation and distress, in addition to what we have above detailed. They appear to be these:—First, the political state of Europe;—Secondly, the fluctuating system of finance pursued by ministers.

The uncertain condition of public affairs has unhinged all the markets of the continent, and the visitation of the dreadful pestilence of the cholera has augmented the evils arising from public agitation. The great markets of Germany have been less thronged during the spring, the summer, and autumn, than was ever known. The large dealers, who used to arrive from Bohemia and Hungary, are kept at home from the apprehensions of the plague; whilst the civil war in Poland has not only interrupted the dealings of the provinces on the banks of the Vistula and the Niemen, but has shut out from the markets of Europe the numerous Russian merchants who came from the extreme banks of the Volga and the D. n. The rich provinces of Galicia and Dalmatia have been deterred, by the same causes, from the German mart; and though our trade with Italy and the Archipelago has not suffered to the same extent, it has still been deranged in a great degree by the like disturbing effects.

It is not to be doubted, therefore, that the agitated state of Europe, in addition to the evils of that dreadful pestilence which "walketh by day, and whose arrows flyeth by night," have produced the most disastrous consequences to our general trade and commerce.

Our large trade with America has not indeed failed us, but the southern states are in a condition so unsettled and unsafe, that their commerce has been more than usually unproductive. Since the late change of government of the Brazils, the commerce with that part of the globe has been almost stagnant, and the merchant thinks himself fortunate if he can get his goods back without exporting any sale at remittance.

If such have been the effects upon trade and commerce from the political agitations of Europe, and our requires us to add, that the fluctuating system of finance pursued by ministers has been the second disturbing cause.

We do not blame lord Althorp for impediments which he could not master, owing to the state of the house of commons when he first brought forward his budget. But his Canada timber bill has been productive of great embarrassment in that large branch of our trade.

Our own opinions upon this bill have been before expressed; but the plan of equalizing, or nearly equalizing, the duties upon Baltic and Canada timbers, should either have been openly abandoned during the present session, or otherwise firmly maintained. Lord Althorp has pursued neither of these courses. He has temporised with the timber trade, and has thereby struck a blow at the most active branch of industry, which is connected with the large subject matter both of our navigation and imports, and domestic labor, and building.

It has been nearly the same as regards the wine trade. It is now nearly ten months since alterations in these duties were first proposed; and wisely proposed. The bill is not yet passed, and the stagnation of trade, which commenced from the first notification of the new finance measure, has still continued. If we look into the Gazette we shall find that nearly one hundred wine merchants have become bankrupts since lord Althorp's bill was first broached in the house of commons.

Another large class of commercial men has also suffered from the uncertainty of our financial system—the West India merchants. A promise, as sacred almost as any public pledge could be, had been given to them, to relieve their produce from some portion of taxation; that is, at least from the old war duties. They were completely unnoticed in the last budget, and the consequence has been,—the most severe and appalling failures amongst the merchants concerned in the West India trade.

It is our duty also to add, that from the delay of the chancellor of the exchequer in not bringing forward the usual annual exposition of finance, the money market has been greatly deranged.

Formerly, a reduced price of stocks such as that which has lately taken place, from 92 to 82, was scarcely deemed an evil. It invigorated and revived trade, by the infusion of new capital, and the public securities were only momentarily depressed, in order that the luntholder might pour his treasures into the channels of enterprise,—reviving again, as these securities were sure to do, from the accumulations and increased investments of successful trade.

But this has not been the case in the late fall of stocks. Capital has not been withdrawn for the purpose of active employment, but for the purpose of holding, in order to watch the turn of public affairs and the financial proceedings of the government.

The first thing, therefore, that ministers owe to the public, is a full exposition of the national income and expenditure, and of our actual financial state.

In connection with the rejection of the reform bill, the London Examiner of the 9th ult. makes the following statement:—

We have taken some pains to obtain information as to the indications of the state of the public mind, in the metropolis, and the country, in the present crisis. The following are a few of the facts which have come to our knowledge:—

It is known in the city that considerable purchases have recently been made of American stock.

There is reason also to believe that persons have provided themselves with small amounts of gold, and property easily available in emergencies; but great caution is used not to create any alarm, and the purposes are seldom avowed.

At the clubs, and other places of meeting of the trading classes in the metropolis, various plans for the formation of a national guard have been the subject of discussion.

We have been informed that in several districts of the metropolis the tax gatherers have been informed by the inhabitants on whom they have called, that the taxes which they have recently collected would be the last which they would have to receive, unless the reform bill was carried. The districts to which we allude are not those in which a determination has been evinced with reference to the taxes called rates imposed by selected bodies, to act upon the constitutional principle that taxation without representation is illegal—namely, Mary-lebone, St. Pancras, and Islington parishes. We may mention, as an instance of the peaceable and quiet mode in which these determinations will be carried into effect, that the inhabitants of St. Martin's parish, without calling any public meeting, or making any outward demonstration, have refused to pay their last poor rate. The amount which it was expected to produce is, perhaps, £2,000; and of this amount probably not more than £100 has been collected, and that, it is believed, has been paid by those who had not been consulted, and who knew nothing of the determination of other inhabitants to refuse payment.

The Morning Chronicle says—If the anti-reformers will not yield to reason, perhaps the following plain facts may strike them. We class them under the two heads of certain and probable consequences of a rejection of reform. The certain consequences will be—1. A prolonged agitation of this dangerous question for at least six or eight months more; 2. A considerable interruption of important parliamentary business for that time; 3. A state of weakness with regard to our foreign relations; 4. A stagnation of the retail, money, commercial and manufacturing interests; 5. The continued public discussion of fundamental principles of government by opposite classes in a state of angry excitement; 6. A collision at such a moment of the two houses of parliament. None will deny the certainty of the occurrence of such consequences; let our bishops calculate their final results; and then take the probable consequences—1. A partial or general refusal to pay taxes or tithes; 2. A run upon the country banks, the savings banks, the bank of England, and thence upon national credit; 3. A panic; 4. Turnings out of trades—political associations—federalism—resistance; 5. General distress —dissatisfaction—Swing; 6. A published list of the majority, with their places, pensions, boroughs, and connections; 7. Hatred of peerage—a large creation of peers—depreciation of the peerage; 8. The present bill, with compound interest; 9. A reform bill for the lords. Let those who have sense, and patriotism, and power, canvass these consequences; ask themselves whether they will tend—and then may the Lord direct their understandings.

BRITISH FINANCES.

Extract from lord Althorp's speech in the house of commons.

"Lord Althorp said it was then his intention to state to the house his view of the present expenditure and revenue for the present year. He proposed to do so—first, by stating what the revenue of the year would be; then the expenditure; and lastly, what would be the balance of the account. The mode in which he would arrive at this result, would be by saying what the produce of last year was; what was the difference between last year and the present one, up to the present time; and what would be probably received for the last quarter of this year. The produce of the customs for 1830 amounted to upwards of £17,540,000. A decrease had taken place up to the 25th of September, from the 1st of January, 1831, to the amount of £644,000. This reduced it to £16,896,000. I estimate, continued the noble lord, a further loss of £210,000 in coals. I expect the duties on wine and on raw cottons will occasion an increase of £100,000, making the whole of the present year for the customs £16,786,000. The produce of the excise for 1830 was about eighteen millions. The decrease up to the 24th of September is upwards of one million. The reduction of duties is about one hundred thousand pounds, which only extends from the 24th of September to the end of the year. This reduction made the excise of sixteen millions. There had been received on the stock of wine in hand one hundred and twenty-seven thousand pounds. Altogether, the clear produce of the excise was sixteen millions eight hundred thousand pounds. With respect to the department of the customs, it will be necessary to state what is the amount of taxes that have been reduced, and what effect they have on the revenue. The amount of taxes reduced is altogether three millions three hundred and fifty-seven thousand pounds; and the reduction on the customs made the whole amount to four millions. But the revenue accruing from the customs and excise, which amounted in 1830, to thirty-six millions, will now amount to thirty-three. Thus the decrease, by a fair computation, instead of being four millions, has only been two millions six hundred and thirty-four thousand pounds. It will now be understood that the customs amount to sixteen millions seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds. The excise amounts to sixteen millions eight hundred thousand pounds. The noble lord then proceeded to state that the taxes, stamps and crown lands were fifteen millions and upwards, which made the amount of the whole revenues received, forty-seven millions two hundred and fifty thousand pounds. He now came to the expenditure. At this period government knew better what was more likely to be the expenditure than at any other period of the year. In the early part of the year government were obliged to make up the amount from estimates, but at the present time a very small proportion was made up from them. He could, in consequence, make a statement of the expenditure which might be perfectly relied on. It amounted, up to the 24th of September, to £35,222,641. The expenditure from that time to the end of the year would amount to £11,533,880, thus making the whole expenditure for 1831, £46,756,521. The surplus which would remain after deducting the expenditure from the produce, would be just £493,479. The expenditure, he found, for 1830, was £47,812,000. I have, continued lord Althorp, examined the statements in every way that I can. I am sure I make no exaggeration. I have consulted those in the treasury whom I believed to have had the most experience, and they tell me that I can with confidence rely on the general accuracy of the statements made."

JUDGE CLAYTON OF GEORGIA.

One of the opinions of Judge Clayton, with reference to the affairs of the Indians in Georgia, it will be recollected, was nullified by the late governor Gilmer; and the friends of the latter, having a majority in the legislature, at the recent election of judges, dismissed Mr. Clayton from office,—though he seems regarded as a "Crawford" or "Troup" man, and will probably have the support of that party to fill the seat in congress vacated by the election of Mr. Lumpkin to be governor of the state. This brief introduction seemed necessary to a better understanding of the following—published in consequence, it seems, of his removal from the judgeship.

Milledgeville, Nov. 12th, 1831.

MESSENGERS. EDITORS.—You will confer a favor by publishing the following letter of Chancellor Kent. In making this request, I have only to remark, that the sole consideration for making it is, to submit the testimony of one, in favor of my legal reputation, whose character as a jurist will entitle his evidence to great weight. He is justly considered the Blackstone of America, and his character as a lawyer stands as high in Europe as it does in his own country. He has never been engaged in either party or political struggles, and his whole life has been devoted to legal research. This publication is asked under not the slightest temper of complaint for my late removal from office, for I hope I shall have it in my power, at a more convenient season, to lay before my fellow citizens, such a statement of the whole matter, as will show there is no necessity, on my part, for either all or reproach. Respectfully yours,

A. S. CLAYTON.

New York, Oct. 13, 1831.

DEAR SIR—I was favored yesterday with your letter of the 5th inst. together with the Southern Recorder of Sept. 29th, containing your opinion in the case of the State of Georgia vs. Calisto.

That opinion has been read by me with great care and attention, and agreeably to your request I submit the conclusions, to which my own mind has arrived, in answer to the two material points in the case.

1. It appears to me that upon the whole, the statute applies to the case. I can only judge from the extracts from it contained in your opinion. The statute asserts that the mines alluded to, are of right the property of Georgia, and it authorizes the governor to take possession of those mines, and to employ force to protect them from all further trespass. I presume such forcible possession has been taken, and that the offence alleged against the Cherokee Indian arose subsequently. But the statute is no exceptionable, in reference to the rights of the Cherokees to their lands, (and which include the mines thereon, as well as the trees and herbage and stones thereon), under the existing treaties with them, and in reference to the constitution and constitutional authority of the United States, that I agree with you, that such a statute should receive an interpretation, if possible, favorable to constitutional and treaty rights. If such a statute does not apply in very terms, to the very case of a Cherokee Indian digging in the mines, the benign intention would be that the legislature did not intend it, because such an intention would contravene the clear rights of the Cherokees, to the undisturbed use and enjoyment of the lands within their territory, secured to them by treaty.

2. But the better way is not to rest upon any such construction, but to go at once, as you have done, to the great and grave question, which assumes the statute to have intended to deprive the Cherokees without their consent and without purchase, of the use and enjoyment in part at least, of their lands secured to them by national treaties, and which calls into discussion the constitutional validity of the statute.

On this point I am entirely with you, and in my opinion your argument is sound and conclusive, and you have examined the subject with candor and accuracy, and with the freedom of judgment which your station and character dictate.

I am most entirely persuaded that the Cherokee title to the sole use and undisturbed enjoyment of their mines, is as entire and perfect as to any part of their lands, or as to any use of them whatever. The occupancy in perpetuity to them and their posterity, belongs to them of right, and the state of Georgia has no other right in respect to the Indian property in their lands, than the right of pre-emption by fair purchase, no other interest in the lands, as property, belongs to the state, and to take possession of the mines by force, is substituting violence for law and the obligations of treaty contract. It appears to be altogether without any foundation, to apply the common law doctrine of waste to the case, and I cannot but think that the legislature of Georgia would not have passed the statute, if they had duly considered that the Indian lands, have never been claimed, or the occupancy of them, in the most free and absolute manner by the Indians, questioned, either by the royal governments before the American revolution, or by the union, or by any state since, except in open wars, or except the claim was founded upon fair purchase from the Indians themselves. The proceeding of Georgia in this case is an anomaly, and I think it hurts the credit of free and popular governments, and the moral character of our country, and is in direct violation of the constitutional authority of the United States, as manifested by treaties and by statute. I cannot think that the high spirited, free and noble race of men, who compose the citizens of Georgia, would be willing on re-consideration to do any such thing. Yours respectfully,

JAMES KENT.

Hon. A. S. Clayton.

MASONIC.

The following address and resolution were adopted at a meeting of the members of Mount Moriah lodge, and Mount Moriah royal arch chapter, held at the masonic hall in Hagerstown, on Monday evening, November 14, 1831:—

The members of Mount Moriah lodge, No. 83, and Mount Moriah royal arch chapter, being specially convened at the masonic hall, in Hagerstown, Maryland, this 14th day of November, 1831, for the purpose of considering the propriety of surrendering our charter, have upon due deliberation, adopted the following declarations and resolutions:

We declare that the institution of masonry, as we understand it, has for its object, 1. The cultivation and diffusion of charity—not merely in the dispensation of alms, but in the inculcation of a spirit of forgiveness and conciliation towards all mankind. 2. An habitual respect for the Laws; and 3. A deep reverence for the bible and a constant adherence to its sacred precepts. Such are the cardinal principles of masonry, as the same have been imparted to, and recognized by us.

We further declare, that we have never, in the remotest degree, suffered our masonic ties to control, or in any manner to influence us, in the discharge of our po-legal rights and duties; that in all the political contests which have from time to time agitated our country, we have never supported any man for office because of his being a mason, nor permitted that consideration in any degree, to influence our suffrages; and that in so doing we have acted in strict accordance with the principles of this institution.

We further declare, that as masons we are bound to each other by no tie or obligation, inconsistent with our duty to our God, our country or our neighbors, and that the various speeches, manifestoes, books, and other publications, in which we are exhibited as united by ties and obligations of a different and contrary import, and more especially those publications in which we are represented as bound to support each other whether right or wrong, and to keep each other's secrets, even when they involve the guilt of treason or murder, are untrue and calumnious.

In reference to the case of Morgan, our minds have been variously affected, by the rumors, conjectures and statements, which have been given to the public through the press, and while some of us entertain the opinion that he is still alive, and residing in Canada or some foreign country, others of us believe that he was forcibly and illegally seized and taken to the northern frontiers of the United States, and there murdered, by men calling themselves masons. But we submit it to the liberal judgment of our countrymen, that this was the crime of a few infatuated and deluded men, calling themselves masons, who in its perpetration, violated no less the principles of the masonic institution, than the laws of their country; and that it is both cruel and unchristian to argue that because these misguided men were guilty of murder, all masons are therefore murderers.

The fate of Morgan, naturally aroused the indignation of the people near the scene of his abduction, and there can be no doubt, that the first and principal object of those who espoused his cause, was to bring the offenders to justice. The transaction however was soon seized upon by agitators, and broken down politicians, as a means of political excitement. We have witnessed upon recent occasions the efforts of emissaries and incendiaries, who have been sent amongst us from other states, for the purpose of exciting against us the hatred and ill will of our immediate friends and neighbors. But amidst all the fierceness and fanaticism with which free masons have been assailed and hunted down, in other portions of the union, it has been the proud distinction of the members of this lodge and chapter, to be sustained and supported by the virtue and intelligence of the community in which they reside, a large portion of which, as it is well known to us, are both from principle and education opposed to the masonic institution.

To the agitators of the day we owe nothing, but to the mass of our fellow-citizens, including those whose minds, through the arts and persuasions of the designing, have been poisoned against us, we do owe it, that the existence of this lodge and chapter should no longer continue to be a cause of strife between us. To preserve the peace of society, therefore, from the machinations of bad men, and in token of the high value which we set upon the good opinion of our fellow-citizens, we have

Resolved, That the chapters of this lodge and of the royal arch chapter of this place, be, and the same are hereby surrendered, and that the said lodge and chapter be henceforth discontinued.

ANTI-NULIFICATION.

Judge Smith's letter.

Yorkville, Nov. 9th.

Messrs. Saml. Lewis, David McCalla, Jas. Chestney, jr. Burr H. Head, committee.

Gentlemen—I received in due time your invitation of the 28th ult., "to attend a general meeting of the citizens of Chester district, on Friday next, for the purpose of taking into consideration the present state of public affairs.

I beg leave to assure you, gentlemen, it would afford me great pleasure to do so were it in my power, but circumstances of late occurrence, not within my control, have rendered it out of my power. I owe much to the people of Chester district for their kind patronage during my practice at the bar, as well as for their unabated civilities to me at all times since, whenever I have had the pleasure to mingle with them. And could I upon this occasion have found it in my power to attend their deliberations and to have contributed my humble services to the promotion of the public weal, I should be much gratified.

I have great confidence in their prudence and integrity, and I have little doubt but in these moments of peril, they will watch over their portion of the republic with such honest ardor as to save it from harm. When I recollect that some of the revolutionary patriots of '76 are still with you, and yet in the scenes of busy life, I am proud to believe the young and ardent youths, who are rising up as the ornaments of their country, will profit from the examples of those who know from experience the horrors and calamities of intestine war—who have seen neighbor butcher neighbor for no other cause than a difference of political opinions.

There are some forebodings of like events at the present time, which I rejoice to believe are lessening, from the circumsppection of the great mass of honest citizens who live in the country, breathe a purer air, and remain untainted by the pestiferous politics of town and village loungers, who, having little else to do, make a prey of their neighbor's fame to prevent their own from sinking into forgetfulness. I am happy to believe that your village is not embraced in this character. They are all men of business. If you have dissensions, they are of a more honorable cast.

I have thought much recently upon the prospect before us. I believe the doctrine of nullification is retrograding. The great mass of this great community are honest. They are also sensible; and by the blessing of heaven, but little versed in the political intrigues of the day. They seek truth, and if once they are correctly informed, they invariably do justice both to their neighbors and their country. Inform these men correctly, and you have nothing to fear. They love peace, they shun war, unless it be necessary for their own safety or their country's glory—then they will to arms.

Accept my best wishes for your individual happiness, and through you I beg leave to present my thanks to the citizens of Chester district.

WM. SMITH.

GENERAL BLAIR'S LETTER.

Red Oak Camp, Nov. 4th, 1831.

Messrs. Saml. Lewis, David McCalla, Jas. Chestney, jr. and B. H. Head, esqrs. committee.

Gentlemen—I have received by to-day's mail, your polite invitation "to attend a general meeting of the citizens of Chester district, to be held on Friday, the 11th of this month, for the purpose of taking into consideration the present state of public affairs"—and you flatter me by expressing a hope that I may find it convenient to favor the citizens of Chester with my counsel, and assist them in their deliberations on that occasion.

Although I am not so vain as to imagine I could enlighten your highly intelligent community, or aid it in coming to correct results on the subject to which you allude, yet, as I should expect to be a gainer thereby, I would take pleasure in attending if it were possible. But having been confined to bed for near a month past, by a violent bilious attack, and not yet sufficiently recovered to leave my room, you will perceive at once there is no probability that I shall be so far restored by the 11th, as to be able to attend your meeting.

I am highly gratified to find the patriotic and enlightened citizens of Chester disposed to take into consideration the state of public affairs. The time has come when every true heart and sound head should exercise their utmost influence to keep public opinion in the right channel. A dangerous heresy called "nullification," is abroad in our land, and should it be entertained and acted on by our state legislature, (a proceeding expected by many), we have a right to apprehend the worst of consequences. The revenue laws, above all others, are laws that the general government cannot suffer to be trifled with. Money is as necessary to the existence of the body politic as bread and water is to sustain the human body. If South Carolina, remaining in the union, should be permitted by the general government to annul or evade the operation of the revenue laws, every other state would immediately follow the example, and in a short time the federal government would not be able to collect a single dollar for its support. From the very necessity of the case, therefore, the general government, to preserve its own existence, would be compelled to enforce the collection of the duties at all hazards, and by military process if necessary.

We hear much about state sovereignty,—and by some a greater supremacy is claimed for the state than they assign to the general government. Although I contend that the general government is endowed with many more and higher attributes of sovereignty than any state government in the union, yet it is idle to claim absolute sovereignty for either federal or state government—that the “sovereignty resides in the people” is the fundamental principle, nay, it is the very foundation of our political theory. The state government is entirely the creature of the people: the federal government was, also, created by the people in their individual and corporate capacities—it was the work of the people and the states conjointly, and partakes of a compound character. In the house of representatives, the popular character is preserved and the people represented—in the senate, the federal feature is maintained and the states represented. The people, however, can alter or abolish either of those governments whenever their interest or happiness requires it. I, therefore, claim for the state of South Carolina the right of seceding from the union upon these principles—but, that she can, even by means of a convention, nullify such laws of congress as she may dislike, and avail herself of those that are calculated for her benefit and protection, is an absurdity I cannot understand. Still less can the legislature exercise the power of nullification. Regarding it as a revolutionary measure, not recognized by the constitution, (according to Mr. McDuffie’s admission), if it could be exercised any where, it must be in a primary assembly of the people,—in convention. But I think I have shown that even a convention cannot exercise this power while the state remains in the union,—and when she withdraws from the union, (should she ever be so mad as to do so), such withdrawal will supercede the necessity of nullification. So that view nullification in any light I can, it appears to me a deformed, incomprehensible monster, incapable of producing any good, but calculated to do evil without measure and without end.

I flatter myself these crude and hasty remarks, (intended, at least, to do good), may be received with all the indulgence due to a mind sympathizing to a great extent with the bodily infirmity of the writer.

Very respectfully, gentlemen, your obedient humble servant,
JAMES BLAIR.

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL.

The venerable chief justice left the city on Saturday morning 19th inst. in the steam boat William Penn, for Baltimore, accompanied by the good wishes of our citizens for his safe return home, and a long and continued enjoyment of uninterrupted health.

Previous to the judge leaving the city, the committee of young men appointed in October last, to wait upon him, presented the following address, which, together with the reply of the judge, have been politely tendered to us for publication. [U. S. Gaz.]

ADDRESS.
Philadelphia, Nov. 17, 1831.

Hon. Judge Marshall,

SIR,—Understanding that you are about to leave this city, permit us to express our regret that your stay cannot be prolonged, while we congratulate you upon your restoration to health, and our country (not less heartily) upon the probability that you will yet, for many years, preserve in full vigour the faculties that have been so long and so successfully employed for the good of your fellow citizens.

As one of the few left among us, in reverence for whom all Americans unite, we have deemed it our duty to assure you of our profound respect and earnest wishes for your future welfare.

Permit us to add,—remembering a kind compliment paid by yourself to the city in which we reside,—that as Philadelphians, we think ourselves entitled to be proud, that SCIENCE has here wrought what we shall have the approbation of our countrymen in calling an inestimable benefit to the nation.

REPLY.

Philadelphia, Nov. 18, 1831.

GENTLEMEN,—I have received your address on my departure from this place with that sensibility which the partial kindness by which it is dictated ought to inspire.

Permit me to assure you, that the flattering terms in which you convey the pleasure you feel at my restoration to health, have made a deep impression on my heart, and will be cherished as an additional stimulus to those exertions which they reward.

With a full sense of the unremitting attention and feeling which has accompanied the skill to which I am indebted for recovery from a painful disease, I carry with me, from Philadelphia, a profound admiration of the many institutions in your city, which attract the attention of a stranger—institutions founded on the safe basis of utility and virtue, and regulated by that wisdom which ensures permanence and improvement. It is no small additional gratification to believe, that the rising generation inherits the spirit of their fathers, and will be found to advance with the age in which they are.

Be pleased to communicate my grateful thanks to those you represent; and, with my sincere acknowledgments for the kind terms in which you have conveyed their sentiments, to be assured of the good wishes and great respect with which I am, gentlemen,

Your obedient servant, J. MARSHALL.

GOVERNOR BARBOUR.

Barboursville, Nov. 2d, 1831.

SIR,—Mr. Eaton Stanard was so good as to be the bearer of your note to me, enclosing the resolution of sundry citizens deputed by the people opposed to the re-election of Andrew Jackson, to choose a delegate to represent this congressional district in the national republican convention, proposed to be held in Baltimore on the second Monday in next month. By these I learn they have honored me with this appointment. My high respect for those who have appointed me, my entire coincidence of sentiment with them in the object to be effected by the convention, and a conviction that no man can with propriety refuse the portion of duty assigned him by his fellow citizens, in times like these, when “our country is degraded by the tyranny and misrule of the present administration,” are considerations which induce me promptly to accept the appointment.

And it is with sincere pleasure I perceive in these resolutions the tribute so justly paid to the worth of Henry Clay.—Having long served with him in the public councils, and for a portion of the time in a relation to him so intimate as to furnish the best opportunity justly to appreciate his talents and his patriotism, I am happy that I can most sincerely respond to the sentiments expressed by my constituents so flattering to this justly distinguished citizen. With them I shall rejoice to see him elevated to the chief magistracy of the United States—whose duties I am confident he will discharge in a spirit corresponding with that which prevailed in the better days of the republic—and if it is made obvious, which I cannot now anticipate, that our great object can be attained only by the selection of another citizen; then, indeed, as our motto is our country, compared with whose honor and the preservation of her noble institutions, names are nothing, Henry Clay will be abandoned by me without hesitation. It is therefore to me a source of unmixed gratification when I reflect that I shall carry with me into the convention, as well from duty as inclination, the views and wishes of my constituents.

Your fellow citizen, JAMES BARBOUR.
Richard Cuse, esq. secretary.

LETTER FROM JUDGE McLEAN.

From the Hagerstown Mail.

A letter from Judge McLean to a member of the anti-masonic convention.

Nashville, 7th Sept. 1831.

DEAR SIR,—As the time for the meeting of the convention at Baltimore is near, in pursuance of my promise, I have the honor to address you, on the subject of our conversation at Columbus. There are now three candidates for the presidency before the people. General Jackson, Mr. Clay, and Mr. Calhoun, have all been nominated by their friends, in public meetings and otherwise, and they must consequently be considered as competitors for that distinguished station. The addition of a fourth name to the list of candidates, and especially one as humble as mine, might lead, insofar as any influence could be attached to it, to distract still more the public mind. This I do not wish to see, as I do fear it would be injurious to the best interests of the country.

It, by a multiplication of candidates, an election by the people should be prevented, I should consider it a national misfortune. In the present agitated state of the public mind, an individual who should be elected to the chief magistracy by less than a majority of the votes of the people, could scarcely hope to conduct, successfully, the business of the nation. He should possess in advance the public confidence; and a majority of the suffrages of the people is the only satisfactory evidence of that confidence.

My situation on the bench imposes considerations of prudence and delicacy which do not arise, perhaps, from any other official station.

Whilst no one can deny the right of the people to select their chief magistrates from any of the branches of the government, it would seem that a member of the judiciary should decline the contest, unless the use of his name would be likely to tranquillise the public mind, and advance the prosperity of the country.

Without presuming that my name would be favorably considered by the convention, I have to request that if it should come under consideration, you will make known the reasons why I most respectfully decline the honor of being presented to that respectable body for nomination to the presidency.

I would do injustice to my feelings, if I were not to tender to my friends in the convention my warmest gratitude for their favorable consideration, and to assure them that I shall never cease to cherish the recollection of their good opinion.

With sentiments of the highest regard, I am, dear sir, truly yours,
JOHN MCLEAN.

MR. CLAY AND THE ANTI-MASONS.

From the Lexington, (Ky.) Gazette.

Having casually heard the following correspondence spoken of, and presuming that our readers would take an interest in perusing it, we have requested and procured a copy of it for publication.

Hanover, Ind. Sept. 2, 1831.

Hon. Henry Clay:

SIR—Having been appointed by an anti-masonic meeting in Hanover, Indiana, to open a correspondence with you for the purpose of ascertaining your sentiments with respect to masonry, we take this opportunity of addressing you on the subject. We feel ourselves impelled to this duty, and to the taking of this step, from the consideration that in us is placed a part of the sovereignty of this country; that on us, as constituent parts of this government, depend the perpetuity of our republican institutions, the character and prosperity of our nation, the happiness of its citizens, and the destiny of millions yet unborn. As citizens of this republic we feel it our bounden duty to watch over the destinies of our nation, to guard with studious care our rights, and to detect and exterminate whatever has a tendency to corrupt our republican institutions, or set aside our laws. The subject of free masonry is one which have of late engrossed the attention of the people in many parts of the United States. It is a subject which is of vital importance, and demands the serious attention of every Christian, patriot and republican. What may be your sentiments on this subject, we know not. By some it is affirmed, that you are now a mason of the highest order, and a zealous supporter of the masonic institution; and by others, that though you were once a mason, you have of late abandoned the society and are now opposed to the institution; so that we have been unable as yet to ascertain with certainty your sentiments on this subject. As we are again shortly to be called upon to choose a man to preside over the councils of our nation; as it will then be our duty and privilege to raise our humble but independent voice in favor of him whom we may deem most worthy of our suffrage; and as you now stand a candidate for a high and important station, as your friends and fellow-citizens, we would solicit from you a frank and candid statement of your sentiments on this subject. We solicit this with the more confidence, because we believe you have always sustained the character of the frank and affable friend, and the faithful and undisguised politician, and that you would scorn to obtain the suffrage of the people by concealing your sentiments. Yours respectfully,

JAMES A. WATSON,
NOBLE BUTLER,
JAMES H. THOMSON.

ANSWER.

Ashland, October 8, 1831.

Gentlemen: I hope you will excuse the delay in acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 2d ult. which has arisen from my absence from home and from various engagements.

Waiving the considerations that I have no knowledge of the existence of an anti-masonic meeting in Hanover, Indiana, other than that which is derived from your letter, nor of your appointment as a committee to correspond with me, other than your statement, nor the satisfaction of a personal acquaintance with you, I will proceed at once to reply to your letter. Its professed object is to ascertain my sentiments on the subject of masonry; and the reason assigned by you for this inquiry is thus stated by yourselves: "As we are again shortly to be called upon to choose a man to preside over the councils of our nation; as it will then be our duty and privilege to raise our humble but independent voice in favor of our suffrage; and as you now stand a candidate for a high and important station, as your friends and fellow-citizens, we would solicit from you a frank and candid statement of your sentiments on this subject."

I do not know a solitary provision in the constitution of the United States which conveys the slightest authority to the general government to interfere, one way or the other, with either masonry or anti-masonry. If, therefore, a president of the U. States, or any other functionary of that government, were to employ his official power to sustain or to abolish, or to advance the interests of masonry or anti-masonry it would be an act of usurpation or tyranny.

You have not called upon me for my opinion upon any great practical measure falling within my scope of federal power; but passing by every question of vital interest, within the sphere of its operation, you demand my sentiments upon a subject with which I humbly conceive it has nothing to do; and you place this demand on the ground of the influence which my sentiments might exert upon the exercise of an undoubted and important privilege which you possess as citizens of the United States.

A compliance on my part, with your demand would amount to an implied admission, that individual sentiments, on the subject of masonry, formed a proper consideration in regulating the exercise of the elective franchise in respect to offices of the federal government. I can make no such admission. I cannot believe that whether I am hostile or friendly to masonry or anti-masonry, is at all material in the formation of any judgment, on the part of my fellow-citizens, concerning my fitness for any office under the government of the United States. That elevated office, to which you allude, should, in my opinion, be filled by one who is capable, unswayed by sectarian feelings or passions, of administering its high duties impartially towards the whole people of the United States, however divided into religious, social, benevolent or literary associations.

Entertaining these views, I have constantly refused to make myself a party to the unhappy contest raging distant from me, in other parts of the union, between masons and anti-masons. Whilst these views remain uncorrected I must adhere to that determination. If, indeed, you gentlemen, will point to the provision in the federal constitution, which can be legitimately made to operate upon the subject in question, I would not hesitate promptly to comply with your request. In the meantime, in declining it, I hope you will consider me as not wanting in proper respect to you or to those whom you represent, but as acting from a conviction of the impropriety of blending an alien ingredient with a question, already sufficiently complex; and also from a sense of personal independence. I am with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

Messrs. James A. Watson, Noble Butler, James H. Thomson.

MR. CLAY IN INDIANA.

Reception of Mr. Clay at Terre Haute.

The intelligence having reached Terre Haute that Mr. Clay had passed up through Illinois to his farm in that state, about twenty miles distant from this town, on the day succeeding, a deputation of citizens of the county of Vigo was sent to wait upon him there, and invite him to Terre Haute. In pursuance of their invitation, on the 28th ult. Mr. Clay visited Terre Haute, escorted into town by a cavalcade of about two hundred citizens, and took lodgings at the hotel of Capt. Jas. Wasson. Immediately after his arrival, he received the citizens who thronged to see, and to be introduced to him; and after an intercourse which appeared to be highly gratifying to them, he was waited upon by the committee in behalf of the town and its vicinity. The following is the correspondence between them:

Terre Haute, Oct. 28th, 1831.

To the hon. Henry Clay.

SIR: Being appointed, by the citizens of Terre Haute and its vicinity, a committee for this purpose, we have to perform the highly acceptable office of addressing you in their behalf. We assure you, sir, of the lively gratification generally felt at your presence amongst us—we tender you the homage of our respect and esteem, and beg you to believe that you are received by all with a heartfelt welcome. Indeed the scene which now presents itself to you renders unnecessary these expressions. You behold our citizens assembled in an immense multitude to greet you at the very moment of your arrival, and by their looks and salutations you have a full assurance of their feelings. The national colors, floating from the flag-staff of our town, and the continued roar of artillery, announce to all that we consider your visit a cause for more than ordinary rejoicing, and that we have declared this day to be one of public congratulation and festivity. We cannot forget the benefits which you have rendered the west, whilst engaged in the national councils, both in congress and the cabinet—your successful efforts in Europe to secure to your country an honorable peace—your eloquence in behalf of the oppressed of South America—your introduction and support of a system of internal improvements and domestic manufactures, so well calculated to secure the real independence of the country, and to all parts of it equal benefits—our national character likewise, elevated as it is in both hemispheres, so that an American citizen is laden with pleasure in every land—for this we consider ourselves, in a great measure, indebted to your splendid career. But, sir, whatever may be your claims, we well know that in these times of political revolution and party violence, none can predict with certainty. It may be your destiny to fill the highest office in the gift of your countrymen—it may be that the Laurel will entwine the brow of some more fortunate competitor; but, should the issue of the contest be against you, we shall still look to your well-tried patriotism, which has never suffered any abatement of its vigor and zeal amidst all your trials, and shall expect of you that, whenever and wherever you may be useful, you will persevere in sustaining the prosperity and honor of the republic. Having seen your answer to the citizens of Vincennes upon the subject of a public dinner, we should expose our motives to suspicion, if we were now to tender you a similar compliment as further evidence of our respect and attachment.

We have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servants,

E. U. BROWN,
RUSSELL ROSS,
WM. WINES,
H. I. GILMAN, Jr.
C. GILBERT,
SAMUEL CRAWFORD.

MR. CLAY'S REPLY.

Terre Haute, 28th Oct. 1831.

GENTLEMEN: I thank you most cordially, and the citizens of this town, for the sentiments, in their name, which you have expressed towards me, and for the lively manifestations of joy and felicitation of which my arrival among you has been the occasion. They abundantly assure me that I am in the midst of ardent and partial friends, and have made a grateful impression on my heart, which will long remain. Whilst I am sensible, gentlemen, that your kindness has greatly magnified the importance of my public services, I feel the proud consciousness of having strove, in every station in which I have been placed, honestly and faithfully to discharge my duty, and it is highly gratifying to me to witness, in the general prosperity of all parts of the country, evidences of the wisdom of the policy which congress has so long pursued. In this remote point, more than eight hundred miles from the capitol of the union, it is impossible not to recognise the emanating tendency of that national road, which, in the progress of its construction, has already reached your town, and passed on still further west.

Who can be on any part of this great road without feeling that its physical connection increases much the strength of the moral and political ties which happily bind us together? We have only to persevere in our American System, relieving consumption, alter the payment of the public debt, as much as possible consistently with an economical administration of the government, without impairing the principle of protection, to be assured of continued prosperity. I am greatly obliged by your kind assurance of confidence and friendship, in any future contingency that awaits me.—Whatever it may be, gentlemen, I shall anxiously endeavour to fulfil every duty I may owe to my country. I pray you, gentlemen, to communicate to my fellow citizens of Terre Haute and its vicinity my profound acknowledgments as well for the testimonies of esteem with which they have actually honored my presence, as for that which they have been restrained from offering by a delicate respect for my resolution announced at Vincennes, and I beg you and them to accept of the best wishes of

Your friend and obedient serv't.

H. CLAY.

DUTY ON IRON.

NEW YORK SUPERIOR COURT,—Nov. 19, 1831.

From the New York Journal of Commerce.

Moses H. Grumell, and others vs. Before his honor judge Samuel Swartwout.

D. Lord, jr. esq. opened the cause by stating that it was an action brought to recover an excess of duty paid on old iron imported from London in April last, in the ship Columbia. It was entered at the custom house as old iron, and the duty was tendered at the rate of 15 per cent. ad valorem; it being an "unenumerated article." The collector called it scrap iron, and demanded a duty accordingly, which was paid. If scrap iron, the duty would be 62½ cts. per 112 lbs and amount to $1,132 78. If old iron, 15 per cent. ad valorem 368 58

By the tariff of April 27, 1816, the duty on all articles not specified, was levied at 15 per cent. ad valorem. Old iron is not specified. By the act passed May 19, 1828, the duty on pig iron was altered to 62½ cts. per 112 lbs. and the same duty was imposed on scrap iron by the law of 1830, (page 105) by a clause in a law relative to iron plates for rail roads.

The question for the jury is, whether this was old iron or scrap iron.

James N. Matthews, sworn for plaintiffs, testified that he is the custom house clerk of Fish, Grumell & Co. An invoice of the iron was received in April last. Prepare an entry for it, and made the entry at custom house. The invoice was presented at the time.—Mr. Swartwout the collector, wrote on the invoice, "appraisers to return whether old or scrap iron, S. S." Mr. Jacques, an officer at the custom house, wrote in the margin of the invoice after examining the iron, "old iron, T. J." Mr. Mo' an appraiser, endorsed on the invoice, "passed as o.

iron." A tender was made to the cashier of $368 58, who refused it, and exacted $1,132 78; and refused to give up the property unless this sum should be paid.—Mr. Grinnell paid it, and at the time told him he should bring a suit to try the question.

Nathaniel L. Griswold, for plaintiffs, testified that he saw the iron, as he supposed, on board a ship lying at the foot of Pine-st.—The greater part was old iron. Old iron is any old article that was formerly manufactured for use, as an axe or hoe, and worn out. It is heated to a white heat, and then rolled into bars; also old iron from wrecks. Scrap iron consists of pieces of iron left from the end of bars or bolts that have been nearly worked up.—The pieces are put together, and beat out with a trip hammer, and rolled into bars.

Preserved Fish, for plaintiffs, testified that he saw the iron in the ship's hold. It was all old iron that he saw. There might have been scrap also, but he did not see it. Witness knows the article from long acquaintance with it. Cast-off articles that have been manufactured for use and worn out, are called old iron.

Pieces that have been left from bars and not fit for use, are called scrap iron.

The plaintiffs here rested.

Jas. A. Hamilton, esq. for defendant, moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that the collector is not liable to be sued, as he is acting in the course of his duty under the instructions of the treasury department; and as he had paid over the sum received, or was bound to pay it over immediately.

The court denied the motion.

He opened the case by stating that the invoice was untrue, there being scrap iron on board which was not mentioned. He then stated the proof he intended to offer, which was, that by the 9th section of the act of May 28, 1830, "scrap iron" was charged with the same duty as pig iron, which was subject to a specific duty of 62½ cents per 112 lbs. by the act of 1828. That old iron was not known to the import laws. That he would prove that the article imported by the plaintiffs and denominated in the invoice and entry as "old iron" was "scrap iron," and so known by the manufacturer and others; and that "old iron" and "scrap iron" were synonymous terms. That this importation could not come under the denomination of non-enumerated articles, because if it was correct that old iron were old manufactured articles, they came within the 5th article of the 1st section of the act of May, 1828, being manufactured articles made of iron, and therefore chargeable with a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem.

David S. Lyon, deputy collector, sworn for defendant, —defendant offered instructions from the treasury department of March 25, 1831, given to collector. They were objected to by plaintiff, as no evidence of any fact, nor any authority in law, and excluded by the court.

Mr. Lyon testified that the invoice was sent to the appraisers for examination, and they passed it as old iron. A permit was given to land it. The permit was filled up as "a quantity of old iron," over his signature. He wrote "scrap," and endorsed on it a request that the inspector should examine it and report the kind. Mr. De Camp reported it as scrap iron.

The weigh master's return distinguished that part of the importation, which was new bar and bolt iron in pieces from 5 inches to 3 feet long, from the other parts.

John De Camp, sworn for defendants, is an inspector at the custom house; carried on the iron business in New Jersey upwards of 30 years. Examined the iron on board the Columbia. The iron was separated by his orders. Part was new bar or bolt iron, from 5 inches to 3 feet long. The rest, old hoes, old spades, crow-bars, &c. which he has always heard denominated scrap iron. It is as good to melt as the pieces that are cut off from the bars. On being asked by a juror to describe old iron, he replied that he could not.

Cross examined.—Could not say there were half a dozen pieces 3 feet long. An old anchor, or iron from a wreck, he should call scrap iron. His reason for giving it that name is, that it is as good to melt as any iron; and is so generally understood to be, and denominated, by manufacturers.

Nicholas Saltus, sworn for defendant, has been in the iron business 25 years. He considers the iron in question scrap iron.—There are two descriptions of scrap iron; one is called cast scrap, the other wrought scrap. The first consists of broken pieces of castings, whether old or new. The second, of pieces of metal used to make bar iron, and old articles if made of wrought iron. Both would require melting to be useful. Old articles used or broken, and wreck iron, would come under the denomination of scrap iron.

Cross examination.—Never knew of an article of commerce denominated old iron. The specimens produced in court, and now shown to witnesses, are all scrap iron; and so generally known.

Wm. Van Buren, sworn for defendant, is an officer of the customs. Was the inspector of the ship, and delivered the cargo in question. Selected all that he considered as ends of new iron from 5 inches to 3 feet long; but few pieces of the latter length. There were 4 tons 6 cwt. of this description, which he did not pass as old or refuse iron, as he considered it would be applied to blacksmith's use. This included a bar which weighed a cwt.

Cross examined.—This bar he supposes to have been an old shaft that had been used; the remainder he considered refuse iron. He never called it old iron. There are different opinions as to the name, some call it old; some scrap.

Daniel Ayres, sworn for defendant, has been acquainted with the iron business as a manufacturer, a number of years. He considers scrap iron and old iron to be synonymous terms. All old iron is considered scrap iron, by the trade generally.

Cross examined.—Is engaged in the business as seller and manufacturer; has known the old rubbish purchased about the streets called old iron. The price of old and scrap iron is the same. He should call an old anchor scrap iron.

William Kemble, sworn for defendant, has been engaged extensively for some years in the iron business. They use in their establishment but one phrase to denominate iron of the description in question, viz. scrap iron. There is a part of their yard appropriated for the ends of bars and old machinery, and old manufactured articles, and they call it the scrap heap.

Cross examined.—The popular name for old articles is old iron. Manufacturers would call it scrap iron. Does not know the term merchants affix. In his scrap heap the new iron predominates.

The defendant here rested.

The plaintiffs called Mr. Fish again, who testified that as a merchant he had known the article of old iron by that name, ever since he had been one. In commerce this name is perfectly familiar. The term scrap iron is seldom used. Old iron is an article of very considerable commerce.

Mr. Griswold, recalled for plaintiffs, has been a merchant in New York 36 years. Has known the article of old iron by that name ever since he has known any thing. The name is as settled and definite in commerce as that of any other article.

John Barstow, sworn for plaintiffs. Has been a merchant about 20 years. Has always heard of old iron in commerce, and always conceived the term to designate worn out articles that had been manufactured for use. He was brought up in the neighborhood of a manufactory, and they called it all scrap iron. Has not seen much of the old iron imported, till within the last 4 years. Merchants call the iron that we see lying about the docks, old iron.

Anson G. Phelps, sworn for plaintiffs. Has been a merchant 17 years. Has often seen old iron advertised, and has dealt in it a little. He should call pieces of iron that had been cut off from the ends of bars, scrap iron. All second hand articles, he should call old iron. Manufacturers include both kinds under the denomination of scrap. Merchants make the difference, and call the one scrap, the other old. In the manufacture of it he should say there would be more waste in the old than the new, and a corresponding difference in the value.

Samuel T. Tisdale, sworn for plaintiffs. Has known the iron trade about 7 years. Has frequently heard the name old iron applied to old articles in commerce. Has frequently purchased it for a factory, and the bills are always made out as old iron. Does not recollect purchasing a bill of iron, as scrap iron. Pieces of new iron from work shops he should call scrap iron. He saw the lot on board the Columbia. It was old iron. The pieces of iron on the heap at the door of a work shop, for railroad plates, would be scrap iron.

Cross exam. Saw it in bulk, and when it was out of the ship. He had previously purchased a lot of F. & H. Grinnell & Co. of about 60 tons. He bought it as old iron. There were a few pieces of scrap in it.

Josiah L. James, sworn for the plaintiffs. Has been acquainted with the iron trade for 13 years. Has heard of old iron in commerce. The name is perfectly notorious, and means all manufactured articles that have been used and abandoned. He has also heard of scrap iron in commerce. Ends of bars, and trimmings from the workshop, that are he should call scraps.

The parties both rested.

Mr. Hamilton, for the defendant, referred to the act of May 22, 1824, to show that no such article was known in the tariff as old iron, and that if it was not included in the denomination of scrap iron, it must pay duty as a manufactured article; as the law makes no difference between an old and a new article. He also contended that the quantity of 4 tons 6 cwt. must pay a duty of 90 cents under the act of 1829, as it was new bar iron, and so admitted to be by the plaintiffs and proved by the witnesses. The law made no difference between long and short bars. He also cited the 9th sec. of the act of 1830, which subjects scrap iron to a duty of 62½ cts. per 112 lbs. and contended that it was under this section that old iron was meant to be included. In support of this position, he remarked that the law intended to cover the whole matter; that as it had described every form iron could take without mentioning old iron, it was reasonable to suppose that they included it under the denomination of scrap iron. He also remarked that the law was intended to encourage and support manufacturers and the terms would therefore be received from them; and as they included both kinds under the one denomination of scrap, congress intended to include it under the same denomination. He insisted that if the plaintiffs had acted in good faith in the matter, and he believed they had, they must have considered the terms synonymous, or they could not have taken the oath that a quantity of iron containing old iron and scrap iron was old iron; and that if the jury believed the terms synonymous, the law was broad enough to cover both under the one denomination of scrap. He further insisted that from the testimony of the witnesses examined before them, and particularly those best acquainted with the subject, they must believe that this importation was scrap iron, and therefore the duty was properly demanded.

Mr. Lord, for the plaintiffs, contended that the words of the act are to be taken in their popular meaning, unless they have acquired a technical meaning well settled in commerce or in art. The popular meaning of the words was very obvious. If they have acquired a peculiar meaning in commerce, and in the arts also, then the commercial meaning must apply;—as the duties are to be paid by merchants, and the article imported by them—the orders for it given by them; and they are to make the entries of the merchandise. If the act is intended to protect manufacturers, then it must be construed restrictively or strictly; as the rule is well settled that where a law is intended for a particular interval, it must receive a strict construction, since it is against common right. We must look to the context for the meaning of a law. The act of 1830, was in relation to railroad iron; and under the denomination of scrap must be deemed to have meant to include the punchings and ends of bars, and iron of a similar description; and therefore had no reference to old worn out articles.

That it was in proof, that scrap iron and old iron were both terms of commerce, and meaning different things; and if so, then, although scrap iron with the manufacturer might include this kind, yet they were to determine which commercial or mercantile term would apply to it.

His honor judge Oakley, charged the jury in substance, that the case was one of importance for the principle involved in it, and that as the article was one of considerable trade, and the government was a party, the jury would use due care in the investigation of it. It seemed to be by the parties conceded, that by the law of 1816 the article in question would be subject to an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent, unless it is a manufactured article, or unless it is considered "scrap iron" within the meaning of the law of 1830. It seems clear that it cannot come within the first description, as the law meant to include articles intended for and capable of being used as manufactured articles, and not articles worn out. That the main question was, whether the act of congress in 1830 includes this iron under the denomination of "scrap iron." In construing every law, reference must be had to the subject matter it intends to control. The tariff laws are frequently called laws of protection to the manufacturer, but legally speaking, they are commercial regulations, and in judging of their meaning, we must look to the commercial sense of their language. The jury must therefore determine from the evidence before them, whether at the time of the passage of the act of 1830, the words "scrap iron" had acquired a distinct and certain meaning in trade and commerce; and whether according to such meaning, it included the article in question. If they should find that the words "scrap iron" are well and generally understood among merchants, as indicating a different kind of iron, from "old iron," and that the article in question fell within the latter denomination, then they ought to find their verdict for the plaintiffs.

The jury found for the plaintiffs, for the amount of the excess of the duty on the quantity of old iron, subject to adjustment by D. S. Lyon, esq.

FROM THE NASHVILLE BANNER.

To the public.

After the notice of me and of a letter written by me, and published in the United States' Telegraph of the 19th of August last, taken by the late secretary of war, in his "Candid appeal to the American people," I deem it unnecessary to offer an apology, for what I shall say in reply to so much of said appeal as relates to myself.

Major Eaton charges me with volunteering "a statement to vindicate the course of Mr. Calhoun," towards him. From the time gen. Jackson was put in nomination for the presidency, I was his warm personal and political friend. When I went on to congress in 1827, I became acquainted with Mr. Calhoun, and found him to be a man, as I believed, of the strictest honor, honesty and patriotism, and withal, possessing the highest order of talents—qualities well calculated to attach me to him; but what above all at that time more closely attached me to him, was the cordial and liberal support which he and his friends gave general Jackson, during Mr. Adams's administration. When I saw an attempt, as I believed, made by Mr. Eaton and his friends to sacrifice such a man, I did volunteer, if possible, an honorable man from unjust aspersions. Another reason, if an additional one, could be required by a candid and enlightened community from "volunteering" was that I believed major Eaton and his friends had attempted to delude and mislead the American people, as to the true cause of the dissolution of the late cabinet. I have always been in favor of calling things by their proper names, and attributing effects to their true causes. Major Eaton says it is "strange indeed, that a man should prepare a letter intended for the press, and to affect other persons, and afterwards admit it to be incorrect, and offer as matter of excuse, that he did not read it after writing it." It is a little more strange that the late secretary of war should be so astonished, at my having written a letter for publication without revising or reading the same over, when it is recollected that this same secretary, after he had made his first report to the congress of the United States and a copy of the same had been laid upon each member's table, actually withdrew it, and laid upon the suggestion of some of his friends was such a document as would and ought to disgrace the head of so distinguished a station as he then held, and at that late period undertook with the advice and assistance of his friends, to revise, correct and new model the same. Major Eaton states that the corrective letter was written by me, after some of my friends at Washington had informed me that he had it in his power to correct it by the most indisputable testimony. "This charge of mine is positively false, for I never received any letter or information from Washington upon the subject before I wrote the letter correcting the error, which I had unintentionally made in my first, nor have I yet received any letter or information from Washington upon that subject, other than what I have received from the major's candid appeal. I was at the post office at Capt. Haynie's when the Telegraph containing my first letter came to hand, and was handed me by Capt. Haynie, (whose certificate is here appended.) Before I had got through reading the letter, I pointed out to Capt. Haynie, that either the printer or myself had made a mistake, that I held the conversation with major Eaton in Washington city, and not in Tennessee. Either that day, or the day following, I saw Dr. James A. Blackmore, informed him of the mistake, or rather the printer or myself, and requested him, to have it corrected in the Gallatin Journal, a paper published in Gallatin; which he did, as appears from his certificate here appended. In a day or two I wrote to the editor of the Telegraph the corrective letter. Thus it will be seen that I availed myself of the first opportunity, and before I could have received the information from Washington of which the major speaks, to correct an unintentional error into which I had fallen. It will also be seen that this distinguished secretary takes upon himself to charge expressly that I had received information from Washington, &c. &c. without any, the slightest evidence to warrant him in so doing, and directly contrary to the truth. Major Eaton says, "the general has not gotten his story right yet." He still adheres to the point that I was in Tennessee when I heard of the death of Mr. T. and that gen. Jackson advised me to marry." &c.

I do not know when or where major Eaton may have heard of Mr. Timberlake's death. He may have heard of it in the spring of 1828, while boarding at Mr. O'Neal's, his now-later-in-law, as he and Mr. Nicklin state, and it may have been from Washington, in November, that he informed general Jackson of his intentions as to Mrs. Timberlake, and of which the general approved—but I well recollect the reason why I held the conversation with major Eaton to which allusion is made in my letter, and what the major said to me on that occasion. Some short time after my arrival in Washington in 1828, I understood that major Eaton intended marrying Mrs. Timberlake: I was then and had been the warm personal and political friend of major Eaton, and being exceedingly solicitous for the success of gen. Jackson's administration, and from the various reports which were in circulation respecting Mrs. Timberlake, believing that a union between her and major Eaton, who was intimately connected with gen. Jackson, would necessarily present obstacles and difficulties to the successful operations of his administration. I suggested to Judge White, the colleague of major Eaton in the senate, and to the representatives from Tennessee, the propriety of some one or all of us, as the friends of major Eaton and general Jackson, talking with Mrs. Timberlake, endeavoring to dissuade him from the expected marriage. I then suggested to Judge White as he was the oldest man, the propriety of his talking with Eaton on the subject. He said he was unwilling to do so, and he thought if I did, I should, in all probability incur Eaton's displeasure so long as I lived. I then told him, that I felt it to be my duty as the friend of Eaton and Jackson, and one of the representatives of Tennessee, and that I was resolved to do it, let the consequences be what they might—I accordingly went to the capitol, and invited major Eaton out of the senate chamber into a back room, where I told him that he knew that I was and had been his warm personal and political friend, which he admitted; I then told him that what I had to say to him, I was induced to say from the kindest and best of motives—I told him I had understood he intended marrying Mrs. Timberlake. He admitted he did. I then told him frankly and candidly all I had understood and heard in relation to her, (which I deem it unnecessary to relate here, but which the major can state if he thinks proper), and then suggested to him the difficulties which his marriage with Mrs. Timberlake would, probably, throw in the way of gen. Jackson's successful administration of the government, and that from the opinions entertained of her in and about Washington, gen. Jackson might be compelled to abandon or give him up. Eaton replied, that if any body supposed Jackson would abandon him on account of his marrying Mrs. Timberlake, they were very much mistaken; for that in Tennessee, where he heard of the death of Timberlake, he determined to go to Washington, and marry Mrs. Timberlake, and that he communicated his intention to gen. Jackson who approved of it. As I have before stated, I do not know when or where major Eaton heard of the death of Timberlake, but I am positive that the above is the language used by him in the conversation between him and myself. Maj. Eaton says "the purpose of this statement [alluding to the statement about his going to Washington to marry Mrs. Timberlake, &c.] is evidently that the major should infer that I had in Tennessee, immediately on hearing of the death of Mr. Timberlake, determine to come on to Washington, not to address, but of my own will to marry his widow; leave it to be inferred, that I was not only conscious of a state of circumstances, which made it unnecessary to consult her upon the subject, but that general Jackson was also aware that such was the case."

The major has to some extent misconceived the purpose of my statement; it was not altogether for the purpose of having the inferences drawn which he charges, but to show that major Eaton and the president had been advised of the probable difficulties which the marriage between him, (Eaton), and Mrs. Timberlake would create, and that they had taken place according to my apprehension. If he now states, as he does, that all the friends of the major has said himself as to the time he heard of Timberlake's death, when he left the city, for Tennessee, and when he returned in November, and in a few days advised general Jackson, by letter, of his intention in relation to Mrs. Timberlake, the inference might be drawn that the major "was conscious of such a state of circumstances" as made him, if he addressed her before he left the city in the spring, lay aside all delicacy and address her, which are usually observed, and he must have addressed her while her mourning weeds were fresh upon her, or if he addressed her after he returned to Washington in November, the match must have been easily made, for very few days indeed could have elapsed between the major's arrival in the city, and the writing of his letter to gen. Jackson. So that I think it is as likely that inferencers prejudicial to the major will be drawn from his own showing, as from my statement.

Major Eaton and his friends have labored much to show that there was a meeting of the friends of Mr. Calhoun, the object of which was to drive him from the cabinet, and in speaking of me he uses the following language: "Gen. Desha also says there was no meeting at the last session of congress, with a view to obtain my removal from the cabinet. It has not been so ascertained. He will not say though, that this was not the case at the session of 1829-30." In reply to this paragraph, I can speak with certainty, when I say that I did not attend any meeting, either at the session of 1829-30, or at any other session, the object of which was to obtain his removal, neither do I have any such meeting was held. During this session of 1829-30, the friends of the president found great and almost insurmountable difficulties in getting any of his important measures through the house; this difficulty, his warm, personal and political friends beheld to arise from the want of harmony and co-operation among the heads of departments. They believed that there was not that concert in the cabinet which was indispensably necessary to the success of the administration. They believed this want of concert was attributable in some degree to the president's too frequent cabinet meetings or councils, as his predecessors had usually done, and thereby engaging the different members of his cabinet, in favor of his measures. This unfortunate state of affairs was frequently the subject of conversation and regret among the warmest of gen. Jackson's friends; men whose attachment to the president and his administration has never been questioned, and who would never by any man who was not regardless of the principles both of truth and justice. Some time during the session of 1829-30, Mr. Wickliffe of Kentucky, called one evening after dark at the room of Mr. Daniel of Kentucky and myself, and requested us to walk over to the room of Judge Bibb, which is a side, and when we arrived, we found there Judge Bibb of Kentucky, Judge White, Mr. Grundy and Col. Polk of Tennessee, and gen. Overton of Louisiana. Mr. Wickliffe then suggested the object he had in view in getting us together.—Knowing us to be the warm friends of the president, he said his object was that some of us should be sent to the president to tell him frankly and candidly the state of affairs, and to try to prevail upon him to hold cabinet meetings, or councils, in order to produce harmony if possible among the heads of the different departments, and if this could not be done, to try and produce concert and co-operation among them and their friends, carrying the important measures recommended by the president through the house. After an interchange of ideas and opinions, Judge Bibb, who was the warm and long tried friend of gen. Jackson, was selected as the person to make the communication to him. It was believed by most of the persons present at that meeting, that major Eaton's being in the cabinet was the cause of most of the difficulties. I do not however know that this opinion was entertained by all.

Who but major Eaton and his partisans would have had the temerity to charge Judge White, Judge Bibb, col. Polk, and others who attended that meeting with being the partisans of Mr. Calhoun? Are not these men the well known and long tried friends of the president? Is not Judge Bibb one of his oldest friends in Kentucky? Did he not hoist the Jackson flag in that state at an early day in opposition to that of Henry Clay? Yet to answer the purposes of major Eaton, such men as these are to be held up to the American people and denounced as the tools and partisans of Mr. Calhoun.

I think what I have here stated will satisfy the community, and perhaps even major Eaton himself, that I had not fallen into such mistakes as he was willing to induce them to believe.

ROBERT DESHA.

P. S. The United States Telegraph, Gallatin Journal and other papers which have published major Eaton's "Candid Appeal," will do me an act of justice by publishing this communication.

I certify that Robert Desha was at my house, (Green Garden post office), immediately after the United States Telegraph arrived at the office, containing a letter of his to the editor of this paper. Which letter, major Eaton has noticed in his late appeal to the people of the United States. When I handed the paper to Desha, he read the letter, and before he had done, remarked there was a mistake. He did not intend it to be understood that he had even had a conversation with major Eaton, in relation to his intended wife, Mrs. Timberlake, in Tennessee; that he himself or the editor of the paper had omitted some words. That it was in the conversation he had in the city of Washington with major Eaton, that he (Eaton) had said that when he was in Tennessee and heard of the death of Timberlake, he determined on marrying his widow, and communicated that intention to gen. Jackson, who advised him to do so.

I am satisfied that Desha had not seen the said letter published before he saw it at my house, and that there was not time for him to receive a letter from "some friend in the city," (as stated by major Eaton), informing him of his mistake. Desha, before he left my house, commenced writing a letter to the editor of the Telegraph, correcting the mistake he had made in said published letter.

JESSE HAYNE.

Being requested by gen. R. Desha to state a conversation that he had with me upon the subject of a letter written by him to the editor of the Telegraph and published in that paper, which letter major Eaton has noticed in his late appeal, (the letter was left in his hands at gen. Desha's residence on the morning after the Telegraph containing said letter reached here. He stated to me that he never intended to convey the idea that he had a conversation with major Eaton in Tennessee, upon the subject of his marrying Mrs. Timberlake; but that the conversation he alluded to was held in Washington; in which major Eaton stated his determination to marry Mrs. Timberlake, and that he was advised by the president upon the subject, who approved of his determination.—The general said the error had originated from the hasty manner in which the letter was written, or from the printer having omitted some words; he requested me on my return to town to have it corrected in the Gallatin Journal, which I did. Gen. Desha could not have received any communication upon the subject from Washington apprising him of the error prior to the above conversation as intimated by major Eaton.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 14—Vol. V. BALTIMORE, DEC. 10, 1831. [Vol. XLI. Whole No. 1,035

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ The sudden and excessive cold—some weeks in advance of its usual season—has interrupted travelling by water between New York and Baltimore, &c. and caused much embarrassment and difficulty in the concerns of the people generally; who had made no calculation on such a state of things.

☞ The rule that has always prevailed in the management of this work, has excluded much matter on general or miscellaneous subjects, the present week—and must have such effect for some time to come, that important public documents may be laid before our readers—among them is an article of considerable length, founded upon a statement in a late London paper as to the wages and subsistence of the working classes in England, and the desire of many in the United States that the labor of our citizens should be brought into competition with that of potato-fidd Englishmen. I have "hauled the subject without gloves," and feel disposed never to put them on until the sordid and monopolizing crop of multifacutors feel willing that others should live as well as themselves—and are ready to confess that others have rights as well as growers of cotton.

☞ The president's message will be found in subsequent pages. It has not been our custom to make many remarks on such papers, though some parts may have invited criticism. We shall however, observe, that the document is chiefly made up of foreign affairs, and extensively partakes of an injurious error, (as we esteem it), into which many distinguished individuals of the United States have fallen—by which affairs at home are rather thrown into the background. Indemnity for spoliation on our commerce, certainly, should be sought and obtained; and we heartily wish success in every effort respecting them—but the manufacture of buttons, perhaps, in the United States has a greater annual value than our claims against Naples,—and those of wooden clocks, mouse-traps, hob nails and fine-toothed combs, produce a larger yearly amount than will be received of either Sweden or Denmark.

The president's message was brought to Baltimore in two hours, for the use of the editors in this city.

☞ We have also received, with unusual promptitude, the annual report of the secretary of the treasury. It is an able and intelligent paper. It shows a great degree of "financial prosperity," on account of the excessive importation of foreign goods—which has earned so much distress into the "wool-y market,"—and, if not speedily relieved by some lucky recurrence, will cause the loss of uncounted millions, in the diminished value of all sorts of property, and ruin thousands of worthy men. The secretary speaks of the bank of the United States in very friendly terms, and suggests that it should be re-chartered, with some "modifications"—which, though not mentioned, do not seem to be regarded by him as important changes in its present constitution. We shall have the pleasure to present this important exposition next week, and, perhaps, also the long, but interesting, report of the secretary of war—which waits an insertion.

The means that we have to lay important papers before our readers, shall be liberally used.

☞ The report of the committee of the New York convention of the friends of domestic industry, on iron, is now published, and in its course of distribution. If the facts stated do not make "some folks" feel a "little red," we have an incorrect estimate of the force of truth—or exceedingly mistake the character of persons who ought to be regarded "honorable men"—not, by any means, including the tools that have been put forward on certain occasions, with reference to this most important manufacture. They cannot feel "red"—their nature pays us such homage to truth.

☞ The "Frederick Herald" has a well-prepared account of the celebration which took place in that city last week, because of the opening of the rail road, which now links Baltimore and Frederick so closely together—and this celebration was, also, a very happy linking of the hearts of the people. The editor, though invited, could not attend—but begs leave to render his thanks for that compliment paid, as well as to express his gratitude because that he was, in the "flowing cup" kindly remembered. He will endeavor to preserve an account of this celebration.

IT WON'T DO! One editor in the west accuses another with being in favor of "Mr. Niles for president!" "I take this opportunity" to let Mr. Thomas Ritchie know, that I am not a candidate!

By the bye—it has happened just as I expected! No sooner did Mr. Ritchie understand that I had not time to discuss the tariff question with him, than he enlarged his paper!!! Here's a "crisis"—"nous venons"—and "obsta principis."

THE TARIFF. There are various projects and speculations concerning a modification of the tariff. We fear that the friends of the "American system" have, in some cases, too easily fallen into the schemes of its opponents. "Caution is the parent of security." Let time be allowed for full reflection—for the subject is one of vital importance.

We see an idea thrown out that Mr. Clay is prepared to make a "compromise upon the tariff of 1816." We have no information on this subject other than what we see in the newspapers—but a recession to the tariff of 1816, would, indeed, "break down the iron arch;" and we venture to assert that neither Mr. Clay, nor general Jackson, nor both together, can make such a "compromise."

"FREE TRADE" FLOUR! The present British duty on American flour is 14s. 10d. or only about three dollars and sixty cents per barrel, including the rate of exchange. This is a fine specimen of "free trade." We submit it to the "philosophers," if any there are among the growers of wheat in the United States.

A CURIOSITY. A friend has placed in my hands "The Calcutta Gazette and Daily Advertiser" of 27th May, 1831—which, among other widely displayed advertisements, contains the following.

"Mackenzie, Lyall & Co. will sell by public auction, at the Exchange Commercial sale rooms, this day, Friday, 27th May, 1831, ten bales fine American sheetings, bleached and unbleached, as fully detailed in the catalogues now in circulation."

"PRACTICE LAUGHS AT THEORY." The New York Journal of Commerce says—three thousand bags Brazil coffee were sold yesterday at 12 1/2 cts. 4 mo. deliverable on the reduced duty of 1 ct. lb.

That is—the duty will be only one cent per lb., but last year, when it was five cents, the average price of coffee was only 11 1/2 cents—so a reduction of the "tax" has increased the price! This is sound "free trade" logic, though common sense rejects it—as it does the whole doctrine. Moore's Entom., or Symmes' proposed journey into the hole in the earth, are not less strange than the theory of "free trade"—not less PRACTICABLE.

SPECIE. The exports have been excessive—$1,300,000 lately left New York in one day, and caused no small degree of excitement among the bankers and those dependent on their accommodations. This export of $1,200,000, no doubt, has caused, or will cause, an additional contraction of the currency in the sum of not less than 5,000,000—the effect of which on men in business, needs no present remark. The operation is fearful against property. Every kind of merchandise that will command cash, has rapidly, and in some cases ruinously, declined in value.

The latest accounts from England, however, hold out a hope that the demand for specie there has been checked; if so, we may expect a reprieve—for a little space: but, must be harassed until the late heavy importations are somehow, any how, satisfied.

CAROLINA BLANKETS. ["good."] There has been left with us, for public inspection, a pair of blankets from the manufactory of Col. John E. Calhoun, of Pendleton district. The warp is of cotton, and the filling of wool, and they are pronounced, by competent judges, to be equal, if not superior, to London Duffels. Experience has proved them to be very durable. They measure eight by nine quarters, and are sold as fast as they can be manufactured, at $5 per pair. Col. C.'s establishment is found to be highly beneficial to the farmers of the district, who find there a ready market for their wool, and a portion of their cotton crops. Flannels, to a considerable extent, are likewise manufactured at this establishment. Very handsome specimens of carpeting have been made there. The wool-carding part of the establishment is actively engaged in preparing the wool of the neighboring counties for domestic use, which is brought, in some instances, a distance of forty miles, for the purpose.—Charleston Courier.

[A plenty of establishments like this, would nullify nullification—"in the twinkling of a bed post," as Lord Dufferin says.]

THE PRESIDENT'S HEALTH. The Cincinnati Republican of the 17th, says:—A gentleman of this city, who has for years been the friend and correspondent of the president, was induced, by the numerous reports so industriously circulated by the *ebonies respecting his health, to inquire, for his own personal satisfaction, directly of himself, whether there was any foundation for these reports, which gave his enemies so much consolation. We are permitted to give the following extract from the reply of our venerable chief magistrate:

"I feel grateful to you for your solicitude for my health, and can assure you it has not been better for many years. I had an attack of the prevailing fever of this place, from which I have entirely recovered. I feel more free from affliction than I have felt for ten years past. Providence has taken, and will take care of me. Contrary to the wishes and prayers of my enemies, I will live just so long as God wills that I should live."

Mr. JEFFERS, recently appointed charge d'affaires at Central America, is said, in the Trenton True American, to have resigned his office.

VALUABLE SITE. The extensive woollen manufactory late of B. Wells & Co. at Steubenville, O. which once caused plenty, though profitable employment, to a large number of persons, but for sometime idle, has been purchased at a public sale by D. L. Collier, esq. of Steubenville, who will dispose of it at a price much below its real value, that the business may be resumed. There is, perhaps, no situation west of the mountains in which the woollen manufactory can be carried on more advantageously than at Steubenville—the country being fertile and healthy, the growth of wool abundant, and the population sober, discreet and industrious.

CANALS. The great New York canal was closed with ice before the 1st inst.—but our rail road is expected to remain open the whole season!

*A little while, and it will be asked what is meant by "ebonies"? That it may be understood, in reference to this work, it is proper to state, that it is a "whole swine" term, to express political opponents of gen. Jackson.

SLAVES AND SLAVERY. A writer in the Petersburg, (Virginia), Intelligencer, says—

"The sentiment is gaining ground in Virginia, (that the whole African race ought to be removed from among us. Many people feel unwilling to die and leave their posterity exposed to all the ills which, from the existence of slavery in our state, they have themselves so long felt.

"Others are unwilling themselves longer to suffer these inconveniences—some of our best citizens are already removing—others will doubtless follow, unless they can see a probability that, at some period, the evil will be taken away."

[The fact stated in the last paragraph has an alarming character. The unhappy truth is, that, as slaves increase and matter for apprehension is collected, the white population retires and the means of defence are reduced—especially in the removal of laboring freemen—who, in almost all circumstances, have to bear the "burthen and the heat of the day."

The Wilmington N. C. Recorder of the 16th ultimo, contains the following:—On Saturday last about 12 o'clock, the six slaves condemned at the last superior court, were hung, in pursuance of their sentence. We learn that two slaves charged with conspiracy—to make insurrection, were tried at the last session of the superior court for the county of Sampson, and found guilty.

MASSACHUSETTS. Mr. Lincoln (nat. rep.) has been re-elected governor of this state by a large majority over both the anti-masonic and Jackson candidates.

DANIEL D. TOMPKINS. It is proposed to erect a monument in the city of New York to the memory of this distinguished man. He belonged to the country; and we regret to see that this proceeding has the appearance of being in the hands of ephemeral party.

PENNSYLVANIA. The following is given as the state of the polls to elect a member of congress in the place of Mr. Ramsey, dec. For Mr. McCay 2459, Mr. Mahon 1931, Mr. McSherry 1154. We believe the parties are Wolf, Anti-Wolf and Anti-masonic.

DELAWARE. A convention in this state, called to revise its constitution, has just completed its labors. We have not room to give particulars now. Among the changes proposed, we observe there is one that the legislature shall meet biennially. The other chief alterations, we believe, are in regulations of the judicial power, or of the judges.

CINCINNATI, OHIO. Effects of the Canal. The effects of the Canal upon the country have already been sensibly felt since it has been opened to this place. It has reduced the price of salt from eighty-seven to fifty cents per bushel. It has reduced the rate of carriage on every article imported from abroad in a corresponding ratio. It has advanced the price of flour from three to four dollars per barrel, and wheat from forty to sixty-five cents per bushel. It has raised the price of real estate and opened a ready market for it, and it has increased the business and bustle of the town at least fifty per cent.!

[Scioto Gaz.]

TENNESSEE. We have a copy of a long report to the house of representatives of this state, against a renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States.

LOUISIANA. The legislature of Louisiana met at New Orleans, agreeably to the proclamation of the governor, on Monday the 14th ult. The governor's message was read the same day. It explains the object of the extraordinary call, to be the passage of a law prohibiting the further introduction of slaves into the state: the appointment of a senator to congress to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Livingston; and the adoption of a remonstrance to be sent to congress against a repeal on the duty on sugar.

George A. Waggaman, esq. has been elected a senator of the United States, on the 5th ballot, in place of Mr. Livingston, resigned, on being appointed secretary of state. The choice took place on the 15th ult. there being 16 senators and 48 representatives present, of whom 32 were necessary for a choice. On the first ballot Mr. Waggaman had 31, Mr. Carleton 29, and there were 2 blanks; there was therefore no election. On the second ballot, Mr. Waggaman had 31, Mr. Carleton 30 and there was 1 blank. The third ballot gave Mr. Waggaman 32 and Mr. Carleton 30; and the former was thereupon declared to be duly elected.

Mr. Waggaman was the "national republican" candidate—and his political opponents bear ample testimony to his private worth and fitness for the place to which he has been elected. But great indignation is expressed in the "Jackson" papers, at the conduct of several "Jackson" men, who are named, for deserting their party on this occasion; and the Advertiser holds the following emphatic tone:

"Do these men entertain so contemptuous an opinion of the intelligence of the people, as to suppose that they can longer endure to be the dupes and the victims of their intrigues, and cajoled by honeyed words and empty protestations? We speak the unanimous wish of an injured and insulted party, when we declare that they are disowned, disclaimed, and repudiated, now and forever."

There are men who will admit no other qualification for office than personal-party preferences. If what has been said of the legislature of Kentucky, and is now said of that of Louisiana, be true—taken with the result of the late election of the member of congress from Missouri, it is manifest that many of the people believe that something beyond an adherence to names has become needful to the "general welfare."

THE LEGISLATURES of many of the states are now in session, as well as that of the United States, by which a rapidly quantity of useful or important information is spreading before the people. We shall do what we can to preserve the principal things as they occur.

Both the legislatures of Georgia and of Louisiana have, at their current sessions, passed laws prohibiting the introduction of slaves (brought for sale) into those states.

WHERE IS "THE WEST?" A few years since, the inhabitants of our Atlantic cities were accustomed to speak of our town, (St. Louis) as being the remote point of civilization—the "jumping off place" in the great Valley of the Mississippi—beyond which no man in his right mind, and having a clean conscience, would think of adventuring. What a transformation has been effected? Now, we begin to think of our city as soon to be the centre—perhaps the capital of the extensive Confederacy. For hundreds of miles to the "West" of us, the land teems with inhabitants. The land of industry is there. Comforts and luxuries abound. A vigorous communication is kept up between ourselves and "these remote parts," as we are already accustomed to call them. It is, indeed, impossible to put any limit to this spirit of adventure. Even now, the formation of a settlement at the mouth of Columbia river, is regarded as so entirely feasible, that many persons have enlisted in the enterprise. Space seems about to be annihilated by the exertions of the hardy pioneers of our western settlements.—Missouri Repub.

[The editor of the REGISTER, though not born a British subject, well remembers when "Red Stone Ohl Fort," in the heart of Pennsylvania, was "the west," and to have heard wonderful tales about the wolves and rattlesnakes that abounded there!]

THE CHEROKEE PHOENIX, of November 12, contains the following note from Mrs. Worcester, the wife of one of the imprisoned missionaries:

"The subscriber acknowledges the receipt of $40 06½ cents, contributed by a few citizens of the Cherokee Nation, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a visit to her husband in prison. To those, and to all who have manifested kindness to her during the late scenes of affliction through which she has been called to pass, she tenders her sincere thanks—desiring that their kindness may receive an eternal reward.

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at New York, brings Liverpool advices to the 25th October, inclusive.

ENGLAND.

The rejection of the "reform bill" in the house of lords, continued to excite the most intense interest in all parts of the kingdom. A procession of upwards of 200,000 persons had been formed in London, on the occasion of presenting petitions to the king, on the subject of the fate of the bill. The procession was headed by the lord mayor of London.

Nottingham castle, the property of the duke of New Castle, and Colwich Hall, the seat of John Musters, esq. were set on fire, by mobs—the former was entirely consumed, but the latter was extinguished without material injury. The rioters at Nottingham, consisted of between 3 and 4,000, and were dispersed by the 15th Hussars, but not until they had violated several houses, and made an attack upon the house of correction. The house of the duke of Wellington had also been injured. Ministers were publicly elarged in parliament with conniving at these outrages, but indignantly repelled the charge.

In addition to those mentioned, there had been great riots at Derby, Shorborne, and other places—several of the nobility hardly escaped the indignation of the mobs, and a cardinal was burnt in effigy. At Carlisle, the bishop of the diocese was burnt in effigy—the figure dressed in full canonicals and labelled "plunderer of the people." The 365 windows in each Digby's castle, had all been destroyed. But the resolution of the king and his ministers to persevere in the project of reform, had had great effect in quieting the people.

In some of the doings of the mobs, the marquis of Londonderry had been severely hurt, and certain of the bishops were roughly handled—the latter appear to have lost the respect of the people. It was made known that the bishop would preach in a certain church in London, and resolved by the parishioners to leave the church in a hody, the moment he rose in the pulpit; and so his "lordship" retired from his design to attend. Earl Grey, lord Brougham, and the reformers generally, are earnestly greeted by the people; and the king is a great favorite with them.

Mr. O'Connell has received a "silk gown." Several of the anti-reform peers, had lately made large investments in American funds.

Mr. Van Buren dined with the king, on the 15th October.

The continent had made large demands on England for hullion and coin—and hence, in part, the heavy drafts from the United States. But a re-action is said to have taken place in favor of England, and bullion was returning. Some heavy failures had taken place in London.

Parliament was prorogued on the 20th October. Earl Grey, in reply to an address to him on the subject of reform, stated that all the ministerial measures would be taken with a view to the most effectual means of insuring success to the bill, and the same sentiment is iterated in the speech of the king proroguing parliament. Many of the higher classes in England, were about to make a temporary change of their residence.

British king's speech on proroguing parliament.

"My lords and gentlemen—

"I am at length enabled to put an end to a session of unexampled duration and labor, in which matters of the deepest interest have been brought under your consideration.

"I have felt sincere satisfaction in confirming, by my royal assent, bills for the amendment of the game laws, and for the reduction of taxes which pressed heavily on the industry of my people, and I have observed with no less pleasure the commencement of important improvements in the law of bankruptcy, from which the most beneficial effects may be expected.

"I continue to receive the most gratifying proofs of the friendly disposition of foreign powers.

"The conference assembled in London has at length terminated its difficult and laborious discussions by an arrangement agreed upon by the plenipotentiaries of the five powers for the separation of the states of Belgium and Holland, on terms by which the interest of both, together with the future security of other countries, have been carefully provided for. A treaty founded on this arrangement has been presented to the Dutch and Belgian plenipotentiaries, and I trust that its acceptance by their respective courts, which I anxiously expect, will avert the dangers by which the peace of Europe was threatened whilst the question remained unsettled.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons:

"I thank you for the provisions made for the future dignity and comfort of my royal consort, in the event of her surviving me, and for the supplies which you have granted for the present year. You may be assured of my anxious care to have them administered with the strictest attention to a well considered economy.

"The state of Europe has produced the necessity of an increased expenditure in the various establishments of the public service, which it will be my earnest desire to reduce whenever it can be done with safety to the interest of the country.

"In the meantime I have the satisfaction of reflecting that these demands have been provided for without any material addition to the public burdens.

"My friends of the commons:

"In the interval of repose which may now be afforded you, I am sure it is unnecessary for me to recommend to you the most careful attention to the preservation of tranquility in your respective counties. The anxiety which has been so generally manifested by my people for the accomplishment of a constitutional reform in the commons house of parliament, will, I trust, be regulated by a due sense of the necessity of order and moderation in their proceedings. To the consideration of this important question, the attention of parliament must, necessarily, again be called at the opening of the ensuing session; and you may be assured of my unaltered desire to promote its settlement by such improvements in the representation as may be found necessary for securing to my people the full enjoyment of their rights, which, in combination with those of the other orders of the state, are essential to the support of our free constitution."

The lord chancellor then, by command of his majesty, prorogued the parliament to Tuesday the 22d of November, to be then held for the despatch of business.

FRANCE.

The hereditary peerage bill, had passed in a form which met the wishes of the ministers, who, in various instances, triumphed over the liberals, in the progress of the bill—the bill passed by a majority of 346.

The revenue for the last three months, prior to the 16th Oct. exhibits an augmentation of 1,835,000 francs—1,800 seamen, belonging to the Toulon fleet, were about to be discharged, and 1,600 had been furloughed. The assassin who attempted to stab the captain of the French corvette, the Eagle, at Lisbon, had been punished. The affairs with Don Miguel were still unsettled.

RUSSIA AND POLAND.

Several Polish officers had reached Paris. They complain most bitterly of being the victims of intrigue and treachery. Krukowiecki, who was the last commander (dictator) in Warsaw, is charged with having acted the part of a traitor, in the surrender of that place. Prince Czartoryski, general Skrzynecki and count Malachowski had retired into the Austrian territories. Gen. Chlopicki, whose wounds were not healed, still remained at Cracow. Joseph Ullerman, a citizen of Warsaw, had been shot for having ammunition in his house. Field marshal Debitsch was buried with great ceremony at St. Petersburg, on the 27th September. The cholera was increasing at St. Petersburg, and had broken out at Hamburg; and the Liverpool Times, says, that there is now only too much reason to fear that it will reach England in a few weeks.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.

The ministers of the five powers, have agreed upon a treaty, settling the affairs between these powers, which is said to be highly dissatisfactory to the Dutch government—Belgium was going on with her military preparations, to be in readiness to repel invasion.

ALGIERS.

The Bedouins had besieged and occupied Bona. The besieging army was commanded by Haigil Bensamour, formerly a merchant of Bona, and was paid by the bey of Constantine. The Bedouins had desolated the town with fire and sword. It is thought that one battalion of the French army might have prevented this catastrophe, while it will occasion the sacrifice of a regiment to recapture it.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

December 5. Mr. Smith, of Md. president pro tem. of the senate, in the absence of the vice president, took the chair at 12 o'clock; and on calling the senate to order, it appeared that all were present except, Mr. Webster, of Mass. Mr. Frelinghuysen, of N. J. Mr. Bernard, of Penn. Mr. Clayton of Del. Mr. Chambers, of Md. Mr. Tazewell, of Va. Mr. Brown, of N. C. Messrs. Troup and Forsyth, of Geo. Mr. Bibb, of Ky. Mr. Waggaman, of Lon. Mr. Ellis, of Mississippi, and Messrs. Benton and Buckner, of Missouri.

The following is the list of senators:

Maine. John Holmes, Peleg Sprague.
New Hampshire. Samuel Bell, Isaac Hill.
Massachusetts. Daniel Webster, Nathaniel Silabee.
Rhode Island. Nehemiah R. Knight, Asher Robbins.
Connecticut. Samuel A. Foot, Gideon Tomlinson.
Vermont. Horatio Seymour, Samuel Prentiss.
New York. Charles E. Dudley, William Marey.
New Jersey. Mahlon Dickerson, Theo. Frelinghuysen.

Georgia. George M. Troup, John Forsyth.
Kentucky. George M. Bibb, Henry Clay.
Tennessee. Felix Grundy, Hugh L. White.
Ohio. Benjamin Ruggles, Thomas Ewing.
Louisiana. Josiah S. Johnston, Geo. A. Waggaman.
Indiana. Wm. Hendricks, Robert Hanna.
Mississippi. Powhatan Ellis, George Pomfret.
Illinois. Elias K. Kane, John M. Robinson.
Alabama. William R. King, Gabriel Moore.
Missouri. Thomas H. Benton, Alexander Buckner.

The credentials of Messrs. Prentiss, of Vt. Hanna, of Ind. Mangum, of N. C. Miller, of S. C. Moore, of Ala. Clay, of Ky., senators from their respective states, were severally presented. Messrs. Murcy, of New York, and Johnston, of Louisiana, senators elect, but whose credentials had not arrived, were permitted to take their seats—it being understood that their credentials are to be filed. The above named gentlemen were then sworn in.

The house of representatives were notified by message, that the senate were ready to proceed to business, and a similar message was received from the house of representatives, as also a resolution appointing a committee to wait on the president to inform him that both houses had organized. The senate concurred therein, and appointed Messrs. King and Foot the committee on the part of the senate.

The senate then adjourned.

December 6. Mr. King from the joint committee appointed to wait on the president, reported that they had performed that duty, and had received an intimation that the president would make a communication this day at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Donelson, the president's private secretary, handed in the following message, and certain accompanying documents.

The message being read, 3,000 copies of the message and 1,500 copies of the documents, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. King moved that the 34th rule of the senate be so far suspended as to authorize the senate, in the absence of the vice president, to appoint by ballot a chairman of the committee of finance; which motion being agreed to.

*Appointed by the governor, for the time being.

The senate proceeded to ballot for a chairman of that committee, and Mr. Smith, of Maryland, was chosen.

The following standing committees were then announced from the chair:

On foreign relations. Messrs. Tazewell, White, King, Forsyth and Bell.

On finance. Messrs. Smith, Tyler, Marey, Silsbee and Johnson.

On commerce. Messrs. Forsyth, Dudley, Silsbee Johnson and Wilkins.

On manufactures. Messrs. Dickerson, Clay, Knight, Miller and Seymour.

On agriculture. Messrs. Seymour, Brown, Moore, Hanna and Waggaman.

On military affairs. Messrs. Benton, Bernard, Troup, Clay and Kane.

On the militia. Messrs. Barnard, Frelinghuysen, Clayton, Prentiss and Waggaman.

On naval affairs. Messrs. Hayne, Tazewell, Robbins, Webster and Bibb.

On public lands. Messrs. King, Ellis, Holmes, Robbins and Hanna.

On private land claims. Messrs. Kane, Naudain, Prentiss, Ruggles and Hendricks.

On Indian affairs. Messrs. White, Troup, Poindexter, Benton and Wilkins.

On claims. Messrs. Ruggles, Bell, Naudain, Brown and Moore.

On the judiciary. Messrs. Marey, Hayne, Webster, Frelinghuysen and Grundy.

On the post office and post roads. Messrs. Grundy, Ellis, Hill, Ewing and Tomlinson.

On roads and canals. Messrs. Hendricks, Poindexter, Hill, Mangum and Sprague.

On pensions. Messrs. Foot, Chambers, Mangum, Buckner and Sprague.

On the District of Columbia. Messrs. Chambers, Tyler, Holmes, Clayton and Miller.

On the contingent fund. Messrs. Knight, Dudley and Tomlinson.

On engrossed bills. Messrs. Robinson, Ewing and Buckner.

The senate then adjourned.

December 7. Mr. Chambers, of Maryland, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

The president of the senate communicated the secretary of the treasury's report, the reading of which was dispensed with, and 1500 additional copies ordered to be printed—also the annual report of the secretary of the senate, of the contingent expenses of his office.

Mr. Dudley, presented the memorial of Edward Fanning and Benjamin Penikese, of New York, praying compensation for losses sustained by the failure of the late contemplated exploring expedition to the south seas—referre.

Mr. Sprague submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to the senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, all the information in his power, relative to the capture, abduction, and imprisonment, of American citizens by the provincial authorities of New Brunswick, and the measures which, in consequence thereof, have been adopted by the executive of the United States.

Mr. Holmes submitted the following:

Resolved, That the president be requested to inform the senate whether any further negotiation is commenced, proposed, or intended, in regard to the north eastern boundary of the United States.

These resolutions lie upon the table until to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. King, it was Resolved, That the secretary of the senate cause to be distributed to the senators, not heretofore supplied, one copy each of Jefferson's Manual and the Executive Journal.

Mr. Hayne gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the settlement of the claims of the state of South Carolina, for advances made to the United States during the last war.

Mr. Foot gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill supplemental to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution.

After a short time spent in the consideration of executive business,

The senate adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

December 8. The chair communicated several letters and reports.

Messrs. Foot and Hayne, having obtained leave yesterday, introduced the bills mentioned.

Several petitions were presented, and referred.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. Sprague was agreed to—and that by Mr. Holmes taken up.

Mr. Poindexter thought the general message of the president fully treated the subject. Mr. Holmes believed that it did not. Mr. Hayne was in favor of motions of inquiry, but thought the resolution premature. Mr. Holmes replied, but consented that the resolution should lie on the table till next week. It was laid on the table.

Mr. Hanna submitted the following resolution which lies upon the table:

Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation to extinguish the Indian title in Indiana.

Two messages, of a confidential nature, having been received from the president of the United States,

On motion of Mr. White,

The senate went into the consideration of executive business; and, after sitting with closed doors for a short time,

Then adjourned over to Monday next, at 12 o'clock.

The house then proceeded to the election of a speaker. The result of the first ballot was announced to be—
For Andrew Stevenson, of Virginia, 98;
For Joel B. Sutherland, of Penn., 54;
For C. A. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, 15;
For John W. Taylor, of New York, 13;
For Lewis Condict, of New Jersey, 4; Scattering 6.
The whole number of votes given being 195.

Andrew Stevenson, of Virginia, having received 93 votes, (the exact number necessary for a choice,) was declared to be duly elected speaker of the house of representatives; whereupon, being conducted to the chair by Thomas Newton, of Virginia, the speaker addressed the house as follows:

Gentlemen: In accepting, a third time, this exalted station, I cannot adequately express the deep sense I entertain of the honor you have been pleased again to confer upon me, or my warm feelings of gratitude, for this distinguished proof of your continued confidence, and unchanging kindness.

It is an honor, too, gentlemen, which has been conferred in a manner, and under circumstances peculiarly calculated to gratify and flatter me; and I shall ever cherish it as the most valuable reward for my past services. The office of speaker of this house has, at no period in our history, been without its embarrassments and trials; and it in times of profound tranquillity and repose, its duties have justly been regarded by the most eminent of the distinguished individuals who have filled the chair, as arduous and responsible, how greatly must its labors and responsibilities be enhanced in times of high political and party divisions!

I certainly am not vain enough to suppose that it will be in my power to discharge the duties of this high office in a manner suitable to its dignity and importance, or as I should myself wish, indeed there is no man, I am very confident, be he whom he may, who could at such a time assume its responsibilities without distrustingly greatly his own abilities. I shall not, however despair. Actuated by an honest and manly zeal, I shall endeavor at least to justify the choice of my friends, and merit the confidence and respect of the house.

Whoever shall fill this chair, to his own honor or the advantage of the nation, must possess not only this confidence of the house, but the esteem and respect of the honorable and high minded men, over whom he presides. Neither station or power can confer esteem or respect. They can only be acquired by integrity, impartiality, and independence here. These alone can shed honor or lustre on this station, and make it, both as it regards the house and the nation what it should be.

I unfeignedly assure you, gentlemen, that I shall need and expect your cordial and kind co-operation, in preserving order and dignity in our deliberations, and sustaining the authority of the chair; and I earnestly hope so to discharge its duties as to insure to its decisions not merely a reluctant support, but a steady and cheerful acquiescence in their justice and propriety.

I tender you, gentlemen, my cordial co-operation in the discharge of your high duties, and ardently pray that we may, by our conduct and deliberations, render this house worthy of the high name and character of our beloved country.

The oath required by law was administered to the speaker by Mr. Newton, of Va. and the same oath (or affirmation), was thereupon administered to all the other members present.

The usual messages having passed between the house and the senate, a committee was appointed to wait on the president and inform him that congress was organized.

On motion of Mr. Speight it was Resolved, unanimously, That M. St. Clair Clark, clerk in the late house of representatives, be appointed clerk to this house.

On motion of Mr. Taylor, it was Resolved, That the rules and orders established by the late house of representatives be deemed and taken to be the rules and orders of proceeding to be observed in this house, until a revision or alteration shall have taken place.

On motion of Mr. Johnson, of Ky. it was Resolved, That the clerk cause the members of this house to be furnished, during the present session, with such newspapers as they may direct, the expense whereof, for each member, not to exceed the price of three daily papers.

And then the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Dec. 6. On motion of Mr. Taylor, it was resolved to appoint two chaplains of different denominations, one by each house, to serve during the present session, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. Ward, from the joint committee appointed yesterday to wait on the president, made a report.

Immediately after which, a communication was received from the president, in writing, by Mr. Donelson his private secretary, which being read,

On motion of Mr. Johnson, of Ky. 10,000 copies thereof were ordered to be printed.

And then the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 7. Richard Coke, Jr. of Va. appeared and took his seat.

A message was received from the president of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his private secretary, transmitting two letters from the secretary of state, accompanied by statements from that department, showing the progress which has been made in taking the fifth census of the inhabitants of the United States; and also, by a printed copy of the revision of the statements heretofore submitted to congress, &c. From these the following is extracted:—

The report of the secretary of the treasury, was laid before the house, and ten thousand copies ordered to be printed.

The house then proceeded to the election of its officers—when John O. Dunn, was, on a second ballot, re-elected sergeant at arms—and Overton Carr, was, on the first ballot, elected door keeper, (the old door keeper capt. Benjamin Burch, being unable from inaptitude to attend to his duties). The house then proceeded to ballot for an assistant door keeper, but no choice being had, the house adjourned.

Thursday, Dec. 8. Dixon H. Lewis, of Alabama, and Austin E. Wing, delegate from Michigan, appeared this day, and took their seats.

On motion of Mr. Taylor, an order was passed for the appointment of the several standing committees, pursuant to the rules and orders of the house. The names of the gentlemen who will compose the committees will be announced on Tuesday next.

After some minor business, the ballotings for an assistant door keeper took place. On the 4th ballot, John W. Hunter, of Georgia, had 104 votes, (elected), Moses Poor 63, and some others a few. There were eleven in nomination.

The speaker laid before the house sundry communications, &c.

I. A letter from the treasurer, accompanied by the annual statement of his accounts. Laid on the table.

II. A letter from the first comptroller of the treasury, accompanying lists of balances due more than three years on the books of the register and second auditor of the treasury. Laid on the table.

III. A letter from the commissioners of the navy pension and navy hospital funds, transmitting their annual report for the year 1851. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Ellsworth, it was Resolved, That the clerk of the house be directed to purchase thirty copies of Gordon's digest of the laws of the United States, for the use of the members of this house.

And the house adjourned until Monday next.

THE MESSAGE AND PRINTER TO CONGRESS.

From the U. S. Telegraph.

We submit the following correspondence, as our justification for the delay in delivering to the two houses of congress the usual number of copies of the message and accompanying documents. The reader can make his own comment:

Mr. Donelson's compliments to gen. Green, and informs him that Mr. Blair will be instructed to furnish to him and to the other proprietors of papers in this city, impressions of the message in time for it to be set up the evening before its delivery, under a pledge that it is not to go out of their offices until the hour appointed for its delivery to congress.

December 8, 1851.

Mr. Green acknowledges the receipt of maj. Donelson's note of this date, informing him that "Mr. Blair will be instructed to furnish to him and to the other proprietors of papers in this city, impressions of the message in time for it to be set up the evening before its delivery," and informs Mr. D. that his application was made as printer to congress, and not as a "proprietor," and asks to remind maj. D., that unless the message is furnished at an earlier date, it will be impossible to furnish the two houses of congress with the usual number of copies as soon as it has been heretofore done.

December 3, 1831.

Sir: I have submitted your second application for a copy of the message to the president, who instructs me to say in reply to it, that he does not consider you, as printer to congress, entitled to the message, as a public document, until it becomes such by being delivered to that body.

As editor and proprietor of a newspaper, you are placed on the same footing with others in the city, by the instructions which have been given to Mr. Blair, and which you have quoted in your note. Respectfully yours, &c.,
AND J. DONELSON.

Gen. Diff Green.

JACKSON AND CALHOUN IN GEORGIA.

The following are the preamble and resolutions, respecting the two distinguished individuals above named, as they passed the senate of Georgia, on the 24th inst. Yes, 65—Nays, 00. It is said to be probable they will go through the house, with nearly the same unanimity.

Whereas, the re-election of Andrew Jackson to the presidency of the United States, for the next term, is of vital importance to the best interests of the people, as such an event will tend to perpetuate the happiness and prosperity of our beloved country, preserving unimpaired the "federal constitution"—for the following reasons:

1st. Because he is a decided and firm friend to the continuance of the federal union of these states: "It must be preserved."

2d. Because of the strong determination which he has expressed, on several occasions, to have the national debt extinguished, that the burthens upon the agricultural interest of the south, and the commercial interests of the whole country, may be removed—authorizing the hope, that under his second administration, the three great interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, may be placed upon a common footing of equal protection and equal freedom, whereby the constitution will be restored, and the south relieved from the injustice of the present system, of drawing tribute from the many, for the benefit of the few.

3d. Because, since he has been president, he has done all in his power to ensure to Georgia the territory now in the possession of the Cherokee Indians, judging therefore by the past, we may confidently rely for the future, on his exercising all his influence, to enforce our just rights, and thereby realize to the state the possession of those lands, and her citizens the enjoyment of them.

4th. Because, by putting his veto to the Maysville road bill, he has arrested the system of internal improvement which proposed to establish a violation of another—to maintain the tariff system, by creating a perpetual drain from the federal treasury—to perpetuate an extravagant and oppressive taxation, by a profligate expenditure of the public revenue.

It is resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the state of Georgia in general assembly met, and it is hereby resolved by the authority of the same, That the people of this state look forward with deep solicitude to the re-election of Andrew Jackson to the presidency of the United States, at the ensuing election, and do hereby pledge themselves to support him for that high office. They do not hesitate to declare it as their opinion, that he is the most fit and proper person to be supported, and do in the most earnest terms, recommend him to the people of our sister states, at the approaching election.

Many of the public presses throughout the United States, opposed to the administration of president Jackson, have labored to induce a belief that a portion of the people of Georgia are willing to make common cause with the vice president, and thereby contribute to the defeat of gen. Jackson. Recent events in this state have been hailed, in some of our sister states, as proof of the triumph here of John C. Calhoun and his principles over the president, his friends and his principles. The great body of the people of this state have no feeling in common with the pretensions, or with many of the principles of Mr. Calhoun—and especially those contained in his late address to the people of the United States on the subject of nullification. They are unequivocally opposed to the claims which his friends have set up for him to the presidency, arrayed as they are against the rightful claims of gen. Jackson. No man can be the friend of Jackson who directly or indirectly gives aid or countenance to the most indolent, the most bitter, and the most talented of his opposers.

Therefore, be it resolved by both branches of the legislature, That they do not favor the pretensions of Mr. Calhoun, either to the presidency or the vice presidency of the United States, and that his excellency the governor be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to furnish our representatives in congress with copies of these resolutions.

SOUTH CAROLINA AND GEN. JACKSON.

Whilst the state of Georgia is unanimously resolving to support general Jackson, because he is supposed to be hostile to the doctrines of Mr. Calhoun and his friends, we learn by the following account of proceedings of the legislators of South Carolina, that they are disposed for that very reason to discard him!

From the Southern Times of Nov. 30.

PLOT AND COUNTERPLOT.

The scene opened last night. A notice was yesterday put up in the state house, summoning a meeting of those friendly to the re-election of general Jackson, in the senate chamber last night. At 6 o'clock, a meeting accordingly took place, and a very general attendance of the members of both houses. Judge Huger was called to the chair, and Mr. Pettigru introduced a string of resolutions approving the administration of gen. Jackson, and nominating him for re-election. The hon. Henry Deas made a motion, as a substitute for Mr. Pettigru's, to the effect that it was inexpedient now to set upon the subject. A warm and general discussion ensued, in which Judge Smith, Messrs. Harrison, Sperry, Levy, and T. Williams took part on one side, and Messrs. Deas, Preston, Butler, Dunkin, and Wardlaw, on the other.

At length a motion was made for adjournment, accompanied with a request for the members present in favor of the immediate nomination of gen. Jackson to remain. The motion was carried, and an instantaneous call was made for a meeting of those opposed to the immediate nomination in the representative hall. The question of nomination was then put in the senate chamber, and carried by a vote of 58. In the representative chamber, the hon. H. Deas was called to the chair, and it was ascertained upon a call of the rolls, that there were present 86 members. The following resolution was then introduced by Col. Preston, and carried nem. con:

"Resolved, That the state of Carolina, being engaged in a contest for great constitutional rights and interests of paramount importance, it is inexpedient at this time to involve her in the struggles of the presidential election, or to pledge her to any particular candidate."

There were 23 members absent from both meetings. If all had been present the vote would have been in about the same proportion. Measures were taken to obtain the opinions of those absent, and they will hereafter be given.

We have only time to say, that col. Preston's resolution speaks the sentiments of South Carolina. Let gen. Jackson and the national republican monopolists and consolidationists look at it.

PRESENTATION OF SWORDS.

On the 19th ult. in the council chamber, governor Howard presented swords to captain Geisenger, lieutenant Smoot and lieutenant Conner, agreeably to the resolution of the last general assembly of Maryland, in the presence of the council, the court and bar of the court of appeals, and a respectable number of citizens and strangers—among the latter were commodore Bainbridge, captain Ballard, and lieutenant Mayo.

The Annapolis Republican states that the following is the address of the governor on the occasion, and the replies of the respective gentlemen thereto.

Address of the governor.

Gentlemen:—In every age and in every country it has been customary to pay some public tribute of respect to distinguished merit. The propriety of this custom established in the early ages of the world, is confirmed by its continuance at the present day, when civilization has become extended over so large a portion of our globe, and the inventions of human genius have arrived at such a point of perfection that we are at a loss to conceive how they can be further extended. The legislature of Maryland, in accordance with this long established custom, has from time to time, selected from amongst her citizens, those who have distinguished themselves by devotion to the public good, bestowing upon them some visible sign of her approbation. It is upon such an occasion that we have met this day. It becomes my duty in my official station, in compliance with the direction of the representatives of the people of this state to bestow upon you, the highest reward the patriot and warrior can desire—these testimonials of the approbation of your native state, of your gallantry and good conduct in defence of the rights of your country, those who have distinguished themselves by services, your names being recorded in the archives of your native state. Having myself received the parental instruction of one who bore arms in our revolutionary struggle, I can readily conceive the feelings by which you are now agitated—flashes of pleasure mingled with that modesty natural to the brave, which would make you prefer your situation at the moment your laurels were won, to this when you are about to receive the reward of your country. It is a proud and gratifying fact, that I cannot refrain from mentioning, that in the generous strife, who should be foremost in deeds of valor, the sons of Maryland were not undistinguished. In the records of our revolution, the names of Marylanders stand proudly prominent; and when at a later period our country again became involved in war with the same nation, with which our fathers so successfully contended, the same spirit which animated them, was found amongst their sons, who nobly redeemed the pledge of devotion to their country, given by their fathers. In the gallant band which marched to such the foe, you were found; and that you went forth not in vain, the transactions of this day are proud evidences. You fought and conquered, carrying the Star Spangled Banner into every sea, and convincing your enemy, that they were not the only nation,

"Whose march is on the mountain wave,

"Whose home is on the deep."

"The Java and the Guerriere—the Peaceock and the Penguin—the Reindeer and the Aron, are proud trophies of this fact."

Your country is grateful to you—Your native state is proud of you, and through me as her organ, tenders to you these words, as evidences of her feelings.

Captain Geisenger's reply.

It is with peculiar pleasure that I receive from the hands of your excellency the sword which is presented by the legislature of my native state, as a mark of its approbation of my conduct during the late war. In the actions in which you refer, I was but an humble participator, as I then only held the station of a midshipman.—Gratifying as is this kind and encouraging remembrance of the patriotic state of Maryland, yet it is mingled with the most painful recollection. The gallant Bickley and his devoted companions never lived to receive from their country, the cheering reward of gallant deeds. I am the only survivor of the officers who shared in the actions which you have this day so kindly celebrated.

For this sword, and for the very flattering expressions with which the presentation has been accompanied, accept my heartfelt thanks, and my solemn assurance that it shall never be drawn except in the defence of justice and of the country.

Lieut. Contee's reply.

The happiness I feel in receiving this testimonial of my native state, is highly increased from its being presented by your excellency, a descendant of the illustrious Sir Cospatrick.

Should the fortune of war ever place me in the military stage, may my career, like his, be crowned with victory and glory.

Lieut. Smoot's reply.

I beg your excellency to believe, that I feel with deep sensibility the distinguished honor conferred upon me by the legislature of my native state, in the presentation of this sword, as a reward for the feeble services rendered by me to my country, during the late war with Great Britain.

It is a proud consolation to me to know (humble as my services were), that throughout that contest I felt an honest devotion to the cause of my country; and that I exerted in her service, whatever ability I possessed. I can only pledge a similar devotion in any future contest in which she may be engaged.

I make my most grateful acknowledgments to your excellency for your kindness and courtesy on this occasion.

ON SLAVE LABOR.

The following eloquent memorial to the legislature of the state of Virginia, has been forwarded to the editors of the Richmond Whig from the county of Fluvanna, by the hands of which county it is now received, it will be extensively signed.

"To the general assembly of the commonwealth of Virginia,

"The memorial of the female citizens of the County of Fluvanna, most respectfully sheweth

Your memorialists have hitherto been blessed with contentment in the happy privacy of domestic retirement, where they have enjoyed peace and security, under the wise institutions of a free government; nor have they until now had occasion to appeal to the guardians of their country's rights for redress of any national grievance, having shared the prosperity of their heavenly-blessed land with feelings of gratitude to the Author of all Good and to their natural guardians and protectors. They retain a grateful recollection of the patriotic exertions of your predecessors in office, when the lands of their native were the fetters of foreign barbarism, and the divisions of a mighty nation were involved in your selfish rations as a legislative body. The spirit now animates your councils which then triumphed over the oppression of Great Britain, and bore us safely through the perils of an unequal contest. The same wisdom pervades your deliberations which framed for our emancipated realm, a system of laws unequalled in the universe. Under this salutary code, we have seen our sons arise to manhood, unfettered by abject restrictions, and our daughters fill their allotted stations among the honored matrons of a free land.

But a slight bow hangs over our national prospects, and a cloud dims the sunshine of domestic peace throughout our state. Our ears have heard the wailings of distress, and a mysterious dread, mingled with fearful suspicion, disturbs the sacred quists of our homes. We have heard "Rachel," as it were, "weeping for her children, because they are not," and uncontrollable sympathy with distant mourners, quickens the throbbings of our once tranquil bosoms.

We cannot conceal from ourselves that an evil is among us, which threatens to outgrow the growth and eclipse the brightness of our national blessings. A shadow deepens over the land and casts its thickest gloom upon the sacred shrine of domestic bliss, darkening over us as time advances. We reflect, with gratitude, that no error, in the framers of our constitution, entailed this evil upon us. We drew the taint from the bosom that fostered us, and it has gradually mingled with the vital principle of our national existence. It can no longer remain dormant and inert in the social system, but calls loudly for redress from the sages of our land. We are feelingly aware of the arduous difficulties of the case in question, and nothing, but the fullest confidence in the wisdom and prudence of our legislative council, joined to a sacred trust in the God of nations, could induce us thus to intrude on the important avocations which engage your time and your attention. We feel confident of your sympathy in all real danger, and trust that none of your revered body will impose its interference in this delicate matter, to a culpable degree of intemperance; neither will you impute to us the extravagant expectation that your utmost exertions can effect an immediate removal of the evil we deplore. We are prepared to endure a large proportion of the affliction, during our brief term of existence. But we look forward to the time, when our children's children will occupy the place which must soon know us as gone. Should your wisdom devise a method of alleviating our national malady, posterity will be indebted to you for the security of the domestic sphere. Our daughters, and their daughters, are destined to become, in their turn, the tender fosterers of helpless infancy, the directors of developing childhood, and the companions of those citizens who will occupy the legislative and executive offices of their country. Can we calmly anticipate the condition of the southern states, at that period, should we not be devoted to arrest the progressive miseries attendant on slavery? We should red for the fate of our female descendants, while we endeavor to still the too important apprehensions of our own bosoms. It will be their province, as it is ours, to impose the salutary restraints of domestic discipline, and, in the absence of their lawful directors, to maintain temporary sway over the household. Can this post of duty be safely filled by a helpless female, amid the impediments arising from the increasing evils of slavery? Will the paternal father's heart be at peace, when, amid the hurly of public affairs, his trait thoughts return to the home of his affections, surrounded by doubt, if not dangerous, subjects to a precarious authority? Perhaps, when deeply engaged in his legislative duties, his heart may quail, and his tongue falter, with irrepressible apprehension for the peace and safety of objects dearer than life itself.

Such will be the trials of our posterity, unless sufficient measures are speedily put in operation to avert them from the unborn myriads of our native land.

We presume not to intrude our suggestions as to the method of accomplishing this stupendous undertaking, but we are content to leave the choice of means to those on whose wisdom we can rely. It is sufficient, that we are allowed the privilege of entreating our lawmakers to commence, without delay, a work which must be slowly and gradually performed. We can only and the mighty task by ardent outpourings of the spirit of supplication at the Throne of Grace. We will call upon the God in Whom we trust, to direct your councils by his unerring wisdom, and guide you with his effulgent spirit. We now conjure you, by the sacred charities of kindred, by the solemn obligations of justice, by every consideration of domestic affection and patriotic duty, to exert every faculty of your minds to the investigation of this important subject—and let not the sacred vows of your mothers, wives, daughters, and kindred, have sounded in your ears in vain!!

"THE CABLE CASE."

From the Boston Gazette.

This case, which has excited considerable interest, especially among the mercantile community, was decided on Monday last, in the United States district court. We have been politely favored with the opinion delivered by Judge Davis in the case, which we doubt not will be acceptable to our readers. It is as follows:—

MASSACHUSETTS DISTRICT.

District court, United States, October 24, 1831.

U. States, Libellants, vs. One hempen cable and one hempen hawser, Benj. Rich, S. H. Rich and John Norris, claimants.

A. Dunlap, district attorney, for the United States.

Charles G. Loring, for claimants.

These articles, brought into the port of Boston, in the brig Moscow, from Cronstadt, were seized on the 14th of September last, by the collector of the district of Boston and Charlestown, on the ground, as the label alleges, that they belong to, or were consigned to the master, mate or crew of that vessel, and were not described or included in the manifest or manifests of the cargo, by which, and by force of the statute of the United States, in such case made and provided, it alleged that they have become forfeited to the sea specified in the statute.

The claimants in their answer on oath declare, that they are the lawful owners of the brig Moscow, that she arrived at Boston on the 5th of September last, from Cronstadt, having, in her outward voyage, first proceeded to Matanzas, in the island of Cuba, the said John Norris, one of the joint owners, being the master; that, on the passage to Matanzas, by a casualty which they particularly describe, part of the stream cable—about twenty-five fathoms—was necessarily cut away and lost, with the anchor to which it was attached, and that, from this circumstance, as well as from the age, long continued use and decay of that cable, it became necessary to procure a substitute, which was accordingly done by the master of the brig, at Cronstadt, for the necessary use of the vessel, and for no other purpose; that, in like manner, a substitute was there provided for the hawser, belonging to the brig—the old hawser, it is averred, being strained, weak and unfit for use; that said new stream cable and hawser were taken on board said brig, at Cronstadt, as part of her ground tackle and equipment, and solely for the purpose of being used as such; that they were purchased in the ordinary manner for immediate use, were stowed in that part of the vessel, where the stream cable and hawser, in actual service, are always stowed and kept; that during the passage from Cronstadt to Boston there was no other stream cable nor hawser on board of said vessel, used or intended to be used, as a part of her ground tackle, or equipment, nor kept on board in the place where said articles are or ought to be stowed and kept, and that in all particulars the same were intended to be, and were kept to be used, as being the ordinary tackle and furniture of the vessel; the stream cable and hawser, thus purchased, intended and applied, they aver to be the same that are mentioned in the libel; they deny that those articles belonged to, or were consigned to the master, mate or crew of the vessel, saving the interest of the master, or that they were brought on board or imported in said vessel as merchandise, or contrary to law; and in answer to an interrogatory propounded with the libel, the respondents further declare, that said cable and hawser were purchased by said Norris, in his capacity as master and part owner of said brig, on the 14th of June last, at Cronstadt, and that they belonged to the claimants, as owners of that vessel, being, as they aver, part of her necessary tackle and equipment.

Numerous witnesses were examined, as to that portion of the claimants' averments respecting the insufficiency of the old stream cable and hawser, and as to the necessity or expediency of procuring new substitutes for the proper use of the vessel in the accomplishment of her voyage; and I am fully satisfied, from that examination, and from the testimony of the mate, contained in his deposition, that the claimants' averments in their defence are true. The loss of the old cable and hawser, and the necessity or would alone, in my opinion, justify the purchase of a new one, and entitle such substitute to be considered as part of the tackle and furniture of the vessel, and as such, free of duties, and the decided testimony given of the condition of the hawser, leaves no doubt of the propriety of procuring a substitute for that article also. The articles libelled being of this character, truly and fairly part of the ship's furniture or equipment, it is not requisite to insert them in the manifest. It is argued, on the part of the government, that, in the true construction of the statute, those articles would come under the denomination of sea stores. This would appear to me a strained interpretation of the statute, and the uniform practice, from the earliest date of our maritime and fiscal regulations, gives no support to such construction. "Fuel and cabin stores," is the expression in the 23d section of the collection law in the case referred to, of sea stores and sea stores. These expressions are understood to mean, and naturally do mean, the stores or provisions laid in for cabin or storage, for officers, passengers or crews, or if further extended, can only be applicable to articles of consumption, perishing in the using, and not to the tackle and apparel of the ship, the sails, rigging, cables or anchors. These are to be considered as attached to the ship, and so belonging to the ship, that it is no more necessary to include them in the manifest than the ship itself. The sails and tackle, says Lord Holt, in the case of Edmonson vs. Walker, are part of the ship—and under the circumstances of that case, were so considered, though they were on the shore. I show 177.

It may be remarked, that if the articles, in question in this libel, are to be considered as falling under the denomination of sea stores, in the present case, they do not properly be founded on the 24th section of the collection law which it recites, but on the 23d section.

It being satisfactorily proved, that these articles were purchased and intended for the vessel, by the master, they became thereby the property of the owners; and even if they constitute an unnecessary supply, under the circumstances in which the vessel was placed, and so to be considered as merchandise imported, still, being the claimants' property, they would not be liable to forfeiture by the action of the act, unless it were for the master's portion. Of the legal result in such view of the case, as to the master's proportion, he being likewise a part owner of the vessel, it is unnecessary, in this case, to express or to form an opinion. On other distinct ground, already expressed, from the suitable and proper connexion of the stream cable and hawser with the vessel, as part of her tackle and apparel, I have no hesitation in decreeing that they be restored to the claimants.

It remains to be considered whether the certificate of reasonable cause shall be entered for the collector's protection, who may be otherwise exposed to a prosecution for an exercise of official duty. There were, it appears, some circumstances attending this transaction, producing a degree of excitement which had not entirely subsided in the interval between the seizure and the hearing; and counsel for the claimants has made a strong appeal to the court, urging a denial of the certificate; at the same time, the generous enclivity which he bestows on the collector, in which I* is understood to express the prevailing sentiment of the commercial community, would seem to render the apprehensions of unworthy or improper motive in this seizure, improbable, and not to be imputed to the collector without the fullest evidence.

That mutual courtesy between the officers and the merchant, without relinquishment of right on one side, or dereliction of duty on the other, which commenced in this collection district, with the venerable general Lincoln, has been laudably continued with his successors, and the present collector is understood fully to estimate the high considerations which recommend such dispositions and deportment, and to exhibit the influence of such sentiments in official transactions, interacting from their magnitude, and often perplexing in their character, have proceeded to a satisfactory conclusion, in a manner, and with a temper, which it is gratifying to contemplate. I may ask allowance for grateful indulgence in these recognitions. The duties of the situation in which I have been placed, through a greater part of the period to which I have adverted, have been better treated, by the dispositions which have prevailed in this highly commercial district, in which a great portion of the business of this court usually originates. The incident controversies and concerns of trade and revenue, would have been rendered particularly irksome, but from a manifestation of a liberal spirit, which looked at objects in their substantial character and relations, and seldom gave to the legal arena any discomposing features.

It seems to have been intimated, or imagined, that the collector was influenced by some improper feeling or suspicion in reference to the owners of the Moscow or some one of them. I see no evidence of this. Capt. Rich, the senior owner, and who had the principal agency in the intercourse with the collector, on this subject, doubtless, fully believed that the Moscow was no more than suitably and reasonably supplied with articles which were necessary or important to her service for her next navigation, in her homeward voyage. The collector, it should be supposed, was equally honest and sincere in the belief, that the vessel was sufficiently well found, for the purpose of her voyage, in what is called ground tackle, without the supply of the new stream cable and hawser; and indirect or unworthy motives, on either side, should not be hastily adopted and entertained. While the addition of necessary articles to ship's furniture, abroad, free of duty, from their attachment to the ship, it is admitted, is not a matter for her master to be liable to abuse. In England, we find it became necessary to guard against such abuses by statute provisions. A law imposing duties on foreign sails or sailcloth was only applicable, in terms, to such as should be brought into the kingdom by way of merchandise. "But this act was evaded," says the authority* to which I refer, "for it requiring foreign sails or sailcloth to be brought in by way of merchandise, British ships used to go upon voyages with old worn out sets of sails, and buy sets of sails abroad; and to put a stop to this evasion, the act 19, Geo. 2, c. 37, enacts that every master of a ship, belonging to any of his majesty's subjects, navigated with any foreign made sails on board, shall make an entry and report of them; and that every ship built in Great Britain, or his majesty's plantations in America, on her first setting out, should be furnished with a set of sails manufactured in Great Britain." We have no statute provisions expressly framed or calculated for keeping an admitted practice, of liberal and indulgent character, within fit and reasonable limits; and an excess in procuring, abroad, articles professedly for vessels' use, and introducing them free of duty, can only be obviated or prevented by proper notice on the part of officers, of cases which may occur, falling under their cognizance.

The present instance, that there was no sudden movement on the part of the collector. The ground tackle of the Moscow, on her departure from the United States, consisted of a chain cable, a hempen bower and stream cable, and a hawser. She returned with the addition of a new hempen bower cable, a stream cable and hawser, and the old articles of corresponding description still remained on board. The collector was of opinion, that there was an excess in this additional supply, and that all the articles, thus purchased and taken on board at Cronstadt, should be rated, as liable to duty. The ultimate seizure of the stream cable and hawser, was the result of several days' deliberation, and after consultation with the surveyor and naval officer and the district attorney, and recurrence to instructions from the treasury department, in cases considered analogous. In finally determining on the seizure the bower cable was omitted, because it appeared it had been furnished for use, on occasion of another cruise, in the passage from Cronstadt. In the seizure of the articles, which will not be decreed to be restored, there was mistake in fact or in law.—If the facts had sustained the collector's opinion, that the articles were not necessary for the vessel's use, and it still should have clearly appeared, that they belong not to the master, mate or crew, they were not liable to condemnation and seizure. In such case, the collector would be under a mistake as to the law, unless it should be thought reasonable for the collector to be held responsible for the part owners, who was master of the vessel. But it is of little importance to inquire, particularly, whether the mistake were in fact or in law, according to the rule of law on this subject by which we are governed. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, in the case referred to by the district attorney. [United States vs. Riddle, 5 Cr. 317] observes, that as the construction of the law was liable to some question, the court would suffer the certificate of probable cause to remain.—"A doubt," it is added, "as to the true construction of the law, is as reasonable a cause for seizure as a doubt respecting the fact."

In the present case, the collector, as appears to me, acted with a sincere conviction that he was in the correct and requisite performance of his official duty, without any culpable or unworthy motive. I shall therefore accompany the decree of restoration, with a certificate of reasonable cause.

GENERAL POST OFFICE.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Post office department, 28th November, 1831.

To the president of the United States:

SIR: The following report of the progress and condition of this department is respectfully submitted.

The revenues of the department, being the amount of postages within the year, commencing on the 1st of July, 1830, and ending the 30th of June, 1831, were

$1,997,811 54
The expenditures of the department, within the same period, were 1,935,559 36
Being for compensation to postmasters
$635,028 48
For transportation of the mail
1,252,226 44
For incidental expenses
48,304 44

Leaving an excess of revenue beyond the expenses of the department, amounting to 62,252 18

Of this sum there have been paid into the treasury, (being irregularly deposited by collecting officers),

563 51

Showing a balance in favor of the department, of 61,688 67

The surplus of revenue on the 1st July, 1830, as stated in the report of last year, amounted to 148,724 22

Thus the surplus revenue at the disposal of the department on the 1st of July, 1831 was

$210,412 89

This surplus, reported as available, and at the disposal of the department, is founded on the statement in the report of the late postmaster general, of 1828, and on the assumption that all the postages which have accrued since my first report in 1829, will have been collected. Of the postages returned within that time, it is confidently believed the losses, in collection will not amount to one fourth of one per centum.

The whole amount of postages from July 1st, 1828, to July 1st, 1829, was	$1,707,418 42
From July 1st, 1829, to July 1st, 1830	1,850,583 10
From July 1st, 1830, to July 1st 1831	1,997,811 54

The increase of postages within the year ending July 1st, 1829, above the amount of the year preceding, was

$108,540 47

The increase of the year ending July 1st, 1830, above the amount of the year preceding, was

143,164 68

The increase of the year ending July 1st, 1831, above the amount of the year preceding, was

147,228 44

The expenses of the department for the year preceding July 1st, 1828, exceeded its revenues in the sum of

$25,015 80

For the year preceding July 1st, 1829

74,714 15

For the year preceding July 1st, 1830

82,124 85

But for the year preceding July 1st, 1831, the revenues of the department have exceeded its expenditures in the sum of

62,252 18

The favorable terms upon which the contracts were last year made for the transportation of the mail in the southern division, commencing on the 1st day of January last, have assisted in producing the result exhibited by the following fact:—The revenue of the department for the half year beginning with the 1st of January last exceeded the expenditure for the same period in the sum of

$75,475 91

Whereas for the half year preceding the 1st January, 1831, the expenditures exceeded the revenue in the sum of 13,223 73

The difference in which results constitutes the excess of revenue over disbursements for the year now reported, of

62,252 18

From the 1st of July, 1830, to the 1st July, 1831, the transportation of the mail was increased in stages equal to

834,450 miles a year

On horseback and in sulkies

134,252 miles a year

Making an annual increase of transportation equal to 968,702 miles beyond the amount of any former period.

Many routes have also been improved, by substituting stages for horse mails, to the annual amount of 362,321 miles.

The total annual increase of stage transportation from July 1, 1830, to July 1, 1831, was

1,196,771 miles

The annual decrease of transportation, on horseback, within the same time, by substituting stages, was

228,069 miles

Making the annual increase as above,

968,702 miles

On the 1st of July, 1831, the annual transportation of the mail was, in stages and steamboats

10,728,343 miles

On horseback and in sulkies

4,740,344 miles

Making the whole annual transportation equal to

15,468,692 miles

Other improvements are also determined on, in which remote parts of the country are immediately interested; among them are, the establishment of a regular steamboat mail on the river Ohio, between Guyandotte, in Virginia, Cincinnati, in Ohio, and Louisville, in Kentucky; to form a daily connexion with the line of post coaches from this place, and from Richmond, in Virginia, to Guyandotte; and the improvement of the route to a daily line between Macon, in Georgia, Mobile, in Alabama, and New Orleans, so as to constitute a daily intercourse between New Orleans and the Atlantic cities, with a despatch of twelve days between New Orleans and this city.

These two improvements are already in a state of progress, and it is expected will soon be in complete operation.

The contracts for transporting the mails in the middle division of the union, comprising the states of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Ohio, and the territory of Michigan, will end with the present year. In renewing the contracts for this division, provision has been made for stage accommodation over 560 miles of post roads, on which the mail had before been carried on horseback, and on which the annual transportation in stages will, from the 1st of January next, amount to 62,365 miles. On 1,803 miles of post roads, where the mail is already carried in stages, the frequency of trips will also be increased to the annual amount of 407,524 miles. By these arrangements an annual increase of stage transportation is secured from the 1st of January next, of 469,889 miles on that section. The value of those improvements, at the lowest estimate, is as follows:

469,889 miles of stage transportation, at 9 cents per mile,

Deduct 62,365 miles of horse transportation superseded by stages, at 4 cents per mile,

2,494 60

Net value of the improvement,

$39,795 41

The acceptances for the new contracts, besides the securing of these improvements, are not so great as the amount now paid for the transportation on that division, by $51,787 18. The renewal of the contracts, therefore, saves in money to the department, the sum of 51,787 18

Which added to the value of the improvements, affect a saving of 91,582 59

Other improvements, highly important in their character, are proposed, the decisions on which have been deferred for further consideration.—It is, however, anticipated from the saving which has been effected in renewing the contracts, that the department will possess the ability to make some further improvements in this division of mail routes.

There were on the 1st of July last, 8,686 post offices. To the plan adopted for their supervision, and the vigilance with which it is observed, together with the system of finance which is strictly adhered to, may be attributed, in no small degree, the increasing prosperity of the department.

I have the honor to be, with high regard, your obedient servant,
W. T. BARRY.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Fellow-citizens of the senate, and house of representatives:

The representation of the people has been renewed for the twenty-second time since the constitution they formed has been in force. For near half a century the chief magistrates who have been successively chosen have made their annual communications of the state of the nation to its representatives. Generally, these communications have been of the most gratifying nature, testifying an advance in all the improvements of social, and all the securities of political life. But frequently, and justly, as you have been called on to be grateful for the bounties of Providence, at few periods have they been more abundantly or extensively bestowed than at the present: rarely, if ever, have we had greater reason to congratulate each other on the continued and increasing prosperity of our beloved country.

Agriculture, the first and most important occupation of man, has compensated the labors of the husbandman with plentiful crops of all the varied products of our extensive country. Manufactures have been established, in which the funds of the capitalist find a profitable investment, and which give employment and subsistence to a numerous and increasing body of industrious and dextrous mechanics. The laborer is rewarded by high wages, in the construction of works of internal improvement, which are extending with unprecedented rapidity. Science is steadily penetrating the recesses of nature, and disclosing her secrets, while the ingenuity of free minds is subjecting the elements to the power of man, and making each new conquest auxiliary to his comfort. By our mails, whose speed is regularly increased, and whose routes are every year extended, the communication of public intelligence and private business is rendered frequent and safe—the intercourse between distant cities, which it formerly required weeks to accomplish, is now effected in a few days; and in the construction of rail roads, and the application of steam power, we have a reasonable prospect that the extreme parts of our country will be so much approximated, and those most isolated by the obstacles of nature, rendered so accessible as to remove an apprehension, sometimes entertained, that the great extent of the union would endanger its permanent existence.

If, from the satisfactory view of our agriculture, manufactures, and internal improvements, we turn to the state of our navigation and trade with foreign nations, and between the states, we shall scarcely find less cause for gratulation. A beneficent Providence has provided, for their exercise and encouragement, an extensive coast indented by capacious bays, noble rivers, inland seas, with a country productive of every material for ship building, and every commodity for gainful commerce, and filled with a population active, intelligent, well informed, and fearless of danger. These advantages are not neglected; and an impulse has lately been given to commercial enterprise, which fills our ship-yards with new constructions, encourages all the arts and branches of industry connected with them, crowds the wharves of our cities with vessels, and covers the most distant seas with our canvass.

Let us be grateful for these blessings to the beneficent Being who has conferred them, and who suffers us to indulge a reasonable hope of their continuance and extension, while we neglect not the means by which they may be preserved. If we may dare to judge of His future designs by the manner in which His past favors have been bestowed, he has made our national prosperity to depend on the preservation of our liberties—our national force on our federal union—and our individual happiness on the maintenance of our state rights and wise institutions. If we are prosperous at home, and respected abroad, it is because we are free, united, industrious, and obedient to the laws. While we continue so, we shall, by the blessing of heaven, go on in the happy career we have begun, and which has brought us, in the short period of our political existence, from a population of three to thirteen millions—from thirteen separate colonies to twenty-four United States—from weakness to strength—from a rank scarcely marked in the scale of nations to a high place in their respect.

This last advantage is one that has resulted, in a great degree, from the principles which have guided our intercourse with foreign powers, since we have assumed an equal station among them: and hence, the annual account which the executive renders to the country, of the manner in which that branch of his duties has been fulfilled, proves instructive and salutary.

The pacific and wise policy of our government kept us in a state of neutrality during the wars that have, at different periods since our political existence, been carried on by other powers: but this policy, while it gave activity and extent to our commerce, exposed it in the same proportion to injuries from the belligerent nations. Hence have arisen claims of indemnity for those injuries. England, France, Spain, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, Naples, and lately Portugal, had all, in a greater or less degree, infringed our neutral rights. Demands for reparation were made upon all. They have had in all, and continue to have in some cases, a leading influence on the nature of our relations with the powers on whom they were made.

Of the claims upon England it is unnecessary to speak, further than to say, that the state of things to which their prosecution and denial gave rise has been succeeded by arrangements, productive of mutual good feeling and amicable relations between the two countries, which it is hoped will not be interrupted. One of these arrangements is that relating to the colonial trade, which was communicated to congress at the last session; and although the short period during which it has been in force will not enable me to form an accurate judgment of its operation, there is every reason to believe that it will prove highly beneficial. The trade thereby authorized has employed, to the 30th September last, upwards of 30,000 tons of American, and 15,000 tons of foreign shipping in the outward voyages; and, in the inward, nearly an equal amount of American, and 20,000 only of foreign tonnage. Advantages too, have resulted to our agricultural interests from the state of the trade between Canada and our territories and states bordering on the St. Lawrence and the lakes, which may prove more than equivalent to the loss sustained by the discrimination made to favor the trade of the northern colonies with the West Indies.

After our transition from the state of colonies to that of an independent nation, many points were found necessary to be settled between us and Great Britain. Among them was the demarcation of boundaries, not described with sufficient precision in the treaty of peace. Some of the lines that divide the states and territories of the United States, from the British provinces, have been definitively fixed. That, however, which separates us from the provinces of Canada and New Brunswick to the north and the east, was still in dispute when I came into office. But I found arrangements made for its settlement, over which I had no control. The commissioners who had been appointed under the provisions of the treaty of Ghent, having been unable to agree, a convention was made with Great Britain by my immediate predecessor in office, with the advice and consent of the senate, by which it was agreed that the points of difference which have arisen in the settlement of the boundary line between the American and British dominions, as described in the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, shall be referred as therein provided, to some friendly sovereign or state, who shall be invited to investigate, and make a decision upon such points of difference; and the king of the Netherlands having, by the late prosident and his Britannic majesty, been designated as such friendly sovereign, it became my duty to carry, with good faith, the agreement so made into full effect. To this end I caused all the measures to be taken which were necessary to a full exposition of our case to the sovereign arbiter; and nominated as minister plenipotentiary to his court, a distinguished citizen of the state most interested in the question, and who had been one of the agents previously employed for settling the controversy. On the 10th day of January last, his majesty the king of the Netherlands delivered to the plenipotentiaries of the United States, and of Great Britain, his written opinion on the case referred to him. The papers in relation to the subject will be communicated, by a special message, to the proper branch of the government, with the perfect confidence that its wisdom will adopt such measures as will secure an amicable settlement of the controversy, without infringing any constitutional right of the states immediately interested.

It affords me satisfaction to inform you that suggestions, made by my direction to the charge d'affairs of his Britannic majesty, to this government, have had their desired effect in producing the release of certain American citizens who were imprisoned for setting up the authority of the state of Maine, at a place in the disputed territory under the actual jurisdiction of his Britannic majesty. From this, and the assurances I have received of the desire of the local authorities to avoid any cause of collision, I have the best hopes that a good understanding will be kept up until it is confirmed by the final disposition of the subject.

The amicable relations which now subsist between the United States and Great Britain, the increasing intercourse between their citizens, and the rapid obliteration of unfriendly prejudices to which former events naturally gave rise—concur to present this as a fit period for renewing our endeavors to provide against the recurrence of causes of irritation, which, in the event of war between Great Britain and any other power, would inevitably endanger our peace. Animated by the sincerest desire to avoid such a state of things, and peacefully to secure, under all possible circumstances, the rights and honor of the country, I have given such instructions to the minister lately sent to the court of London, as will evince that desire; and if met by a correspondent disposition, which we cannot doubt, will put an end to causes of collision, which, without advantage to either, tend to estrange from each other two nations who have every motive to preserve, not only peace, but an intercourse of the most amicable nature.

In my message at the opening of the last session of congress, I expressed a confident hope that the justice of our claims upon France, urged as they were with perseverance and signal ability by our minister there, would finally be acknowledged. This hope has been realized. A treaty has been agreed, which will immediately be laid before the senate, for its approbation; and which, containing stipulations that require legislative acts, must have the concurrence of both houses before it can be carried into effect. If it, the French government engage to pay a sum which, if not quite equal to that which may be found due to our citizens, will yet, it is believed, under all circumstances, be deemed satisfactory by those interested. The offer of a gross sum, instead of the satisfaction of each individual claim, was accepted, because the only alternatives were a rigorous exaction of the whole amount stated to be due on each claim, which might, in some instances, be exaggerated by design, in others over-rated through error, and which, therefore, it would have been both ungracious and unjust to have insisted on, or a settlement by a mixed commission, to which the French negotiators were very averse, and which experience in other cases had shown to be dilatory, and often wholly inadequate to the end. A comparatively small sum is stipulated on our part, to go to the extinction of all claims by French citizens on our government; and a reduction of duties on our cotton and their wines has been agreed on, as a consideration for the remission of an important claim for commercial privileges under the construction they gave to the treaty for the cession of Louisiana.

Should this treaty receive the proper sanction, a source of irritation will be stopped, that has, for so many years, in some degree alienated from each other two nations, who, from interest as well as the remembrance of early associations, ought to cherish the most friendly relations—an encouragement will be given for perseverance in the demands of justice, by this new proof, that, if steadily pursued, they will be listened to—and admonition will be offered to those powers, if any, which may be inclined to evade them, that they will never be abandoned. Above all, a just confidence will be inspired in our fellow citizens, that their government will exert all the powers with which they have invested it, in support of their just claims upon foreign nations; at the same time that the frank acknowledgment and provision for the payment of those which are addressed to our equity, although unsupported by legal proof, affords a practical illustration of our submission to the divine rule of doing to others what we desire they should do unto us.

Sweden and Denmark having made compensation for the irregularities committed by their vessels, or in their ports, to the perfect satisfaction of the parties concerned, and having renewed the treaties of commerce entered into with them, our political and commercial relations with those powers continue to be on the most friendly footing.

With Spain, our differences up to the 22d of February, 1819, were settled by the treaty of Washington of that date; but, at a subsequent period, our commerce with the states, formerly colonies of Spain, on the continent of America, was annoyed and frequently interrupted by her public and private armed ships. They captured many of our vessels prosecuting a lawful commerce, and sold them and their cargoes; and at one time, to our demands for restoration and indemnity, opposed the allegation, that they were taken in the violation of a blockade of all the ports of those states. This blockade was declaratory only, and the inadequacy of the force to maintain it, was so manifest, that this allegation was varied to a charge of trade in contraband of war. This, in its turn, was also found untenable; and the minister whom I sent with instructions to press for the reparation that was due to our injured fellow citizens, has transmitted an answer to his demand, by which the captures are declared to have been legal, and are justified, because the independence of the states of America never having been acknowledged by Spain, she had a right to prohibit trade with them under her old colonial laws. This ground of defence was contradictory, not only to those which had been formerly alleged, but to the uniform practice and established laws of nations; and had been abandoned by Spain herself in the convention which granted indemnity to British subjects for captures, made at the same time, under the same circumstances, and for the same allegations with those of which we complain.

I however indulge the hope that further reflection will lead to other views, and feel confident that when his catholic majesty shall be convinced of the justice of the claim, his desire to preserve friendly relations between the two countries, which it is my earnest endeavor to maintain, will induce him to accede to our demand. I have therefore despatched a special messenger with instructions to our minister to bring the case once more to his consideration; to the end that if, which I cannot bring myself to believe, the same decision, that cannot but be deemed an unfriendly denial of justice, should be persisted in, the matter may, before your adjournment, be laid before you, the constitutional judges of what is proper to be done when negotiation for redress of injury fails.

The conclusion of a treaty for indemnity with France seemed to present a favorable opportunity to renew our claims of a similar nature on other powers, and particularly in the case of those upon Naples, more especially as in the course of former negotiations with that power, our failure to induce France to render us justice was used as an argument against us. The desires of the merchants who were the principal sufferers have therefore been acceded to, and a mission has been instituted for the special purpose of obtaining for them a reparation already too long delayed. This measure having been resolved on, it was put in execution without waiting for the meeting of congress, because the state of Europe created an apprehension of events that might have rendered our application ineffectual.

Our demands upon the government of the Two Sicilies are of a peculiar nature: The injuries on which they are founded are not denied, nor are the atrocity and perfidy under which those injuries were perpetrated attempted to be extenuated. The sole ground on which indemnity has been refused is the alleged illegality of the tenure by which the monarch who made the seizures held his crown. This defence, always unfounded in any principle of the law of nations—now universally abandoned, even by those powers upon whom the responsibility for acts of past rulers bore the most heavily, will unquestionably be given up by his Sicilian majesty; whose counsels will receive an impulse from that high sense of honor and regard to justice which are said to characterize him; and I feel the fullest confidence that the talents of the citizen commissioned for that purpose will place before him the just claims of our injured citizens in such a light as will enable me, before your adjournment, to announce that they have been adjusted and secured. Precise instructions, to the effect of bringing the negotiation to a speedy issue, have been given and will be obeyed.

In the late blockade of Terceira, some of the Portuguese fleet captured several of our vessels and committed other excesses, for which reparation was demanded; and I was on the point of despatching an armed force, to prevent any recurrence of a similar violence and protect our citizens in the prosecution of their lawful commerce, when official assurances, on which I relied, made the sailing of the ships unnecessary. Since that period frequent promises have been made that full indemnity shall be given for the injuries inflicted and the losses sustained. In the performance there has been some, perhaps unavoidable delay; but I have the fullest confidence that my earnest desire that this business may at once be closed, which our minister has been instructed strongly to express, will very soon be gratified. I have the better ground for this hope, from the evidence of a friendly disposition which that government has shewn by an actual reduction in the duty on rice, the produce of our southern states, authorising the anticipation that this important article of our export will soon be admitted on the same footing with that produced by the most favored nation.

With the other powers of Europe, we have fortunately had no cause of discussions for the redress of injuries. With the empire of the Russians, our political connexion is of the most friendly, and our commercial, of the most liberal kind. We enjoy the advantages of navigation and trade, given to the most favored nation: but it has not yet suited their policy, or perhaps has not been found convenient from other considerations, to give stability and reciprocity to those privileges, by a commercial treaty. The ill health of the minister last year charged with making a proposition for that arrangement, did not permit him to remain at St. Petersburg, and the attention of that government, during the whole of the period since his departure, having been occupied by the war in which it was engaged, we have been assured that nothing could have been effected by his presence. A minister will soon be nominated, as well to effect this important object, as to keep up the relations of amity and good understanding of which we have received so many assurances and proofs from his imperial majesty and the emperor his predecessor.

The treaty with Austria is opening to us an important trade with the hereditary dominions of the emperor, the value of which has been hitherto little known, and of course not sufficiently appreciated. While our commerce finds an entrance into the south of Germany by means of this treaty, those we have formed with the Hanseatic towns and Prussia, and others now in negotiation, will open that vast country to the enterprising spirit of our merchants, on the north: a country abounding in all the materials for a mutually beneficial commerce, filled with enlightened and industrious inhabitants, holding an important place in the politics of Europe, and to which we owe so many valuable citizens. The ratification of the treaty with the Porte was sent to be exchanged by the gentleman appointed our charge d'affaires to that court. Some difficulties occurred on his arrival; but at the date of his last official despatch, he supposed they had been obviated, and that there was every prospect of the exchange being speedily effected.

This finishes the connected view I have thought it proper to give of our political and commercial relations in Europe. Every effort in my power will be continued to strengthen and extend them by treaties founded on principles of the most perfect reciprocity of interest, neither asking nor conceding any exclusive advantage, but liberating, as far as it lies in my power, the activity and industry of our fellow-citizens from the shackles which foreign restrictions may impose.

To China and the East Indies, our commerce continues in its usual extent and with increased facilities, which the credit and capital of our merchants afford, by substituting bills for payments in specie. A daring outrage having been committed in those seas, by the plunder of one of our merchantmen engaged in the pepper trade, at a port in Sumatra, and the piratical perpetrators belonging to tribes in such a state of society, that the usual course of proceedings between civilized nations could not be pursued, I forthwith despatched a frigate with orders to require immediate satisfaction for the injury, and indemnity to the sufferers.

Few changes have taken place in our connexions with the independent states of America since my last communication to congress. The ratification of a commercial treaty with the united republics of Mexico has been for some time under deliberation in their congress, but was still undecided at the date of our last despatches. The unhappy civil commotions that have prevailed there, were undoubtedly the cause of the delay; but as the government is now said to be tranquilized, we may hope soon to receive the ratification of the treaty, and an arrangement for the demarcation of the boundaries between us. In the mean time an important trade has been opened, with mutual benefit, from St. Louis in the state of Missouri, by caravans, to the interior provinces of Mexico. This commerce is protected in its progress through the Indian countries by the troops of the United States, which have been permitted to escort the caravans, beyond our boundaries to the settled part of the Mexican territory.

From Central America I have received assurances of the most friendly kind, and a gratifying application for our good offices to remove a supposed indisposition towards that government in a neighboring state; this application was immediately and successfully complied with. They gave us also the pleasing intelligence that differences which had prevailed in their internal affairs had been peaceably adjusted. Our treaty with the republic continues to be faithfully observed, and promises a great and beneficial commerce between the two countries; a commerce of the greatest importance, if the magnificent project of a ship canal through the dominions of that state, from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, now in serious contemplation, shall be executed.

I have great satisfaction in communicating the success which has attended the exertions of our minister in Columbia to procure a very considerable reduction in the duties on our flour in that republic. Indemnity, also, has been stipulated for injuries received by our merchants from illegal seizures; and renewed assurances are given that the treaty between the two countries shall be faithfully observed.

Chili and Peru seem to be still threatened with civil commotions; and, until they shall be settled, disorders may naturally be apprehended, requiring the constant presence of a naval force in the Pacific ocean, to protect our fisheries and guard our commerce.

The disturbances that took place in the empire of Brazil, previously to, and immediately consequent upon, the abdication of the late emperor, necessarily suspended any effectual application for the redress of some past injuries suffered by our citizens from that government, while they have been the cause of others, in which all foreigners seem to have participated. Instructions have been given to our minister there, to press for indemnity due for losses occasioned by these irregularities; and to take care that our fellow-citizens shall enjoy all the privileges stipulated in their favor, by the treaty lately made between the two powers, all which, the good intelligence that prevails between our minister at Rio Janeiro and the regency, gives us the best reason to expect.

I should have placed Buenos Ayres in the list of south American powers in respect to which nothing of importance affecting us was to be communicated, but for occurrences which have lately taken place at the Falkland Islands, in which the name of that republic has been used to cover with a show of authority, acts injurious to our commerce, and to the property and liberty of our fellow citizens. In the course of the present year, one of our vessels engaged in the pursuit of a trade which we have always enjoyed, without molestation, has been captured by a band acting, as they pretend, under the authority of the government of Buenos Ayres. I have therefore given orders for the despatch of an armed vessel, to join our squadron in those seas, and aid in affording all lawful protection to our trade which shall be necessary; and shall without delay send a minister to inquire into the nature of the circumstances, and also of the claim, if any, that is set up by that government, to those islands. In the mean time I submit the case to the consideration of congress, to the end that they may clothe the executive with such authority and means as they may deem necessary for providing a force adequate to the complete protection of our fellow-citizens fishing and trading in those seas.

This rapid sketch of our foreign relations, it is hoped, fellow citizens, may be of some use in so much of your legislation as may bear on that important subject; while it affords to the country at large a source of high gratification in the contemplation of our political and commercial connexion with the rest of the world. At peace with all—having subjects of future difference with few, and those susceptible of easy adjustment—extending our commerce gradually on all sides, and on none by any but the most liberal and mutually beneficial means—we may, by the blessing of Providence, hope for all that national prosperity which can be derived from an intercourse with foreign nations, guided by those eternal principles of justice and reciprocal good will, which are binding as well upon states, as the individuals of whom they are composed.

I have great satisfaction in making this statement of our affairs, because the course of our national policy enables me to do it without any indirect exposure of what in other governments is usually concealed from the people. Having none but a straight-forward open course to pursue—guided by a single principle that will bear the strongest light—we have happily no political combinations to form, no alliances to entangle us, no complicated interests to consult; and in subjecting all we have done to the consideration of our citizens, and to the inspection of the world, we give no advantage to other nations, and lay ourselves open to no injury.

It may not be improper to add that, to preserve this state of things, and give confidence to the world in the integrity of our designs, all our consular and diplomatic agents are strictly enjoined to examine well every cause of complaint preferred by our citizens; and, while they urge with proper earnestness those that are well founded, to countenance none that are unreasonable or unjust, and to enjoin on our merchants and navigators the strictest obedience to the laws of the countries to which they resort, and a course of conduct in their dealings that may support the character of our nation, and render us respected abroad.

Connected with this subject, I must recommend a revival of our consular laws. Defects and omissions have been discovered in their operation, that ought to be remedied and supplied. For your further information on this subject, I have directed a report to be made by the secretary of state, which I shall hereafter submit to your consideration.

The internal peace and security of our confederated states, is the next principal object of the general government. Time and experience have proved that the abode of the native Indian within their limits is dangerous to their peace, and injurious to themselves. In accordance with my recommendation at a former session of congress, an appropriation of half a million of dollars was made to aid the voluntary removal of the various tribes beyond the limits of the states. At the last session I had the happiness to announce that the Chickasaws and Choctaws had accepted the generous offer of the government, and agreed to remove beyond the Mississippi river, by which the whole of the state of Mississippi and the western part of Alabama will be freed from Indian occupancy, and opened to a civilized population. The treaties with these tribes are in a course of execution, and their removal, it is hoped, will be completed in the course of 1832.

At the request of the authorities of Georgia, the registration of Cherokee Indians for emigration has been resumed, and it is confidently expected that one half, if not two thirds of that tribe, will follow the wise example of their more westerly brethren. Those who prefer remaining at their homes will hereafter be governed by the laws of Georgia, as all her citizens are, and cease to be the objects of peculiar care on the part of the general government.

During the present year, the attention of the government has been particularly directed to those tribes in the powerful and growing state of Ohio, where considerable tracts of the finest lands were still occupied by the aboriginal proprietors. Treaties, either absolute or conditional, have been made, extinguishing the whole Indian title to the reservations in that state; and the time is not distant, it is hoped, when Ohio will be no longer embarrassed with the Indian population. The same measure will be extended to Indiana, as soon as there is reason to anticipate success.

It is confidently believed, that perseverance for a few years in the present policy of the government, will extinguish the Indian title to all lands lying within the states composing our federal union, and remove beyond their limits every Indian who is not willing to submit to their laws. Thus will all conflicting claims to jurisdiction between the states and the Indian tribes be put to rest. It is pleasing to reflect, that results so beneficial, not only to the states immediately concerned, but to the harmony of the union, will have been accomplished, by measures equally advantageous to the Indians. What the native savages become when surrounded by a dense population, and by mixing with the whites, may be seen in the miserable remnants of a few eastern tribes, deprived of political and civil rights, forbidden to make contracts, and subjected to guardians, dragging out a wretched existence, without excitement, without hope, and almost without thought.

But the removal of the Indians beyond the limits and jurisdiction of the states, does not place them beyond the reach of philanthropic aid and Christian instruction. On the contrary, those whom philanthropy or religion may induce to live among them in their new abode, will be more free in the exercise of their benevolent functions, than if they had remained within the limits of the states, embarrassed by their internal regulations. Now, subject to no control but the superintending agency of the general government, exercised with the sole view of preserving peace, they may proceed unmolested in the interesting experiment of gradually advancing a community of American Indians from barbarism to the habits and enjoyments of civilized life.

Among the happiest effects of the improved relations of our republic, has been an increase of trade, producing a corresponding increase of revenue, beyond the most sanguine anticipations of the treasury department.

The state of the public finances will be fully shewn by the secretary of the treasury, in the report which he will presently lay before you. I will here, however, congratulate you upon their prosperous condition. The revenue received in the present year will not fall short of twenty-seven millions, seven hundred thousand dollars; and the expenditures for all objects, other than the public debt, will not exceed fourteen millions, seven hundred thousand. The payment on account of the principal and interest of the debt, during the year, will exceed sixteen millions and a half of dollars: a greater sum than has been applied to that object, out of the revenue, in any year since the enlargement of the sinking fund, except the two years following immediately thereafter. The amount which will have been applied to the public debt from the 4th of March, 1829, to the first of January next, which is less than three years since the administration has been placed in my hands, will exceed forty millions of dollars.

From the large importations of the present year, it may be safely estimated that the revenue which will be received into the treasury from that source during the next year, with the aid of that received from the public lands, will considerably exceed the amount of the receipts of the present year; and it is believed that with the means which the government will have at its disposal, from various sources, which will be fully stated by the proper department, the whole of the public debt may be extinguished, either by redemption or purchase, within the four years of my administration. We shall then exhibit the rare example of a great nation, abounding in all the means of happiness and security, altogether free from debt.

The confidence with which the extinguishment of the public debt may be anticipated, presents an opportunity for carrying into effect more fully the policy in relation to import duties, which has been recommended in my former messages. A modification of the tariff, which shall produce a reduction of our revenue to the wants of the government, and an adjustment of the duties on imports with a view to equal justice in relation to all our national interests, and to the counteraction of foreign policy, so far as it may be injurious to those interests, is deemed to be one of the principal objects which demand the consideration of the present congress. Justice to the interests of the merchant as well as the manufacturer, requires, that material reductions in the import duties be prospective; and unless the present congress shall dispose of the subject, the proposed reductions cannot properly be made to take effect at the period when the necessity for the revenue, arising from present rates, shall cease. It is, therefore, desirable, that arrangements be adopted at your present session, to relieve the people from unnecessary taxation, after the extinguishment of the public debt. In the exercise of that spirit of concession and conciliation which has distinguished the friends of our union in all great emergencies, it is believed that this object may be effected without injury to any national interest.

In my annual message of December, 1829, I had the honor to recommend the adoption of a more liberal policy, than that which then prevailed towards unfortunate debtors to the government; and I deem it my duty again to invite your attention to this subject.

Actuated by similar views, congress, at their last session, passed an act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States; but the provisions of that law have not been deemed such as were adequate to that relief to this unfortunate class of our fellow citizens, which may be safely extended to them. The points in which the law appears to be defective will be particularly communicated by the secretary of the treasury; and I take pleasure in recommending such an extension of its provisions as will unfetter the enterprise of a valuable portion of our citizens, and restore to them the means of usefulness to themselves and the community. While deliberating upon this subject, I would also recommend to your consideration the propriety of so modifying the laws for enforcing the payment of debts, due either to the public, or to individuals suing in the courts of the United States, as to restrict the imprisonment of the person to cases of fraudulent concealment of property. The personal liberty of the citizen seems too sacred to be held, as in many cases it now is, at the will of a creditor to whom he is willing to surrender all the means he has of discharging his debt.

The reports from the secretaries of the war and navy departments, and from the postmaster general, which accompany this message, present satisfactory views of the operations of the departments respectively under their charges, and suggest improvements which are worthy of, and to which I invite the serious attention of congress. Certain defects and omissions having been discovered in the operation of the laws respecting patents, they are pointed out in the accompanying report from the secretary of state.

I have heretofore recommended amendments of the Federal constitution, giving the election of president and vice president to the people, and limiting the service of the former to a single term. So important do I consider these changes in our fundamental law, that I cannot, in accordance with my sense of duty, omit to press them upon the consideration of a new congress. For my views more at large, as well in relation to these points as to the disqualification of members of congress to receive an office from a president in whose election they have had an official agency, which I proposed as a substitute, I refer you to my former messages.

Our system of public accounts is extremely complicated, and, it is believed, may be much improved. Much of the present machinery, and a considerable portion of the expenditure of public money, may be dispensed with, while greater facilities can be afforded to the liquidation of claims upon the government, and an examination into their justice and legality, quite as efficient as the present, secured. With a view to a general reform in the system, I recommend the subject to the attention of congress.

I deem it my duty again to call your attention to the condition of the District of Columbia. It was doubtless wise in the framers of our constitution, to place the people of this district under the jurisdiction of the general government; but, to accomplish the objects they had in view, it is not necessary that this people should be deprived of all the privileges of self-government. Independently of the difficulty of inducing the representatives of distant states to turn their attention to projects of laws, which are not of the highest interest to their constituents, they are not individually, nor in congress collectively, well qualified to legislate over the local concerns of this district. Consequently, its interests are much neglected, and the people are almost strait to present their grievances, least a body, in which they are not represented, and which feels little sympathy in their local relations, should, in its attempt to make laws for them, do more harm than good. Governed by the laws of the states whence they were severed, the two shores of the Potomac within the ten miles square, have different penal codes: not the present codes of Virginia and Maryland, but such as existed in those states, at the time of the cession to the United States. As congress will not form a new code, and as the people of the district cannot make one for themselves, they are virtually under two governments. Is it not just to allow them at least a delegate in congress, if not a local legislature, to make laws for the district, subject to the approval or rejection of congress? I earnestly recommend the extension to them of every political right which their interests require, and which may be compatible with the constitution.

The extension of the judiciary system of the United States is deemed to be one of the duties of government. One fourth of the states in the union do not participate in the benefits of a circuit court. To the states of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, admitted into the union since the present judicial system was organized, only a district court has been allowed. If this be sufficient, then the circuit courts, already existing in eighteen states, ought to be abolished; if it be not sufficient, the defect ought to be remedied, and these states placed on the same footing with the other members of the union. It was on this condition, and on this footing, that they entered the union; and they may demand circuit courts as a matter, not of concession, but of right. I trust that congress will not adjourn, leaving this anomaly in our system.

Entertaining the opinions heretofore expressed in relation to the bank of the United States, as at present organized, I felt it my duty, in my former messages, frankly to disclose them, in order that the attention of the legislature and the people should be seasonably directed to that important subject, and that it might be considered and finally disposed of in a manner best calculated to promote the ends of the constitution, and subserve the public interests. Having thus conscientiously discharged a constitutional duty, I deem it proper, on this occasion, without a more particular reference to the views of the subject then expressed, to leave it for the present to the investigation of an enlightened people and their representatives.

In conclusion, permit me to invoke that Power which superintends all governments, to infuse into your deliberations, at this important crisis of our history, a spirit of mutual forbearance and conciliation. In that spirit was our union formed, and in that spirit must it be preserved.

ANDREW JACKSON.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 15—VOL. V. BALTIMORE, DEC. 17, 1831.

[VOL. XLI. WHOLE NO. 1,050]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ The matter of the present sheet is not various—but no less valuable on that account. Many pages must now be given up to official papers, and the journal of the proceedings of congress. The state legislatures, also in session, present many things that would be gladly laid before my readers. I shall, as before observed, make strong efforts to keep pace with events. The rapidly increasing support of the REGISTER invites them—and encourages a desire to cheapen its price as ability is afforded; and yet further extend its circulation. A feeling, perhaps, nearly as strong as a regard for personal profit, leading me to wish the latter—but without any lurking disposition to interfere with the business or pursuits of other publishers.

By an arrangement made, and at extra cost and labor, the very able report of the committee of the New York convention on the manufacture of iron, is published and distributed herewith, as an "Addendum" to the current volume of the REGISTER. A calm and careful examination of the facts it sets forth, is warmly recommended to all. The friends of domestic industry will find encouragement in them, and the advocates of what is called "free trade" much matter for reflection. The examinations of a certain report, is severe—but such errors, (if they may be called by so mild a term), richly merited the ample exposure which they have met with.

From the distant location of the secretary of the committee on iron, and the almost impossibility that errors should not be made in preparing such manuscript statements for the press—a few mistakes were committed by us, and certain corrections have also been made by the author or compiler of the report. None of them are very material—but have been corrected for a part of our impression, and will be so for the numerous copies that are about to be distributed in pamphlet form, by order of the permanent committee.

☞ The annual treasury report has caused much speculation and remark. The "Globe," of the 9th, has thought it necessary to vindicate, or rather excuse, the wide range of the secretary, as supposed to interfere with many things that do not belong to his department at all—and the "Telegraph" comments very freely on such interference. The "Globe" also dissents from the opinions of the secretary as to the bank of the United States, and they seem to have given the venerable editor of the "Richmond Enquirer" the horrors—but the strangely moderated tone of the president's message in respect to that institution, ought to have prepared him for something. There are reports of dissensions, on various points, and matters of great interest, and to cause much "excitement," we think, may soon be expected from Washington, and elsewhere.

The treasury report has produced a "sensation." It is given entire in the present sheet, together with that of the secretary of the navy, which fitted the business of the week better than that of the secretary of war, being shorter.

The National Intelligencer, speaking of Mr. McLane's report, says—

Perhaps there never was a communication from the executive, or any one of the executive officers of this government, that has produced such a sensation as the annual report of the secretary of the treasury to congress, which we laid before our readers on Thursday last. It would be hazardous to assert which of the nine parties, into which it has been whimsically said that congress is divided, was most astounded by it. For ourselves, we have not been able to draw a long breath since we read it; and cannot pretend to say what we think of it until we have recovered a little from the shock of surprise which it gave us."

VOL. XLI.—No. 20.

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONVENTION. As we cannot, in the present sheet, give such an account of the proceedings of the "National Republican Convention," (which met in this city on Monday last), as is due to the character of that assembly and a record of its proceedings, we shall just now only present some of the leading occurrences, intending, as on other like occasions, to preserve the details in our next number, with a list of the members, committees, &c. &c.

The very unusual inclemency of the weather preventing the prompt arrival of many of the delegates, though they had seemingly allowed themselves time enough to be present at the opening of the convention—about 130, however, appeared at 12 o'clock, on Monday, at the Athenaeum, where gen. Abner Lucock, of Pennsylvania, was called to the chair, for the time being, and Mr. Thomas P. Ray, of Virginia, appointed secretary.

After attending to some preparatory business, and adopting a plan for the organization of the convention, an adjournment took place until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Tuesday. The chairman took his seat, and the roll of members was called—and 155 delegates answered to their names, from seventeen states—the delegates from Tennessee not yet having arrived.

The committee on the organization of the convention having reported—

James Harbour, of Virginia, was appointed president; Allen Trimble, of Ohio, Joseph Kent, of Maryland, Peter B. Porter, of New York, and Robert Temple, of Vermont, vice presidents; and Joseph L. Tillinghast, of Rhode Island, and Henry Bacon, of Ohio, secretaries.

Mr. Harbour, on taking his seat, delivered a brief, but spirited address.

After other proceedings, which shall be fully detailed, Mr. Peter R. Livingston, of New York, having made some remarks with great eloquence and power, named HENRY CLAY, of Kentucky, as a candidate for the presidency of the United States; which was received with loud and repeated plaudits.

The roll was then called, and each member rose in his place, and pronounced his distinct approbation of the nomination—there were 155 votes, every one for Mr. Clay. The result was received with repeated cheers, from a great crowd of spectators.

A committee was now appointed to prepare an address to the people of the United States, viz: Messrs. A. H. Everett, of Massachusetts, Steward, of Virginia, Dodd, of New Jersey, Howk, of Indiana, Johns, of Delaware, Cummings, of Maine, and Wilton, of New Hampshire.

A committee of one from each state was named to notify Mr. Clay of his nomination. [These appointed a sub-committee, who proceeded immediately to Washington.]

The convention then adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Wednesday. Prayers being offered by the rev. Dr. Wyatt—the president took his seat, and several distinguished gentlemen were invited to take seats within the chamber of the convention. Several new members appeared and gave in their names.

The committee to notify Mr. Clay of his nomination, presented the following letter from him:

Washington, 13th Dec. 1831.

Gentlemen—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which, as a committee of the convention of national republican delegates now assembled in Baltimore, you addressed to me, stating that I had been this day unanimously nominated by the convention as a candidate for the office of president of the United States.

This manifestation of the confidence of a body so distinguished, is received, gentlemen, with lively sensibility and profound gratitude. Although I should have been glad if the convention had designated some citizen of the United States more competent than myself to be the instrument of accomplishing the patriotic objects which they have in view, I do not feel at liberty to decline their nomination. With my respectful and cordial acknowledgments, you will be pleased to communicate to the convention my acceptance of their nomination, with the assurance that, whatever may be the event of it, our common country shall ever find me faithful to the union, and the constitution, to the principles of public liberty, and to those great measures of national policy which have made us a people, prosperous, respectful, and powerful.

Accept, gentlemen, of my thanks for the friendly manner in which you have conveyed the act and sentiments of the convention. I am, with high respect, your obedient servant,
H. CLAY.

Messrs. Peter R. Livingston, &c. &c.

MR. JOHN SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania, was then named for vice president, by Mr. McNairy, of Tennessee; and, as on the nomination of president, each member rose and expressed his approbation, which was accepted unanimously. A committee was appointed to inform Mr. S. of his nomination.

Among other proceedings, it was resolved, that the convention would, to-morrow, at 4 o'clock pay their respects to CHARLES CARROLL, of Carrollton, if agreeable to him. And a committee was appointed to wait upon him.

Adjourned until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Thursday. The convention was opened after an eloquent prayer by the rev. Mr. Nevins. The delegates who had arrived in the preceding evening, were called upon, and recorded their votes in favor of the nominations of Messrs. Clay and Sergeant.

Among other business, Mr. Morrow, of Ohio, reported that Charles Carroll would be pleased to receive the members of the convention at 4 o'clock this day.

Mr. Lacock reported that the committee had waited upon Mr. Sergeant, who accepted the nomination in the following reply to their note.

Baltimore, December 14, 1831.

Gentlemen—I have received your note of this date, informing me that the national republican convention, now sitting in this city, have unanimously nominated me as a candidate for the office of vice president of the United States.

The nomination by a body so enlightened and patriotic, for one of the highest trusts of the republic, is felt to be a very great honor, and is appreciated accordingly. It is the more gratifying, as it associates me in their estimation and support with that distinguished citizen, whose public life and character, marked by, undeviating devotion to the best interests of our country, and a spirit as generous as it is elevated, are a sure pledge that an administration under his guidance would be comprehensive and national, aiming unceasingly to preserve the union, to maintain the supremacy of the constitution and laws, to keep unbroken the public faith and honor, and to regard, with becoming indulgence and respect, the honest differences of opinion among our fellow citizens, which our republican institutions permit and invite. To co-operate with him, to the extent of whatever means I possess, in thus promoting the welfare and happiness of the nation, and securing the freedom of opinion and conduct from unconstitutional oppression, would be no less my pleasure than my duty.

Be pleased, gentlemen, to make known to the convention my acceptance of their nomination, and with it, to express to them the unaffected sensibility with which I have received this distinguished proof of their confidence.

I beg you to accept my thanks for the kind and flattering terms of your communication and to be assured of the high respect of, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,
JOHN SERGEANT.

To Messrs. Abner Lacock, Jeremiah Morrow, William L. Stone, Robert Stanard, Walter Jones, committee, &c.

A vote of thanks was passed to the National Republican Committee at Baltimore, and to the committee of arrangement, for the accommodation and courtesies extended to the convention and its members.

At 4 o'clock, the convention formed a procession to pay their respects to Mr. Carroll, and then adjourned till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Friday. The convention was opened this morning with prayer by the rev. Mr. Finley, of the Baptist church. The proceedings of yesterday having been read, Mr. Everett, of Massachusetts, from the committee assigned to that duty, reported an address to the people of the United States, which was unanimously adopted, and ordered to be published, &c.

The convention, after some other business, adjourned sine die.

The members of the convention, in attendance, were from Maine 5, New Hampshire 5, Vermont 6, Massachusetts 9, Connecticut 5, Rhode Island 4, New York 16, New Jersey 7, Pennsylvania 23, Delaware 5, Maryland 10, Virginia 25, Ohio 18, Kentucky 14, North Carolina 3, Indiana 2, Louisiana 2, Tennessee 1, District of Columbia 5.

YALE COLLEGE. The catalogue of this flourishing institution is just published, from which it appears that the whole number of under-graduates is 331, viz. seniors 33, juniors 102, sophomores 86, freshmen 90.—Number of resident graduates 4, medical students 45, law students 44, theological do. 42. Grand total 469.

ITEMS.

A New York paper says—foreign wool is now shipping from this port to England, the prices there being better than can be procured here, under the present rate of duty.

Some degree of "reticence" by the president, from the ground previously taken concerning the bank, was anticipated in several of the newspapers.

The reception of the message at Philadelphia and New York, advanced the stock of the bank from 128½ to 129 and 129½.

Gov. Wolf's message to the legislature of Pennsylvania does not admit any thing "judicious" in a tariff that is not efficient.

Though so often warned, people will kill themselves, without intending it, by the use of charcoal, in sleeping rooms.

Many persons were named in the legislature of Pennsylvania, as the successor of Mr. Bernard in the senate of the United States—who had resigned: but Mr. Geo. M. Dallas was chosen. We have not yet seen the vote.

Messrs. Webster and Frichinghuysen were detained from their seats in the senate by severe attacks of the influenza, which is very generally prevailing. The former took his place on Thursday last.

Walter Bowne, the present mayor of New York, has been unanimously re-elected by the joint ballots of the councils of that city.

At Baltimore, notwithstanding the early and very unexpected close of our water communications, the price of oak wood is only $6 a cord—being kept in check by supplies brought on the rail road; the coal companies, however, have unwisely advanced the price of their stock of fuel. In Philadelphia, oak wood was selling at 15 dollars the cord, notwithstanding her vast supplies of coal; and at New York, Boston, &c. the price of wood had advanced to about three times its usual cost. Wood at New York 12 dollars, at Boston 9—coal in proportion.

A bill has been introduced into the legislature of N. Carolina, to raise a fund for the removal of free persons of color to Liberia, (proposing to lay a tax of ten cents for that purpose on every black poll in the state.)

The court house of Somerset county, Maryland, at Princess Ann, was recently destroyed by fire—the books and papers all saved. The house had stood 87 years. Some of the other buildings in the village took fire, but were not materially injured.

The two Jackson parties in Pennsylvania have been at issue—the one, supported by the present "official organ" of the state, the Philadelphia Inquirer, had fired the 8th of January, to hold a convention to nominate a president, &c.—the other preferred the 4th of March, (adopting the 5th, because the 4th was Sunday), and has succeeded. The latter is Wolf—the former Anti-Wolf.

In consequence of the late gales and excessively severe weather, there have been many shipwrecks and an unusual amount of suffering on our coast. The details of some of them are terrible.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

December 12. The Vice President of the U. S. attended this day and took the chair of the senate.

Messrs. Bibb, Buckner, Brown, Tazewell and For-ayth, appeared this day—Mr. Buckner, senator elect from Missouri, and Mr. Forayth, re-elected from Georgia, had their credentials presented, and were sworn in.

Several petitions were presented, amongst which were several from the merchants of the Atlantic cities praying a further reduction of the duties on teas after the 31st. December, 1831.

The following motion submitted by Mr. Hanna, on Thursday last, was then considered and agreed to.

Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation to extinguish the Indian title in Indiana.

Mr. Hayne, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving the act which provided for the publication of the decisions of the Supreme court.

On motion of Mr. Chambers, it was ordered that the several officers of the senate who are now officiating, shall continue to act in their respective stations until Monday next.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate went for a short time into executive business, and then adjourned.

December 13. Various petitions and memorials were presented.

Mr. Grundy moved a resolution to inquire into the propriety of purchasing a law library for the use of the supreme court.

Mr. Moore, moved a resolution requiring the committee of public lands to inquire as to the expediency of discontinuing the sale of public lands by the auction system, and to authorize the sales to be made in lots of 40 acres.

The resolution offered by Mr. Hayne, yesterday on the expediency of reviving the act providing for the publication of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, was taken up and agreed to.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Marcy, directing the secretary to purchase copies of Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates, for such members of the senate as have not been heretofore supplied, was taken up; and being amended by the mover, so as to include copies of the debates on the adoption of the constitution, published by J. Elliot, was agreed to.

Pursuant to notice, Mr. Paindexter asked leave to bring in a bill "authorising appeals and writs of error to the supreme court, in certain cases," which was twice read, and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

December 14. Mr. Smith gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill touching the re-organization of the ordinance department.

Several private memorials were presented—as also, a joint resolution of the legislature of Indiana with respect to a grant of a portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of public roads.

Mr. Ewing presented the memorial of the legislature of the state of Ohio, praying the establishment of a dividing line between that state and the territory of Michigan—which, on motion of Mr. Ewing, was referred to a select committee—which being elected by ballot, consists of Messrs. Ewing, Wilkins, Naudam, Hendricks and Grundy.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. Grundy, Moore and King respectively, were severally taken up and agreed to.

A message from the president transmitting all the information in the possession of the executive relative to the capture, abduction and imprisonment of American citizens, by the authorities of the province of New Brunswick, were then read.

The vice president communicated from the secretary of the treasury copies of the receipts and expenditures of the U. States for 1830.

The communication from the president touching the assistance afforded our fellow citizens by the crew of the Spanish brig Leon, was, on motion of Mr. King, referred to the committee on commerce.

The senate then adjourned.

December 15. Mr. Webster appeared to-day and took his seat.

The chair communicated the certificate of election of George M. Dallas, elected senator to congress from the state of Pennsylvania, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Isaac D. Barnard.

Many petitions were presented and disposal of—and notices of several intended motions given, which will sufficiently appear hereafter. Mr. Smith introduced a bill for the organization of the ordinance department. After some time spent in executive business, the senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, Dec. 12. The following gentlemen were announced as having been appointed by the chair, since the last sitting of the house, to compose the several standing committees.

Committee of elections. Messrs. Claiborne, Randolph, Holland, Griffin, Bethune, Collier and Arnold.

Committee of ways and means. Messrs. McDuffie, Verplanck, Ingersoll, Gilmore, Alexander, Walde and Gaither.

Committee on expenditures in the navy department. Messrs. Maxwell, Hall, of Tenn. and Harper.

Mr. Adams, of Mass. (the ex-president of the United States), presented fifteen petitions, all numerously subscribed, from sundry inhabitants of Pennsylvania, all of the same purport, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and moved that the first of them should be read; and it was read accordingly.

Mr. Adams then observed that it had doubtless been remarked that these petitions came not from Massachusetts, a portion of whose people he had the honor to represent, but from citizens of the state of Pennsylvania. He had received the petitions many months ago, with a request that they should be presented by him, and, although the petitioners were not of his immediate constituents, he had not deemed himself at liberty to decline presenting their petitions, their transmission of which to him manifested a confidence in him for which he was bound to be grateful. From a letter which had accompanied those petitions, he inferred that they came from members of the society of Friends; a body of men than whom there was no more respectable and worthy class of citizens, none who more strictly made their lives a commentary on their professions—a body of men comprising, in his firm opinion, as much of human virtue, and as little of human infirmity, as any other equal number of men of any denomination upon the face of the globe.

The petitions, Mr. A. continued, asked for two things: the first was, the abolition of slavery; the second, the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia. There was a traffic of slaves carried on in the District, of which he did not know but that it might be a proper subject of legislation by congress, and he, therefore, moved that the petitions he had had the honor of presenting, should be referred to the committee on the affairs of the District of Columbia, who would dispose of them as they, upon examination of their purport, should deem proper, and might report on the expediency of granting so much of the prayer of the petitioners as referred to the abolition of the slave trade in the district.

As to the other prayer of the petitions, the abolition by congress of slavery in the District of Columbia, it had occurred to him that the petitions might have been committed to his charge under an expectation that it would receive his countenance and support. He deemed it, therefore, his duty to declare, that it would not. Whatever might be his opinion of slavery in the abstract, or of slavery in the District of Columbia, it was a subject which he hoped would not be discussed in that house; if it should be, he might perhaps assign the reasons why he could give it no countenance or support. At present he would only say to the house, and to the worthy citizens who had committed their petitions to his charge, that the most salutary medicines uniformly administered, were the most deadly of poisons. He concluded by moving to refer the petitions to the committee on the District of Columbia.

A great number of petitions were presented.

Mr. Mercer moved the following resolution, which was read and laid upon the table, viz:

Resolved, That there shall be appointed, for the present session, and hereafter, at the commencement of each session of congress, a committee of seven members of this house, to be styled "a committee on roads and canals," whose duty it shall be to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things, relating to roads and canals, and the improvements of the navigation of rivers, as shall be presented, or may come in question, and be referred to them by the house; and to report thereupon; together with such propositions relative thereto, as to them shall seem expedient.

On motion of Mr. McCarty, it was Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to hold a treaty to extinguish the Indian title to lands within the state of Indiana.

On motion of Mr. Duncan, it was
Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the price of public lands, and of giving a preference to the actual settler.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorising the sale of public lands in lots of forty acres, or in quarter-quarter sections.

On motion of Mr. E. Everett, it was Resolved, That a committee of three members of this house be appointed, who, with three members of the senate, to be appointed by that body, shall direct the expenditure of the money appropriated for the library of congress.

On motion of Mr. Polk, it was Resolved, That the message of the president of the United States, with the accompanying documents, of the 7th instant, upon the subject of the fifth census of the United States, be referred to a select committee; and that said committee be instructed to report a bill fixing the ratio of representation in congress under the fifth census of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Hing, it was Resolved, That the committee on the territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of creating a separate territorial government north of the states of Illinois and Missouri, and west of lake Michigan.

Mr. Wickliffe submitted the following resolution, which was read and laid on the table:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury communicate to this house, such information as the department may have collected upon the subject of steamboat navigation, with a view to the adoption of such measures as may be deemed practicable the better to guard and protect passengers from the danger of the bursting of boilers.

The speaker laid before the house the following communication from the secretary of the treasury, which was referred to the committee of ways and means.

Treasury department, 8th Dec. 1831.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, for the information of the house of representatives, an estimate of the appropriations proposed to be made for the service of the year 1832, amounting to

Military service, including fortifications, armories, ordnance, Indian affairs, revolutionary and military pensions, and internal improvement	5,736,470 02
Naval service, including the marine corps	3,407,618 71

To the estimates are added statements showing—

1. The appropriations for the service of the year 1832, made by former acts, including public debt, gradual improvement of the navy, army, and equipping the militia, subscription to canal stocks, revolutionary claims, and Indian affairs, amounting to

11,512,945 00

2. The existing appropriations, which will not be required for the service of the year 1831, and which it is proposed to apply in aid of the service of the year 1832, amounting to

501,102 78

3. The existing appropriations, which will be required to complete the service of 1831, and former years, but which will be expended in 1831, amounting to

These three last mentioned amounts, together with as much as may remain unexpended of the sum stated in the report on the finances, presented by this department on the 7th instant as the estimated expenditure in the fourth quarter of the present year, and with such sums as may be appropriated by congress for the year 1832, will complete the whole amount subject to the disposition of the executive government in that year.

There is also added to the estimates a statement of the several appropriations which will probably be carried to the surplus fund at the close of the present year, either because the objects for which they were made are completed, or because these sums will not be required for, or will no longer be applicable to them, amounting to $215,194 48.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

LOUIS McLANE,
secretary of the treasury.

To the hon. speaker of the house of representatives U. S.

The speaker laid before the house the third auditor's annual list of balances—the annual report of the clerk, containing an account of the contingent expenses of his office—also a letter from E. H. Cummins, accompanied by tables, exhibiting the several phases of the 5th census, and the result to each state, and to the U. States, of any ratio of representation that may be assumed from that of one representative from 48,000 to 55,000 souls.

Mr. Wayne, of Georgia, moved a series of resolutions allotting the various parts of the president's message to the appropriate committees.

The form of the resolution on the subject of the bank of the United States, as first moved by Mr. Wayne referred that part of the president's message relating to it to a select committee.

Mr. McDuffie moved to amend it so as to refer it to the committee of ways and means, which motion, after debate prevailed, and the house referred it to the committee of ways and means.

Tuesday, Dec. 13. The following gentlemen compose the several committees directed to be appointed yesterday by the resolutions of Mr. Wayne.

Ratio of representation under 5th census.—Messrs. Polk, of Tennessee, Holtzcliff, of Maine, Thomson, of Ohio, J. King, of Penn., Thomas, of Louisiana, Barstow, of N. York, Bucher, of Penn.

On internal improvements.—Messrs. Mercer, of Va., Blair, of Tenn., Letcher, of Ky., Vinton, of Ohio, Craig, of Va., Leavitt, of Ohio, McCarty, of Indiana.

On the subject of patents.—Messrs. Taylor, of N. York, Choate, of Mass. Corwin, of Ohio, Potts, of Penn., Wilkin, of N. York, Silas Condit, of N. Jersey, Banks, of Penn.

Imprisonment for debt.—Messrs. Johnson, of Ky., Cooper, of N. J., Kennon, of Ohio, Bouck, of N. Y., Cooke, of Ohio, Dewar, of Penn., Whitlesey, of N. Y. Militia.—Messrs. Barringer, of N. C., Adam King, of Penn., Weeks, of N. H., Pitcher, of N. Y., Dearborn, of Mass., Cahoon, of Vt. Stewart, of Penn.

On memorial of New England asylum for the blind.—Messrs. Everett, of Mass., Kendall, of Mass., Dickson, of N. Y., Everett, of Vt., Briggs, of Mass., Cooke, of N. Y., Heister, of Penn.

On the system of keeping public accounts.—Messrs. Wayne, of Geo., White, of N. Y., Davenport, of Virginia, Greenell, of Mass., Wm. B. Shepard, of N. C., Babcock, of N. Y., Slade, of Vt.

On the subject of president and vice president, &c.—Messrs. McDuffie, of S. C., Root, of N. Y., McCoy, of Va., Adair, of Ky., Hughes, of N. J., Thompson, of Geo., Thomas, of Md.

On the affairs of the library.—Messrs. Everett, of Mass., Verplanck, of N. Y., Wayne, of Geo.

A great number of petitions were presented this day. Amongst others—

Mr. Everett, of Massachusetts, presented a petition praying for the settlement of the Oregon territory under the authority of the United States. Lest his opinions on the matter involved should be mistaken from the fact of his having presented the petition, he considered it a duty to state that he could not urge the granting the prayer of the petition at this time—because it would be impossible to grant it, without violating the stipulations of the treaty on this subject with Great Britain. There was, however, one view of the subject in which it required the consideration of the house. It is stated in the memorial, that flourishing settlements of British subjects existed in the Oregon territory. If this were so, it was in violation of a stipulation agreed to between Great Britain and the United States, that, during the convention, no settlement should be authorised to be made on the debatable lands, by the citizens of either country. This was a matter that required to be looked to, and was an appropriate subject of inquiry for the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Connecticut, interested in the claims for apolations by French cruizers prior to 1800, which claims were relinquished by the government of the United States by the treaty of 1803, praying relief in the premises at the hands of congress; and moved that it should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Polk, of Tennessee, thought that the memorial should be referred to the standing committee on foreign relations, and moved that it be accordingly referred to that committee.

Mr. Ellsworth replied, and contended for its reference to a select committee. He was supported by Mr. Adams, Mr. Everett, and Mr. Drayton. Mr. Howard moved to lay the memorial on the table. Mr. Hoffman, and Mr. McDuffie were for referring it to the standing committee. The memorial was then referred to the standing committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Post was elected chaplain by ballot.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the resolution moved yesterday by Mr. Mercer on the subject of creating a committee to be styled "a committee on roads and canals."

A debate arose on this resolution between Mr. Hitchcock, of South Carolina, and Mr. Mercer. The former gentleman protested against the adoption of the resolution as unnecessary, because a select committee had always been found competent to take charge of this business heretofore, but especially because the adoption of such a resolution would lead to an impression that the house was disposed to systematize internal improvement, and with the present high duties on imports, &c. He was disposed to soften and soothe, rather than to irritate existing discontents, as he believed the adoption of this resolution would. Mr. M. took occasion to say, that towards this object (conciliation), he was more than glad to hear the patriotic remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), yesterday.

Mr. Mercer expressed unfeigned astonishment at the ground taken by the gentleman from South Carolina, believing that there was nothing in the resolution which went in any manner to commit the house either upon the general principle of internal improvement, or to any particular section under that principle. No one could be more disposed to the course of conciliation recommended by that gentleman than he (Mr. Mercer) was. But he could not perceive any connection between that argument and the resolution before the house, which was a mere matter of form, intended to raise a general committee for all cases of a similar nature, instead of appointing general committees on particular cases, as was done yesterday. A standing committee of this character had for many years existed in the other branch of congress, to the great convenience of that body, and he could see no possible substantial objection to the same course here.

Mr. Craig, of Virginia, not perceiving any benefit to arise from prolonging the discussion, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

This motion was negatived.

Mr. Speight, of North Carolina, wishing to present his views on the subject, and not desiring to proceed to-day, because of the lateness of the hour, moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until tomorrow.

The house refused to postpone it.

Mr. Speight then moved an adjournment, which was carried. And the house adjourned accordingly.

Wednesday, Dec. 14. Among the memorials this day presented, was one by Mr. Sevier, from the legislature of the territory of Arkansas, praying that the laws for the government of said territory, may be so amended as to give the election of governor and secretary of the territory to the people. In presenting the memorial Mr. Sevier took occasion to say that this memorial contained sundry charges of misconduct and mal-administration against the present governor, (Mr. Pope), from which he wished it to be understood that he himself entirely dissented. Upon the motion of Mr. Sevier, the memorial was referred to the committee on the territories.

Upwards of 70 petitions were presented.

Several bills of a private nature were reported, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Wickliffe, that part of the secretary of the treasury's report which relates to the public lands, was referred to the standing committee on public lands.

On motion of Mr. Hoffman, the report of the commissioners of the navy pension and navy hospital funds, was referred to the committee on naval affairs.

The house resumed the consideration of Mr. Mercer's motion for adding to the standing committees of the house, a committee on roads and canals.

Mr. Speight, of N. Carolina, and Mr. Doubleday, of New York, addressed the house against the motion; Mr. Mercer replied, and was followed by Mr. Mitchell, of S. C. in further opposition to the resolution—Mr. Mitchell's speech was arrested by the expiration of the hour allotted to such discussions.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a statement of the amount of duties and drawbacks on the several articles imported into the United States, and re-exported therefrom during the years 1828, 1829, 1830.

From this statement it appears,
That in the year 1828, the accruing duties were $29,951,915

the drawbacks payable	4,001,665
In the year 1829, the accruing duties were	27,689,731
the drawbacks payable	4,213,163
In the year 1830, the accruing duties were	28,299,159
the drawbacks payable	4,511,182

The speaker also laid before the house an account of the receipts and expenditures of the government for 1830—laid on the table.

The speaker laid before the house a long and interesting communication from Peter S. Duponceau, of Philadelphia, upon the subject of silk manufactures, accompanied by samples of plush for hats, manufactured at Philadelphia, from American silk; of gros de Naples, for ladies' dresses, manufactured at Manchester, in England, from American silk; and thrown silk, in the unbleached state.

The letter and samples were referred to the committee on agriculture.

A message was received from the president enclosing certain documents relative to the relief afforded by the Spanish brig Leon to the American ship Mimera, wrecked on the Bahama banks—and suggesting the propriety of granting an indemnity to the crew of said vessel.

Thursday, Dec. 15. Many resolutions for enquiry or instruction were offered—among them the following:

On motion of Mr. White, of N. Y. it was Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to take into consideration the state of the gold and silver coins of the United States, and to inquire into the expediency of making certain foreign coins a legal tender in the payment of debts; and also to report such amendments of the existing laws regulating the mint of the United States as may be deemed expedient, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. Doddridge, it was

Resolved, That the committee on internal improvements be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

On motion of Mr. Stewart, it was

Resolved, That the act passed by the legislature of Pennsylvania, on the 4th day of April last, "for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road," be referred to the committee of internal improvements; and that the committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for carrying the same into effect.

Mr. Drayton, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill for the adjustment and settlement of the claims of the state of S. Carolina against the U. States; which was twice read, and made the special order of the day for Wednesday the 28th day of the present month.

Mr. Mitchell concluded his speech on the resolution concerning internal improvements. Mr. Wilde moved to refer the question to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Davis, of Mass. considered the whole debate unimportant. Standing committee or select, there must be one. Names were nothing.

Mr. Mitchell called for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the resolution, and they were taken as follows:

Yeas 96—nays 90.

[Mr. Adams was at the head of the list of yeas. The names may be given hereafter; but the "Intelligencer" says of the vote—The reader would fall into a great error, if he were to suppose the vote of yesterday, by yeas and nays, in the house of representatives, as indicating the true sense of the house upon the general subject of internal improvement. The question regarded only the mode of transacting the business of the house. We have not the least doubt, that there are fully two-thirds of the members of the house of representatives who are free from any constitutional scruples on the subject of internal improvement, as will be seen whenever any expedient measure of that description is presented for their decision.]

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS

Transmitted to the congress of the U. States, Dec. 1831.
TREASURY REPORT ON THE FINANCES.

In obedience to the directions of the "act to establish the treasury department," the secretary of the treasury respectfully submits the following report:

1. Of the public revenue and expenditures.

The receipts into the treasury, from all sources, during the year 1829, were $24,827,637 38

The expenditures for the same year, in including payments on account of the public debt, and including $9,033 38, for awards under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, were 25,044,358 40

The balance in the treasury on the 1st January, 1830, was 5,753,704 79

The receipts from all sources during the year 1830, were 24,844,116 51
Viz:

Customs	21,922,391 39
Lands (statement D)	2,329,356 14
Dividends on bank stock (E)	490,000 00
Incidental receipts (F)	102,368 98

Making with the balance, an aggregate of 30,599,821 30

The expenditures of the same year were (F) 24,855,281 55

Viz:
Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous 3,237,416 04

Military service, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian affairs, pensions, arming the militia, and internal improvements 6,732,688 66

Naval service, including the gradual improvement of the navy 3,239,428 63

Public debt 11,355,748 22

Leaving a balance in the treasury, on the 1st January, 1831, of 6,014,539 75

The receipts into the treasury during the three first quarters of the present year, are estimated at 20,653,677 69

Viz:
Customs	17,354,291 59
Lands (G)	2,479,658 90
Bank dividends (H)	490,000 00
Incidental receipts (I)	111,987 26

And the indemnity under the Danish convention 217,739 95

The receipts for the fourth quarter are estimated at 7,346,735 18

(Including indemnity under the Danish convention.)
Making the total estimated receipts of the year 28,000,412 87

And with the balance on the 1st January, 1831, forming an aggregate of 34,014,952 63

The expenditures for the three first quarters of the present year are estimated at (1) 21,159,778 97

Viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous 2,507,614 44

Military service, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian affairs, arming the militia, & internal improvements 5,649,017 22

Naval service, including the gradual improvement of the navy 3,019,667 85

Public debt 9,983,479 46

The expenditures for the 4th quarter, including $6,205,-$10 21 on account of the public debt, are estimated, on data furnished by the respective departments, at 9,807,422 28

Making the total estimated expenditures of the year 30,967,201 25

And leaving in the treasury, on the 1st January, 1832, an estimated balance, including $439,475 13, on account of the indemnity under the Danish convention, of 3,047,751 37

Which, however, includes the funds, estimated at $1,400,000, heretofore reported by this department as not effective.

The appropriations remaining unsatisfied at the close of the year, are estimated at $4,139,823 13; but of this amount, it is estimated by the proper departments,

1. That the sum of $3,483,525 87 only will be required for the objects for which they were appropriated.

2. That the sum of $501,102 78 will not be required, and may therefore be considered as an excess of appropriation, and is proposed to be applied, without being re-appropriated, in aid of the service of the year 1832, as will more fully appear when the estimates for the appropriations for that year are presented.

3. That the sum of $215,194 48 will be carried to the surplus fund, either because the objects for which it was appropriated are completed, or because these moneys will not be required for, or will be no longer applicable to them.

II. Of the public debt.

The payments on account of the public debt, during the first three quarters of the year, have amounted, as has been already stated to 9,983,479 46

Viz:

On account of principal 8,891,049 97

And of interest 1,092,429 49

And it is estimated that the payments to be made in the fourth quarter of the year will amount to 6,905,810 21

Viz:

On account of principal 5,908,810 21

And of interest 297,000 00

Making the whole amount of disbursements on account of the debt in 1831 16,189,289 67

This sum will be increased by purchases of stock which have been authorised, but which have not yet been fully reported.

Of the amount disbursed for the debt, $10,000,000 were applied from the appropriation made for the year, under the 2d section of the sinking fund act of 1817; and the remaining $6,189,289 67, were applied, with the sanction of the president, under the authority of the 1st section of the act of 24th May, 1830.

The stocks redeemed, by the application of that portion of the above sums disbursed on account of the principal, are as follows—viz:

1. Of the funded debt.

The residue of the five per cents created under the act of the 10th of April, 1816, in payment of the United States subscription for the shares owned in the bank of the United States 4,000,000 00

The exchanged four and a half per cent. per act of 3d of March, 1825 1,539,336 16

The four and a half per cent. per act of 26th May, 1824 5,000,000 00

The five per cent. per act of 15th May, 1820 999,999 13

And a part of the four and a half per cent. of the 24th of May, 1824 3,260,475 99

2. Of the unfunded debt, exclusive of $228 64, converted into 3 per cent. stock.

The old registered debt 40 90

Treasury notes 8 00

Mississippi stock 655 00

After these payments, the public debt, on the 2d of January, 1832, will be as follows—viz:

1. Funded debt.

Three per cents. per act of the 4th of August, 1790, redeemable at the pleasure of government 13,296,626 21

Five per cents. per act of 3d of March, 1821, redeemable after the 1st January, 1835 4,735,296 30

Five per cents. (exchanged) per act of the 20th April, 1822, one third redeemable annually after the 31st December, 1830, 1831, and 1832 56,704 77

Four and a half per cents. per act of the 24th May, 1824, redeemable after the 1st day of January, 1832 1,739,524 01

Four and a half per cent. (exchanged) per act of 26th May, 1824, one half redeemable after the 31st day of Dec. 1832, the residue after the 31st day Dec. 1833 4,454,727 95

24,282,879 24

2. Unfunded debt.

Registered debt, being claims registered prior to the year 1798, for services and supplies during the revolutionary war, 27,919 85

Treasury notes 7,116 00

Mississippi stock 4 320 09

Making the whole amount of the public debt of the United States 24,322,235 18

III. Of the estimates of the public revenue, and expenditures for the year 1832.

The great commercial activity prevailing in the United States has contributed not only to enlarge the revenue from customs for the present year beyond the estimates, but will probably carry that of the next year to a still higher amount. The importations for the year ending on the 30th of September last, are estimated at $97,032,858, and the exports at $80,372,566; of which, $62,048,233 were domestic, and $18,324,333 foreign products.

The duties which accrued during the first three quarters of the present year, are estimated at $27,319,000; and those for the fourth quarter, at $6,000,000. Some deduction, however, will be made from these before they can reach the treasury, on account of the reduction on the duties on coffee, tea, cocoa, and salt, by the acts of the 20th and 29th May, 1830, and which may be estimated to affect the duties on those articles remaining in store on the 1st of January, 1832, to the amount of about $750,000.

The receipts from the public lands, during the present year, it will be perceived, have likewise exceeded the estimates, and indeed have gone beyond all former example. It is believed that, notwithstanding the large amount of scrip and forfeited land stock that may still be absorbed in payments for lands, yet, if the surveys now projected, be completed, the receipts from this source of revenue will not fall greatly below those of the present year.

From all the information which the department has been able to obtain, the receipts into the treasury during the year 1832, may be estimated at 30,100,000 00

Viz:

Customs	26,500,000 00
Public lands	3,000,000 00
Bank dividends	490,000 00
Incidental receipts, including arrears of internal duties and direct taxes	110,000 00

The expenditures for the year 1832, for all objects other than public debt, are estimated at 13,365,202 16

Viz:

Civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	2,809,484 26
Military service, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian affairs, arming the militia, and internal improvement	6,648,099 19
Naval service, including the gradual improvement of the navy	3,907,618 71

Which, being deducted from the estimated receipts, will leave a balance of 16,734,797 84

An exhibition of the transactions of the treasury will show that this department has endeavored to carry into effect the policy indicated by the laws and the views of the president in regard to the early extinguishment of the public debt; upwards of forty millions will have been applied to that object from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 2d of January, 1832, inclusive, of which about sixteen millions and a half will have been drawn from the treasury during the present year.

The occasion is deemed a propitious one to bring to the view of the legislature the subject of the debt, with a view to its redemption at a period not only earlier than has been heretofore anticipated, but before the termination of the present congress.

The entire public debt, on the 2d of January next, as has been already shown, will amount to $24,322,235 18

The amount of the receipts into the treasury during the year 1832, after satisfying all the demands of the year other than on account of the public debt, are estimated, as above, at 16,734,797 84

To this may be added the balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1832, estimated, (exclusive of the medicinal funds and the Danish indemnity), at 1,208,276 24

From this aggregate of 17,943,074 08 after deducting the amount of the unsatisfied appropriations already estimated at 5,423,525 87 there will remain a surplus, in the year 1832, of 14,519,548 21 which, unless congress should enlarge the appropriations for other objects, may be applied to the public debt.

The interest on the debt, during the year 1832, may be estimated at 500,000 00

Leaving for the principal in that year 14,019,548 21

Which, being applied to that object, will leave the total amount of the public debt, at the close of the year 1832, 10,302,686 97

The government, however, has other means which, if congress see proper, may be applied towards the payment of the debt, viz: the shares in the bank of the United States, amounting, at par to $7,000,000, but which, as will be presently explained, may be estimated at not less than 8,000,000 00

In that event, the amount of the debt, on the 1st of January, 1833, would be but 2,302,686 97

Which sum, together with a fair allowance for the cost of purchasing, at the market price, the stocks not redeemable in the course of the proposed operation, might be supplied in the months of January and February, 1833, by the application from the revenues of that year of a sum equal to 2-12 of the amount applied from the ordinary revenues to the debt in the year 1832—say 2,503,258 02

It may be further observed, that, should any diminution take place in the estimated revenue, or should the expenditure exceed the estimated amount, the deficiency which either event might produce in the means of the treasury, applicable to the debt, would be supplied by the amount reserved in this estimate for the unsatisfied balances of appropriations. For, although that sum constitutes a legal charge on the treasury, to be met as occasion requires, yet, in any estimate of present means, it may be considered rather as a nominal than a real charge.

It will be thus perceived that the government has the means, if properly employed, of reimbursing the whole of the public debt, by purchase or otherwise, on or before the 3d of March, 1833.

The moral influence which such an example would necessarily produce throughout the world, in removing apprehension, and inspiring new confidence in our free institutions, cannot be questioned. Seventeen years ago, the country emerged from an expensive war, encumbered with a debt of more than one hundred and twenty-seven millions, and in a comparatively defenceless state. In this short period, it has promptly repelled all the direct and internal taxes which were imposed during the war, relying mainly upon revenue derived from import, and sales of the public domain. From these sources, besides providing for the general expenditure, the frontier has been extensively fortified, the naval and maritime resources strengthened, and part of the debt of gratitude to the survivors of the revolutionary war discharged. We have, moreover, contributed a large share to the general improvement, added to the extent of the union by the purchase of the valuable territory of Florida, and finally acquired the means of extinguishing the heavy debt incurred in sustaining the late war, and all that remained of the debt of the revolution.

The anxious hope with which the people have looked forward to this period, not less than the present state of the public mind, and the real interests of the community at large, recommend the prompt application of these means to that great object, if it can be done consistently with a proper regard for other important considerations.

Of these means as has already been shewn, the shares owned by the government in the bank of the United States are an indispensable part; and, that for the reimbursement of the debt within the period contemplated, it will be necessary to effect a sale of three, for a sum not less than eight millions of dollars.

The stock created by the United States for their subscription to the bank, having been actually paid previously to the 1st of July last, their interest in that institution has ceased to be nominal merely, and the shares form a part of the fiscal resources applicable to the public demands.

The objects connected with the early reimbursement of the public debt, are more important than the interest of the government as a mere stockholder; and it is, therefore, respectfully recommended to congress to authorize the sale of those shares for a sum not less than $8,000,000.

A sale of so large an amount in the public market could not be expected to produce more than the par value; and, if attempted under circumstances calculated to shake public confidence in the stability of the institution would, in all probability, prove wholly abortive. For these reasons, it is deemed advisable to effect a sale to the bank itself—a measure believed to be practicable on terms satisfactory both to the United States, and that institution.

In submitting this proposition to the wisdom of congress, it is not intended that its adoption should be founded on any pledge for the renewal of the charter of the bank, considering, however, the connection of the proposition with the bank, and viewing the whole subject as a necessary part of the plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit, the undersigned feels it his duty to accompany it with a frank expression of his opinions.

The act of congress to establish the treasury department, makes it the duty of the secretary of the treasury to digest and prepare plans for the support of public credit, and for the improvement and management of the revenue. The duties enjoined, as well by this act, as by the subsequent one of the 10th of May, 1800; requiring the secretary "to digest, prepare, and lay before congress at the commencement of every session a report on the subject of finance, containing estimates of the public revenue, and public expenditures, and plans for improving or increasing the revenue, from time to time, for the purpose of giving information to congress, in adopting modes for raising the money requisite to meet the public expenditures," have been supposed to include not merely the application of the resources of the government; but the whole subject of the currency and the means of preserving its soundness.

On this supposition, the first secretary of the treasury, in his memorable reports of January and December, 1790, recommended a national bank as "an institution of primary importance to the finances, and of the greatest utility in the operations connected with the support of public credit;" and various communications since made to congress, show that the same views were entertained of their duties by others who have succeeded him in the department.

The performance of the duties thus enjoined by law upon the secretary of the treasury implies, however, no commitment of any other department of the government, each being left free to act according to the mode pointed out by the constitution.

The important charge confided to the treasury department, and on which the operations of the government essentially depend, in the improvement and management of the revenue, and the support of public credit; and of transferring the public funds to all parts of the United States, imperiously requires from the government all the facilities which it may constitutionally provide for these objects, and especially for regulating and preserving a sound currency.

As early as May, 1781, the congress of the United States, convened under the articles of confederation, approved the plan of a national bank, submitted to their consideration by Mr. Morris, then superintendent of the finances, and, on the 31st of December of the same year, "from a conviction of the support which the finances of the United States would receive from the establishment of a national bank," passed an ordinance incorporating such an institution under the name and style of "The President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of North America." The aid afforded by that institution was acknowledged to have been of essential consequence during the remaining period of the war, and its utility subsequent to the peace of little less important.

The authority of the present government to create an institution for the same purposes cannot be less clear. It has, moreover, the sanction of the executive, legislative, and judicial authorities, and of a majority of the people of the United States, from the organization of the government to the present time. If public opinion can not be considered the infallible expounder, it is among the soundest commentators of the constitution. It is undoubtedly the wisest guide and only effective check to those to whom the administration of the constitution is confided; and it is believed, that in free and enlightened states, the harmony, not less than the welfare, of the community is best promoted by receiving as settled, those great questions of public policy in which the constituted authorities have long concurred, and in which they have been sustained by the unequivocal expression of the will of the people.

The indispensable necessity of such an institution for the fiscal operations of the government in all its departments, for the regulation and preservation of a sound currency, for the aid of commercial transactions generally, and even for the safety and utility of the local banks, is not doubted, and, as is believed, has been shown in the past experience of the government, and in the general accommodation and operations of the present bank.

The present institution may indeed be considered as peculiarly the offspring of that necessity—springing from the inconveniences which followed the loss of the first bank of the United States, and the evils and distresses incident to the excessive, and, in some instances, fraudulent issues of the local banks during the war—the propriety of continuing it is to be considered, not more in reference to the expediency of banking generally, than in regard to the actual state of things, and to the multiplicity of state banks already in existence, and which can neither be displaced nor in other manner controlled in their issues of paper by the general government. This is an evil not to be submitted to; and the remedy at present applied, while it preserves a sound currency for the country at large, promotes the real interests of the local banks by giving soundness to their paper.

If the necessity of a banking institution be conceded or shown, that which shall judiciously combine the power of the government with private enterprise, is believed to be most efficacious. The government would thus obtain the benefit of individual sagacity in the general management of the bank, and by means of its deposits and share in the direction, possess the necessary power for the prevention of abuse.

It is not intended to assert that the bank of the United States, as at present organized, is perfect, or that the essential objects of such an institution might not be attained by means of an entirely new one, organized upon proper principles, and with salutary limitations. It must be admitted, however, that the good management of the present bank, the accommodation it has given the government, and the practical benefits it has rendered the community—whether it may or may not have accomplished all that was expected from it—and the advantages of its present condition, are circumstances in its favor, entitled to great weight, and give it strong claims upon the consideration of congress, in any future legislation upon the subject.

To these may be added the knowledge the present bank has acquired of the business and wants of the various portions of this extensive country, which, being the result of time and experience, is an advantage it must necessarily possess over any new institution.

It is to be observed, moreover, that the facilities of capital actually afforded by the present institution to the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing industry of all parts of the union could not be withdrawn even by transferring them to another institution, without a severe shock to each of those interests and to the relations of society generally.

To similar considerations, it may be presumed, is to be traced the uniform policy of the several states of the union, of rechartering their local institutions, with such modifications as experience may have dictated, in preference to creating new ones.

Should any objection be felt or entertained on the score of monopoly, it might be obviated by placing, through the means of a sufficient premium, the present institution upon the footing of a new one, and guarding its future operations by such judicious checks and limitations as experience may have shown to be necessary.

To these considerations, and others which will be adverted to in a subsequent part of this report—the experience of the department in the trying periods of its history, and the convictions of his own judgment, concurring with those of the eminent men who have preceded the undersigned in its administration—induce him to recommend the expediency of re-chartering the present bank at the proper time, and with such modifications, as, without impairing its usefulness to the government and the community, may be calculated to recommend it to the approbation of the executive, and—what is vitally important—to the confidence of the people.

Should congress deem it expedient to authorise the sale of the bank shares, for a sum not less than eight millions of dollars, the reimbursement of the public debt on or before the 31 of March, 1833, may be confidently anticipated; and, from that period, the amount of revenue applicable to that object will be no longer required.

The revision and alteration in the existing duties which will be called for by this state of things cannot too early engage the attention of congress. The information requisite to the establishment of a scale of duties upon a permanent and satisfactory basis will require time; and a system in which so many important interests are involved will be better subserved by prospective legislation than by sudden changes.

The revenue derived from the present duties cannot be safely dispensed with before the period assigned for the extinguishment of the public debt; but such revised system as congress may, in its wisdom, previously provide, may, with entire propriety, be authorised to take effect from and after the 31 of March, 1833.

Independently of the charge for the public debt, the revenue for the expenditures of the government, as at present authorised, need not, it is estimated, exceed, annually, the sum of $13,500,000.

It is believed, however, that there are other objects of expenditure of obvious expediency, if not of indispensable necessity, which it may be supposed have been postponed by the higher obligation of paying the public debt. The present occasion is deemed propitious to provide for those objects in a manner to advance the glory and prosperity of the country, without inconvenience to the people.

It is therefore respectfully recommended, that in addition to the expenditure as at present authorised, appropriations may, at the proper time, be provided for the following objects:—For augmenting the naval and military resources; extending the armories; raising the militia of the several states; increasing the pay and emoluments of the navy officers to an equality with those of the army, and providing them with the means of nautical instruction; enlarging the navy hospital fund; strengthening the frontier defences; removing obstructions from the western waters; for making accurate and complete surveys of the coast, and for improving the coast and harbors of the union, so as to afford greater facilities to the commerce and navigation of the United States. The occasion would also be a favorable one for constructing custom-houses and warehouses in the principal commercial cities, in some of which they are indispensably necessary for the purposes of the revenue; and likewise for providing for the proper permanent accommodation of the courts of the United States and their officers.

In many districts the compensation of the officers of the customs, in the present state of commerce, is insufficient for their support, and inadequate to their services; as a part of the general system, however, and effectually to guard the revenue, the services of such officers are necessary, without regard to the amount of business; and it is believed expedient to make their allowances commensurate with the vigilance required and the duties to be performed. A further improvement may be made in the mode of compensating the officers of the customs, by substituting salaries for fees in all the collection districts, by which, at a comparatively small expense to the treasury, commerce and navigation would be relieved from burthens, always inconvenient, if not oppressive.

It is believed that the public property and offices at the seat of government require improvement and extension, and that farther appropriations might be made to adapt them to the increasing business of the country.

The salaries of the public ministers abroad must be acknowledged to be utterly inadequate either for the dignity of the office, or the necessary comfort of their families. At some foreign courts, and those whose relations towards the United States are the most important, the expenses incident to the station are found so burthensome as only to be met by the private resources of the minister. The tendency of this is to throw those high trusts altogether into the hands of the rich, which is certainly not according to the genius of our system. Such a provision for public ministers as would obviate these evils, and enable the minister to perform the common duties of hospitality to his countrymen, and promote social intercourse between the citizens of both nations would not only elevate the character of his country, but essentially improve its public relations.

In addition to these objects, farther provisions may be made for those officers and soldiers of the revolution, who are yet spared, as monuments of that patriotism and self-devotion, to which, under Providence, we owe our multiplied blessings.

For the foregoing purposes, together with the existing expenditure, and a moderate allowance for such objects of general improvement as shall be of an acknowledged national character, within the limits, as admitted by the executive, of the powers of congress over the subject, an annual revenue of $15,000,000 will be fully adequate. It is worthy of remark that such an amount of revenue, would scarcely exceed one dollar on each individual of our population, as it may be reasonably computed when the reduced duties shall take effect, and that the individual burden would continue to diminish with the increase of population and of the national resources.

The sources from which the revenue has hitherto been derived are the imports, public lands, and bank dividends. With the sale of the bank stock the latter will cease, and as the imports, according to any scale of duties, which it will be expedient and practicable to adopt, will be amply sufficient to meet all the expenditure; that portion of the revenue heretofore drawn from the sale of the public lands may be dispensed with, should congress see fit to do so.

On this point the undersigned deems it proper to observe that the creation of numerous states throughout the western country, now forming a most important part of the union, and the relative powers claimed and exercised by congress and the respective states over the public lands, have been gradually accumulating causes of inquietude and difficulty, if not of complaint. It may well deserve consideration, therefore, whether at a period demanding the amicable and permanent adjustment of the various subjects which now agitate the public mind, these may not be advantageously disposed of in common with the others, and upon principles just and satisfactory to all parts of the union.

It must be admitted that the public lands were ceded by the states, or subsequently acquired by the United States for the common benefit; and that each state has an interest in their proceeds, of which it cannot be justly deprived. Over this part of the public property the powers of the general government have been uniformly supposed to have a peculiarly extensive scope, and have been construed to authorise their application to purposes of education and improvement to which other branches of revenue were not deemed applicable. It is not practicable to keep the public lands out of the market; and the present mode of disposing of them is not the most profitable either to the general government or to the states, and must be expected when the proceeds shall be no longer required for the public debt, to give rise to new and more serious objections.

Under these circumstances it is submitted to the wisdom of congress to decide upon the propriety of disposing of all the public lands, in the aggregate, to those states within whose territorial limits they lie, at a fair price, to be settled in such manner as might be satisfactory to all. The aggregate price of the whole may then be apportioned among the several states of the union, according to such equitable ratio, as may be consistent with the objects of the original cession, and the proportion of each may be paid or secured directly to the others by the respective states purchasing the land.

All cause of difficulty with the general government on this subject would then be removed: and no doubt can be entertained, that, by means of stock issued by the buying states, bearing a moderate interest, and which, in consequence of the reimbursement of the public debt, would acquire a great value, they would be able at once to pay the amount upon advantageous terms. It may not be unreasonable also to expect that the obligation to pay the annual interest upon the stock thus created would diminish the motive for selling the lands at prices calculated to impair the general value of that kind of property.

It is believed, moreover, that the interests of the several states would be better promoted by such a disposition of the public domain, than by sales in the mode hitherto adopted. And it would at once place at the disposal of all the states of the union, upon fair terms, a fund for purposes of education and improvement, of inestimable benefit to the future prosperity of the nation.

Should congress deem it proper to dispense with the public lands as a future source of revenue, the amount to be raised from imports after the 3d of March, 1833, according to the foregoing estimate, will be $15,000,000; but with a reliance upon the public lands, as heretofore, it may be estimated at $12,000,000—to which, as the case may be, it will be necessary to adopt the provision for the future.

Whatever room there may be for diversity of opinion, with respect to the expediency of distributing among the several states, any surplus revenue that may casually accrue, it is not doubted that any scheme for encouraging a surplus for distribution, or for any purpose which should make it necessary, will be generally discountenanced. There is too much reason to apprehend, that a regular uniform dependence of the state governments upon the revenue of the general government, or an uniform expectation from the same source, would create too great an incentive to high and unequal duties, and not merely disturb the harmony of the union, but ultimately undermine and subvert the purity and independence of the state sovereignties.

The public welfare and the stability of the union would be more effectually promoted, by leaving all that is not necessary to a liberal public expenditure, with the people themselves. Their affection for the government would be thereby strengthened, and the sources of individual and national wealth augmented; so that when the government should have cause to increase its expenditures for public emergencies, it might rely upon a people able and willing to answer the call. While these means of the national wealth are thus cherished, the machinery by which duties upon imports are collected and brought into the public treasury may be kept in full operation, and susceptible of greater efficiency whenever the exigency may make it necessary.

It is respectfully suggested, that these considerations, and others that will readily present themselves, point out the duties on imports as the best source of revenue, and peculiarly recommend that these duties should be adapted to the actual expenditure of the government.

The propriety of reasonably protecting the domestic industry is fully conceded; but it is believed that it would neither require nor justify the raising of a larger amount of revenue than may be necessary to defray the expenses of the government. Some of the evils of a surplus, which an excess of revenue beyond the expenditure would necessarily induce, have been already noticed. To them may be added the effect upon the peace and harmony of the country, and upon the safety of the union, which should certainly not be hazarded for any object not of vital importance to its welfare.

If it could be shown that the labor and capital of the United States required greater aid to shield them from the injurious regulations of foreign states, sound policy would rather recommend a system of bounties, by which the duties collected from imports might be directly applied to the objects to be cherished, than the accumulation of money in the treasury. No such necessity, however, is supposed to exist.

The amount of revenue equal to the authorised expenditures of the government, it is the constitutional duty of congress to provide; and to a tariff framed for this object, it is not perceived there can be any reasonable objection. Of this duty the constitution itself precludes all doubt, by authorising both the expenditure and the means of defraying it.

It will be difficult precisely to graduate the revenue to the expenditure. The necessity of avoiding the possibility of a deficiency in the revenue, and the perpetual fluctuation in the demand and supply, render such a task almost impracticable. An excess of revenue, therefore, under any prudent system of duties, may be for a time unavoidable. But this can be better ascertained by experience, and the evil obviated, either by enlarging the expenditure for public purposes, or by reducing the duties on such articles as the condition of the country would best admit.

In providing a revenue upon this principle, and for those purposes, the attention of congress will be necessarily directed to the articles of imports from which the duties should be collected; and this is a question of expediency merely, to be decided with a just regard to all the great interests involved in the subject.

To distribute the duties in such a manner, as far as that may be practicable, as to encourage and protect the labor of the people of the United States from the advantages of superior skill and capital, and the rival preferences of foreign countries; to cherish and preserve those manufactures which have grown up under our own legislation, which contribute to the national wealth, and are essential to our independence and safety; to the defence of the country; the supply of its necessary wants; and to the general prosperity, is considered to be an indispensable duty. The vast amount of property employed in the northern, western, and middle portions of the union, upon the faith of our own system of laws, and in which the interests of every branch of our industry are involved, could not be immediately abandoned without the most ruinous consequences.

The various opinions by which the people of the U. States are divided upon this subject, concern the peace and harmony of the country, and recommend an adjustment on practical principles rather than with reference to any abstract doctrines of political economy.

The proposed action of congress will not be directed to introduce or countenance, for the first time, the adaptation of duties for revenue to the protection of American labor and capital. The origin of that lies at the foundation of the government;—and taking root in the act of July, 1789, it has since increased and spread over our whole legislation, has quickened each branch of industry, and affected most of the important relations of the community. That it may have gone beyond the proper standard, and that the present crisis requires that it should be confined within reasonable limits, will not be denied. It ought to be remembered, however, that the amount of the revenue has not at any time exceeded the authorised object of expenditure; and that, in preserving such an equality in future, justice to every portion of the community requires that it should be accomplished without uprooting those great interests which have been providently planted and carefully nourished.

If the amount of expenditure be regulated by an enlightened economy, and the aggregate of duties levied on imports be neither extravagant nor oppressive to the consumer, it is deemed to be comparatively unimportant whether it be collected from many or few articles of importation. It could only become material by causing the duties to bear unequally upon particular classes. It might not be practicable, however, in such a community as ours, and in distributing the duties with any reference whatever to the protection of labor, altogether to avoid that inconvenience. So much of the inconvenience as may be unavoidable, might be temporarily submitted to for the sake of the national advantages it would ultimately confer. It may be expected, also, that the poorer classes, so far as any such inequality would affect them, will be generally indemnified by the increased activity given to profitable modes of employment.

Happily for the United States the aim to which it is now proposed to limit the revenue, is not likely to be oppressive on any class, even according to the present numbers of the American population. It is also to be observed, that relatively both to population and the means of consumption, it would annually diminish; while the cheapening of transportation by the means of the rapidly increasing facilities of intercourse, would constantly tend to equalize prices, and diffuse the benefits of labor.

The objects more particularly requiring the aid of the existing duties, upon the principles of this report, are believed to be wool, woollens, cotton, iron, hemp and sugar; as comprehending those articles in which the agricultural and manufacturing industry are more particularly interested.

Upon these articles the average duty collected in the years 1829 and 1830, amounted to $8,940,393—as is shewn by the annexed statement.

These duties could not be materially changed at present, without the effect already deprecated. No objection is perceived, however to such gradual reduction of them in future, as may withdraw the aid thus afforded, as the growth and stability of our manufactures will enable them to dispense with it,—to such a degree, at least, as will, with the aid of an increase of population, and the means of consumption, still leave a revenue adequate to the expenditures, or until what may be withdrawn from them, may be levied on other articles which may be found to admit of it.

The additional sum, which, together with the amount of these duties, it may be necessary for congress to provide in a re-adjustment of the tariff will depend upon its decision as to confining the expenditures to the present objects, or of enlarging them, as here-in suggested. In the former case the sum of $1,559,607 00, and in the latter, the sum of $6,059,607 00 will be required; and in regard to either estimate the provision should be upon a scale sufficiently liberal to guard against the chance of a deficiency. In providing for either sum, the duties may be advantageously retained upon those articles of luxury, or which are principally consumed by the wealthier classes, or upon those not abundantly produced in the United States, in preference to others. The effect of this would be to countervail to the poorer classes, by cheapening their general supply the higher duties on other articles. At the same time the duties may be removed from such raw materials as will admit of it without detriment to our agriculture; whereby the manufacturers would be enabled to sell cheaper, and also the sooner to dispense with a part of the duties, which may be at present retained for their protection. Any amount of duty upon a raw material is, to its extent, an injury to the manufacturer, requiring further countervailing protection against our own rather than foreign regulations, and is only to be justified by the paramount interests of agriculture. In that case it would deserve consideration whether the encouragement of an object of agriculture might not be more properly reconciled with the encouragement of the manufacturer, and with greater equality as regards other interests, by bounties, rather than by a duty on the raw material.

While presenting these views, the burthens to which, the interests of navigation have been subjected by the existing duties on articles necessary in ship-building, have not been overlooked; and while equitably adjusting other interests, this may require from the legislature particular attention. The great importance both of our foreign and coasting navigation to the country, and especially to those interests, now requiring to be cherished, cannot be doubted. In the competition which it is obliged to maintain with the commerce of the world, every where the object of pecuniary gain, it would seem to demand of the government a liberal support. It is believed that the expenses of building and fitting out vessels of every description, including steamboats, are injuriously increased by the present duties, and that a drawback of a large portion, if not the whole of the duty on all the articles composed of iron, hemp, flax or copper, whether of foreign or domestic production, used in their construction or equipment, might be authorised, under proper safeguards, with obvious advantage to other interests, and without material detriment to the revenue.

It is hoped, however, that these suggestions will be received as proceeding from a sense of official duty, and intended to invite the attention of congress to the various modes of revising the existing scale of duties from which a selection may be more judiciously made with the aid of greater information than is at present in the possession of the department, rather than to present a digested scheme for the future revenue.

The undersigned is not insensible to the embarrassments attending such a subject, both from its delicacy and complexity; and the difficulties of reconciling any system of duties, in the present condition of the public mind, with the interests and views of all, are fully appreciated. These can be surmounted only by the wisdom and patriotism of the people, and of congress. He cannot doubt, however, that it will be the wish of all earnestly to endeavor to surmount them; and he confides in the forbearance and liberality of an enlightened public to accomplish the task. He respectfully suggests that the subject is to be dealt with in the spirit of a liberal compromise, in which, for the sake of the general harmony, each conflicting interest should be expected to yield a part for the common benefit of all.

The diversity of interests which characterize different portions of the union, arising from geographical position and peculiarity of habits and pursuits, does not admit of that degree of favor to any particular interest, which in other countries, differently situated, may be safely and wisely granted. The industry of each portion of the union should be equally regarded and gradually fostered, by which means each would as certainly, though more slowly, attain maturity, without the aid of measures dangerous to the general peace and harmony.

Similar considerations prevailed in the formation of the constitution; and at that period the difficulty of drawing with precision the line between rights surrendered and those reserved, at all times great, was increased by a difference among the several states as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests. In harmonising these various objects, and conducting them to practical results, the framers of that instrument kept steadily in view "the consolidation of the union, and the general prosperity of the whole." By merging in these, all objects of inferior magnitude, the constitution came from their hands "the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession, which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable." "The full and entire approbation of every state was not counted upon; but it was hoped that each would consider, that had her interests been alone consulted, the consequences might have been particularly disagreeable or injurious."

In the government thus formed, were fully and effectually vested the power of making war, peace, and treaties, that of levying money and regulating commerce, and the corresponding judicial and executive powers of expounding and executing the whole.

Upon no other principles, and in no other spirit, can the constitution be administered with safety to the union. The force of the government is a moral force resting upon the sound action of the public opinion throughout the various portions of the country. Due respect for the rights and duties of the states, and a mild, equal, and moderate exercise of those confided to the general government, with a ready deference to the will of the people, are believed to constitute the soundest policy, and to furnish the best safeguards.

The observance of this policy is the duty of the government, and a patriotic equanimity in measures calculated to effect it, though they may occasionally act with some inequality, is not less the duty of the people. Considerations of power are not alone involved either in measures or opinions, affecting the interests and harmony of the community; and no measures can, or ought long to prevail without a broad and general support from public opinion. The obligation of laws, constitutionally enacted by the proper authorities, is not to be questioned; but, extreme measures adopted by slender majorities, and obnoxious to the interests and opinions of minorities, powerful in numbers, wealth and intelligence; cannot be persevered in without danger to the general harmony, and without undermining the moral power, not merely of the executive and legislative departments, but also, that of the judiciary, which may be called to sustain the authority, without the option of deciding upon the expediency of the measure. In our system, each side has important rights; and those of the minority consist in requiring that the power of the majority be exerted with a just regard to their interests both of person and property. Without a reasonable deference and concession both as to measures and opinions, the great objects of the government cannot be attained; and, while it is conceded that it would be improper to push measures for the protection of the labor or improvement of the country to an extreme or oppressive degree, it must, also, be admitted that it would not be less so altogether to deny the general government the moderate exercise of powers for those objects for which it is believed mainly to have been instituted.

The real strength of the government depends not more upon a harmonious action of its various parts than in producing the same effect upon the various interests over which it acts.

Considering the amount of labor and capital employed in manufactures of the greatest importance to the country, and which have already contributed an essentially to our defence and safety, and to the general prosperity, it could not be expected that they should be suddenly abandoned. Regarding, at the same time, the diversity of interests resulting from the peculiar situation of the United States, the manufacturing interest itself should be content with a moderate and gradual protection, rather than by extreme measures to enlarge the public tranquillity. The indispensable necessity of the aid of the general government for those objects of acknowledged national concern—more especially the improvement of the rivers and harbors which are the great highways of the people—and to which the means of the several states are both inadequate and inapplicable, could not be withheld without opposition to the opinions of a majority of the people, and the interests of many portions of the union. It is at the same time admitted that this aid should be moderately conferred, and with proper deference to opinions of an opposite character. And it cannot be doubted that too extensive an exercise of the powers of the general government over these objects would ultimately subvert the constitutional sovereignty of the states. It must be acknowledged that the just medium on all these subjects is difficult of attainment; but, in the desire to seek, and in the sagacity to adopt, the best, consists the true policy of an American statesman.

If the adjustment suggested to congress by the views hazarded in this report be in any wise entitled to their respect, it is not unreasonable to hope that the various topics of national concern at present engaging the attention of the people, may facilitate rather than embarrass the task. The interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, and the final disposition of the public lands, are the prominent and necessary, and immediate objects of public policy. As incident, however, and, indeed, necessary to the security and prosperity of these great interests, the preservation of a sound currency cannot escape attention. On the soundness and steadiness of this indispensable medium of exchange depend the value and stability of every description of property not less than the activity of every branch of business; and it is not to be doubted that the commercial and manufacturing industry would be most severely and immediately affected by any derangement of this spring of their prosperity.

The measures of the general government in respect to the tariff, to objects of public improvement, to the public lands, and to the bank of the United States, are the sources of the existing solicitude throughout the country. For the permanent adjustment of all, in a manner to promote the harmony of all parts of the union, and elevate the moral character of the country, the wisdom and patriotism of the government and of the people can alone be looked to.

Independently of the considerations connected with the currency, the interests both of the government and individuals involved in the bank of the United States, make the stability of that institution an object of great importance. No reason is perceived why this great interest should not be equally considered in the scheme of deference, and concession, and compromise, which the public safety, not less than the national prosperity, so urgently recommends. While conflicting interests and opinions on other subjects are invited to meet on middle ground, and on the altar of common good, each to offer something for the preservation of concord and union throughout this favored land, the advocates and opposers of the existing system for regulating the currency may also be expected to join in the same patriotic sacrifice.

It is not perceived that any other satisfactory basis for a scheme of general adjustment can be devised, than that which shall pay a just regard to the interests of all, and observe a proper deference to the public will. On this ground, mainly, one portion of the agricultural interest has been invited to accommodate opinions, conscientiously formed and ardently advocated, to opposite opinions, more successfully maintained by other and more powerful interests. The invitation could not be more appropriately recommended than by affording an example in other cases, founded upon the same principle. Acquiescence in the public will is not less the duty of government, than of the people themselves. The utmost respect is left for an independent exercise of conscientious opinions; but in a country like ours, though a sense of duty authorities all fair attempts to convince the public mind, it equally dictates a ready acquiescence by all, in the public will, finally expressed.

In presenting to the view of congress the means of the government, the bonds due for duties, which are now in suit, has been reserved for this place. The amount of bonds remaining in suit since the commencement of the government, may be estimated on the 30th of September last, at $6,855,821 63; of this sum it is believed that not more than one million of dollars could, under any circumstances be recovered. The debtors, however, remain legally liable for the whole amount; and, without the hope of ever paying, are thereby kept in a state of poverty and helplessness.

The act passed at the last session of congress for the relief of certain insolvent debtors, according to the construction which has been given to it, has afforded but little relief to those for whom it was probably intended. It will be the duty of the undersigned, in a subsequent report, in conformity with that law, to lay before congress the principles and manner of its execution. It may not be out of place, in the mean time, when presenting a general view of the financial means of the government, to recommend that no reliance should be placed on these debts.

The punctuality of the American merchant in the payment of duties, in every period of our history, and under the most severe vicissitudes, is deserving of the greatest admiration. Of the whole amount of custom house bonds, falling due in the first three quarters of the present year, only $46,965 76 have been unpaid. Of seven hundred and eighty-one millions of dollars secured for duties from the commencement of the government to the 30th of September last, the whole loss may be estimated to be less than six millions of dollars. These delinquencies are believed, in most, if not in all instances, to have been the result of unavoidable misfortune, involving, in the ruin of the principal, the auctores required by the laws of the United States, by means of their pawning priority acts, have obtained the benefit of whatever property the debtors possessed at the time of their insolvency. In many instances, their general creditors have either released, or would be willing to release them, if the claim of the government did not render such an act of liberality unavailing. By this means a large number of our fellow citizens, of fair character and intelligence, and qualified by their exertions to promote the prosperity of the country, are paralyzed in their industry, and deprived of the means of providing for their families, and contributing to the general stock of labor. It is respectfully submitted to the wisdom and generosity of congress, whether the occasion of extinguishing the national debt and relieving the burdous of the community at large, and where the greatest amount likely to be recovered is not required for the public exigencies, is not also propitious for giving absolute relief to those enterprising men who, in times of difficulty and need, contributed to enrich the public treasury. The period of the total extinguishment of the national debt will be a period of national rejoicing, and might be properly signalized by such an act of grace to this unfortunate class of our countrymen.

Should congress, however, desire to compel the payment of any portion of these debts, or to discriminate among the objects of its clemency, it is believed that a law of greater scope than the present, authorising an inquiry into the facts, and a discharge of the debtor where there is no fraud, with or without payment of any particular amount, and returning to each debtor a reasonable per centage of the sum paid, is recommended as expedient and necessary.

The secretary of the treasury also transmits a report from the commissioner of the general land office, showing the state of the affairs of that branch of the department. All which is respectfully submitted.

LOUIS MC LANE,
secretary of the treasury.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Navy department, December 3, 1831.

To the president of the United States:

Sir: The secretary of the navy respectfully submits a report of the transactions of this department during the past year.

Under its general supervision the employment of the public vessels for the protection of our commerce, the erection of dry docks, the improvement of the navy yards, the purchase of timber and stores for future use, and the preservation of live oak, have been the most prominent objects of attention.

Many minor subjects connected with the interests of the service have received due care; and the results of the whole will be presented to your consideration with all practicable brevity.

The naval force in commission has consisted of five frigates, eleven sloops, and seven schooners; but, of these, four small schooners, purchased, and temporarily used in guarding our live oak, and in making surveys of the coast, can hardly be considered as a permanent portion of the establishment, while the relieving vessels necessary to keep up a complement in the different squadrons, have, in this and former years, by going out before others returned, become a considerable number and expense of those actually engaged as in commission.

Our force abroad has been divided between the Mediterranean, the West Indies, Brazil, and the Pacific. From the first station, the Java, the Fairchild, and the Constellation have returned, the former taking the Cape de Verd Islands and Liberia in her way homeward. An account of her cruise is annexed, as it may be interesting to those specially engaged in African colonization. (A.)

The Java, on a minute survey, was found to be very defective; and, having been built of inferior materials, expensive repairs on her are not deemed judicious. As she bears the name of one of our trophies during the late war, it is recommended that an appropriation be made for purchasing timber to rebuild her, and another, for a similar reason, to rebuild the Cysic. A frame has heretofore been obtained for the Macedonian; and an appropriation to finish one of these vessels, whose names are so intimately associated with our naval glory, could be expended with much advantage the two ensuing years. (B.)

Last August the Constellation was ordered home from the Mediterranean after the close of the cruising season, as the usual term of absence would expire next spring, and a large saving of expense would be made by her wintering in this country. She recently arrived, a few weeks earlier than anticipated, and in excellent condition, and, after the discharge of her crew, was immediately placed in ordinary.

The John Adams is the only vessel which has been added to that station.

The squadron there has been usefully employed in its ordinary duties. At this time a part of it, having lately been engaged in transporting of our former consul at Algiers to his new situation as charge to Constantinople, is supposed to be in the Archipelago, waiting the result of the chief object of that mission, and watching the consequences to our commerce of the late disturbances in Greece; another part is under orders to carry from Gibraltar our diplomatic agent to Naples; and a part of it, as recently directed, is presumed to be on new cruising ground, extending into the Atlantic along the coasts of Portugal and her neighboring dependencies.

As the duties of the navy are so extensive, and the number of duty, and the novel state of our relations with the Ottoman Porte, as well as the agitated condition of other portions of Europe, it would seem expedient immediately to increase our naval force in that quarter of the world. To effect that object, and others hereafter mentioned, and at the same time to ensure in our navy a continuance of the requisite skill and experience in navigating ships of the line, a sum sufficient to put us in commission is included in the general estimate for the ensuing year. C. (No. 1 to 15.)

The squadron employed in the West Indies has discharged its accustomed service with fidelity and success; no piratical whatever having been perpetrated on our commerce; the slight disturbances near Porto Cabello, Hayti and Havana, having been promptly looked after; and the health of the crews and officers in our public service is having, been, with a few lamented exceptions, uncommonly good. The only changes in this squadron have been the substitution of the Vincennes for the Peacock, and the Fairchild for the Natchez, on account of greater despatch and economy in preparing the relief vessels.

The Brazilian station, notwithstanding the political commotions in its neighborhood, has presented little active employment for the squadron. The utmost security to our navigation in that quarter has existed, except a recent, and, it is believed, unprecedented claim, which has been made to disturb our vessels engaged in seal-catching at the Falkland Islands. To guard against the ill consequences of this claim to our commercial interests, prompt measures have been taken, so far as the subject comes within the purview of this department. From that station the Hudson has returned home, and not having been built of live oak, she is in a condition rendering the expediency of repairing her very doubtful. The Yankee, another vessel of the same class, built the Lexington and War-on, sent to relieve them, have probably, ere this, reached their destination. Our force in that region will soon be strengthened by one of the schooners now building, and whose small draught of water will render her employment on that coast highly beneficial. Preparations are making to send more vessels in that direction, should circumstances require and justify the measure; visiting, among other places on their way out, Para and the principal ports on the northern coast of Brazil, where the amount of our commerce, and the agitated condition of the country, make the presence of some of our public vessels judicious, and where none have shown themselves since the late war.

In the Pacific no occurrence of much interest has happened since the last annual report. The Falmouth has been ordered to join that squadron instead of the St. Louis, and the Guerrier, which place the Guerrier, and which last vessel, it is gratifying to announce, arrived two days since, safely, in Hampton roads. Directions have been given to the new commander on that station to keep one of his vessels constantly employed in cruising among those islands in the Pacific to which our whalers and merchantmen resort for either supplies or trade. Unfortunately for the credit of our bills of exchange in that quarter, the payment, early in the year, fell into arrear, and it was some time before the debts by its former agents; and an attempt was made to improve the terms of transacting business there, and to lessen the expenses of providing for the squadron, by sending out a purser to make purchases, and to take charge of the stores and provisions for the whole. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed to test fully the success of this experiment, though the arrangement has required and recently received some modifications to promote its efficiency.

In consequence of a most wanton outrage upon the American ship Friendship, on the N. W. coast of Sumatra, the Potomac was ordered to proceed to the Pacific by way of the Cape of Good Hope, and from the caution used in her instructions, and from the energy of her commander, favorable hopes are entertained of procuring some indemnity for that barbarous and piratical injury. She has also been ordered, after leaving Sumatra, to touch at Macao, and communicate with Canton. The great value of our commerce in India and China, exceeding five millions annually, and its constant exposure, with many valuable lives, to insult and rapine, furnish a strong appeal to the government for the protection of a naval force. Should appropriations be made for the ensuing year, in conformity with the estimates, it will enable the department not only to strengthen the squadron in the Mediterranean, and extend its cruising ground with success, as before suggested; but to guard more efficiently our navigation on the coasts of South America, and provide a sufficient force to visit occasionally the India and China seas. Another beneficial change can also be accomplished, by thus having it in our power to keep one vessel of war fit for active service at the shortest notice, within our own waters, ready to be despatched to any weak or endangered point of our relations in any quarter of the world; and, when not so wanted, to be employed on the home station for purposes of protection to commerce, or of discipline to the navy, as the interest of the country may require.

A part of the different vessels in commission are engaged in several stations and commanders is subjected. (D.) It is due to those having special charge of the ministerial duties of this department, to add, that the strictest attention appears to have been paid to the prompt and thorough repairs of all our force destined to foreign stations; and that, in point of strength and perfect equipment for useful service, the vessels of the United States in commission were probably never in superior condition.

The construction of the two dry docks advanced with great rapidity during the past year. Both are now mostly completed, except the removal of the coffer dams, and the finishing of some of the galls and steam machinery. They present to the eye specimens of stone masonry seldom rivalled in beauty and solidity. The expenditures on each have been about 500,000 dollars; and, by the 4th of next July, it is hoped that some of the public vessels requiring repairs may be safely docked in these useful, economical, and highly convenient for our naval establishment.

For greater detail on this subject, and on the purchase of materials under the act of congress for the gradual improvement of the navy, reference can be had to the report annexed. (E.)

A personal inspection, during the past season, not only of the dry docks, but of all of the navy yards except that near Pensacola, has caused, to the head of this department, high gratification at the prosperous condition of most of them. In building of store-houses and wharfs for the reception of materials, collected formerly for the gradual increase, and now collecting under the appropriation for the gradual improvement of the navy, seems conducted with great regard to durability and convenience.

Experiments have been recently commenced, with a view to settle beyond further controversy the best mode and places in this country for depositing, stowing and preserving the different kinds of timber in most general use here in naval architecture. Whatever differences of opinion may once have existed in Europe, or may now prevail in America, on this subject, it is believed we possess the means of removing them so far as regards our own service.

The buildings for accommodation to the officers of the yards, reported in the surveys and plans of A. D. 1828, are in progress where most needed, and, in connexion with the storehouses, sheds, wharves, walls and ship ways, require, annually, such appropriations as can be expended without a neglect of more urgent duties. An increased estimate, to advance all these improvements, is presented for the ensuing year. (C. No. 9.)

The discontinuance of some, and the establishment of other navy yards, have been subjects of previous communications from this department. But no sufficient reasons can be discovered by me to warrant the former measure at this time; and the latter measure should, in my opinion, depend much, though not entirely, on the future increase of our naval power.

Among other contemplated improvements in those plans were rope walks at some of our present yards. All observation and experience in the navy show, that in nothing does it suffer more at this time than from bad cordage. The impurities in the quality of the hemp, in the manufacture, and in the tar, are numerous, are difficult of detection, productive of injurious delays when detected, and, when not detected, exceedingly hazardous to the safety of both crews and vessels. Indeed, the reasons seem more powerful in favor of making our own cordage, than of building our own vessels, or manufacturing our own blocks and anchors. An estimate is presented for the erection of two rope-walks at appropriate sites. (F.)

The vessels in ordinary have been, at most, of the yards, covered, so as to shelter them effectually from sunshine and storms, and to render their security from decay much greater than heretofore. It is a gratifying circumstance, that most of these vessels, as well as all those upon the stocks, are in a condition highly creditable to the persons who planned and executed the present mode of preserving them; and that, by proper care in future, until put in commission, no probability whatever exists of much further decay in the important portions of their expensive works, or of any decay in those portions composed of the invaluable material of live oak. (G. and H.)

The three new schooners, authorized to be built under the act of Congress of February 25, 1824, were completed, one at the yard in this city, one at New York, and one at Charlestown. They are all nearly finished, and the first named on a plan seldom before attempted. If successful, it may prove a source of much economy and utility in the construction of vessels of the lower classes. She has been called the Experiment, and the others the Enterprise and Boxer.

The annual purchases of timber and stores, under the act for the gradual increase of the navy, which remain in deposit at the yards, are over a million and a half in value.

The amount of purchases, under the act for the gradual improvement of the navy, in deposit, is nearly half a million.

The amount of property on hand for repairs, is almost a million.

The ordnance, provisions, &c. amount to upwards of a million and a half more.

The paper annexed (I) will present any further detail desirable on this subject. By this, it will likewise be seen, that the property belonging to the navy has rapidly increased, and is increasing. Some new regulations in respect to the accounts for property, which exceed in amount the money'd accounts of the navy, will probably be introduced into the rules for the service next session. The object will be to ensure ample security to the government, strict care of its interests, and the greatest precautions against waste from accident or neglect.

The real estate, as well as the personal property, belonging to the navy establishment, is very valuable, including navy yards, hospital grounds, sites for magazines, and their respective buildings. The titles to some of these, and to parts of others, are in dispute; and the evidences of the titles are in some instances mixed and preserved together. It would be very conducive to the security of this estate, and render the transaction of business concerning it more expeditious and satisfactory, if the examination of the titles, and the various controversies about the estate, and if the collection and preservation, of all the documentary evidence of these titles, were devolved upon one of the law officers of the government.

The act of congress of March 27th, A. D. 1801, makes the commander of the yard at Washington the navy agent for this department. In the changes since adopted respecting navy agents, no separate and permanent one has been appointed at this yard; but the duties have been performed by the commander without giving any security by bonds, and without the usual check of an approval of his purchases by another officer. The duty of the department was well performed, and he has been employed on him in practice, till the past summer. This last change has been made in compliance with both the letter and spirit of the act of congress, and has contributed to public convenience, by the saving of time and labor to the officers of the government, and to those having business to transact with it. It is recommended, for the obvious reasons before suggested, that the duties of navy agent at the yard and at the navy yards hereafter be separated from those of the commander of the yard; and that the usual responsibility, and a just compensation, be annexed to the former office. (C. No. 7.) Indeed, the whole system of compensation to navy agents, whether permanent or temporary, has for many years depended so much upon large and arbitrary allowances, very questionable in some particulars in point of principle, that further legislation on the entire subject seems highly proper.

A new arrangement in respect to the draughts by our agents on two foreign stations, and in respect to the payment of the draughts drawn on all of our foreign stations, when payable in London, has lately been concluded on terms much more advantageous to the government.

As a part of the plan for the gradual improvement of the navy, the attention of this department has, for some years, been turned to the rearing of live oak, and to its preservation, when found growing on the public lands. About a quarter of a century ago it was estimated that the full growth of between four and five hundred acres of timber trees were annually requisite to keep the British navy in its condition at that time, and that the rise in value, as well as scarcity, of good building materials in the progress of high agricultural cultivation, that the royal forests of England, preserved for public purposes, have sometimes been considered one foundation of her naval greatness.

The plantation of trees, commenced a few years since in Florida, was not deemed a proper subject of further attention by my immediate predecessors, more, however, it is presumed, from doubt about the legality and necessity of that particulate measure, than about the utility of careful attention to either the growth or safety of our live oak generally. No expense in respect to the plantation has yet been authorized by me, except such as seemed indispensable to secure the benefits of previous expenditures. A more extended plan of agents and vessels for the discovery and preservation of such live oak as is now growing on the public lands, was devised last winter, dividing the seaboard from the St. Mary's to the Sabine into seven districts, with an agent in each, and stationing three small vessels at proper distances on the coast, to aid in the same object, and in the survey of the bays, navigable creeks, and rivers of that region. This plan had advanced so far in May, that it could not be at once discontinued without much loss. The measures necessary for a fair test of its merits have therefore been completed; its benefits, if any, and, if not, its objections will soon be developed, and, whether failing or successful, the trial, it is hoped, will lay the foundation for full information as to the quantity and location of this kind of timber, will assist the government in the reservation of those public lands where it abounds, and enable the department hereafter to recommend a substitute less expensive and equally efficacious. In the paper annexed (J) is a minute detail of the proceedings on this subject.

Intimately connected with the interests of the service, are the purchase and use of iron tanks in all our vessels in commission; they are now prepared only for ships of the line and frigates built out of the fund for the gradual increase of the navy. The convenience derived from them in ballasting, the increased capacity they leave for stores, the greater security to health in the quality of the water—all conspire to render a specific appropriation for this object very desirable, and in the end economical. (K.)

The building of steam batteries is another subject of much interest. While such astonishing improvements are making in the application of steam, it would be imprudent to overlook its probable importance hereafter in marine warfare, or fail to keep pace with other naval nations in any new means of attack or defence. The experiment made here soon after the successful introduction of this power, in the building of a steam frigate, was, perhaps, equal to the state of skill in the use of the power at that period. As that frigate however has been destroyed by accident, and as the machinery since obtained for other steam vessels of war is not the best now extant for such purposes, it is recommended that an appropriation be made to enable the department to exchange it, or to purchase new and more appropriate machinery, and to erect, soon as may be, two steam batteries of twelve heavy guns each, on the most modern and approved models (L.)

The improvement of the navy depends so much on the character of its officers and seamen, as well as on its vessels, docks, yards, and building materials, that your attention is invited to some circumstances calculated to exercise, in that respect, a favorable influence. It would hardly be useful or decorous to dwell on former recommendations from this department in respect to many important changes, chiefly as regards rank and pay, a limited peace establishment, a naval academy, further discriminations in favor of sea service, additional provision for hospitals, the abolition of such a large and vexatious system of discretionary allowances, a division of the duties of the naval board, a change in the powers of purveyors, and in the mode of making purchases for the medical department. Most of these recommendations have my devoted approbation. In addition to them, the state of the service imperatively requires the adoption of a few alterations connected with the instruction on ship-board to young officers, and with the welfare of some, who are highly useful in their stations, though acting in subordinate capacities. Thus, it is believed, that greater benefits of duration to the youthful midshipmen, while at sea, could be obtained by a more liberal compensation to schoolmasters, who draw attention to the physical and religious preservation of naval boys and instruments; that the important class of sailing-masters, as they are not in the line of promotion, will soon become extinct without emoluments more nearly equal to what can be commanded by them in the merchant service; that the carpenters and joiners are paid much less than those not in commission; and that the wages of gunners and boatswains are entirely unjustified. It happens that the moral and religious benevolence anticipated from the employment of chaplains, in our vessels abroad, though earnestly desired, cannot be fully obtained by the department, in the present condition of that class of officers. This misfortune occurs, in part, from the bodily infirmities of a majority of them; but so far as it springs from the smallness of the number, and the insufficiency of their compensation, it is hoped that Congress will furnish a remedy.

It gives much pleasure to observe that the occurrence of courts martial is becoming less frequent; that your resolution to protect the oppressed, whether seamen or officers, and at the same time to carry sentences into full and final effect against those clearly convicted, and that the salutary alterations in punishments recommended during the past year are beginning to produce a beneficial influence.

Notwithstanding the high wages and great demand for seamen in our rehaut vessels, the naval service continues popular. No difficulty has been experienced in obtaining crews seasonably; indeed, the recruiting rendezvous were closed some months ago, and in the interim, till more men were wanted, they made repeated applications for the rendezvous to be re-opened. Much care has been exerted to promote the welfare of our seamen. Whenever their terms of service expire abroad, they have, for some years, if not consenting to re-enlist, been sent home at the public expense. But the latter course is attended by inconvenience and cost, arising mostly from short differences in the periods of service in a large crew, and for which the most effectual remedy would be found in congress authorizing men to be enlisted not only for three years, but, if sailing to a foreign station within the first year, then to extend three years from the time of sailing. Two orders are annexed, (M, 1 & 2), which have been issued during the past season, chiefly with a view to ameliorate the condition of this class of men. Besides these, other attentions, of late years, to comfort in their dress, to greater dryness and warmth in their apartments at sea, to new securities against disease, and better accommodations while sick, appear to have excited increased and permanent attachment on their part to that service in which they have helped to cover their country with such durable glory.

Many useful changes in the naval code, as to the punishment of officers, have before been urged; and, in addition to them, the power to order courts in yards and vessels within the limits of the United States, in the same way as on board public vessels at sea, would be a great convenience.

The discontinuance of the marine corps, or its transfer entirely to either the army or the navy, has been the subject of former recommendations from this department. In its present fluctuating condition, without any imputation on the character of the officers, of the corps, frequent difficulties in relation to pay, allowances, trials, and orders, are necessarily happening; and part of which proceeded to such an extent as to require a special resolution of congress in 1830, and a particular provision in the appropriation bill of 1831. But by placing this establishment, as in former years has been proposed, wholly under navy discipline and laws, most of these difficulties might, in my opinion, be obviated, all the present benefits of it to the service retained, its increase in numbers rendered unnecessary, its old associations preserved, and much greater economy, harmony, and energy infused into its operations, without derogating at all from the respectability and usefulness of the corps. Should the system recommended in the document annexed (C, No. 12) be fully adopted, the saving is estimated at over 40,000 dollars annually. But, in that event, the officers not needed should, in justice, be transferred to the army, and the saving to the government would then fall short of that amount. In its hospital and staff departments alone, a change of less extent as to officers would save to the public more than 10,000 dollars annually; and a portion of the expense call for new barracks, presented in the estimate of the present year, would be reduced one-economy. The appropriation at the last session, for those at Philadelphia, was so expressed, that the officers of the treasury did not feel authorized to allow the expenditure.

The condition of the navy pension and navy hospital funds, they being under the charge of other officers in connexion with the secretary of the navy, will be made the subject of a distinct report by the committee, and with a view to greater aid, in my opinion, very salutary changes in their future management. The statement of the privateer pension fund the past year is disclosed in the annexed report. (N.)

The large supply of lead in the hands of the government, as recited from the public mines, being three or four millions of pounds beyond what has been used by the war department, and the great quantity needed in the navy being annually, for ten years past, about fifty thousand pounds, induce me to recommend that from those tons a quantity equal to our naval wants be yearly set apart, and placed at the disposal of this department.

The deaths, dismissals, and resignations, the past year, are detailed in the list annexed. (O, 1 & 3.)

The general estimates for the ensuing year are presented in the document before referred to, and marked (C, No. 1 to 15). In these an attempt has been made, in conformity to what is believed to be the true spirit of our institutions and the repeated wishes of congress, to enable the legislative authorities to render the appropriations more specific, and to place the enumerated contingent fund in a condition to meet more nearly and promptly those demands upon it, so far as applicable to the contingent of the navy. Although the whole expenses of the last year did not equal the whole appropriations and balances on hand for the naval service, yet the enumerated contingent, as in former years, has proved insufficient. The remedy, heretofore suggested to supply all past deficiencies, is considered preferable to any former practice of resorting to other specific appropriations.

In the mode of keeping accounts with persons responsible to this department, great latitude has been allowed in the transfer of appropriations from one object to another, that the disbursing officers stand charged with large and almost incredible sums under some heads, and credited with almost equal sums under other heads; but which balances cannot be legally settled without the authority of congress. As this difficulty has generally originated more from carelessness than dishonesty, and, though censurable in principle, has probably caused no essential injury to the public, it seems indorsed to allow, under the usual guards against imposition and loss, the privilege of an adjustment to the persons interested. No other course is perceived which will enable the accounting officers connected with this department ever to close these transactions on their books, and to introduce, with full effect, an accurate and improved system. These unsettled balances now exceed seven millions of dollars. Again, by carrying the balances not expended from the contingent appropriations to the surplus fund, instead of reserving them, as in the case of pay, provisions, &c., to meet future claims, (and in the necessities of the service abroad these claims cannot always be early received and adjusted), the demands on those contingent appropriations in some former years have not only exceeded these amounts, but cannot now be discharged from any surplus of other years. Nor should the deficiency be taken, as done at some prior periods, from different heads of appropriations, without an express legal provision; nor can it be taken from any existing appropriation for arrears, as none has been made the last few years. To settle these just demands, it will therefore be necessary to appropriate to the object the balances of all former years carried to the surplus fund, or to make a new appropriation of about 800,000 dollars. This latter course is the more definite, and seems due to all the claimants, and especially to the meritorious officers of the navy. To obviate this difficulty in future, it will only be necessary that the appropriations for contingencies should assume the form of those for pay and subsistence, without any increase of their whole amount; that these appropriations in other respects should correspond with the appropriations for the present year, by throwing some of the enumerated items upon other and specific heads, and thus lessening the gross nominal sum for contingencies over 100,000 dollars; and that due vigilance be exercised in the department to confine the demands on these appropriations within the limits of the sums provided. There will probably be on the 1st of January next an unexpended balance from all the appropriations of last year to the navy of nearly twenty times this 80,000 dollars; but it may all be required when the whole accounts for the year are closed; and if not, as before remarked, it would seem, on any correct principles of legal construction and of administering specific appropriations, not to be applicable to these old arrears, or to different heads from those particularized, without the special authority of congress. (P.)

If the system of making surveys of our coast by naval officers at great exposure and toil continues to meet public approbation, a specific appropriation to reward the extra services in that employment the last year, as well as any in future, to the amount of 2,000 dollars annually, will be necessary.

It would conduce much to the convenience of officers in the navy, without incurring any great risk to the public, if this department were empowered to advance the allowance for travel and transportation when orders are given for duty within the United States—the authority to do it now being confined to the case of orders for service abroad.

Under an appropriation made at the last session, the naval monument has been removed from the navy yard, in this city, to a site west of the capitol. The expense has not exceeded the estimate, although, in addition to the repairs, about two hundred dollars' worth of labor, not included in the estimate, will be required fully to compensate the contractor, if he proceeds to remove the inscriptions, besides giving uniformity of color to the statues. But, as the appropriation is already exhausted, must depend solely on the liberality of congress. (Q.)

The general appropriation for the suppression of the slave trade has had but small demands upon it, in addition to the special charges imposed by congress in favor of Armstrong and of Livingston's heirs. For information in relation to the expenditures the past year, and to the property of the United States in Africa, acquired by former expenditures on this subject, a document is annexed. (R, 1 and 2). This property may require some new legislation concerning its sale or preservation. Though an agent is still maintained at Liberia, the report from the commander of the Java, before named, containing all the intelligence received from the establishment at that place during the last year, is a letter announcing the loss by piracy of a vessel in the employ of the volunteers. From the nature of the transaction it may be questionable whether any hostile designs are meditated against the commerce of the United States by those who committed that outrage. But measures were immediately taken to obtain full information on the subject; and the earliest opportunity will be embraced to have that region of country again visited by one of our public vessels.

With a view to a more uniform and satisfactory administration of both the naval and civil branches of this department, the rules and regulations, published in A. D. 1878, have been carefully revised, and enlarged as to naval duties, and the different orders, circulars, and decisions, now in force in relation to the transmission of business to this department and the officers of the navy, with their several rules of a civil character in respect to the service, have been collected in some cases amended; and in all condensed. The whole of the work will soon be submitted for your approbation, and, if receiving it, will be afterwards laid before congress. Their distribution and strict enforcement hereafter will, it is hoped, contribute to system in business, harmony in the service, and economy in the public disbursements. This last kind of economy, and in some degree conformity to what is supposed to be the wishes of the people in respect to so important an establishment; and without any augmentation of officers not before sanctioned, and without the recommendation of any doubtful novelties in our expenditures, every thing has been attempted, which promises to ensure, with frugality, promptitude, and vigor, the promotion of the great ends of naval protection and defense.

With much respect,
LEVI WOODBURY.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ The present number contains twenty-four pages of closely printed matter, but does not get in one half the articles that had been prepared or laid off for immediate insertion. Perhaps, we may find room for some of them next week—but the current of new materials is powerful! Several articles in manuscript are among those postponed.

☞ The chairman of the permanent committee of the friends of domestic industry, raised by the convention which lately met at New York, begs leave to inform all persons interested—that the labor and difficulty encountered in distributing the address and reports of the convention, have been oppressively increased because of the early and unexpected interruptions of conveyances by water—the excessive charge made for the postage of pamphlets forbidding a general circulation of these articles by the mails. The address, however, has been nearly disposed of, and several thousand copies of the report on iron, &c. are under way; and the best arrangements within his power has been made to distribute what remains on land, or may hereafter be published, with all possible promptitude, reconcilable to a moderate charge on individuals receiving those important papers.

☞ We had prepared, with much labor, (because of the manifest hurry and high state of excitement in which the details had been published in the London papers), a kind of history of the late terrible riots in the city of Bristol, as being, possibly, the commencement of a series of events which may shake the British nation to its centre, and have a mighty influence over the relations of a large part of the civilized world. But that labor is lost; for we cannot insert the account, except by the omission of some articles of a domestic interest; and it is our "system" rather to regard things at home than those abroad. The latter, besides, have less of novelty in them to a large portion of our readers, being generally anticipated by the lithral press, and spread in all directions; and it must suffice at present to say, that on Sunday, the 30th Oct. a succession of riots took place at Bristol, of a most furious and reckless character—immediately produced by the official entry of the recorder, Sir Charles Whetthell, an anti-reformer. With difficulty, he reached the mansion house—there the state coach was broken and then the house attacked—Sir Charles and his party making their escape in the rear. The people and the police many times charged upon one another, with sticks and clubs and stones—some were killed and many much injured. The military was introduced, but cheered by the mob, and much good feeling seemed to exist between the parties. They, however, pretty soon came into collision, and for a while the soldiers restrained the people; but, at last, the mob got the ascendancy, and the end was the destruction of the mansion house, the bridewell, the new jail, certain toll-houses, the bishop's palace, the custom-house, the exercise office, and 42 other dwellings or houses, by fire! The mobs plundered the wine vaults and liquor shops—thousands became intoxicated, and some suppose that hundreds of miserable wretches perished in the flames which they themselves had kindled. In the end, the mob having seemingly exhausted itself, or because that time was allowed to collect a strong military force, order was restored, and some persons, charged with being ringleaders, arrested. All the criminals were released from the prisons, and cheered by the mob. A tri-colored cap was placed on the statue of the king.—All things were done in greatest excess; and the whole presents a view of the most terrible mob that we have heard of for many years past. It is a frightful picture of what may be expected in England, if the people of that country shall break the chains that hold them in poverty and submission, to the aristocracy and priesthood. The bishops, by their votes against reform, appear to have offended beyond the hope of forgiveness; being before, the most unpopular individuals in England.

Much feeling prevails in many parts of England. The parties for and against reform talk openly of arming themselves. Associations of national guards are advised. A military hierarchy is talked of. An appeal to "physical force" is freely mentioned! A great crisis seems at hand—whether to relieve the working people and finally redress their wrongs, or confirm their masters in the possession of their grinding powers, we shall not predict. Acts of violence, like those committed at Bristol, cannot be justified—and yet how else is it that a population conditional like the laboring classes in England, can expect to obtain their "long lost liberty?" The time will come—must come, just as certainly as that all men shall die, when the British system of church and state, monopoly and exaction, inordinate luxury and beggarly poverty, will terminate by peaceful interference or rivers of blood. The artificial state of things must yield to realities. The ultimate point of oppression seems to have been reached, and reaction must be expected. "A feather will break a camel's back" says the Arabian proverb;—and there is a grade of privation when the lack of one potatoe, may raise the cry of havos and let slip the hyena-spirit of civil war.

Holland and Belgium appear to be settling down into peace. The president of Greece has been assassinated—the affairs of this country are in the worst state. France was quiet, and many efforts were making to encourage the industry of the kingdom. Nothing important has been received from Poland—the dominion of the autocrat, however, was fully established, and punishments were going on. The cholera was committing dreadful ravages in Egypt—nearly 1,000 persons a day had died at Cairo! The harem of the pacha had been attacked by it, and he had sought refuge on board a vessel of war—his son Ibrahim had retired to Upper Egypt.

MR. VAN BUREN. It has been extensively believed that certain parts of the instructions to Mr. McLane, on his mission to England, by Mr. Van Buren, while secretary of state, would become a subject of pointed discussion in the senate of the United States, which we now clearly understand will take place, from the following significant paragraph in the National Intelligencer of yesterday.

The British negotiation.—In the course of some incidental debate in the senate on Mr. Holmes's resolution proposing to call upon the executive for certain further information concerning the West India trade, Mr. Webster made remarks to the following effect, the bearing of which induces us to state it, though the rest of the debate does not appear.

"From the close of the late war down to a very recent period, it has been the object of the several administrations to secure a reciprocity not only to the navigation, but to the commerce, the traffic in commodities, of this country with England. Since the recent period alluded to, that purpose has been abandoned; and an arrangement has been completed, in conformity with instructions given by the government here to the minister at the court of St. James; given, sir, in terms and in a temper which may very properly become the subject of public examination and comment here; I say, sir, of public examination and comment."

INDIANA. Gen. John Tipton was elected a senator of the United States from this state, in the place of Mr. Noble, deceased, (whose seat has been held for the time being by Mr. Hanna) on the 7th ballot. For Gen. Tipton 55, Jesse L. Holman 36, several others 14. Gen. T. is said to be a friend of the president.

"HER HURNAR!" By the report of the secretary of the navy, it seems that some claim has been made "to disturb our vessels engaged in seal-catching at the Falkland islands." "HER, HURNAR!"—"our naval force in that region will soon be strengthened." It is also stated that an outrage was committed on an American ship on the North West coast of Sumatra—"HER, HURNAR," and quickly away goes an American frigate to procure "indemnity." And we have long and interesting accounts of our squadrons in the West Indian and Mediterranean seas, and South Atlantic and Pacific oceans, all zealously and faithfully engaged in the protection of commerce; and the "HER HURNAR!" is heard in thunder when a rope-yarn of a ship is ludicrously touched. Very well—this is all right—let the stripes and stars protect all persons and property sailing under them. But pirates at New York, and in other of our sea-ports, defraud the public revenue of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and cheat the growers and manufacturers of wool out of that protection which the law is intended to give them—they forge invoices, make false oaths, tear off the marks and numbers of their goods, and do more injury, in one month, than the whole trade at the Falkland Islands, or in the Mediterranean, render profit in a year—but there is no "HER HURNAR!"—These are "free trade" BULL's doings, and gracious in our eyes; they are things not immediately connected with property in ships—and the domestic growth and manufacture of wool, which have a greater annual value, as we believe, than every article of American product exported to all parts of the world, is quietly submitted to piracy, compared with which that happening at the distant island of Sumatra, is, as it were, only a drop in the bucket—or mere atom of wrong! The expense of the frigate sent to Sumatra, it wisely disbursed at home, would advance the profits or increase the comforts of a million of farmers and other working people, including their families—free citizens of the United States, seeking the protection of equal laws.

It is high time that this manner of proceeding was fully looked in the face. We cannot see why the pursuits of persons abroad are sacred, and those of persons at home unprotected. The tax talonia was once nearly applied because of this state of things, by resolving to refuse all appropriations for the support of distant expeditions of vessels of war. There is power enough in congress to do it now. If the "free trade" party possessed such power, what would they do?—that "free trade" party which is always seeking, and promptly obtains full protection, while it wants the moral sense of justice to yield it to others, ten or twenty times more numerous than the non-lives, equally contributing to the public wants, and equally responsible for the public safety.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

December 19. Mr. Benton, of Missouri, appeared and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. Holmes, the message and documents relative to the affair between certain American citizens and the authorities of New Brunswick, were ordered to be printed.

Several private memorials were presented.

Mr. Tazewell presented the memorial of the general assembly of Virginia, praying the payment of certain claims.

Mr. Troup presented the memorial of the surgeons and assistant surgeons of the army of the U. S. praying an increase of pay.

Mr. Chambers presented the memorial of the Columbian college, praying donations of certain lots in the city of Washington.

Mr. Kane presented three memorials of the general assembly of the territory of Arkansas, praying aid in the construction of certain roads, and for the continuation and extension of the national road.

The vice president communicated a survey of the Wabash river.

Mr. Smith, from the committee of finance, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that it is inexpedient at this time to act on the subject of the memorials praying an immediate reduction of the duties on teas.

Mr. Chambers obtained leave to bring in a bill to settle the interest of certain advances made by sundry states during the last war.

Mr. Clay inquired whether it was the intention of the chairman of the committee, to bring the report relative to the reduction of duties on teas before the senate, so that there might be a general expression of the whole body on the subject. He avowed himself to entertain views entirely different from those of the report.

Mr. Smith, the chairman, said a few words in reply.

On motion of Mr. Hanna, the resolution moved by him on Thursday last, instructing the committee on the militia, to inquire into the expediency of organizing the militia, between the ages of 21 and 35, and to increase the annual appropriation for arming them; was read, and after discussion, adopted.

On motion of Mr. Holmes, his resolution calling on the president for certain information relative to the N. E. boundary question, was, on motion, after discussion, referred to the confidential sitting.

The senate then proceeded to the election of officers of the senate, and the vice president having desired the senators to prepare their ballots for secretary,

Mr. Chambers rose, and called upon the secretary to explain to the senate, whether he had given certain information to the president, of the probable result of one of his nominations, at the last session, while it was still pending before the senate. After some remarks from Mr. Brown and Mr. Hayne,

The secretary then stating, through the president, a wish to address the senate, and the wish being seconded by the general consent of the members,

Mr. Lowrie rose and stated that the specific charge he had not seen; but so far as he understood it from what had been read, he had no explanation to make further than the most indignant denial of the whole charge. Since he had held the office of secretary, he never had, either during the administration of Mr. Adams or gen. Jackson, communicated to either of them a word relative to any nomination, nor never, indeed, did either of them ask him a question on such a subject. Self-respect as well as duty, would have prevented him. He understood the charge to be made in a letter from Mr. Lewis, that during the last session such a communication was received from him (Mr. Lowrie). He recollected that some time in the session—not the 2d March, however, he was confident—when going into the president's on official business, Mr. Lewis asked him if some nomination would be confirmed; but, it it were to save my life, said Mr. Lowrie, I could not tell what nomination it was. If, however, he had asked me whether Stephen Simpson's nomination would be confirmed, I should certainly have answered no—not because I knew the opinion of any one senator, but from the character of Simpson. That answer I should have given a year before, or would give now. But I appeal to every senator who was then here, whether I ever spoke a word to one of them on the subject of that or any other nomination. It was his impression, derived from his opinion of the man's character, and would have been given as his private opinion—not as derived from a knowledge of the views of any senator. This was all he had to say, whether it might be called an explanation or not.

The senate then proceeded to the election of secretary, when Mr. Lowrie received 40 votes—scattering 1. Mr. Lowrie was accordingly elected.

Mountjoy Bayly was re-elected principal door keeper.

Mr. Shackford, of Missouri, after six ballottings, was elected assistant door keeper. There were eighteen applicants.

The rev. Mr. Durbin, of Ky. was, on the second ballot, elected chaplain.

The senate spent some time in executive business, and then adjourned.

December 20. Mr. Benton introduced a bill providing for mounting and equipping a portion of the army of the United States, which was read.

Mr. Smith introduced a bill to provide for the arming of certain fortifications—which was read.

Mr. Wilkins introduced a bill to provide for the satisfaction of the claims of certain American citizens for spoils committed on their commerce prior to September, 1800—it was twice read and referred to a select committee consisting of Messrs. Wilkins, Webster, Chambers, Brown and Dudley.

Sundry private memorials were presented and referred.

Mr. Robbins moved a resolution instructing the committee of finance, to inquire into the expediency of reviving the acts providing for the payment of the loan office and final settlement certificates, which appear by the registry of the debts of the U. S. to be still unpaid.

Mr. Holmes, of Maine, rose to call the attention of the senate to a passage of the president's message, in which the arrangement with Great Britain, in regard to the colonial trade, was referred to, and the beneficial effect of that arrangement on American navigation in the increase of American tonnage asserted; and Mr. H. proceeded by a series of remarks, and a reference to the public documents, to show that American tonnage engaged in the British colonial trade had greatly fallen off, and the British tonnage admitted into our ports greatly increased, since the arrangement went into effect. He concluded by moving the following resolutions, which were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed, viz.

Resolved, That the president be requested to cause to be communicated to the senate the number of vessels and their tonnage and cargoes which have cleared from any ports in the United States to any port or place in the British American colonies since the president's proclamation of 5th October, 1830; distinguishing those, if any, which cleared for such ports and places, and a market, or for a British port or place, or some other port or place; distinguishing also American flag foreign tonnage; and also the entries of all vessels from any British colonial port with their cargoes, since the above proclamation; distinguishing the tonnage as above, and designating the British port or place from whence the cargoes were imported.

Resolved, That the president be requested to inform the senate what amount of American and foreign tonnage (distinguishing those, if any, which cleared for, and entered from the several Danish West Indies, since the president's proclamation of the 5th October, 1830, with the kind and amount of the cargoes.

Resolved, That the president be requested to inform the senate whether, since his proclamation of the 5th October, 1830, British vessels have cleared from the United States, for any port in the British continental colonies in America, and have sailed directly to the British West Indies, by virtue of clearances previously obtained from custom houses in those continental colonies, thus performing voyages circuitous on paper but in fact direct.

Resolved, That the president be requested to inform the senate what are the duties paid on British American vessels and their cargoes respectively, in British ports in the West Indies and the other British American colonies, distinguishing between the West Indies and the other colonies, and between American and British vessels, and the produce of the United States and of the colonies.

The senate took up for consideration the report of the committee on finance, on the memorials of the merchants of New York, Philadelphia, and Pittsburg, praying that the reduction of the duties on teas may take effect on the first day of January, ensuing,—the report being adverse to the prayer of the memorialists. A debate ensued thereon, in which Messrs. Webster, Clay, Hayne, and Chambers participated. On motion, of Mr. Chambers, the report was finally laid on the table.

The senate then resumed the bill supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution, together with the amendment reported thereto by the committee on pensions—which, on motion, of Mr. Foot, was made the order of the day for Monday next. The senate then adjourned.

December 21. Mr. George M. Dallas, elected a senator by the legislature of Pennsylvania, attended this day, was qualified and took his seat.

Mr. Johnston moved a resolution instructing the committee on commerce to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to deepen the mouth of the Mississippi—Also a resolution instructing the committee on military affairs to inquire into the expediency of building barracks, &c. for the accommodation of the troops at New Orleans.

Mr. Buckner moved two resolutions requiring information relative to the present situation and condition of the unconfirmed land claims in the state of Missouri, and as to the expediency of an adjustment thereof.

Mr. Pinckney, moved the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the committee of finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of fixing a rate of duties on foreign imports, not to exceed on any article imported into the United States, more than twenty per cent. of value, and not to reduce the duty on any article so imported below ten per cent. of value; and to arrange such duties, having regard to all the great interests of the country, so as to produce a net revenue of not less than fifteen millions of dollars annually.

2. Resolved, That the said committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving effect and operation to said system of duties on the 30th day of June next.

The senate took up the resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. Holmes.

Mr. Webster made some remarks to shew that there existed a considerable misconception in regard to the effects of the arrangement with Great Britain, and suggested a modification of the resolutions, so as to render the call for information more complete; and after some explanatory remarks from Messrs. Holmes and Smith, the resolutions were further laid on the table at the request of the latter gentleman, who wished further time to look into the subject.

The bill to authorize the mounting and equipment of part of the army of the United States; and the bill providing for the armament of the fortifications, were severally read the second time and referred.

The senate then spent some time in executive business and then adjourned.

December 22. A large number of petitions and memorials were presented, and several reports on private claims made and referred.

Mr. Pinckney obtained leave to bring in a bill concerning Mutha Randolph, daughter and only surviving child of Thomas Jefferson, deceased.

The resolution of Mr. Holmes, relative to the West India trade, were taken up and agreed to.

The resolutions moved yesterday by Mr. Buckner relative to unconfirmed land claims in Missouri, was taken up and adopted—the one concerning their adjustment was also taken up, but, at his motion, laid on the table.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. Johnston, were taken up and agreed to.

The bill to enable the president to extinguish Indian titles to lands in the state of Indiana, was taken up, amended, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. Holmes moved a resolution requiring a map of the disputed north eastern boundary to be made.

The senate spent some time in executive business, and then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, Dec. 19. About a hundred and sixty memorials were presented, among which was one by Mr. Barbour, of Virginia, from the legislature of that state, relative to claims for revolutionary services, which was referred to a select committee.

Mr. Arnold presented the memorial of Sam'l Martin, of Tennessee, praying that all actual subscribers of newspapers and pamphlets not exceeding one sheet, should pass free without postage—that letters to printers be also free; that the 2 cents charged on free letters for delivering be abolished; that as soon as the national debt be paid off, the expenses of the post office department be paid out of the general fund; and that all the papers in the U. States be employed to publish the advertisements of the post office, and laws of congress, and be paid each $100 per annum.

Mr. Whitteley, from the committee of claims, reported 38 bills, which were severally read and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. Doddridge, from the committee for the district of Columbia, made a report on sundry memorials of citizens of Pennsylvania, on the subject of slavery in said district—the report concludes with a resolution, praying that the committee may be discharged from the further consideration of the prayer of the memorialists.

The resolution relative to information concerning steamboat explosions, was adopted.

The resolution laid on the table on the 15th instant by Mr. Whitteley, calling for information from the secretary of the treasury, concerning a claim due to the U. S. by the commercial bank of Lake Erie, was called up and passed.

A resolution relative to the boundary line between Georgia and Florida, was taken up and adopted.

On motion of Mr. Evans, of Maine, the committee of commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the purpose of removing obstructions in the Kennebec river.

On motion of Mr. Duncan, the committee on internal improvements were instructed to allow the state of Illinois to apply the proceeds of a grant of land to construct a rail road instead of a canal, as heretofore authorized.

On motion of Mr. Dearborn, the committee on manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of exempting from duty, teas, coffee, wines, pepper, spices, indigo, and wool, the current market value of which in the United States, at the time of importation, shall not exceed 12 cents per pound.

Tuesday, Dec. 20. A great number of petitions and memorials were presented and referred.

Mr. Clay, reported a bill authorizing the sale of the public lands in lots of 40 acres, which was read twice and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Sundry bills on private claims were reported, read, and referred.

Mr. Drayton reported a bill to regulate the pay and emoluments of the officers of the army—which was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Hoffman, reported a bill authorizing the construction of naval hospitals, at the navy yards at Charlestown, Mass., Brooklyn, New York, and at Pensacola, which being twice read was referred to the committee of the whole. Also a bill to provide for completing the navy hospital at Norfolk, and the naval asylum at Philadelphia—which being read, was referred as above.

Several private bills were reported, read and referred.

Mr. McDuffie, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill to explain an act, "entitled an act to reduce the duties on coffee, tea, and cocoa, passed 20th May, 1830"—which was twice read and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. Dearborn, for the present, withdrew his resolution relative to the duty on teas, coffee, &c.

The house adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 21. A number of petitions were presented. Several reports on private claims were made.

A message was received from the president concerning tonnage duties paid by American vessels in the colonies of France—which was read and referred to the committee on commerce.

Mr. Huntingdon, of Conn. laid the following resolution on the table.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to this house the amount of duties on foreign merchandise which may have been remitted, in pursuance of the authority vested in him by the act entitled "an act for the relief of certain importers of foreign merchandise," approved March 2, 1835, together with the names of the importers of such merchandise, and whether imported on account of citizens of the United States or of foreigners, (if known), and the time and place of the shipment of the same, and of the entry thereof at the custom house.

On motion of Mr. Stewart, a resolution passed by the legislature of Pennsylvania, in favor of a subscription, by the general government, of a million of dollars towards the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, was referred to the committee on internal improvements.

Mr. Carson moved a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill providing for the election of a delegate, in the said district, to the U. S. house of representatives.

On motion of Mr. Wickliffe, it was Resolved, That the committee on internal improvement be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation of money for the purpose of purchasing the stock held by individuals in the Louisville and Portland canal, with a view of making the navigation of the said canal free to the commerce of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.

On motion of Mr. Wing, it was resolved to instruct the committee on military affairs to inquire into the expediency of constructing a public road from fort Howard, at Green Bay, to fort Crawford, on the Mississippi.

On motion of Mr. Gilmore, the committee on internal improvements were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making a national road from the city of Pittsburgh to the borough of Erie on Lake Erie.

On motion of Mr. McCarty, the committee on internal improvements were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting permission to the state of Indiana to make certain roads through the national lands, and of granting to Indiana each alternate section of land through which the said roads, may pass, on each side thereof.

On motion of Mr. Wm. B. Shepard,

Resolved, That the committee on internal improvements be directed to inquire into the expediency of confirming the acts of incorporation granted by the legislature of North Carolina to the Roanoke inlet company, in 1831 and 1839. And that said committee be directed to inquire into the expediency of surveying said Roanoke inlet, with a view of re-opening the same, and that the papers now before the committee of commerce be referred to the committee on internal improvements.

On motion of Mr. Duncan, the committee on roads and canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the national road from Vandalia to the Mississippi river above the mouth of the Missouri, and of making an appropriation therefor.

On motion Mr. Drayton, the committee on naval affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of fixing the pay, &c. of the marine corps.

On motion of Mr. Drayton, it was Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of revising the existing laws under which compensation for their services is allowed to the officers of the customs, and of so altering them, as to place these officers upon a more just and equitable footing.

On motion of Mr. Fitzgerald, it was

Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of ceding to the state of Tennessee the refuse lands south and west of the congressional reservation line in said state, the proceeds of said lands to be applied to purposes of education or internal improvements, in said state.

Mr. Blair, of Tenn. introduced a resolution inquiring into the propriety of building an army on the western waters.

On motion of Mr. Fance, it was Resolved, That the clerk of this house purchase three hundred and fifty copies of the journals of the old congress, from 1776 to 1789, for the use of the members of the house of representatives; provided the same shall not cost more than two dollars and fifty cents per volume.

Mr. Carr, of Indiana, introduced a resolution inquiring into the propriety of reducing the price of the public lands.

A large number of resolutions, of a local character, were offered, and variously disposed of. Adjourned.

Thursday, Dec. 22. Forty-one memorials, &c. being received—Mr. Davis, of Mass. presented three resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts, on the more efficient organization of the militia; the obtaining of certain documents in the plantation office in Great Britain; and recommending the objects of the colonization society to the favorable consideration of congress.

Mr. Hoffman, of New York, reported a bill providing for a survey of the coast of the U. States—read and referred.

Mr. Cambreling, of New York, reported a bill authorizing $3,000 to be distributed among the owners, officers and seamen, of the Spanish brig Leon, for services rendered the crew of the American ship Minerva, wrecked on the Bahamas bank—twice read and referred.

Mr. Carson, of N. C. reported a bill to establish assay offices in the gold regions of N. Carolina, S. Carolina, and Georgia.

Mr. Mercer, of Va. submitted a resolution requiring information as to the amount of expenditures made by the general government in breakwaters, moles, the improvement of the mouths of rivers, &c. &c.

The resolution of Mr. Huntington, relative to the amount of certain duties remitted, was taken up and adopted.

The resolution relative to certain surveys, &c. moved by Mr. Mercer, yesterday, was adopted.

Mr. Whitteley's resolution relative to opening a land communication between forts Howard and Crawford, was taken up and adopted.

On motion of Mr. Hunt, inquiry was instituted as to the propriety of dispensing with the signature of the president to patents.

Mr. Drayton moved a resolution instructing the committee on commerce to report a bill regulating the compensation of certain custom-house officers on the northern frontiers.

Mr. Heister moved a resolution requiring certain information as to the amount of postage received on newspapers and periodicals for the five preceding years, and as to the propriety of abolishing postage on newspapers and periodicals.

Mr. Craig moved a resolution inquiring into the expediency of increasing the pay of certain distributing post masters.

Mr. Dodbridge moved a resolution inquiring into the expediency of building a bridge over the Ohio river, at or near the town of Wheeling—adopted.

Mr. Boulton moved a resolution requiring the compensative cost of production of certain articles manufactured in the United States and foreign countries, &c.

Mr. Drayton introduced a resolution inquiring into the propriety of granting compensation to the claimants for French spoliation, &c.

Mr. Blair, of Tennessee, moved a resolution inquiring into the expediency of distributing the proceeds of the public lands, according to population, among the several states, for purposes of internal improvement, &c.

Various reports on private claims were made, and bills of a similar character taken up and disposed of.

Adjourned.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

From the American Sentinel.

Wood Lawn, 5th Dec. 1831.

DEAR SIR—Your friendly letter on the subject of the bank of the United States, has been received by due course of mail. The opinion which I formed of the constitutionality and expediency of the bank of the United States when I was a member of the senate, was the result of a careful examination of the constitution of the United States, made without any preconceived opinions. That opinion is recorded in two speeches which I made in the senate in the year 1811. Since that time I have had no occasion of reviewing the question. My opinion remains unaltered. I was secretary of the treasury more than eight years, and during that time I had ample evidence of the great utility of the bank of the United States, in managing the fiscal concerns of the union. I am persuaded that no man, whatever his preconceived opinions may be, can preside over the treasury one year, without being deeply impressed with the expediency of the bank of the United States, in conducting the finances of the union. The provision in the constitution which gives congress the power to pass all laws which may be necessary and proper to carry into effect the enumerated powers, gives congress the right to pass the bank bill, unless a law most proper to carry into effect the power to collect and distribute revenue, should be excluded by that provision. The opponents of the constitutionality of the bank, place great stress upon the word necessary, contained in the grant of power, and insist that no law can be necessary but such, that without which the power could not be carried into effect. Now this construction appears to me to be indefensible. It does seem to me, that the words "necessary and proper" cannot exclude a law that is most proper to carry the power into effect—Yet the unconstitutionality of the bank can be pronounced only upon that construction. It does appear to me that the framers of the constitution never could have intended to exclude the passage of a law most proper to carry a power into effect, because it might be carried imperfectly into effect by another law. My construction of the grant of power to pass all laws which may be necessary to carry the enumerated powers into effect, includes the power to pass all laws which are necessary and proper to carry the enumerated powers into effect in the most perfect and complete manner, and not in an incomplete and imperfect manner.

I have not seen a complete development of the president's plan of a bank. It is possible that by his plan the transmission of the revenue may be effected, but the safety of the public deposits cannot be effected by the president's plan. The advantage of this security to the public is incalculable. It ought not to be relinquished, unless it can be satisfactorily proved that the bank of the United States is unconstitutional.

This I think cannot be satisfactorily shown. My speeches are recorded and can be re-published if necessary—They contain the result of the best investigation I was able to give the subject. I am persuaded I could not improve upon it now, if I had the means of investigating the subject, which I have not.

I am, sir, your friend, &c.

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

Monday, Dec. 12. The national republican convention met in the city of Baltimore, this day at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Peter R. Livingston, of New York, rose after the members had taken their seats, and remarked that he should beg leave to name a gentleman, as a temporary chairman of the convention, preparatory to its more perfect organization, distinguished for his talents, and applauded for his integrity and principles, throughout a long life of public service. He then moved that general Abner L. Locke, of Pennsylvania, be appointed chairman pro tem. of the convention. The motion was unanimously adopted.

Mr. James Harbair, of Va. moved that Thomas B. Rye, be appointed secretary of the convention, which motion was adopted, nem. con.

Mr. Livingston then rose, and after a few remarks, respecting the delay of members on the way, occasioned by the inclement state of the weather, and the extensive prevalence of the existing epidemic, which prevented as full an attendance this day as was desirable, offered the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the delegations of the several states represented in this convention be requested to examine the credentials (or the evidence of appointment) of the members of their respective states, and report a list of their names to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Stone, of New York, observed, that in order to afford every possible facility to the gentlemen of the press, he availed himself of the present early moment to offer the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the editors of the several newspapers published in this city, together with all others in attendance from abroad, with their reporters, be invited to take seats to be appropriated for their accommodation.

Mr. Breck, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the word "invited," and insert "permitted," and expressed a hope that the gentlemen offering the resolution, would assent to the modification.

Mr. Stone replied, that he would not consent to the motion. It was no compliment to the gentlemen of the press, merely to be permitted to enter the convention. And a precedent for the phraseology was to be found in the proceedings of the late tariff convention in New York, where the resolution upon this subject was offered in the old form of giving permission only, but was amended by substituting the word invited. Mr. S. said, that, being himself a representative, in part, of the public press, he had some feeling upon this subject, and he could not listen for a moment to the proposed amendment.

The resolution was withdrawn by Mr. Breck, and Mr. Blunt, of New York, thereupon suggested that the resolution had best be laid over until the convention should be completely organized.

A motion to lay it on the table was then made. Mr. A. H. Everett, of Boston, opposed this motion. If the doings of the convention were to be reported at all, the incident proceedings might be as interesting as those to follow.

This motion was therefore withdrawn, and the resolution unanimously adopted.

Mr. Cumby, of Kentucky, then moved that when the convention adjourns, it will adjourn to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock; which was agreed to.

The convention then adjourned.

[There were between 130 and 140 members in attendance this day.]

Tuesday, Dec. 13. At 12 o'clock, the convention was called to order by A. Locke, esq. and the proceedings of yesterday having been read, the secretary called over the names of the delegates, according to the order of the several states, when it appeared that there were 156 members in attendance, and representing seventeen states and the District of Columbia, viz: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, North Carolina, Indiana, Louisiana, and the District of Columbia.

Mr. Holmes, of Maine, reminded the convention that the organization of yesterday having been merely temporary, it would be necessary to make a permanent organization. He then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to organize the meeting, by selecting a president, &c., and report what further proceedings they might deem necessary.

Which being read was adopted, when the chair appointed Messrs. Holmes, Sergeant, Thomas, Dearborn, and Denny, the said committee. The committee retired, and after a short time returned and reported that it was deemed expedient that the officers of the convention should consist of a president, four vice presidents, and two secretaries; and recommended the following gentlemen as the officers to fill those stations:

For president—James Barbour of Virginia.

For vice presidents—Allen Trimble of Ohio, Joseph Kent of Maryland, Peter B. Porter of New York, and Robert Temple of Vermont.

For secretaries—Joseph L. Tillinghast of Rhode Island, and Henry Bacon of Ohio.

The report having been agreed to,

Governor Barbour took the chair, and addressed the convention as follows:—

"Fellow citizens—I beg you to be assured that I most highly appreciate the distinguished and unexpected honor you have just conferred upon me. The approbation of such a body as this, under any circumstances, could not but be highly acceptable. To me, it is more precious, when I cast my eye over the assembly, even on many with whom it was my good fortune to be associated, in the public councils, in the better days of the republic. Every effort will be made, within the reach of my capacity, to justify this mark of your confidence. I may be permitted to add, that we have convened together for an object, always an important one, but now peculiarly so, from the times in which we are called to act. The auguries proclaimed at the commencement of our political career, that the burden of our experiment would be found in the executive branch of our government, are, I fear, in a rapid course of fulfilment. As yet, we may confide in the peaceful and sure remedy of republican recurrence to the people, a majority of whom I sincerely believe, would hail with joy, the redemption of the pledge so often given by the present incumbent of the chief magistracy, to retire to private life at the expiration of his present term of service. The union and co-operation of this majority is all that is necessary to enforce, whether voluntary or involuntary, the fulfilment of his promise. I am aware that large calculations are made on our divisions; but I will not believe that there is any individual whose ambition is so unchastened as to permit himself to be the instrument of fomenting these divisions, or that the people of the United States will become the dupes of their personal predilections or prejudices. I continue to repose confidence in their virtue and intelligence, and on that Providence who has so frequently manifested his protecting kindness to this people. It was here that the great scheme of human emancipation was first opened on an admiring world. It cannot be that it has been decreed summarily to pass away, "like the baseless fabric of a vision," leaving "not a wreck behind." Let us then, coming directly from the people, the great source of all authority, and animated by an exclusive regard to their interests, set an example of the harmony so essential to success, and indulge a hope that its influence will reach the extremities of the republic.

"My ardent prayer is, that your deliberations may be conducted in that spirit—that your decision may be made with wisdom, and that the result thereof, may be propitious to the best interests of our beloved country."

On motion of Mr. Sergeant, it was ordered that an invitation be sent to Charles Carroll of Carrollton, and Messrs. Howard and Thomas, to take seats within the bar of the convention.

Mr. Holmes, as chairman of the committee appointed on the subject of the officers and business of the convention, rose to make a further report, in the shape of a motion, which he was sure, would entirely satisfy the impatience and delight the hearts of all. He then moved—"that the convention do now proceed to nominate a candidate for the office of president of the United States, to be supported by those who are opposed to the re-election of Andrew Jackson."

The motion was agreed to.

On motion, the hon. Jonathan Roberts of Pennsylvania and governor Spriegg of Maryland, were invited to take seats within the bar of the convention.

In this stage of the proceedings, the chair laid before the convention the following letter from Mr. Clay.

Washington, 10th Dec. 1831.

MY DEAR SIR:

I was extremely glad to learn that you had accepted the appointment of a member of the Baltimore convention, which is to assemble next week, to nominate, for the consideration of the people of the United States, candidates for their president and vice-president; and that notwithstanding the extraordinary inclemency of the weather, you had proceeded to the city where the important trust is to be performed. It is to be sincerely hoped that the acknowledged patriotism and intelligence of that convention, aided by the purity of intention and practical good sense by which I have so often witnessed you to be guided in public affairs, may conduct your deliberations to results satisfactory to the community. I must have been entirely regardless of passing events, if I had not observed that my name has been repeatedly mentioned as being likely to be brought before the convention, and that, in some instances, delegates have been instructed by their constituents to yield support to it, as a candidate for the presidency. This restriction, or any restriction upon the perfect freedom of deliberation and decision of the convention, is inexpedient. It would have had a more happy constitution if it had embodied the will of all who are desirous of rescuing the executive government of the union from the misrule which threatens to subvert established institutions and systems of policy, long and deservedly cherished, and to bring disgrace and ruin upon the country. So constituted, the convention could have made a comparative estimate of the many citizens of the United States who are competent to discharge the duties of chief magistrate, and selected from among them that one, who, possessing the requisite principles, would probably unite, to the greatest extent, the public confidence and the public support. For one, I anxiously wish that the convention, dismissing every feeling of previous attachment or predilection, will now make impartially such an estimate and selection; and should their choice fall upon any individual other than myself, it shall have, not only my hearty acquiescence and concurrence, but my cordial and zealous co-operation.

I have been very desirous to lay these sentiments before the convention, but it has appeared to me that I could not formally do it without incurring the imputation of presumptuousness or indelicacy. Will you then, my dear sir, with whom I have so often had the happiness to be associated in the public councils, consent to be the organ of making them known, if necessary, to the convention. Should my name not be presented to its consideration for the presidency, it will not be proper or necessary to make the communication; but if it should be, I confide the manner of doing it to your judgment and sense of propriety.

With fervent wishes for the prevalence of good feelings and harmony in the convention, I am cordially and constantly your friend,

H. CLAY.

JAMES BARBOUR, esq.

After the letter had been read, Mr. Livingston, of New York, rose, and, after some pertinent and eloquent remarks, nominated Henry Clay, which was received with loud and reiterated plaudits.

Mr. Dearborn, of Massachusetts, proposed that when the sense of the convention was taken on the nomination, that each member, as his name was called by the secretary, should rise and name the candidate to which he was most favorable. Mr. Livingston having accepted this amendment, it was agreed that the sense of the convention should be taken in that manner.

Accordingly, the secretary called over the names of the members, and each rising from his seat, avowed himself in favor of HENRY CLAY. Mr. F. H. Shuman, of North Carolina, (who was understood to say that his mind was not made up on the subject) was excused from nominating his candidate.

The chair announced that HENRY CLAY had been unanimously nominated by the convention as the most suitable person to be recommended to the people as a candidate for the office of president of the United States.

Here the plaudits were enthusiastically reiterated.

On motion of general Dearborn, it was ordered that a committee of seven members be appointed to prepare an address to the people, and the chair announced the following as the names of the committee, Messrs. A. H. Everett, of Massachusetts, Stenard, of Virginia, Dodd, of New Jersey, Hook, of Indiana, Johns, of Delaware, Cummins, of Maine, and Wilson, of New Hampshire.

On motion of Mr. Sergeant, of Penn. the president was requested to invite one or more of the clergymen of Baltimore to open the session of the convention with prayer.

Mr. Everett, of Mass. moved that the president and secretaries inform Mr. Clay of his nomination by the National Republican Convention, as a candidate for the office of president of the United States. This motion was withdrawn, and a resolution substituted, that a committee of one member from each state be appointed for that purpose. At the suggestion of the chair, the delegates from the several states appointed each their member of the committee, which consisted of the following gentlemen—Maine, Henry Warren; New Hampshire, Leonard Jarvis; Vermont, William Jarvis; Massachusetts, H. A. S. Dearborn; Connecticut, John A. Rockwell; Rhode Island, C. E. Robbins; New York, P. R. Livingston; New Jersey, Job S. Halsted; Pennsylvania, Thomas Burnside; D. Lawrence, E. I. Dupont; Maryland, William Price; Virginia, William Breckenridge; Ohio, John Stuart; Kentucky, Daniel Brock; North Carolina, F. H. Shuman; Indiana, John H. Neely; Louisiana, H. A. Billard; District of Columbia, R. S. Coze.

Some conversation having arisen relative to the wish of the convention as to the manner in which the communication should be made to Mr. Clay, the matter was left entirely to the discretion of the committee.

On motion of Mr. W. L. Stone, of New York, the convention adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

[The committee of one delegate from each state, appointed to inform Mr. Clay of his nomination by the convention, remained after the adjournment, and resolved to address him a letter, to be delivered to him by a sub-committee of five of their body.—Accordingly the sub-committee started for Washington in the afternoon at four o'clock.]

Wednesday, Dec. 14. The convention met pursuant to adjournment this day at 12 o'clock.

Previously to entering on the business of the convention, the following prayer was delivered by the rev. Dr. Hyatt, who, under a resolution adopted on Tuesday, had been invited to attend.

Oh! eternal God, wonderful in counsel, mighty in power, and of majesty incomprehensible, who hast taken thee a nation from the midst of other nations, by temptations, by signs, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm, according to all that the Lord our God hath done for us in this land, we, thy people, worship before thee. Thine is the greatness, and the glory, and the victory; and thou art exalted as head above all, for all that is in the heaven, and in the earth is thine. Thou hast been graciously pleased to promise thy special presence wherever two or three shall assemble to call upon thy name. Mercifully regard, therefore, O Lord, our supplications this day, and bless us with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus. We acknowledge before thee with shame and sorrow the many offences which, as individuals, and as a people, we are guilty before thee. Remember them not, we beseech thee, O Lord, neither take thou vengeance of our sins; but spare us, good Lord, spare thy people whom thou hast redeemed, and be not angry with us forever. Create and make in us new and contrite hearts, that we, worthily lamenting our sins, and acknowledging our wretchedness, may obtain of thee, the God of all mercy, perfect remission and forgiveness. And because through the weakness of our mortal nature we can do no good thing without thee, grant us the help of thy grace, that in keeping thy commandments we may please thee both in will and deed, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

O Lord, God of our salvation, who upholdest all things in the word of thy power, and who hast hitherto been exceeding gracious unto this our land, bestowing upon us many and precious privileges, delivering us from all our enemies, and granting to us singular prosperity, we desire to offer thee that sacrifice of praise which proceedeth not from feigned lips. Thou hast girded us with strength, and blessed the work of our hands, thou makest peace in our borders, and fillest us with the flour of wheat. Oh continue to us thy love and protection. Let uprightness and diligence, unity and brotherly kindness, moderation and sobriety, so flourish among us, that they may be the stability of our times, and make this nation a praise of the whole earth. Guide, sanctify, and save the president of the United States, and all subordinate magistrates, and officers thereof. Let the spirit of wisdom, and counsel, and the fear of God, rest upon all legislative bodies; and may all estates of men in thy holy church cheerfully and uniformly obey for conscience sake; that thy church may increase and flourish, and every member of the same in his vocation and ministry may serve thee devoutly and faithfully, through Jesus Christ our Saviour.

Most gracious God, we humbly beseech thee, as for the people of these United States in general, so especially for their senate, and representatives now in congress assembled, and also for this present convention; that thou wouldest be pleased to direct and prosper all their consultations, to the advancement of thy glory, the good of thy church, the safety, honor and welfare of thy people; that all things may be so ordered and settled by their endeavors upon the best and surest foundation; that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us for all generations. These and all other necessities for them, for us, and thy whole church, we humbly beg in the name and mediation of Jesus Christ, our most blessed Lord and Saviour.

Our Father, who art in Heaven, &c.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with us all evermore. Amen.

The president having taken his seat and called to order, it was Resolved, That gov. Cotes, the honorable Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, and the hon. E. F. Chambers, of Maryland, of the senate of the U. S. be invited to take seats within the bar.

On motion of Mr. Holmes,

Resolved, That the names of such members as may have arrived since yesterday's session, be called that they may give their vote to the candidate whom they may prefer.

The following gentlemen answered to their names. Virginia—P. J. Cohen, A. B. Spooner, James Carr. Ohio—J. Morrow, E. Stone, R. A. Thruston, S. W. Davis.

Tennessee—Boyd McNairy.

North Carolina—John Hamilton.

New York—W. J. Bacon, J. H. Pierson.

The proceedings of Tuesday were then read.

Mr. Somerville, from the committee appointed to wait on the hon. Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, and to invite him to a seat in the convention, presented the following answer to the invitation:

Wednesday morning, Dec. 14, 1831.

Gentlemen—The severity of the weather, and the apprehensions of my family on that account, admonish me to be cautious in venturing abroad at this season. I must therefore claim the privilege of advanced age, and apologise for not accompanying you this morning to the Athenaeum according to the promise of yesterday.

I request, gentlemen, that you will have the goodness to convey my apology to the distinguished individuals by whom you were deputed, to propose to me so flattering a compliment, and to accept, on their behalf, and for yourselves, an assurance of the regard and respect with which I am, gentlemen, respectfully, yours,

C. CARROLL, of Carrollton.

Mr. Dearborn, from the committee appointed to wait upon Mr. CLAY, and acquaint him with his unanimous nomination to this office of president of the United States, by the convention, laid before the meeting the following correspondence:

Baltimore, Dec. 13, 1831.

Hon. Henry Clay:

SIR,—The undersigned have been appointed a committee, by the convention of national republican delegates now assembled in this city, to announce that you were this day unanimously nominated as a candidate for the office of president of the United States.

Entertaining the most exalted opinion of your eminent talents, enlarged patriotism, and distinguished public services, we have the fullest confidence that you will receive the united, cordial, and zealous support of every friend to the constitution, the integrity of the union, all the great branches of national industry, and the prosperity of the general weal; and we pledge to you, in behalf of the convention, the assurance of an ardent determination to use all honorable means to insure your elevation to the chair of chief magistrate of this republic. With the highest consideration, we have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servants,

PETER R. LIVINGSTON,	of New York.
HENRY WARREN,	Maine.
LEONARD JARVIS,	New Hampshire.
WILLIAM JARVIS,	Vermont.
HENRY A. S. DEARBORN,	Massachusetts.
CHRISTIAN E. ROBBINS,	Rhode Island.
JOHN A. ROCKWELL,	Connecticut.
JOB S. HALSTED,	New Jersey.
THOMAS BURNSIDE,	Pennsylvania.
E. I. DUPONT,	Delaware.
WILLIAM PRICE,	Maryland.
JAMES BRECKENRIDGE,	Virginia.
J. SLOANE,	Ohio.
DANIEL BRECK,	Kentucky.
FREDERICK H. SHUMAN,	N. Carolina.
JOHN J. NEELY,	Indiana.
H. A. BULLARD,	Louisiana.
RICHARD S. COXE,	D. Columbia.
	Committee.

Washington, 13th Dec. 1831.

Gentlemen—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which, as a committee of the convention of national republican delegates now assembled in Baltimore, you addressed to me, stating that I had been this day unanimously nominated by the convention as a candidate for the office of president of the United States.

This manifestation of the confidence of a body so distinguished, is received, gentlemen, with lively sensibility and profound gratitude. Although I should have been glad if the convention had designated some citizen of the U. States more competent than myself to be the instrument of accomplishing the patriotic objects which they have in view, I do not feel myself at liberty to decline their nomination. With my respectful and cordial acknowledgments, you will be pleased to communicate to the convention my acceptance of their nomination, with the assurance that, whatever may be the event of it, our common country shall ever find me faithful to the union, and the constitution, to the principles of public liberty, and to those great measures of national policy which have made us a people, prosperous, respected, and powerful.

Accept, gentlemen, of my thanks for the friendly manner in which you have conveyed the act and sentiments of the convention. I am, with high respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

Messrs. P. R. Livingston, Henry Warren, Leonard Jarvis, Wm. Jarvis, H. A. S. Dearborn, C. E. Robbins, John A. Rockwell, Job T. Halsted, Tho. Burnside, E. I. Dupont, William Price, James Breckenridge, J. Sloane, Daniel Breck, F. H. Shuman, John J. Neely, H. A. Bullard and Richard S. Cox, &c. &c.

The letter was received with immense applause, both by the members of the convention, and a crowded audience.

On motion of Mr. Bradish, of New York,

Resolved, That this convention do now proceed to nominate a candidate of the national republican party to fill the office of vice president of the United States.

Mr. Boyd McNairy, of Tennessee, then nominated JOHN SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania, as a suitable candidate for that important station, remarking that Mr. S. was too well known to require any eulogy from him.

The nomination of Mr. Sergeant, was seconded by gen. Jones, of Washington, in a speech of considerable length.

On motion of Mr. William Halsted, of New Jersey, the same course was directed to be pursued in nominating for the vice presidency, as was done yesterday in nominating for president: whereupon,

The delegates were all called over by name, and each one rose as he was called, and signified his preference for JOHN SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania.

So, JOHN SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania, was nominated by the convention for vice president of the U. States, with the same unanimity which had already attended the nomination of HENRY CLAY for the presidency—160 persons this day answering to their names.

On motion of Mr. Marshall, of Virginia, a committee of five persons was ordered to be appointed by the chair, to inform Mr. SERGEANT of his nomination. The committee appointed consisted of Mr. Loeck, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Stunard, of Virginia, Mr. Jones, of the District of Columbia, Mr. Stone, of New York, and Mr. Morrow, of Ohio.

Mr. Burke moved for the appointment of a committee to ascertain what would be the probable expenses incurred by the convention, and to make provision for paying them. Upon which,

Mr. John B. Morris, of Baltimore, rose, and stated, that so far as the place of meeting and other accommodations of the convention were concerned, no provision was necessary, the citizens of Baltimore having, so far as in their power, made all the necessary arrangements for reimbursing expenses.

On motion of Mr. Livingston, it was Resolved, That the thanks of the convention be presented to those gentlemen who had prepared the accommodations, and for the very hospitable manner in which they had been treated, and that the president be the organ of the common action.

Mr. Everett stated that he thought the resolution just adopted did not supersede the necessity of a committee, as certain expenses, such as printing, &c. were not taken into view. He therefore moved that a committee be appointed, which motion was adopted.

The following gentlemen were named members of the committee:

Messrs. Burke, Somerville, Talliaferro, James, and Combs.

On motion of Mr. Livingston, it was

Resolved, That a committee of one member from each state, and one from the District of Columbia, be appointed to wait upon the hon. Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, the surviving patriot who signed the Declaration of Independence, to know at what time and place it would be agreeable to him to receive the members of the national republican convention, who wish to tender to him their best feelings and high sense of gratitude for his patriotic services.

The delegations of the respective states having consulted together, the following gentlemen were named as members.

Messrs. Muesey, of Maine; Wm. A. Kent of New Hampshire; A. H. Everett, of Massachusetts; N. F. Hickson, of Rhode Island; Joseph Trumbull, of Connecticut; W. A. Griswold, of Vermont; A. R. Lawrence, of New York; Wm. Halsted, of New Jersey; Josiah Randall, of Pennsylvania; Wm. W. Morris, of Maryland; Robert Stunard, of Virginia; R. H. Alexander, of North Carolina; L. White, of Kentucky; Boyd McNairy, of Tennessee; Jeremiah Morrow, of Ohio; H. A. Bullard, of Louisiana; J. J. Neely, of Indiana; Walter Jones, of District of Columbia.

Mr. Combs, of Ky. stated that he had just received a letter from two of his colleagues, Messrs. Johnson and Morehead, now on their way, and who would probably be here this evening, who had been reluctantly detained by the inclemency of the weather. His chief reason for mentioning the circumstance, however, was that they both assured him they were decidedly in favor of the nomination of HENRY CLAY, for the presidency.

On motion of Mr. Randall, of Pa. it was ordered that when the convention adjourn this day, it will adjourn to meet to-morrow, at 10 o'clock.

The convention then adjourned.

Thursday, Dec. 15. The convention met this day pursuant to adjournment, and the throne of grace was addressed by the rev. Mr. Nevins, of the presbyterian church.

The president having taken the chair, and called the convention to order, the proceedings of yesterday were read.

The following additional delegates appeared to-day, viz: from Kentucky, Francis Johnson, and James T. Morehead, who severally reconsidered their votes in favor of the nomination of Henry Clay and John Sergeant.

On motion of Mr. Fairfax, of Va. the following resolution was agreed to:

Resolved, That a central state corresponding committee be provisionally appointed in each state where none are now appointed. And that it be recommended to the several states to organize subordinate corresponding committees in each county and town, in their several respective states.

Mr. Blunt, of New York, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That it be recommended to the young men of the national republican party to hold a convention in the city of Washington, on the first Monday of May next.

In offering this resolution, Mr. Blunt stated that the young men of the national republican party hail it in contemplation to assemble in convention at Washington, and he thought it right that their proposition should receive the countenance of this convention. With that view he submitted the resolution.

It was proposed that a convention of delegates appointed by the mechanics of the national republican party, to meet at Washington in May next, should be recommended, but on its being suggested that the present convention was, in fact, composed of delegates from the mechanics, as well as other classes of the party, and that, therefore, there existed no necessity for such a convention, the motion was withdrawn.

Governor Morrow, of Ohio, from the committee yesterday appointed to wait upon Mr. Carroll, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and that Mr. Carroll would be happy to receive the members of the convention at his house, this day, at 4 o'clock.

The president having intimated a wish to know whether it was the intention of the convention to proceed in a body to the residence of Mr. Carroll,

Mr. Dearborn, of Massachusetts, moved the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the members of the convention will meet at the saloon of the Athenaeum, this afternoon, at a quarter before 4 o'clock, and proceed thence in a body to the residence of the venerated Mr. Carroll, to pay him their respects.

Mr. Lacock, from the committee yesterday appointed to wait upon John Sergeant, of Pennsylvania, and inform him that he had been unanimously nominated to the office of vice-president, by this convention, presented the following correspondence; which was read.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 14, 1831.

Hon. JOHN SERGEANT.

SIR: The undersigned, a committee appointed by the national republican convention for the purpose, inform you that you have this day been unanimously nominated by the said convention as a candidate for the office of vice president of the United States.

It gives them much pleasure to make this communication, having the strong assurances, from a view of your political character and conduct, heretofore, that, if elected, you will be found an able and efficient auxiliary to the enlightened statesman recently nominated for the office of president; and that you will cheerfully co-operate with him in maintaining the supremacy of the laws and constitution of the United States, and defending the primary and important interests of the people. Under these impressions, the committee are extremely solicitous that you should accept the nomination thus unanimously and spontaneously tendered you by the convention; in which event, the committee are warranted in pledging you the hearty and zealous support, not only of their colleagues and themselves, but of the great constitutional party of the United States, by whom they have been delegated by this convention.

Accept, sir, the assurances of our respectful consideration.

A. LACOCK,
WM. L. STONE,
JEREMIAH MORROW
ROBERT STANARD,
WALTER JONES.

Baltimore, December 14, 1831.

Gentlemen—I have received your note of this date, informing me that the national republican convention, now sitting in this city, have unanimously nominated me as a candidate for the office of vice president of the United States.

The nomination by a body so enlightened and patriotic, for one of the highest trusts of the republic, is felt to be a very great honor, and is appreciated accordingly. It is the more gratifying, as it associates me in their estimation and support with that distinguished citizen, whose public life and character, marked by undeviating devotion to the best interests of our country, and a spirit as generous as it is elevated, are a sure pledge that an administration under his guidance would be comprehensive and national, aiming unceasingly to preserve the union, to maintain the supremacy of the constitution and laws, to keep unbroken the public faith and honor, and to regard, with becoming indulgence and respect, the honest differences of opinion among our fellow citizens, which our republican institutions permit and invite. To co-operate with him, to the extent of whatever means I possess, in thus promoting the welfare and happiness of the nation, and rescuing the freedom of opinion and conduct from unconstitutional oppression, would be no less my pleasure than my duty.

Be pleased, gentlemen, to make known to the convention my acceptance of their nomination, and with it, to express to them the unaffected sensibility with which I have received this distinguished proof of their confidence.

I beg you to accept my thanks for the kind and flattering terms of your communication and to be assured of the high respect of, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

JOHN SERGEANT.

Messrs. Abner Lacock, &c. &c.

The acceptance of the nomination by Mr. Sergeant, was hailed with enthusiasm, and drew forth three very distinct rounds of applause.

On motion of Mr. Hulsted, of New Jersey, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the thanks of the national republican convention be tendered to Luke Terner, Hezekiah Niles, Nathaniel F. Williams, William H. Freeman, Charles F. Mayer, Joshua Medart, and James Harwood, members of the national republican committee, and to John B. Morris, Henry V. Somerville, N. F. Williams and James Harwood, the committee of arrangement on the part of the numerous citizens of Baltimore, for the extensive accommodations they have provided for its sittings, and the attentions and courtesies they have extended to its members, and the facilities they have afforded to the objects of the convention.

[In submitting the foregoing resolve, Mr. H. said, that in adopting the resolution of yesterday the tender of thanks was too general and indefinite. The names of the national republican committee of Baltimore were now known, and it was due to them, and every member of this convention, he was confident, would be proud of the opportunity, to tender the thanks of this body to those very respectable gentlemen who had spontaneously come forward and provided for the accommodation of the convention.]

Mr. Livingston, of New York, stated he was requested by the committee appointed to draft the address, to say that they would require a little more time for that purpose. He therefore moved that a recess be taken until one o'clock, P. M. which was carried, and the convention adjourned until that hour.

One o'clock, P. M.—The convention having assembled, a letter was read from Mr. Samuel Parnell, of Virginia, regretting the necessity of his absence, and hoping that Henry Clay would be nominated by the convention as the candidate for the presidency. The letter enclosed ten dollars to be appropriated to the incidental expenses of the convention. The letter was ordered to be recorded on the minutes of the proceedings.

After having agreed to assemble at four o'clock this afternoon, to pay their respects in a body to Charles Carroll of Carrollton, the convention adjourned until 12 o'clock on Friday.

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon of Thursday, the convention again assembled, when a procession was formed at the saloon of the Athenæum, headed by the president and other officers, the delegates being arranged in the geographical order of the states which they represent, which proceeded to the mansion of the venerable CHARLES CARROLL, where each delegate was introduced to that distinguished patriot, who stood to receive them.

After the introduction was over, the president of the convention, James Harbourn, of Virginia, advanced and tendered to Mr. Carroll the "homage of the national republican convention." He made a very handsome allusion to the patriotism of Mr. Carroll in the days of the revolution, spoke of the veneration in which his name was held by a grateful people, as the last survivor of that illustrious band of patriots who had signed the charter of our liberties; and said that our infants were taught to hush his name, as one of the benefactors of the republic. He concluded by observing that the prayers of the free citizens of this highly favored land were daily offered to heaven in hearty supplication that that life might be long preserved which had been freely devoted to the sacred cause of liberty in the days of trial.

After partaking of some slight refreshment, which had been plentifully prepared at the hospitable mansion of the revolutionary worthy, the delegates severally withdrew to their respective places of abode.

Mr. Carroll appeared to be pleased with the attention shown him, and conversed with several of the delegates for some time. When asked of his health, he replied, "I enjoy very good health." The epidemic which so generally prevails has affected the family of Mr. Carroll, as well as others; but that venerable individual has entirely escaped.

Friday, Dec. 16. The convention assembled this day at 12 o'clock; when the rev. Mr. Finley, of the Baptist church, delivered a very appropriate prayer.

The record of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. Everett, from the committee appointed to prepare an address to the people of the United States, on the subject of the election of a president and vice president of the United States, reported a draft as agreed upon by the committee; which was read, and unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. Coxe, of Washington.

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the proceedings of the convention, and of the address just adopted, be printed, under the direction of a committee to be appointed by the chair.

On motion of Mr. Rockwell, of Connecticut,

Resolved, That it be recommended to the delegates from the several states to promote among their constituents a zealous support of the principles of the national republican party, and of the candidates nominated by this convention.

Mr. Morrow, of Ohio, said the duty had been assigned to him of offering to the convention a resolution tendering a vote of thanks to the officers which had been appointed to preside over its deliberations. That duty was the more gratifying to him, as he had had the pleasure to associate with those individuals in other times—in times when the dark cloud of war lowered over the land, and when it became the duty of every patriot to stand forward for his country's safety and honor. The country was now at peace with all the world—yet, he had again been permitted to take counsel with those same individuals, at a moment of great interest, and when the talents and moral powers of every friend to the nation were required to be exerted for the security of its best interests. He would not take up more of the time of the meeting, but submit for its adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be presented to James Harbourn, the president; and Allen Trimble, Joseph Kent, Peter B. Porter, and Robert Temple, vice presidents, of this convention, for the able and dignified manner in which they have presided over its deliberations.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Dearborn, it was Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this convention be presented to Joseph L. Tillinghast and Henry Bacon, for the diligent and attentive manner in which they have discharged their duties as secretaries.

On motion of Mr. Bradah, it was Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be presented to Abner Lacock, the chairman, and to Thomas P. Ray, the secretary, who officiated on the temporary organization of the convention.

Mr. Harbourn then rose, and addressed the convention, in behalf of himself and his colleagues, for about twenty minutes, in a most able and eloquent manner, during which he was repeatedly interrupted by the cheers of the assembly.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the committee this day appointed to superintend the printing of the address, be directed to have also printed and subjoined at the end thereof, the names of the members of the convention, and their respective places of residence.

On motion,

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be presented to those clergymen of the city of Baltimore who have so kindly officiated at its several meetings.

On motion,

Resolved, That the president be requested to furnish for publication a copy of the address this day delivered by him, and that it be appended to the proceedings of this convention.

The convention then adjourned, sine die.

ADDRESS OF THE NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.
To the people of the United States.

FELLOW CITIZENS:—The period will soon arrive when you will be called upon to exercise a right, which, of all independent nations of considerable power on the globe, you alone possess—that of electing, by your own free choice, and from among yourselves, the person who is to be entrusted with the high functions of your chief executive magistrate. It is sometimes said that it is of little importance what individual is clothed with that character: that a president of the United States has no great personal influence either for good or evil, and that, in the present prosperous condition of the country the public affairs would be transacted just about as well under one president as another. Such opinions can only be entertained by persons who have reflected very little on the theory or the practical operation of our government. The whole course of the public affairs depends, in a very considerable degree, upon the direction which is given to the influence belonging to the office of president. It is no doubt true that the political machine may continue to move on a while with apparent success under very unskillful direction by the effect of a favorable impulse received at other times; but it is obvious, that if such a state of things continues long, the favorable impulse will be lost, and the principle of prosperity destroyed, perhaps forever. It is generally acknowledged that the pure and lofty character of Washington contributed more than any other cause to carry our institutions into successful operation, and that the eminent virtues and acknowledged talents of his successors in the presidency, have aided very powerfully in sustaining and perfecting the work which he began. It is equally apparent, that if the chief magistracy should ever be committed for any great length of time to persons of an opposite character, the condition of the country must undergo, in one way or another, a disastrous, perhaps a fatal revolution.

Such being the importance of the right which you will soon be called upon to exercise, you owe it to yourselves, to your children, to your country, to the cause of humanity, which is so deeply involved in the issue of the political experiment that is now making among us, to exercise it with full and mature deliberation—without any bias from party feeling or mere personal advantage, and with a single view to the public good. You owe this, not only to the interest, but to the honor of the nation. It is important to the preservation of the fair fame which we have already acquired throughout the world, that the seat of Washington, and his successors, should be worthy fillets: that persons should be chosen to succeed these illustrious men, who shall be able, like them, to do honor, by their manner of discharging its duties, even to the high office of president of the United States: that the personal conduct of the head of the executive department should be marked, as it always was in former days, with dignity, judgment, good temper, discretion, and moderation; that the youth of our government should not be sullied by the foul stains of immorality that disfigure the antiquated and corrupt institutions of other countries, and that our citizens and the world at large should be able to look up to the high places of this union for examples of public and private virtue.

Under these impressions of the importance of the crisis, a numerous portion of our fellow-citizens residing in all parts of the country, and who have acted together in political affairs for some years past, under the name of NATIONAL REPUBLICANS, have directed us to meet together and deliberate upon the course which they ought to pursue, and the persons whom they ought to support for the great offices of the government at the approaching election. In preparing to exercise this delicate trust, we have been naturally led to take a careful and deliberate survey of the political condition of the country, and of the manner in which the public affairs have been conducted by the present administration. This survey has resulted in a full conviction that the public good imperiously requires a change; and in proposing to you as candidates for the presidency and vice presidency the distinguished citizens whose names accompany this address, we have deemed it our duty to lay before you a concise statement of the principle circumstances which have led us to this conclusion.

No president ever entered on the duties of his office under circumstances more favorable to a successful discharge of them than the present incumbent. The country, thanks to Providence and to the ability and good fortune with which the public affairs had been carried on by preceding administrations, was in a high state of prosperity.—All the public establishments, and all the great branches of private industry were in the most flourishing condition. Agriculture was rapidly extending itself in all directions, and particularly through the wide and fertile regions of the west—manufactures were advancing with unprecedented rapidity—commerce, internal and foreign, was animated with a corresponding vigor—our relations with foreign powers were of the most amicable character—at home, tranquility and general contentment pervaded every corner of the union—the parties that formerly divided the citizens and distracted the country, had in a great measure become extinct under the operation of time—the growing prosperity of the nation, and the judicious and liberal conduct of the government. In the pride and pleasure which we all felt in claiming the character of citizens of the United States, we were ready to forget that our fathers had been classed as republicans and federalists. The name of AMERICAN had, by a sort of common consent taken the place of all other political distinctions. AMERICAN PRINCIPLES had become the common creed of the high minded and patriotic adherents of all the former parties. In a word, the best friends of the country had little more to wish or hope, in regard to our political situation, than that we might proceed in the course which we were then pursuing, and remain, in every thing belonging to character and principles of government, substantial as we were.

This state of things, afforded, of course, the best evidence that could possibly be had in favor of the administration under which it had grown up. Much of it could be traced directly to the character and opinions of the leading members of that administration. It was, however, under these circumstances, that a vigorous, and, as has been shown by the issue, successful effort was made to effect a change, and to place in the chair of the chief magistracy the present incumbent. Of the comparative qualifications of the president and his predecessor, for the high station which they have successively filled, we will not here speak. We cheerfully resign a task so ungrateful in one of its divisions, to the impartial and unshrinking hand of history. Nor will we here enlarge on the means by which the change in question was accomplished—the reckless and persevering calumny, which was constantly poured forth from hundreds of presses, on the best and the purest men in the nation,—the false pretensions to exclusive republicanism—the factious clamor which was kept up in congress—the artful combination of conflicting personal and party interests for a common object, and the various other unworthy arts, that were brought into action on this occasion.—Suffice it to remark, that the change was effected—in form, at least—in a legal and constitutional way; and, however, justly offensive the circumstances that brought it about, might and must have been to the friends of the last administration, however deficient the present incumbent might have been supposed to be in the qualities most requisite for the station to which he had been raised, it is believed that when he entered on his office, there was no disposition in any portion of the people to commence a premature or factious opposition to his measures.—It was alarming enough to prudent and well meaning men, that the government of the country had fallen into such hands, and far from attempting to perplex or embarrass the administration, they would rather have lent all the aid in their power to carry the country safely through so dangerous a crisis.—On the other hand, the military successes of the president had gained him an extensive personal popularity, which would have enabled him, had he known how to turn it to account, to carry on the government with extraordinary facility. Under this combination of circumstances, it is believed, that had the public affairs been managed with tolerable prudence and discretion, general Jackson might have gone through his term of official life without a show of opposition, and have been re-elected, had he been so inconsistent as to desire it, by a very unanimous vote.

Nor were the friends of the country without strong hopes that such a result would follow. Deficient as the president was known to be in the qualities and accomplishments most essential to a civil magistrate, it was yet anticipated that he might be found to possess the courtesy, the generous feelings, the high sense of decorum and propriety which form the appropriate ornaments of the military character, and would have secured him from any other offence against the dignity of his office. After the letter to the venerable patriot Monroe, in which he had so emphatically recommended the oblation of the old party distinctions, it was confidently expected that nothing would be done by himself that should tend to revive them. He had given, on several public occasions, opinions on points of administration which—however at the time incorrectly applied—would have served excellently well as guides for his own conduct in office; and it was perhaps not unreasonable to hope that his actions would correspond, in some imperfect degree at least, with his previous professions. Had this been the case, his administration would have given complete satisfaction to the country. Whether its complete and acknowledged failure has been owing to defects in his own character, or to the influence of evil counsels on his mind and measures, is a point which it is unnecessary, and would be ungrateful, to discuss. We should regret to visit with too severe censure the last days of one who, in another line of duty, has done the state much service, and whom nothing but the impudence of injudicious friends, or rather the efforts of political partisans, who found it convenient to make use of his name and popularity for their own selfish purposes, has prevented from going down to posterity with a high military reputation, and filling an honorable place in our history. We are rather willing to believe that, placed in a situation for which he was by education and character wholly unfit, worn out by toils, infirmities, and the natural progress of age, he acted under influences which, morally speaking, he could not well control. However this may be, it is certain that the expectations and hopes which some persons may have been disposed to indulge of the success of his administration, have been signally disappointed, and that his failure has been more complete than even his enemies could have possibly anticipated. The political history of the union for the last three years exhibits a series of measures plainly dictated in all their principal features by blind cupidity or vindictive party spirit, marked throughout by a disregard for good policy, justice, and every high and generous sentiment, and terminating in a dissolution of the cabinet under circumstances more scandalous than any of the kind to be met with in the annals of the civilized world. The voluntary dissolution of the cabinet authorizes the remark which we have made above, that the failure of the administration of gen. Jackson was not only signal and complete, but acknowledged; and it is remarkable that, after this public acknowledgment of his incapacity to execute the duties of his office, through agents appointed by himself, even to his own satisfaction, he should deem it expedient to offer his services to the nation for a second term.

The first official act of the president indicated, in a striking and painful manner, in how small a degree any favorable anticipations, that might have been formed of his conduct were likely to be realized. We allude to his inaugural address to the people, in which he levelled against the administration of his predecessor a sweeping charge of incapacity and corruption. A charge of incapacity to conduct the civil affairs of the country preferred by Andrew Jackson against such men as Mr. Adams, Mr. Clay, and their distinguished colleagues in office, was of course merely ludicrous; but the imputation of corruption was of a more serious character. Had there been the least foundation for it in fact, it is obvious that the last person who ought to have made it his business to denounce it to the public was the president of the U. States, who has no other constitutional agency in regard to such offences but the power of pardon. The indecorum of this denunciation was hardly less glaring than its essential injustice, and can only be paralleled by that of the subsequent denunciation of the same administration, on the same authority, to a foreign government.

This proceeding awakened in the mind of every good citizen very painful forebodings as to the consequences which were to follow upon such a commencement.

These forebodings were too soon realized. The next act of the administration was a general removal of such of the public agents as were not recommended by attachment to the person or party of the president. The extent to which this system was carried is strikingly evinced by the fact, that within a month after the inauguration of gen. Jackson, more persons were removed from office than during the whole forty years that had elapsed since the adoption of the constitution. The motive which led to this policy is illustrated by the fact, that it was applied principally in states where the majority of the people were opposed to the administration, while in the others there were comparatively few removals. Such was the practical comment on the text of the inaugural address which denounced the preceding administration as having brought the patronage of the government into conflict with the purity of elections. The foreign ministers were abruptly recalled at large expense to the country, in some instances before they had reached their destination, and in all, without the observation of the common forms of civility towards them, or the governments near which they were accredited. Among the victims of proscription at home were some of the most respectable and interesting persons in the community—veterans who, after fighting the battles of the war of independence, had been placed by the justice of the government in the offices they held, and were now rudely thrust out of them to endure, at an advanced age, the miseries of actual want, as a reward for the devotion of their whole lives to the public service. This was not all. This universal proscription, taken in connection with the tenor of the inaugural address, amounted to a charge of universal corruption. Common justice required that the individuals against whom such a charge was brought should have opportunity to defend themselves. None was given. No enquiry was ordered. No specifications were made. No examination was had. When a public servant of unblemished character, now a member of congress, demanded of the late secretary of state an explanation of this implied charge of corruption, under which he had been removed from his place as a clerk in the department of state, he was coolly informed that no harm was meant, and that no explanation would be given. Even this was not the worst. Attempts were made in more than one instance, under pretext of a stricter control of the public accounts, to deprive these victims of persecution of the scanty remnant of their means of subsistence. A public servant of most respectable character and venerable years, was not only removed and thrown upon the world, at the age of more than eighty, but actually had his furniture seized, under a treasury warrant of distress, upon a false pretence of peculation, at a time when, as appears from a subsequent decree of the competent tribunal, the United States owed him more than twelve thousand dollars. Other cases occurred of a precisely similar character. Can there possibly be any thing behind more revolting than this? There is. In the case of the assistant post master general, there is too much reason to fear that there occurred in the post office department an actual alteration of the public accounts, for the purpose of fixing, upon that most meritorious public servant, the blame of some supposed malversation in office, which had really been committed by his successor. We cannot but hope, for the honor of the country, that some explanation will yet be given of this transaction, consistent with the probity of the individuals at the head of the post office.

The history of the administration of civilized governments presents no parallel to this scene. Many of the partisans of gen. Jackson have shrunk from the task of defending it and taken refuge in a bold denial of the fact. Public writers of some respectability did not scruple to affirm that there had been no removals on account of political opinions, as if—to use the indignant language of a Roman historian—they thought they could blot out the record of their slongs from the memory of the human race. After a while, the charge of corruption seems to have been abandoned, and in his first message to congress the president justified himself on the principle of rotation in office; affecting to suppose that the public would derive an advantage from employing new agents, as fast as the old ones acquired, by experience, the capacity for performing their duties with ability and success.

This doctrine, which, if applied to practice in private life, would be thought to argue a degree of imprudence, equivalent, in its effects, to insanity, and would immediately ruin the most prosperous establishments—was gravely announced as an acknowledged truth. It was affirmed that the natural effect of possessing an office was to create negligence and corruption in the person holding it; that the public lost more in this way than was gained by the additional experience and dexterity resulting from the same cause—that frequent changes in office were highly expedient—that all offices should be held for short terms, and, in particular, that the constitution ought to be so amended, that no person be eligible a second time for that of the president of the United States.

These principles, whether true or false, are irrelevant to the subject, because the removals from office by gen. Jackson were not made, either really or professedly, for the purpose of change or rotation, but, professedly, because the incumbents were incapable or corrupt, and really for the purpose of "rewarding his friends and punishing his enemies." No disposition has been shewn to apply this wholesome principle of rotation to the president's partisans, and the best illustration of the real meaning of the language used on this occasion, is to be found in a letter written from the president's house, under the president's frank, to a member of the Pennsylvania legislature, requesting him to use his influence to procure from that legislature a nomination of the president for re-election. The doctrine of rotation in office had, therefore, nothing to do with the matter. The motives assigned, in the first instance, by the president, viz: the incapacity and corruption of the incumbents, would have been sufficient had they been founded in fact; but it was felt that no removal for such reasons would be tolerated by the public, unless the supposed incapable or corrupt functionary was first put upon his trial, and allowed an opportunity of defending himself against the specific charges, whatever they might be, which has been preferred against him. It was therefore found necessary to abandon this ground, and for want of a better, resort was had by the president's counsellors to the stale sophistry of rotation in office.

On the appointments which were made to fill the numerous vacancies occasioned by these removals we shall not enlarge. Among them are to be found the names of some persons very honorably known to the public; but they were made, in general, almost avowedly for no consideration but that of party, and in many instances, with so little discretion that they were rejected, in one or two cases, almost unanimously, by the senate. An occurrence of this kind is, we believe, without a parallel at any previous period of our history, and would be sufficient of itself to throw discredit on the administration. Of the persons so rejected, some were recommended anew, under circumstances amounting to an attempt by the president to force them into office against the known opinion of his constitutional advisers. On this occasion was also exhibited a striking example of the inconsistency between his professions before his election, and his subsequent practice. Although he had himself signalized the appointment of members of congress to office as a great abuse, he selected four of the five heads of department from that body, and appointed its members to other places to an extent which had never been known before. Although he had inveighed with warmth against the supposed corruption of the public press under the preceding administration, and in his inaugural address had even denounced his predecessor for having brought the patronage of the government into conflict with the purity of elections, partisan editors were now among the most favored classes of pretenders to employment. Under these circumstances the first year of the present administration presented little else than an eager and tumultuous scramble for place. The offices which were instituted for the public service and ought to be conferred with a view to no other object, were apparently, and even avowedly, treated as prizes to be distributed among the conquerors in the struggle of parties. What have we been fighting for—was the language of some of the leading administration prints—if the public officers are not to be the spoils of victory?

Such were the auspices under which the present administration commenced their career. They were not of a kind to create very high expectations from the result of their labors. The subsequent progress of events has shown very clearly that the least favorable expectations that could possibly have been formed of their policy were yet too sanguine—that our most important institutions are now seriously threatened, and that a continuance in the course that we are pursuing, will probably plunge the country, at no distant period, into dangerous—perhaps irretrievable confusion.

In the conduct of the foreign affairs, there has been, however, an appearance of success, in consequence of the fact that several arrangements with foreign powers which had been matured, and in some instances concluded, under the preceding administration have been made public under this. Such was the case with the treaties with Austria, with Brazil, with Denmark, and with Turkey. In announcing the conclusion of these arrangements, a president of an elevated and generous disposition would have taken delight in doing complete justice to the merits of a political competitor. General Jackson took to himself, without scruple or ceremony, the whole credit of these negotiations, and on this and other occasions affectively avoided to mention the name of his predecessor. In the recent treaty with France the principle adopted by the last administration in the arrangements with Denmark were proposed as the basis of a compromise and in consequence of a favorable change in the internal policy of the former power, was assented to. The treaty with Great Britain, supposing it even, which may well be doubted, to have been the best arrangement which circumstances rendered practicable, was obtained by concessions derogatory to the honor of the country and the dignity of the government.

The administration have, in other respects, mistaken the leading principles in the true foreign policy of the country. With Russia, our most important, powerful, and useful political ally, our relations have been wholly neglected. At a critical moment in the political affairs of Europe, when our influence with the emperor of Russia might have been turned to the best account in favor of the cause of free government, when the breaking out of a general war may render his influence in Europe of the highest importance to ourselves, a distinguished citizen, who had for many years represented the country with extraordinary credit and success at St. Petersburg, and who was known to be personally agreeable to the imperial family, is abruptly recalled, and the affairs of the legation left in a wholly uncertain state.

On the great subjects of internal policy which have given rise to conflicting opinions and adverse feelings among the citizens, the course of the president has been so inconsistent and vacillating that it is impossible for any party to place confidence in his character, or to consider him as a true and effective friend. By avowing his approbation of a judicious tariff, and at the same time recommending to congress precisely the same policy which had been adopted as the best plan of attack by the opponents of that measure: by admitting the constitutionality and expediency of internal improvements of a national character, and at the same moment negating the most important bills of this description which were presented to him by congress, the president has shown that he is either a secret enemy of the system, or that he is willing to sacrifice the most important national objects in a vain attempt to conciliate the conflicting interests or rather adverse party feeling and opinions, of different sections of the country. How can the president be regarded at the north and west as the friend of the tariff and internal improvements, when his only recommendation at the south is the anticipation that he is the person through whose agency the whole system is to be prostrated? With a chief magistrate who acts upon so temporizing and uncertain a policy it is obviously impossible that any abatement can take place of the excitement that prevails upon these disturbing topics. It is only through the intervention of a statesman, in whose known sentiments and elevated character all parties can place confidence, that a hope can be entertained of so regulating these delicate subjects as to extend a fair and impartial protection to all the great branches of industry, whether agricultural, commercial, manufacturing, or mechanical, without exciting the just apprehensions of any sincere and enlightened friend of the constitution and the union.

Next to the great measures of policy which protect and encourage domestic industry, the most important question, connected with the economical policy of the country, is that of the bank. This great and beneficial institution, by facilitating exchanges between different parts of the union, and maintaining a sound, ample, and healthy state of the currency, may be said to supply the body politic, economically viewed, with a continual stream of life-blood, without which it must inevitably languish, and sink into exhaustion. It was first conceived and organized by the powerful mind of Hamilton. After having been temporarily shaken by the honest though groundless scruples of other statesmen, it has been recalled to existence by the general consent of all parties, and with the universal approbation of the people. Under the ablest and most faithful management it has been for many years past pursuing a course of steady and constantly increasing influence. Such is the institution which the president has gone out of his way in several successive messages, without a pretence of necessity or plausible motive, in the first instance six years before his suggestion could with any propriety be acted upon, to denounce to congress as a sort of nuisance, and consign, as far as his influence extends, to immediate destruction.

For this denunciation no pretext of any adequate motive is assigned. At a time when the institution is known to all to be in the most efficient and prosperous state—to be doing all that any bank ever did or can do, we are briefly told in ten words, that it has not effected the objects for which it was instituted, and must be abolished. Another institution is recommended as a substitute, which, so far as the description given of it can be understood, would be no better than a machine in the hands of the government for fabricating and issuing paper money without check or responsibility. In his recent message to congress, the president declares, for the third time, his opinion on these subjects, in the same concise and authoritative style as before, and intimates that he shall consider his re-election as an expression of the opinion of the people that they ought to be acted on. If, therefore, the president be re-elected, it may be considered certain that the bank will be abolished, and the institution which he has recommended, or something like it, substituted in its place.

Are the people of the United States prepared for this? Are they ready to destroy one of their most valuable establishments, to gratify the caprice of a chief magistrate, who reasons and advises upon a subject, with the details of which he is evidently unacquainted, in direct contradiction to the opinion of his own official counselors? Are the enterprising, liberal, high-minded, and intelligent MERCHANTS of the union willing to countenance such a measure? Are the cultivators of the west, who find in the bank of the United States a never-failing source of that CAPITAL, which is so essential to their prosperity, and which they can get no where else, prepared to lend their aid in drying up the fountain of their own prosperity? Is there any class of the people or section of the union so lost to every sentiment of common prudence, so regardless of all the principles of republican government, as to place in the hands of the executive department the means of an irresponsible and unlimited issue of paper money—in other words, the means of corruption without check or bounds? If such be, in fact, the wishes of the people, they will act with consistency and propriety in voting for General Jackson, as president of the United States; for, by his re-election all these disastrous effects will certainly be produced. He is fully and three times over pledged to the people to negative any bill that may be passed for re-chartering the bank, and there is little doubt that the additional influence which he would acquire by a re-election, would be employed to carry through congress the extraordinary substitute which he has repeatedly proposed.

It may be said, indeed, that the President's counselors do not agree with him on this subject, and may perhaps over-rule his opinion before the time of action shall arrive. In his recent report to congress, the secretary of the treasury has, in fact, undertaken an apology for the bank, which, coming from him, can be viewed in no other light than as a formal defence of that institution against the attack made upon it by the president, although he concludes with the intimation, that his views may be modified in compliance with those of the executive; as if he were not himself the head of the financial branch of that department. It is one of the singularities of our present political situation, that while we are told on the one hand, by the president's partisans, that his acknowledged incapacity may be remedied, by the employment of an able cabinet, we are now told, on the other hand, by his "able cabinet," that they cannot control the president's conduct, and that their sounder notions must be modified so as to meet the views of the executive. In what we are apt enough to consider as the corrupt and servile courts of Europe, a cabinet minister who cannot prevail upon the "executive" from whom he holds his commission to adopt his views, resigns his commission. He deems it improper to modify his opinions, in order to suit them to the views of the executive—in other words, to make himself responsible for a scheme of policy which he does not approve. But supposing that the present secret ry of the treasury, if continued in place, would be able, when the time of action should arrive, to over-rule the president's opinion, substitute his own views for those of the executive, and stay this great mischief—what security can the country feel that he will be so continued? Who can assure us that some explosion, resulting from causes too frivolous to be even made, with propriety, the subject of distinct allusion in a serious political document will not scatter the present cabinet, like the last, to the four winds of heaven, and introduce into the councils of the nation a new set of advisers, still more ready than those who now occupy that place, to accommodate their opinions to the views of the executive? The only security which the country can have for the proper discharge of the duties of the executive, as of every other branch of the government, is the capacity, fidelity, and industry of the individual who is by law responsible for that department—that is, the president; and experience has amply shown, that an individual who is unfit for the office himself, is equally unfit to select those who are to assume his responsibility, and be virtually presidents under him.

The judiciary department, an institution still more important than any one can be that merely affects the economical interests of the union, seems also to be seriously threatened by the perverse policy of the present administration. The great improvement made by the adoption of the present constitution in the political system of the old confederation, was the extension of the power of the union over the persons of the individual citizens, through the action of the federal courts, including, as a necessary ingredient, a right of appeal to these courts from the decisions of those of the states. The adoption of this single salutary provision raised us from the situation of a cluster of poor, imbecile, and, for all substantial purposes, mutually dependent states, oppressed with debts, disturbed by insurrections, and on the verge of absolute anarchy, into our subsequent condition of one great, powerful, prosperous, glorious, free and independent federal republic. The rejection of this wholesome principle would bring us back again to the same situation in which we stood before. Notwithstanding this, a powerful party, represented by several important states, and by a large and respectable portion of the people seem to consider the union, and the principles on which it is founded, positive evils. Much is said of the sovereignty and independence of the states, and of their right, as separate states, to annul the laws; while threats are held out, which have not in all cases proved to be mere empty words, that this is to be immediately exercised, and the union of course virtually dissolved.

Under these circumstances, it was to have been expected that the president, as the head of the executive department, and natural guardian of the rights and powers of the federal government, would have exerted his influence to check this seditious spirit. Instead of this, we find him openly encouraging it, and acting under its influence. When a proposition to repeal, without a substitute, the section of the judiciary act which provides the appeal from the state to the federal courts, and forms the foundation of the jurisprudence of the union in this respect, was made in congress, it was favored by the immediate friends of the president, and by the journals under his control; and at the recent organization of the house of representatives, the member proposing the repeal was placed at the head of the judiciary committee. These proceedings seem to indicate a settled intention in the administration to shake the independence and destroy the efficiency of this most important branch of the government.

The last point which we shall notice in the conduct of the administration, as relates to the internal policy of the country, and it is, perhaps the most important of all, as far as concerns the principles involved, is that of our relations with the Indian tribes, and particularly that portion of the Cherokees situated within the territorial limits of Georgia. A series of solemn treaties concluded successively by all the administrations of the general government since the period of its establishment, guaranteed to these Indians the possession of their lands without interference or intrusion from any quarter, their right of governing themselves according to their own laws within those limits, and their character of sovereign states. An act of congress passed in the year 1802, authorized and required the president to protect the Indians in the rights guaranteed to them by those treaties, if necessary, by the employment of the military force. In open violation to all these solemn engagements the state of Georgia has extended her jurisdiction, over the territory and persons of the Cherokees situated within her limits, interrupted them in the possession of their dwellings and plantations, and attempted to deprive them of the character of distinct communities; while the president, instead of protecting the Indians against these acts of wholly unauthorized violence, has openly countenanced the pretensions of Georgia, and, instead of employing the armed force of the United States, in their defence, has actually withdrawn that force at the instance of the offending party, from the scene of action, and left the unoffending natives entirely at the mercy of their enemies.

The recent inhuman and unconstitutional outrages committed under the authority of Georgia upon the persons of several unoffending citizens heretofore residing as missionaries within the territory of the Cherokees, constitutes, perhaps, the most unjustifiable portion of these proceedings. They have received, like the rest, the countenance and approbation of the general executive. Few examples can be found, even in the history of barbarous communities, in which the sacred character of a minister of religion has furnished so slight a protection against disrespect and violence to the persons invested with it. We rejoice to learn that this subject will shortly be presented to congress and to the people, in full detail, and in a form fitted to excite the attention which it so well deserves.

It appears from this concise survey of the present situation of the union, as regards the principle branches of our foreign and domestic policy, that it is the duty of all patriotic citizens not only not to aid in the re-election of the present incumbent to the chief magistracy of the union, but to use their efforts to effect a change in the national administration; and in order that such efforts may be made with success, the time has now arrived when it is necessary to designate a candidate for the succession, whose name may be a rallying point and a principle of union among the citizens who are opposed to the re-election of Andrew Jackson.

In looking around the country for such a person, it is almost superfluous to say, that the eyes of all are instinctively directed towards that illustrious citizen, who, after occupying the most distinguished places in the gut of the people; and in all the departments of the administration, has dwelt for some years past in tranquil retirement in the bosom of the west. The qualifications and services of HENRY CLAY are too well known to require the aid of our testimony. As a statesman, advocate and orator, he has been from his youth upward the pride of our courts and legislative halls. As an ardent, fearless, and consistent friend of liberty and republican institutions, he has endeared himself to their friends throughout the world. His devotion to this great cause, furnishes the surest guaranty that he will, on all occasions, assert the supremacy of the laws, and that executive power in his hands, will be their faithful auxiliary. As one of the principal founders, and supporters of the American system, he is entitled to the warm support of all who desire the prosperity of the great cause of domestic industry and internal improvement. The signal success with which he conducted the affairs of the department of state, evinces his capacity for the actual business of administration; while the generous frankness and captivating warmth of his manners, eminently fit him for a station, where in order to be useful, it is necessary to conciliate the public favor as well as to transact with ability the public business. He has already been designated in various ways, and in all quarters of the country, as the candidate of the opposition, and we consider it the duty of all good citizens to use all the means in their power for the purpose of securing his election.

In proposing, in connection with the name of HENRY CLAY, as a candidate for the presidency, that of JOHN SERGEANT as a candidate for the vice presidency of the United States, the convention offer to your suffrages a citizen of acknowledged talents, various accomplishments, large experience in the highest and most honorable public trusts, unblemished reputation, and the most ardent and unwearied zeal for the honor and interest of the country. Pennsylvania has long looked up to him as one of her chief ornaments, and the citizens of other parts of the union, in placing him in the second office in the executive department of the government, will be happy to shew their concurrence in sentiment with that great and patriotic state.

Without meaning to encourage an undue confidence, which would only generate inactivity, we believe that, with proper exertion, the success of the good cause is beyond the possibility of doubt. The present administration has for some time past been justly discredited in public opinion.—General Jackson has been gradually losing, ever since the commencement of his official term, the popularity with which he entered it. Whole sections of the union have been alienated from him by his strange and inconsistent course upon the tariff and internal improvement. Extensive interests have been thrown into opposition by his reckless and unaccountable denunciation of the bank. Many of his ablest partisans among the public writers have deserted him, and if any considerable portion of reflecting men still adhered to his standard, the wanton attacks upon the judiciary department must have driven them from it in disgust.—The unity of his party is completely broken up, the open rupture between the friends of the vice president and the late secretary of state; and at this moment the citizens opposed to his re-election, constitute a large majority of the whole population of the U. States. Under these circumstances it is quite apparent, that nothing is wanted but zeal, activity and concert, to ensure success.

The aspect of this convention—the unanimity and spirit which have marked its proceedings—and the favorable results which may be expected from its influence upon the community, afford ample security that these requisites will not be deficient.

Such, fellow citizens, is the character of the present administration—such are the motives for changing it, and such are the persons whom we recommend to you for the chief executive officers. Compare their qualifications with those of their competitors; and may the goodness of Providence, so enlighten your choice, that it may tend to promote the security and permanence of our excellent political institutions, and the true greatness and glory of our beloved country.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Extracts from the message of governor Stokes, to the legislature, delivered 22nd Nov.

In relation to our internal concerns, I have to observe, that it would be impossible to conceal from the world, and needless to disguise from ourselves, the fact that a certain class of the population of the state have become more discontented and ungovernable than heretofore. Fanatics of their own complexion, and other incendiaries, have fomented these discontents and have incited them in many instances to enter into conspiracies dangerous to the peace and safety of the country. To guard against these evils, which in all probability will continue, the utmost caution and prudence are necessary. Restrictive laws have been enacted without producing the desired effect; and the crimes committed in a late insurrection in an adjoining state, would seem to require further and early attention to this subject. Instead of multiplying severe and sanguinary laws to operate upon those who know little and care less about them, would it not be advisable to establish a more efficient and accountable police, and arm and equip one or more companies of volunteers or detached militia in each county, to be called out when required and to be paid while in actual service? It is believed that such a force, in aid of the civil authority, would effectually secure the peace of the country; and the public arm, belonging to the state could not be placed in safer hands. These state troops might be enrolled for one or more years, be held responsible for the arms and ammunition furnished, and not be suffered to abandon the service during the term of their engagement.

“Another subject demanding your attention is the situation of the funds of the state, invested in the banks. The time is near at hand when the charters of the several banks in this state will expire. The stock held by the state in the state bank of N. Carolina, has for some time past only yielded an interest of 4 per cent. per annum; the stock held by the state in the bank of Cape Fear has, for the last two years, yielded an interest of only three per cent. per annum; whilst the stock held by the state in the Newbern bank has not, for nearly three years, yielded any interest. The period will shortly arrive when all these banks are authorized by law to make a division of part of their capital stock. The funds vested by the state in these banks amount to seven hundred and twelve thousand seven hundred dollars, ($712,700). This amount of stock, at the common interests of six per cent. ought to produce forty-two thousand six hundred and seventy-two dollars, ($42,672), annually, whereas, in fact, it produces only eighteen thousand five hundred and sixty-two dollars, ($18,562), not equal to three per cent.”

“Under these circumstances, would it not be advisable to provide for the establishment of a new bank, in which the funds of the state may be invested, under such regulations as to your wisdom and experience shall be deemed safe and proper? Or shall the state rely, for the accommodation of its citizens and for a circulating currency, upon that portion of the capital of the United States bank, which has already, or may hereafter be allotted to their office of discount in North Carolina?”

“I would willingly bring to your notice the important object of forming a navigable communication between the waters of the Albemarle Sound and the Atlantic ocean, north of Cape Hatteras, and would recommend the application of all the means in your power towards its accomplishment; but believing that, without the aid of the general government, the resources of the state are inadequate to the undertaking at this time, and the last general assembly having urged upon our members of congress the propriety of claiming that aid, we must console ourselves with the hope that this great national work will receive the sanction and support of the national legislature. Having bestowed such immense sums towards the construction of roads and canals in other states, it is believed that this desirable object, so essential to the interests of North Carolina and of the union, will not long be overlooked or neglected.”

“It is to me a source of much gratification to have observed, and to have it in my power to state, that the excitement which seems to pervade a sister state, upon the subject of the tariff, has effected little change in the opinions of the citizens of North Carolina.—With regard to the policy of that measure, there is, so far as my information extends, a perfect union of sentiment. All deprecate it as unequal in its operation, and destructive of the interests of the southern planter. The period, however, has not yet arrived, which, in the judgment of this community, authorizes the adoption of doctrines subversive, in their nature, of all order, and manifestly tending to weaken, if not destroy, our whole system of government. The state is justly proud of having given the first legislative sanction to the spirit of the revolution. The same love of rational liberty which prompted this high example, induced our revolutionary statesmen to consider attentively and anxiously the form of government proposed for their adoption. Satisfied, after full investigation by successive conventions, that no powers were delegated but such as were essential to the existence and preservation of the union, it is no matter of surprise that they and their children should support and defend the compact, and neither seek nor desire a remedy beyond it. A new congress is about to assemble. The same spirit of compromise which adopted the constitution, must preserve it, or the question whether man is worthy and capable of self-government, remains yet to be solved. The patriotism of the country looks with confidence to the councils of the nation for a wise and liberal system of policy, and will not hastily arrive at the conclusion that the perils of the revolution were fruitless and vain."

LEGISLATURE OF GEORGIA.

Executive department, Milledgeville, Nov. 25, 1831.
To the senate and house of representatives:

I submit to the general assembly, for its consideration, copies of two communications received yesterday, purporting to be signed by Henry Baldwin, esq. one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, and to be citations to the state of Georgia, to appear in the supreme court, on the second Monday in January next, to show cause before that tribunal, why two several judgments should not be set aside, which have been lately rendered in the superior court of the county of Gwinnett, against Samuel A. Worcester and Elizar Butler, for a violation of an existing law of the state, committed within its jurisdictional limits. Also a copy of a notice purporting to be signed by William Wirt and John Sergeant, as counsel for Samuel A. Worcester and Elizar Butler, informing me of an intended application to the supreme court, for a hearing on writs of error filed by those persons.

The obvious object of the proceedings to which this notice and these citations relate, is to call in question, and attempt to overthrow, that essential jurisdiction of the state, in criminal cases, which has been vested by our constitution, in the superior courts of the several counties of the state.

My respect for the supreme court of the United States as a fundamental department of the federal government, induces me to indulge the earnest hope, that no mandate will ever proceed from that court, attempting or intending to control one of the sovereign states of this union, in the free exercise of its constitutional, criminal or civil jurisdiction. "The powers not delegated by the constitution to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively." Such a control over our criminal jurisdiction, as these proceedings indicate, is believed, has not been delegated to the United States, and consequently cannot be acquiesced in or submitted to.

Any attempt to infringe the evident right of a state to govern the entire population within its territorial limits, and to punish all offences committed against its laws, within those limits, (due regard being had to the cases expressly excepted by the constitution of the United States), would be the usurpation of a power never granted by the states. Such an attempt, whenever made, will challenge the most determined resistance; and if persevered in, will inevitably eventuate in the annihilation of our beloved union.

In exercising the duties of that department of government, which devolve on me, I will disregard all unconstitutional requisitions, of whatever character or origin they may be; and to the best of my abilities, will protect and defend the rights of the state, and use the means afforded to me, to maintain its laws and constitution.

Signed,

WILSON LUMPKIN.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To the state of Georgia, greeting:

You are hereby cited and admonished to be and appear at a supreme court of the United States to be holden at Washington on the second Monday of January next, pursuant to a writ of error filed in the clerk's office of the superior court for the county of Gwinnett in the state of Georgia, wherein Elizar Butler is plaintiff in error and the state of Georgia is defendant in error, to shew cause if any there be, why judgment rendered against Elizar Butler as in the said writ of error mentioned should not be corrected; and why specially justice should not be done to the parties in that behalf.

Witness the honorable Henry Baldwin, one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, this twenty-seventh day of October, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one.

His excellency the governor of Georgia.

LEGISLATURE OF OHIO.

We learn from the message of governor McArthur, that the aggregate amount disbursed at the treasury of this state for canals and other purposes, for the year ending 15th November, 1831, is $236,190 31, leaving a balance in the treasury of $6,073 33 cents—that the amount of the foreign debt contracted on account of canals, is $4,400,000, bearing an interest of $260,000 annually—that in addition to the amount thus borrowed, $237,128 08 cents had been transferred from the different school funds to the use of the canals, the interest on which last sum, payable to the citizens of Ohio, is $15,427 68 cts. making the whole canal debt $4,637,128 08, and that the entire annual interest, is $275,427 68 cts. The amount received into the treasury from the sale of lands granted by congress to the state of Ohio for canal purposes, during the year ending as above, was $55,090 79 cts. The amount of tolls collected on the several canals, for the year ending on the 1st November last, was as follows:

On the Miami,	$36,177 78
" Ohio,	63,934 47

Making in all, $100,112 05
 which, after deducting the expenses of collection, leaves $94,619 15 net profit to the state.

The navigation of the Erie and Ohio canal has been opened as far south as Chillicothe, a distance of 250 miles. This, with the Miami canal, and the navigable feeders connected with the main line, make an amount of finished canal, now navigable, of about 344 MILES. It is believed by the acting commissioners that that portion of the Ohio canal between Chillicothe and Portsmouth, a distance of 30 miles, together with the Granville feeder, 6 miles, already in a very advanced state, will be completed in July next, when Ohio will have, of navigable canals, 400 miles.

The effect of the canals, as far as completed, upon the commerce and general interests of the state, is thus described by governor McArthur:—

"The first arrival of canal boats at Columbus, on the 25th September, and at Chillicothe, on the 23d of October, inspired our fellow citizens of the Scioto valley with the most lively and cheering anticipations; and the cheap and pleasant mode of travelling thereby afforded, has occasioned a great increase of communication between the citizens, not only of our own state, but of those adjoining. The increase of commerce, and the vast amount of merchandise transported upon canals, have already wrought in the country through which they pass, many changes of substantial improvement; and our fellow citizens of the south western and western states, have in many instances availed themselves of this means of conveying their merchandise to their respective places of residence. The regular arrival and departure of packet and freight boats in the various towns along the line of the canal, at a season of the year when navigation has been hitherto unknown, has produced a spirit of enterprise amongst our citizens, which, it is believed, will be attended with the most beneficial effects to the country. The increased demand for the staple products of the country, and the consequent enhancement in the price, must animate the farmers to improve and cultivate their lands to more advantage, and thereby place our agricultural population in that flourishing condition which is so essential to the prosperity of our state."

In looking at the rapid advance which our young sister of the west has made in the perfection of her system of internal improvement, we feel that we should be doing injustice to her enterprise, and to our own feelings, were we not to express the pleasure which we derive from witnessing the brilliant example which she has set to her elders in the confederacy—an example so alluring and salutary, that we trust its influence will not only be felt, but serve to marshal every member of it in the way which leads to the promotion of objects at once so permanent in their character, and so beneficial in their influences upon the rising interests of the states.

[Chron.

LEGISLATURE OF LOUISIANA.

Extracts from the governor's message to the legislature of the state, conveyed at an earlier period than usual in consequence of the events referred to in the following passages; and also for the purpose of appointing a senator of the United States, in place of Mr. Livingston, resigned.

"Conspiracies of slaves, instigated, most probably, by imprudent propagandists and the false philosophy of a certain class of persons styling themselves the friends of the blacks, and who in reality are their greatest enemies, have been plotted in several of the states of the union. These attempts at rebellion have most fortunately been every where repressed with the greatest facility. In Virginia, where these troubles assumed the most serious aspect, the revolted, who only shewed courage when attacking unarmed men and helpless women and children, made no show of resistance when opposed by armed citizens. Those who escaped with life, the first effervescence which they themselves had excited, were soon arrested and delivered over to the just vengeance of the offended laws.

"These insurrections have, with much reason, excited the serious attention of most of the states of the south.—They have taught the necessity of adopting effective measures for preventing the like scenes of disorder; and we cannot be astonished that here, perhaps, more than any where else, they have been regarded with most jealous solicitude. It is well known that in a state, situated as we are, the evil that may result from such attempts can be but very partial and momentary;—we know that we can at any time re-establish order so soon as the public peace is disturbed—we know that it would be absurd to suppose that a revolt of this nature could terminate definitely in any other manner than the total extermination of those who took part in it. But as we are far from desiring the destruction of those whose ignorance only could lead them into such plots, our object in taking the subject into consideration is not so much to provide the means of arresting and punishing our guilty slaves, as it is to save them as far as possible from becoming criminal."

The governor adverts to the inequality of the two minds of population, which he considers however of less consequence than the frequent introduction into the state of the very worst kind of the laboring sort, and in many cases of such as have been elsewhere participants in conspiracies. The deportation inflicted by Virginia on her slaves is declared to be injurious in this way to other states.

"By a law of the year 1829, the legislature prohibited, under severe penalties, the introduction into this state of any slave or slaves who have been accused of any conspiracy or insurrection, or who have resided in any country or any state or territory of the United States during the time of any conspiracy or insurrection in such country."

The total prohibition of slaves into this state, during a certain number of years, appears alone to me to be the only method of avoiding the danger with which we are threatened. All other means have been tried, and experience has proved their inability.

"This law, if you should think proper to enact it, would not prevent the emigration to this state, of those of our fellow citizens of other states who might, in good faith, wish to bring their slaves and establish themselves amongst us. It can be so framed as to make an exception in their favor, yet obliging them to furnish proper and sufficient proofs as to the good character of the negroes, and security for the faithful fulfilment of their intention of employing them in agriculture. They should also be deprived of the privilege of selling them during a certain number of years; their guarantees would prevent greedy speculators from making use of the exception to their advantage."

On the sugar-duty the message has the following remarks.

"It would be easy to shew beyond a doubt, that the duties complained of, are of no injury to other interests, and only afford us the protection necessary to prevent us from being crushed by foreign competition; that this protection, far from affording a local profit as advantageous to other states, as it is in Louisiana; that it has occasioned a reduction of more than two thirds, in the price of sugar, that by the continuance of the duties, Louisiana will soon be enabled to turn her sugar for the consumption of the United States, and that it in contempt of the public faith, which we have reason to think pledged to the protection of a culture, into which we were induced to embark by the laws of the union, and in which we have expended immense capital, our manufactures should be ruined, the citizens of the United States would thus pay a tax of more than three cents per pound to the profits of foreigners, because the price of West India sugars would be increased much more than the amount now levied, on them in the shape of duty."

The subject of the public lands calls forth the following observations:—

"The subject of the public lands is so painful to me, that I would willingly avoid referring to it, but I feel it my duty to call your serious attention to the sales of pretended vacant lands in this state, by which many families find themselves on the eve of being stripped of the property they have possessed for several generations in virtue of the concessions granted them by the then existing governments of this territory. When we reflect that it is far from being proven, that the general government land, by the treaty of cession, the right of reserving the property in lands really vacant, within the limits of our state, and that our cause may be considered as having been defeated upon without having been investigated, because in guaranteeing to us upon our admission into the union, 'all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States,' it would appear by the treaty that we have the same title to those lands which the original states possessed over their vacant lands, and in virtue of which they retained them; it is difficult to suppress the expression of the feelings that naturally arise in regard to the conduct of the agents of this government, who, not satisfied that we have entirely renounced our claims to the public lands, seek to deprive us of our private property, the possession of which, it certainly will not be denied, was guaranteed to us by the treaty. A respectful but firm remonstrance addressed by you to congress, will no doubt add much weight to the representations which our delegation may make on this subject."

 In consequence of the preceding message, a very severe law was passed against the further introduction of slaves, unless in specified cases; which those interested will refer to for their own instruction.

The New Orleans papers of the 21st Nov. contained a copy of the act in full, and it has been published extensively in other journals, for the general information of holders of and dealers in slaves in other states—in substance as follows:—

It prohibits the introduction of slaves into that state, except by persons emigrating thereto for the purpose of residence, and by citizens for their own use and service, provided that in the latter case they shall not be procured from the states of Mississippi or Alabama, or from the territories of Florida and Arkansas, and provided also that in neither case they shall be sold, mortgaged or loaned, for five years after their introduction. All slaves introduced contrary to these provisions are to be made free, and then removed from the state by the executive; and all persons so introducing them are subjected to a penalty of $500 to $1,000 for each slave, and to imprisonment until the same be paid, together with the cost of prosecution.

ALABAMA.

The legislature of Alabama assembled on Monday, the 18th November, at Tuscaloosa. We annex two extracts from gov. Moore's message, on the United States bank and the tariff, questions on which every development of public sentiment is now interesting.

"The bank of the United States is a company bank, in which four-fifths of the stock is owned by individuals. There are twenty-five directors, twenty of which are chosen by the individual stockholders, the remaining five by the president of the United States; the number chosen by the individuals is at all times sufficient to control the direction of the bank. It is, therefore, a separate interest, and liable to all the objections of other company banks, and much more alarming in a government, because of its ramifications throughout the union, in defiance of state authorities. These directors have chartered authority at their discretion, to establish at any point or points, in your state, a branch or branches of a so-called United States bank, no other than a powerful moneyed institution for the emolument, and under the direction of a few individuals of different states and nations. Where are your state rights when twenty-five men, private citizens, have a right thus to trample upon your authority? Collectors of tariff duties are officers of government, and the tax which they collect is for public use, but the national banking tax collectors are private citizens, not material of what nation or country, collecting a tax within the limits of your state, probably against its consent, and for their own aggrandizement. I respectfully submit to your consideration the propriety of making a strong and decided expression against the policy of re-chartering the bank of the United States, especially on its present principles and with its present powers, and discountenancing (for that is the limit of your state right) the establishment of other branches in the state of Alabama.

As a state, we ought to be decidedly opposed to the policy of the American System. It would seem folly to oppose argument to the absurd idea, that the imposition of a tax or duty on any species of fabric will not enhance its price to the consumer; and until this be true, we are sufferers, and cannot favor the policy. There is, however, much diversity of opinion on the subject of the extent to which we may legitimately oppose the existing tariff.

The constitution vests in congress the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;" and it so prescribes that "all duties, imposts and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States." If congress, therefore, enact a law, to lay and collect duties, which are uniform throughout the United States, the law is within the prescribed powers and binding on the states; but if the duties be not uniform throughout the United States, the law authorizing their collection is unconstitutional and not binding on the states.

But congress by the enactment of the law have said, that the duties are uniform throughout the United States, (otherwise they had not the power to enact the law) and therefore constitutional. But the state of Alabama says they are not uniform throughout the United States, and therefore the law is not constitutional. Here is the issue. How is it to be tried? I think not by battle in the first resort. The judicial power of the United States is vested in a federal, supreme, and other inferior courts, and extends to "all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, the law of the United States, &c." But this case arises under the constitution, or laws of the United States, therefore this case is cognizable by the federal, supreme or other inferior courts. But the federal court divides the case against the state; truly, and the decision establishes a part of the constitution, which before was in dispute. But the evil still exists. And the law which oppresses us, has been determined by the proper tribunal to be constitutional. The fault is therefore in the constitution; it vests too much power in congress. The next inquiry is—how is the constitution to be amended? The instrument itself has pointed out the mode.

Having exhausted all the means known to the constitution, and consistent with the union, to obtain relief from legal oppression in vain; if the evil still exist, and be insufferable, it is now the state may begin to calculate the value of the union (a painful reflection to a heart that has always cherished a belief that its value is incalculable.) It is now by reverting to the first principles of a free government, the state may nullify the acts of congress, by declaring them inoperative and void within its limits, and set up for itself. But before it takes this step, it ought carefully to weigh the advantages of a secession, against those of the union, and see that the former clearly preponderates."

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS

Transmitted to the congress of the U. States, Dec. 1851.
REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Department of war, November 31, 1851.

Sir: In obedience to your instructions, I have the honor to submit herewith a general view of the operations of this department, and of the various branches of its administration, together with the accompanying reports of the officers in charge of the different bureaus for the past year.

The plan of organization by which the great objects of public concern, committed to the war department, are divided into different classes, and placed under the more immediate control of respectable and responsible officers, is well calculated to promote fidelity, promptitude, and economy in the management of these important interests. By assigning to each officer a particular branch of the service, experience in the general administration is acquired at the department, and in the practical details at the places of execution. On this subject I have only to remark, that the importance of our Indian relations, both present and prospective, demands a similar arrangement for this portion of the public affairs. The existing organization rests upon executive authority, but the efficiency and responsibility of that department would be greatly promoted, if its duties were regulated by a legislative act. This measure has more than once been recommended in the reports of my predecessors, and I beg to add my conviction to theirs of its necessity.

The condition of the army is satisfactory in its material, and so far in its morale as depends upon the exertions of the officers. Its appropriate functions are performed honorably for itself, and useful for the country. Although some of the details of the service are susceptible of improvement in their administration, and some in their legislation, still, in the general result, whether viewed as an arm of national defence, or as a depository of military knowledge and experience, it has attained the great object for which it was raised and is maintained. It is efficient without being expensive, and adequate to the exigencies of our service without being dangerous. I refer to the report of the major general commanding, for the detailed operations of the year.

The annual reports of this department have already brought before the government the subject of desertion; and I regret to state, that this serious evil is not only continuing but increasing. Inquiries have been instituted into the causes of this evil, and the most efficient remedy, and much valuable information is contained in a report from the war department of February 17, 1850. But no measures have been adopted to check a practice, which, from its extent and impunity, not only materially injures the service by the loss of the men and the consequent expense, but threatens in its progress, and by its example, to destroy that principle of fidelity which is the only safe bond of connection between the soldier and his country. In the present state of our martial law, and of its necessary administration, there is in fact no adequate punishment for the crime of desertion. Confinement and military tribunals can inflict; and where a soldier is confined in a guard-house, and his companions stationed without to secure him, and with all the facilities of constant communication, we may well doubt whether his situation is so much more unpleasant then there, as to give to this mode of punishment any salutary effect upon the discipline of the army; and at all our posts, and particularly at those upon the inland border, the soldiers are generally employed either in the line of their duty or upon fatigue, and a sentence to hard labor subjects them to little more than the ordinary demands of the economy.

Whether any system of moderate rewards will prevent this practice, may be doubted; but certainly the abolition of all efficient punishment, without providing any substitute to operate upon the pride and hopes of the soldier, is in fact to invite him to abandon his colors, whenever the restraints of discipline cause temporary dissatisfaction.

To retain a part of the bounty and the pay, and thereby to provide a fund for the use of the soldier when discharged, to reduce the period of service, and to increase the pay of the rank and file of the army, and particularly of the non-commissioned officers, are among the most prominent suggestions, which have been offered upon this subject.

The number of desertions in 1826 were	436
1827	848
1828	870
1829	1,115

And in 1831 they will probably amount to 1,450

An estimate has been prepared at the adjutant general's office, founded upon a minute examination and comparison of the various expenses incident to the maintenance of a soldier, and exhibiting the actual pecuniary loss of the government arising from this cause.

This loss was for 1826	dolla. 54,393
1-28	63,137
1829	98,848
1831, probably	118,301

The tabular statement accompanying the report of the commanding general shows, that the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, may be increased so as materially to improve their condition, and not exceed the aggregate amount of $5,930 dollars. The non-commissioned officers particularly are, in our service, inadequately paid. Every military man is sensible of their importance to the character and efficiency of an army; and such inducements should be offered, as would ensure the engagement of competent men, qualified, by their principles, habits, and intelligence, to acquire the confidence and to command the respect of the soldiers. That this additional compensation would have a tendency to diminish the mischief of desertion, there is no doubt, but in so great a degree as to save the whole sum proposed to be given, expense being only determined.

A very large proportion of all the crimes committed in the army may be traced to habits of intemperance. This vice is, in fact, the prevalent one of our soldiery. I am satisfied that ardent spirits should not form a component part of the ration. By issuing it, we furnish to those already accustomed to its use the means of vicious indulgence, and we invite those, who are yet temperate, to acquire this destructive habit. It is certainly sufficient for all useful purposes, if there be in truth any utility in the consumption of ardent spirits, that the officers be authorized to grant permission for its purchase. In proper quantities, to those whose situation may require it, without the direct agency of the government in allowing and providing it.

There were expended, in 1830, 12,537 gallons of whiskey, at the cost of 12,133 dollars. If this sum were applied to the purchase of tea, coffee, and sugar, for the use of the soldiers, their habits and morals would be greatly improved, and the discipline and respectability of the army promoted. The regulation of this department, by which an officer is made to the soldier of committing the whiskey ration by the payment of one cent, is productive of little advantage. In this estimate of the value of this part of the ration, reference has been had only to the actual average cost of the article, delivered in large quantities at the various posts. But this is unjust to the soldier. He estimates it very naturally at the retail price, averaging probably five cents, and the present offer of commutation is in fact to ask him to sell his whiskey for one-fifth of its value. It is far better to have the troops no choice but to allow them a liberal compensation, and in such articles as will be most useful.

The American soldier is well paid, fed, and clothed; and, in the event of sickness or disability, ample provision is made for his support. But his moral culture is wholly neglected. There is no arrangement in our service for his mental or religious improvement. And there is perhaps no similar service, in which such a measure is more necessary. The use of the positions occupied by our troops are upon the verge of civilization, or beyond it. They are retained for years, and under circumstances, which, if not counteracted, almost necessarily lead to great immorality. None of the ordinary means of instruction are within their reach, and neither these habits nor principles can be improved or fortified by those institutions, which are elsewhere so generally established, and so useful. Independently of any obligation which may be supposed to exist on the part of the government, to provide for the moral as well as the physical wants of a class of men, who, in devoting themselves to the service of the country, become unable to provide for their own wants, it is certain, that, as a question of expediency, this measure is recommended by powerful considerations. Where moral and religious principles are practically acknowledged, their sanctions will add validity to the obligations voluntarily assumed by the soldier, and his duties will be performed with more fidelity and alacrity. A soldier becomes a better man he will become a better soldier. Discipline and subordination will be promoted, punishments diminished, and all the details of the service will feel the spirit of improvement. I am satisfied that the appointment of chaplains, and their employment at such of our military posts, as from their position and the strength of the garrisons may seem to call for such a measure, would be productive of great advantages to the service; and to the satisfaction of individuals, it would be equally beneficial. In religious exhortations in life, and the consolations of religion in death, would be freely offered to them. The experiment, I think, is worthy of trial; and the expense can scarcely be placed in fair competition with an object, which promises such useful results for the present improvement and future happiness of the soldiers.

The various departments of the staff of the army have performed their respective duties with great efficiency, and in the few great divisions of efficiency, economy, and accountability. The present mode of administration seems well adapted to the nature of our service. The several tabular statements accompanying this report exhibit the satisfactory manner in which the public funds have been expended and accounted for. Nor is there any reason to believe, that the slightest loss will occur from the fiscal operations of the year. It is hoped that the system, as thus benefited, must be not only safe in itself, but safely administered. And for this administration we are indebted to the superintending care of the several bureaus, and to the various officers employed under them, throughout the country. It is evident, that a fund of knowledge has been provided, which cannot fail to be useful in any future emergency. Armies may be suddenly raised, and discipline in the beginning of the late war, furnished a memorable lesson upon this subject, which is to be never forgotten, as we recede from this period of that occurrence. Our present system, and for a small enough for the wants of the service, and yet such is its nature, that it may be indefinitely extended, as the pressure of circumstances may require, ensuring in every branch of the service a judicious system of administration, and experienced officers to direct and supply it.

The military academy has existed sufficiently long, under its present mode of instruction, to enable the government to send the country to form a correct estimate of its value, both with relation to the cadets themselves, and the character of the army. Of 560 officers, having rank in the line, and now in the service, 404 were educated at that institution. These young men have been prepared by a rigid and judicious course of instruction and discipline for the various duties of their profession. 600 have entered the army, of whom but a few have been discarded, and during the present year only two have been brought before courts martial, and they upon charges not affecting their moral character.

These facts are honorable and decisive proofs of general good conduct, when the high state of discipline and the course of vigilant inspection in our service are taken into view. In the annual reports of the visitors at West Point, is exhibited the result of the most careful observations made by persons competent to estimate, and prepared to scrutinize the claims and conduct of the institution. For some years these reports have borne unequivocal evidence to the fidelity and ability of the superintendent, and the academic staff generally, and to the proficiency and correct deportment of the pupils. The record which is kept of their progress and conduct, the spirit of emulation necessarily excited, and the judiciousness of the examinations, which are offered, by the publication of the names of the most distinguished individuals, and by their admission into the army in the order of merit, are powerful incentives to exertion, and, when combined with the strict and impartial examinations to which all must submit, can scarcely fail to secure for the service of their country, such, and such only, as are qualified to be useful.

The science of war is an advancing one. In Europe, where peace is seldom long maintained, a large portion of the talent and intelligence of the community is devoted to this study, and to the consideration and suggestion of changes and improvements in all the branches of their military establishments, whether they relate to the operations in the field, to the various supplies, or to the various course of administration. We must look to those nations for the benefit of the world, who are engaged in the progress in the elements of military knowledge will depend, in a great measure, upon the careful preparation and education of the young men, who are annually appointed in our service. Our local position, as well as our free institutions, may delay, but we have no right to expect they will prevent, the occurrence of war. At this event may happen, it is the part of true wisdom to be prepared for it, as the depositary of a fund he made without too this important subject, which will enable the government to diffuse among the community upon the approach of danger. By assigning a portion of the officers, previously in service, to new regiments and corps, these will soon acquire a competent knowledge of their duties, both in subordination and discipline. The great object of present economy and future security can in no other mode be so certainly attained. When we advert to the comparative effects of training young men for the course of life before them, or of selecting them indiscriminately for the army, without reference to previous pursuits, it will be manifest, that the present system can alone ensure the attainment of the important objects, connected with our military establishment.

It has been stated, that the number of cadets allowed at the military academy is 300. There are in the line of the army 813 officers of all descriptions. Of these, on the 1st day of November, there were present for duty 303, of whom 19 were field and 284 company officers. There were 460 sick and on furlough. And 143 were detached upon various staff duties including the regular staff departments of the army, objects of internal improvement, and the emigration of the Indians. The number of companies being 700, there were not three officers to each company. Taking into view the casualties of the service, there ought not to be less than that number at all times with their companies. The law provides, that there shall be three to each company of infantry, and five to each company of artillery. In addition to these, the act of April 30th, 1812, allows one supernumerary brevet lieutenant to be attached to each company. Of these, there are in service 93, leaving 12 vacancies to be filled from the graduates of the military academy for 1832. The number of the average annual vacancies in the army for five years has been 23, and of the graduates to fill these, 40. There may, therefore, at the next examination, be forty candidates for appointment, and but 26 vacancies to be filled. I would suggest the expediency of adding 34 to the number of brevet ad lieutenant, and leaving them unattached to do duty whenever required. Every company may thus have three officers at all times present, to the great advantage of the service.

I refer to the report of the chief of the engineer department for the various details connected with this interesting branch of the public service.

The suggestions he has made, appear to me worthy of consideration. I particularly call to your notice the proposition for a new organization of the corps of engineers. The views of this department upon that subject, were expressed in a report of January 13th, 1831, in answer to a call of the house of representatives, and in those views I fully concur. The measure is required by the public interest.

Unless provision is soon made for the repair and preservation of the road constructed by the United States from Cumberland to the Ohio river, that expensive and useful work will be ruined. Many parts of it are now so seriously injured as to render traveling difficult, and sometimes dangerous. The destruction of this great connecting link between the Atlantic and the western states, which, with a light transit duty and a proper system of administration, would last for ages, cannot be anticipated without great concern. The continuance of this road in the state of Ohio is threatened from this danger. With the consent of the general government, that state has established toll gates, and levies a moderate duty upon that part of the road within her jurisdiction, which is finished.

I consider it my duty to bring this matter before you, in the hope that it will engage the attention of congress, and that a similar system for the preservation of the road from Cumberland to the Ohio river, will be adopted. If it were placed by the general government in proper repair, and then surrendered to the states respectively, through whose territories it passes, under the same conditions, as were annexed to the cession of the road in Ohio, there is reason to believe, that the arrangement would receive the sanction of those states, and that a permanent system and adequate means would be provided for the preservation of this work, in a manner not birth to come to the communication upon it. If this be not done, or some other expedient adopted, the road will soon fall into a state of entire dilapidation.

By an executive regulation of the 31st of June, 1831, the topographical corps was reorganized from the engineer department, and now constitutes a distinct bureau. The duties of this corps are important to the country; and if its organization is rendered commensurate, a mass of valuable materials, exhibiting a general and accurate view of the geographical outlines of the union, will be collected, to be used for any of the great purposes of peace or war. In a report from this department, of January, 1831, this subject was considered, and the necessity of the measure stated and enforced. To that report, containing valuable suggestions, I take the liberty of referring.

A minute knowledge of the features of a country is essential to any plan of military operations; and this knowledge should be gathered in a season of leisure, and deposited in our archives. In Europe, it is considered one of the most important elements of military science, and upon its contributions have often depended the efforts of a whole campaign. All the surveys made by the topographical corps are returned to the depot in this department, where they can be detained or combined, as it may become necessary to exhibit views more or less general. These surveys, dissecting the country in all directions, and particularly along its streams or routes, where roads already are, or probably will be established, prevent those features, which are most important to the operations of armies. A general survey of our coasts, both Atlantic and interior, is demanded by considerations of national interest as well as of character. Arrangements for the former were made some years since, and expensive instruments were procured, which are yet in the possession of the government. The work was actually commenced, but was abandoned before much progress had been made. If this operation were resumed, and committed to one of the scientific corps of the army, its completion would prevent the recurrence of those circumstances, to which the abandonment of the project may be attributed. Our own lakes are but imperfectly known to us, and the advance of the settlements and the extension of commerce require, that this defect should be supplied. Labors of this nature have engaged the attention of the most enlightened governments, and the materials become a part of the general stock of the public knowledge. The necessity of peculiar instruction for officers devoted to these duties, both in the scientific principles and in the practical details, is well illustrated in the report from the topographical office. Some of the operations require an intimate knowledge of the most abstruse investigations of the present day, in mathematical and physical science; and we shall in vain look for their accomplishment, unless the government make provision for the measure.

To the ordnance department is committed the duty of providing and preserving the necessary armament for the land service of the United States. The trust is a responsible one, requiring fidelity in the administration, and practical as well as scientific knowledge in the execution. The expenditure for these objects exceeds 900,000 dollars annually, and the value of the accumulated property equals twelve and a half millions. But the pecuniary service gives it a still deeper interest, than the preservation of the armaments. The arms are well fabricated and preserved, and in sufficient abundance, and unless we keep pace with the improvements, which modern science and ingenuity are making, the consequences may hereafter prove disastrous. The necessary provision for these objects cannot be made without much time and experience, and that they may be ready for use they must be procured in peace. A stable and efficient organization is therefore essential to the ordnance corps; and in the report of the officer at the head of the branch, I find his views of its present condition. I recommend the subject to your favorable notice. The suggestions are the result of much experience, and present in a forcible manner the defects of the existing system, and the meliorations that are required. I am assured, that the adoption of the measures proposed would give greater efficiency to the operations of this section of the public interest, and more economy in its expenditures.

A commission of experienced officers will be directed to investigate the subject, and to report their views concerning the various matters connected with it; and particularly with respect to the patterns and construction of the small arms and cannon, and any alterations which experience may have indicated. Their report, when received, will be laid before you.

I have made some examination into the condition of this branch of the national defence, with the view of ascertaining the supplies in service and in depot, and determining the quantity yet required to meet the demands of a prudent forecast. The result I shall submit for your consideration.

The United States have now in serviceable condition about 465,000 muskets. The annual demand to supply the necessary loss in the army and the militia, and to furnish the issues to the respective states, is 18,300. The same manufactured in the public armories is about 55,000, and 31 private manufacturers make a total of 36,000, at the average cost of twelve dollars each. We had at the commencement of the late war 240,000 muskets in depot, and during its progress 66,000 were made and purchased. At its termination, there were but 80,000 at the various arsenals, and many of those in the hands of the troops were unserviceable. Eight years were then required to replace the number lost during the war.

From 1802 to 1814 there were 3,056,257 small arms of all descriptions, procured for the French service.

And during the same period, for the British service, 3,142,306. The average number of small arms annually fabricated in the French arsenals from 1802 to 1814, was 119,573.

In the British arsenals, from 1802 to 1814, 1,001,947. The stock on hand in Great Britain, in 1817, in depot, was

In the public service,	818,323
Total,	1,019,296

The number in depot in France, in 1811, was 600,000, not including the great number in service.

These statements may be useful in determining the proper number of small arms, which ought to be provided in this country. Being almost imperishable, when properly secured and preserved, their accumulation occasions no actual loss, as the time must, in all probability, come when they will be wanted.

Considering the nature of our service, requiring, as it does, an unusual expenditure of these articles in consequence of the great proportion of militia we employ, and the system of rotation, by which their services are regulated, and great losses consequently occasioned, and also the necessity of large depots in different sections of such an extensive country, each of which should be adequate to any probable emergency, it is evident that our stock of small arms should at all times be large. Whether the quantity now on hand be sufficiently so, is for congress to determine.

There are now 633 cannon of various calibers, for field service. And there are at the arsenals and in the old fortifications, 1,165. But these cannon are all of antiquated patterns, and, with the exception of the six pounders, amounting to 344, and a few of the heavier pieces, are considered unserviceable. There have been procured for the armament of the new fortifications, 1,814 cannon of the improved pattern.

The old fortifications will require, (probably), 646
The new, already completed, 2,587
Those contemplated by the board of engineers, a part of which are now constructing, 4,045

Besides these, proper field trains, deposited in different sections of the union, and sufficiently large to meet probable contingencies may be estimated at 853.

The average cost of our cannon is 5 94-100 dollars per hundred pounds, which gives the following for those of different calibers:

For 42-pounders,	720 dollars.
32 "	180
24 "	330
18 "	345

It is estimated that an iron cannon will not safely bear more than 1,300 discharges with the service charge, after which it should be broken up.

The United States have no armories for the fabrication of cannon. The practice for some years has been to make contracts with the owners of the four foundries at Richmond, Georgetown, Pittsburg and West Point, to the amount of the annual appropriation, allowing about an equal proportion to each, and paying such price as the ordnance department, on the best information, judge reasonable.

This procedure has been repeatedly stated in the annual reports to Congress, together with the reasons which led to it. There are furnished in the capacity and experience required to conduct this business; in the necessity of depending in some degree upon the integrity and character of the manufacturers, as there may be defects in the price not easily discoverable, owing to the necessity of purchasing in large quantities; and in the fact that, in the event that a general competition for these supplies were excited, the existing establishments would be broken down and others endeavor to take their place, which would either lead from similar causes, or furnish common profit for service; and thus leave the Government, at some critical period, without the means of procuring this indispensable arm of defense. The provisions of the Act of March 3, 1879, in relation to, (to preserve) are serious objections to this course; and I bring the subject before you at this time, that it may be fully considered.

It appears to me, that a public armory for the fabrication of munitions is required by obvious considerations. By forming such an establishment, the necessary experience and artisans would be provided, and such supplies of heavy ordnance manufactured as the government might direct. The actual value of the article would be ascertained, and contracts with individuals could be formed with a full knowledge of the circumstances. There would be no danger of combinations, nor would any injury result to the fabricator. The supplies might be so controlled as to leave no fear of a deficiency in the quality or quantity of this essential arm of defense.

The report of the surgeon general will be found a review of the operations of the medical department, and the propositions submitted by him for its better organization. Fifteen thousand dollars are annually expended for the employment of private physicians, because the corps is not sufficiently numerous to discharge the duties demanded of it. We have sixty four military hospitals and recruiting rendezvous requiring surgeons, and we have in service about fifty three surgeons and assistants. There is no doubt that the present organization, under all circumstances, is for the public interest. An increase of the corps as recommended by the surgeon General, is evidently required.

The considerations urged by him for an addition to the pay of surgeons and assistants, are certainly forcible. There is no portion of the army, whose compensation is so inadequate, nor is there any, which presents less prospect of reward. There are but two grades of rank in our medical service, and the emolument of the highest is but little superior to that of a captain.

It is due to the army, that the subject of these commissions should be placed before you. So far as respects the prices and compensation of officers holding these commissions, the present regulations are just, and well calculated to prevent any injury to the public service. No officer can receive the pay of his brevet until after serving in that capacity when on duty and having a command according to his brevet rank. There are twenty three officers in the army now drawing brevet pay.

These brevet commissions presuppose experience in the office, and are founded upon the presumption, that circumstances may arise when his services may be useful in a more extensive sphere than that in which, by his final commission, he is required to perform them. The brevet is not a promotion, but a recognition of merit in any other. Our regular troops and militia must frequently be put together. When thus co-operating, the officers of the regular army take rank of all militia officers of the same grade; whatever may be the date of their respective commissions. This rule is not confined to the militia, but extends to all the armed forces of the nation. In the militia, however, the brevet is not a permanent distinction; it gives no experience its proper weight. In granting brevet commissions, after ten years' service in one grade, agreeably to the present rule, experienced officers will be provided for command upon detachment, or at posts where the

The construction, which has been given to the law upon this subject, has restricted the granting of brevet commissions upon or only to those cases only where ten years' services have been rendered under such prior commissions. There may be no doubt respecting the correctness of this view, and also the expediency of the restriction.

These commissions except in the few instances stated, and in very rare operation, are expiate to the government. The young men, in their operations, are to be good conductors and instructors to future officers. They cannot be allowed, for instance, to faintly qualify an officer for a higher grade; and to attain by merit promotion the rank of brigadier general from the commencement of a term of a captain, requires a period of forty years. And if to this be added the necessary progress through the lower grades of first and second lieutenant, the prospect of a young man, on entering our service, is not very flattering. Nor can he now, as in former times, be allowed to be a soldier and officers, with equal economy, to live respectably; and few will leave for their children any inheritance but a good name.

It is important that a just pride of character, personal and professional, should be encouraged in a class of men, whose order and fidelity are essentially upon the cultivation of such a feeling. This form of promotion, so useful in war and economical in peace, is a honorable object of ambition, and cannot fail to stimulate the exertions of the officers of the army.

The situation of the militia demands the attention of the Government. Owing to defects in the system itself, or in the management of its administration, public confidence has been impaired in the efficacy of that great branch of the national defence. This is to be regretted; for, although this force cannot be regarded as our main reliance, it is nevertheless the best, and the only, we possess of a plausible auxiliary, and one which the nature of our institutions has allowed as they are to a large standing army, renders indispensable. The power of organizing, arming and disciplining the militia is vested by the constitution to congress; and if the laws upon this subject are faithfully executed, it is for the benefit of that body to apply the remedy.

1926, a board of officers, selected from the regular army and militia, was convened at the seat of government, and instructed to take into consideration the militia system generally, and to submit recommendations which might appear to them useful. Thus it embodied much intelligence and experience; and their report is an able and interesting one. I advert to it, in the hope, that this subject may engage the attention of congress, and in the opinion, that the plan of organization recommended by that body is the only one, which offers any real prospect of improvement or efficiency.

the condition and prospects of the aboriginal tribes within the United States, and yet the subjects of anxious solicitude to the government. Circumstances have occurred of late years, which have produced important changes in the intercourse between them and us. In some of the states, they have brought within the operation of the ordinary municipal laws, and have thereby become subject to the legislative enactments. This procedure renders most of the provisions of the acts of Congress upon this subject inoperative; and a crisis in Indian affairs has evidently arrived, which calls for the establishment of a system of policy adapted to the existing state of things, and which shall be upon a more permanent basis than that of Indians. Whatever change may be contemplated in their present situation, no one will advocate the employment of force proper influence in effecting it. It is due to the character of government, and the feelings of the country, not less than to honor and pleasant results, that of our unhappy race the more of kindness and far-berance should mark the whole course of intercourse with them. The great object, after giving ourselves up to the best chance of their permanent well-being, is to establish the basis of the integrity of our views, and the wisdom of the course we have pursued. It is the wisdom which in the retrospect for various reflection on our part, and pleasant recollection on thine; and it is only by a dispassionate examination of the subject, and by prudent and timely action, that we can hope to repair the errors of the past by the wisdom of the future.

Indians, who are placed in immediate contact with the settlements of the United States, have now the alternative of migration, of remaining in their present position, or of migrating to the country west of the Mississippi. If they are induced to remain, their political condition becomes a subject of considerable national interest, as they may either retain all those institutions, constitute them a peculiar people, both socially and politically, or they must become a portion of that great community which is gathering round them, responsible to its laws, and looking to them for protection.

Can they expect to maintain that quasi independence they have heretofore enjoyed, and could they so maintain it, would the privilege be beneficial to them?

The right to extend their laws over all persons, living within their boundaries, has been claimed and exercised by many of the states. The executive of the United States, has, on full consideration, decided that there is no power in that department to interpose any obstacle to the assumption of this authority. As upon this co-ordinate branch of the government devolves the execution of the laws, and particularly many of the most important provisions in the various acts regulating intercourse with the Indians, it is difficult to conceive how these provisions can be enforced, after the president has determined they have been abrogated by a state of things inconsistent with their obligations. How provisions can be conducted, treasuries removed by military power, and other acts performed, which require the co-operation of the executive, either in their initiation or progress.

I do not presume to discuss this question. I find it determined, and the settled policy of the government already in operation. Whatever diversity of opinion there may be upon this subject, those who are most opposed to these views will probably admit, that the question is a judicial one, connected with its relations and pregnant with serious consequences. The claim of exemption from the operation of the state laws, which is presented in favor of the Indians, must rest upon the constitution of the U. States, upon natural right, or upon conventional engagements. If upon the former, it may be doubted whether the instrument contains any grant of authority to the general government, which necessarily divests the state legislatures of their jurisdiction over any class of people, living within their respective limits. The two provisions, which can alone bear upon the subject, seem to have far different objects in view. If the claim rest upon natural right it may be doubted whether the condition and institutions of this rude people do not give to the civilized communities around them and among whom they live, the right of guardianship over them, and the power to legislate in a forthright practice of all other civilized nations under similar circumstances—a practice, which, in its extent and exercise, has varied from time to time, as the relative circumstances of the parties have varied, but of whose limitations the civilized communities have been and must be the judges. And, besides, if the Indian tribes are independent of the state authorities, on account of their natural and primitive rights of both, then the Indians are equally independent of the authorities in the United States. The claim upon this ground, places the parties in the attitude of entire independence; for the question then is not how we have divided our political power between the confederated government and its members, and to which we have entrusted the exercise of this supervisory authority, but whether the facts of nature gave to either any authority upon the subject. But, if the claim rest upon a legal conventional engagement it may then be doubted whether in all our treaties with the Indian tribes there is any stipulation, incompatible with the exercise of the power of legislation over them. If there were, the legislative power of congress, as well as that of the respective states, would be annihilated, and the treaties alone would regulate the intercourse between the parties. But, on a careful investigation, it will probably be found, that, in none of our treaties with the Indian tribes, is there any guaranty of political rights incompatible with the exercise of the power of legislation. These instruments are generally either treaties of peace or of cession. The former treatise and secure to the Indians interests of which they were deprived by conquest, and the latter define the boundaries of cessions or reservations, and provide for the territory and the consideration to be paid, really the principles of the new compact. In both, every sound rule of construction requires, that the terms used should be expounded agreeably to the nature of the subject-matter, and to the relations previously subsisting between the parties. If general expressions are not controlled by these principles, then the term "their land," or, as it is elsewhere called "their hunting grounds," instead of meaning what our own negotiators and the Indians themselves understood, that possessory right, which they have heretofore enjoyed, would at once change our whole system of policy, and leave them as free to sell, as it would individuals or nations to buy, those large unappropriated districts, which are rather visited than possessed by the Indians.

It may be remarked that all rights secured by treaty stipulations are wholly independent of this question of jurisdiction. If the Indians are subject to the legislative authority of the U. States, the authority will not be exercised so as not to contravene their rights. If they are subject to the respective states, such too, will be the course of legislation over them. And if, undesired, any right should be impaired, the Indians have the same respect as our own citizens to the tribunals of justice for redress; for the law, while it claims their obedience, provides for their security. The supremacy of the law will be exercised so as not to contravene their obligations to the Indians, nor are these necessarily impaired by it. It may be difficult to define precisely the nature of their possessory right, but no one will contend that it gives them the absolute title to the land with all its attributes; and every one will probably concede that they are entitled to as much as is necessary to their comfortable subsistence. If we have entered into any stipulations with them, the government is not at liberty to withdraw them with the limited powers of the government, or interfering with paramount obligations, the remedy is obvious. Let ample compensation be made to them by the United States, in a spirit of good faith and liberality. The question would be one, not of pecuniary amount, but of national character and national obligations.

That we may neither deceive ourselves nor the Indians, it becomes us to examine the actual state of things, and to view these as they are, and as they are likely to be. Looking at the circumstances attending this claim of exemption on the one side, and of supremacy on the other, is it probable that the Indians can succeed in the establishment of their pretensions? The nature of the question, doubtful, to say the least of it; the opinion of the executive; the practice of the older states, and the claims of the young ones; the difficulties which would attend the introduction of our system of a third government, complicated in its relations and difficult in its principles; public sentiment, naturally opposed to any reduction of territorial extent or political power; and the obvious difficulties, inseparable from the consideration of such a great political question, with regard to the tribunal, and the trial, the judgment, and the process; prevent obstacles which must all be overcome before this claim can be enforced.

But could the tribes, and the remnants of tribes, east of the Mississippi, succeed in the prosecution of this claim, would the issue be beneficial to them, immediately or remotely?

We have every reason to believe it would not; and this conclusion is founded on the condition and character of the Indians, and on the result of the efforts, which have been made by them, and for them, to resist the operation of the causes that yet threaten their destruction.

I need not endeavor to illustrate these positions. They are connected with the views, which will be found in the sequel of this report. And it is not necessary to embarrass a subject already too comprehensive.

A change of residence, therefore, from their present positions to the regions west of the Mississippi, presents the only hope of permanent establishment and improvement. That it will be attended with inconveniences and sacrifices, no one can doubt. The associations, which bind the Indians to the land of their forefathers are strong and enduring; and these must be broken by their migration. But they are also broken by our citizens, who every day encounter all the difficulties of similar changes in the pursuit of the means of support. And the experiments, which have been made, satisfactorily show, that, by proper precautions, and liberal appropriations, the removal and establishment of the Indians can be effected with little comparative trouble to our country. Why, then, should the policy of this measure be doubted, or its adoption opposed? The whole subject has materially changed, even within a few years; and the imposing consideration it now presents, and which are every day gaining new force, call upon our government and the country to determine what is required on our part, and what course shall be recommended to the tribes. If they resist, they must decline, and eventually disappear. Such is the result of all experience. If they comply, they may be comfortably established, and their moral and physical condition meliorated. It is certainly better for them to meet the difficulties of removal, with the probability of an adequate and final reward than, yielding to their constitutional apathy, to sit still and perish.

The great moral debt is owed to this unhappy race is universally felt, and acknowledged. Direct acts of opinion expressing the proper mode of discharging this obligation, but its validity is not denied. And there certainly are difficulties which may well call for discussion and consideration.

For more than two centuries we have been placed in contact with the Indians. And if this long period has been fruitless in useful results, it has not been so in experiments, having in view their improvement. Able men have been sent to the frontiers, and good men attempting to improve it. But, if these labors have been as unsuccessful in the issue, as many of them were laborious and expensive in their progress.

The work has been aided by governments and communities, by public opinion, by the obligation of the law, and the sanction of religion. But its history furnishes abundant evidence of entire failure, and every thing amount to upon the frontier confirms its truth. The Indians have either refused as our settlements advanced, and until their fragments with some kindred tribe, or they have attempted to establish themselves upon reservations in the vain hope of retaining the pressure upon them, and of preserving their peculiar institutions. Those, who are honest to us, have generally suffered most severely by the debasing effects of adroit spirits, and by the loss of their own principles of restraint, few as these are, without the acquisition of ours; and almost all of them have disappeared, crushed by the onward course of events, or driven before them. Not one instance can be produced in the whole history of the intercourse between the Indians and the white men, where the former have been able, in districts surrounded by the latter, in withstand successful attempts at subjugation or long enough to have elevated one of their race and depressed the other. Such a monument of former successful exertion does not exist.

These remarks apply to the efforts, which have been heretofore made, and whose history and failure are known to us. But the project has been lately revived with a different interest, and is now pursued in this labor of philanthropy, and who, from a religious interest, time must show. That must of these engage it in this labor are actuated by pure and disinterested motives, I do not question. And, if in their estimate of success they place too high a value upon appearances, the error is natural to persons zealously engaged in a task calculated to enlist their sympathies and awaken their feelings, and has been common to all, who have preceded them in this labor of philanthropy, and who, from a religious interest, have indulged in anticipations of the most signal success, only to be succeeded by disappointment and despondency.

That these exertions have recently been productive of some advantage, may well be admit it. A few have probably been reclaimed from abandoned habits, and some, perhaps, have really appreciated the inestimable value of the doctrines which have been taught them. I can speak from personal observation only of the northern and northwestern tribes. Among them, I am apperbrenne the benefits will be found but few and temporary. Of the condition of the Cherokees, who are said to have made greater advances than any of their kindred race, I must judge from such information as I have been able to procure. Owing to the prevalence of slavery and other peculiar causes among them, a number of the half-breeds and their connections, and perhaps a few others, have acquired property, and with it some education and information. But I believe the great mass of the tribe is living in ignorance and poverty, subject to the influence of the principal men, and submitting to a state of things, with which they are dissatisfied, and which offers them no rational prospect of stability and improvement.

The failure, which has attended the efforts heretofore made, and which will probably attend similar attempts upon similar principles, may be attributed partly to the inherent difficulty of the undertaking, resulting from characteristics peculiar to the Indians, and partly from the mode in which the operations have been conducted.

Without entering into a question which opens a wide field for inquiry, it is sufficient to observe, that our primitive people, as well in their habits and opinions as in their customs and pursuits, offer obstacles almost insurmountable to any considerable and immediate change. Indolent in his habits, the Indian is opposed to labor; impudent in his mode of life, he has little forethought in providing, or in saving. In domestic economy, he is ignorant, and once his own traditions and institutions, he is satisfied of their value, and dreads the anger of the Great Spirit, if he should depart from the customs of his fathers. Devoted to the use of ardent spirits, he abandons himself to his indulgence without restraint. War and hunting are his only occupations. He can endure, without complaining, the extremity of human suffering; and if he cannot overcome the evils of his situation, he submits to them without repining. He attributes all the misfortunes of his race to the white man, and looks with suspicion upon the offers of assistance that are made to him. These traits of character, though not universal, are yet general; and the practical difficulty they present, in changing the condition of such a people, is to satisfy them of our sincerity and the value of the aid we offer; to hold out to them motives for exertion; to call into action some powerful feeling, which shall counteract the tendency of previous impressions; and, under such circumstances, and with these difficulties in view, that the government has been called upon to determine what arrangements shall be made for the permanent establishment of the Indians. Shall they be advised to remain or remove? If the former, their fate is written in the annals of their race; if the latter, we may yet hope to see them renovated in character and conduct by our exertions, and by the influence of the new world.

But, to accomplish this, they must be first placed beyond the reach of our settlements, with such checks upon their disposition to hostilities as may be found necessary, and with such aid, moral, intellectual, and pecuniary, as may teach them the value of our improvements, and the reality of our friendship. With these salutary precautions, much should then be left to themselves, to follow such occupations as the forest or the field, or the cultivation of the soil, without too much interference. Time and prosperity must be the great agents in their melioration. Nor have we any reason to doubt but that such a condition would be attended with its full share of happiness; nor that their exertions would be stimulated by the security of their position, and by the new prospects before them. By encouraging the severity of soil, sufficient trials might be assigned to all disposed to exertion; and, by timely assistance, the younger class might be brought to seek in the farm a less precarious subsistence than is furnished by the chase. Their physical comforts being increased, and the desire of acquisition brought into action, a moral stimulus would be felt by the youthful portion of the community. New wants would appear, and new means of gratifying them; and the great work of improvement would thus commence, and, commencing, would go on.

To its aid, the truths of religion, together with a knowledge of the simpler mechanic arts and the rudiments of science, should then be brought; but if our dependence be first placed upon these, we must fail, as all others have failed, who have gone before us in this field of labor. And we have already fallen into this error of adapting our efforts to a state of society, which is probably yet remote among the Indians, in withdrawing so many of the young men from their friends, and separating them at our expense. They are there taught various branches of learning, and, at some of these institutions, a partial knowledge of the mechanic arts, and of the principles of agriculture. But after this course of instruction is completed, what are these young men to do? If they remain among the whites, they find themselves the members of a peculiar caste, and look around them in vain for employment and encouragement; if they return to their countrymen, they acquire no other benefit: these are neither understood nor valued; and, with the exception of a few articles of iron, which they procure from the traders, the common work of our mechanics is useless to them. I repeat, what is a young man, who has been thus educated, to do? He has no means of support, no instruments of agriculture, no domestic animals, no improved farm. Taken in early life from his own people, he is no longer the same man; he has the chance of means of support or exchange; and that, under such circumstances, he should stand himself to a life of interdependence, can scarcely excite our surprise, however it must our regret. I have been earnestly asked by these young men, how they were to live; and I have felt that a satisfactory answer was beyond my reach. To the government only can they look for relief, and if this should be furnished, though at a moderate rate, they might still become useful and respectable; their example would be encouraging to others, and they would form the best instructors for their brethren.

The general details of a plan for the permanent establishment of the Indians west of the Mississippi, and for their proper secu-city, would require much deliberation; but there are some fundamental principles, obviously arising out of the nature of the subject, which, when once adopted, would constitute the best foundation for our exertions and the hopes of the Indians.

1. A solemn declaration, similar to that already inserted in some of the treaties, that the country assigned to the Indians shall be theirs as long as they or their descendants may occupy it, and a corresponding determination that our settlements shall not spread over it; and every effort should be used to satisfy the Indians of our sincerity and of their security. Without this indispensable preliminary, and without full confidence on their part in our intentions, and in our abilities to give the effect, these change of position would exclude all ardent spirits from their new country. This will no doubt be difficult; let a system of surveillance upon the borders, and of proper police and penalties, will do much towards the extermination of an evil, which, where it exists to any considerable extent, is equally destructive of their present comfort and their future happiness.

2. The employment of a quiet force in their immediate vicinity, and a fixed determination to suppress, at all hazards, the slightest attempt at hostilities among themselves.

So long as a passion for war, fostered and encouraged, as it is, by their opinions and habits, is allowed free scope for career, it will prove the master spirit, controlling, if not absorbing, all other considerations. And if in checking this evil some plans should become necessary, they would be sacrifices to humanity, and not to severity.

3. Encouragement to the severity of property, and such provision for its security, as their own regulations do not afford, and as may be necessary to its enjoyment.

4. Assistance to all who may require it in the opening of farms, and in procuring domestic animals and instruments of agriculture.

5. Leaving them in the enjoyment of their peculiar institutions, as far as may be compatible with their own safety and ours, and with the great objects of their prosperity and improvement.

6. The eventual employment of persons competent to instruct them, as far and as fast as their progress may require, and in such manner as may be most useful to them.

Arrangements have been made upon fair and equitable terms with the Shawnees and Senecas of Lewistown, with the Shawnees of Wapashkonetta, and with the Ottowas of Blanchard's fork, and the Maumee, all within the state of Ohio, for the cession of their reservations in that state, and for their migration to the region assigned for the permanent residence of the Indians. A similar arrangement was made with the Senecas in the early part of the year, and they are already upon their journey to their new country. A deputation from the Wyandots has gone to examine the district offered to them; and the general outlines of an arrangement for a cession have been agreed upon, to be formally executed, if the report of the exploring party should prove satisfactory.

It has been suggested that a considerable portion of the Cherokees in Georgia are desirous of availing themselves of the provisions of the treaty, May 6th, 1828 for their removal. With view to ascertain this fact, and to afford them aid offered by that treaty, if they are inclined to accept it, a system of operations has been adopted, and persons appointed to carry it into effect. Sufficient time to form a judgment of the result of this measure has not yet elapsed.

But in all our efforts, which may be made, the subject will be fully and accurately explained to the Indians, and they will be left to judge for themselves. The agents are prohibited from the exertion of any improper influence, but are directed to communicate to the Indians the views of the President, and his decided conviction, that their speedy removal can only preserve them from the serious evils which environ them. It is to be hoped, that they will accept this salutary advice, and proceed to join their countrymen in the district appropriated for their permanent residence.

If the seeds of improvement are sown among them, as many good men assert and believe, they will ripen into an abundant harvest—profitable to themselves in the enjoyment, and to all the members of this dispersed family in the example.

The details of an outrage committed by a party of Fox Indians upon a number of Menomonees at Prairie du Chien, while encamped upon the Wisconsin reservation, and the subsequent proceedings of the officer having charge of the bureau of Indian affairs. The alleged motive for this wanton aggression was some previous injury of a similar nature, stated to have been committed by the Menomonees upon the Fox Indians—a justification, which can never be wanting, where neither truth nor treaties, as in this case, are permitted to cancel the offence.

The aggressive and vindictive difficulties at Rock Island with the Indians, of which the same report furnishes the particulars, shows the necessity of employing upon the frontier a corps of mounted men, to be stationed at the most exposed points, and to be always prepared to follow every party, that may attempt to interrupt the peace of the border by attacking either our citizens, or other Indians. These predatory bands strike a stroke, and disappear. And there is no institution in the Indians, which has a strong tendency to war, that we shall long be liable to the outrage. A military prowess and success form their principal road to distinction. And the interminable forests and prairies of the west offer them the means of shelter and escape. No infantry force can expect to overtake them; and if we are not provided with mounted troops, who can prevent or punish these aggressions, we shall finally be compelled to adopt measures more expensive and inconvenient to us, and more injurious to the Indians.

Very respectfully, sir, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
LEWIS CASS.

To the President of the United States.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ A writer in the "National Intelligencer" thinks that I have been taking one of Rip Van Winkle's long naps, because I spoke of the dog-in-the-manger policy of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, in relation to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road.

I do not profess an acquaintance with the legal details of a controversy so fatal to the public interest, in its arrest of, at least, one of the great lines of communication between the east and west—for the rail road company is well known to be ready to go onward! I had reference only to what I understand to be a simple fact—the road company's proposition to pass the Point of Rocks at the joint expense of both companies, which, in its division, will much less-n the cost which either, setting separately, must incur. Unless there be some reasons urged against this proposition which I have not seen or heard of—the term used cannot be withdrawn.

There appears to be a feeling about the canal which does not exist concerning the rail road. The people of Baltimore have no jealousies with respect to the canal, unless interfering in the construction of their road. Whether the canal shall be made or abandoned, enters not into our calculations of business, any more than matters of the moon. The canal is never spoken of, but with reference to its obstruction of our operations. We feel conscious of power to make the road, and think we know what it will do for us when made; our chief anxiety, therefore, is to march forward, not in hindrance of the canal, but side by side—if the latter company has the same faith in their improvement and feels the same power to effect it, that we have in ours. The time has passed when questions as to the relative utility of rail roads and canals might be discussed—at least, we believe so, and are content with the election that we have made.

☞ The "Richmond Enquirer" thinks it very "modest" in us to express an opinion, that neither Mr. Clay nor gen. Jackson, nor both together, can break down the "iron arch" of the American System, and "compromise" on the tariff of 1816.

We should have expected the commendation of our old friend. Is he immodest enough to entertain the idea of a "compromise" of what he so solemnly regards constitutional principles? Fie, Mr. Ritchie! If the tariff of 1816 may be submitted to on that ground, where will you stand!—Knee-deep in your own consistency—a muddy location, surely! But that's nothing—non veniens.

But these are mere words. No one thinks of a "compromise." A reduction of taxes must be made, but the protecting principle will not, cannot be, abandoned.

☞ Certain resolutions have passed the senate of Georgia, offering a reward of five thousand dollars for the arrest and conviction of persons who shall circulate a small paper published at Boston, called the "Liberator." We regret that state of society which should have deemed a proceeding of this sort necessary to its preservation.

THE CONDITION OF THE LABORING POOR OF ENGLAND. The London Spectator, of Oct. 1, has the following exhibit of the wages and subsistence of a poor family in the south of England.

What a living for a family! This calculation supposes constant employment, and no sickness, and a very small family.

They talk about the public debt and the great number of stockholders having an interest in it, as a safeguard in the government, and bulwark against revolution. What are all these to the vast throng of the stockholders of human misery, reduced to the extreme minimum of the means of sustaining life, and who, if one mouthful be subtracted, must die, or take food with the strong hand!

☞ And is it with working animals, thus paid and sustained, that southern "philosophers" and philanthropists would have the free people of the United States to contend? Shall they "calculate the value" of our laboring citizens, and measure rights to the enjoyment of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," by gallons of sweat, as extracted from the bodies of white or black slaves—mere machines, fastened like cabbages to the soil, and esteemed solely in proportion to their ability to administer to the gratification of a superior or privileged class—though only flesh and blood like themselves? Yes—YES: there are thousands even in this "land of the free," as it is boastingly called, who have no heart for those who labor—no sympathy for the industrious poor—no pride in the growth of a "virtuous population;" who, resist all accumulations of property by working men, and keep back producers, that the distinction which belongs to their own nobility may not be interfered with—the descendants of pedlars talking about rank, and those of exported paupers or felons, perhaps, gathering to themselves respect because of the virtue of their ancestors! If we look closely into things, we shall see that such as these constitute the "house of lords" which forbids any "reform" that may place mechanics in the same rank with the owners of slaves. And they have admirably succeeded in banishing the virtuous and aspiring poor to new habitations, where idleness is regarded a sin and industry obtains both respectability and wealth. Look at the census, for appalling effects of this nobility-policy, on certain sections of our country—some of which are going into desolation, for want of that redeeming part of the people which is as well the glory, as the shield, of every enlightened and prosperous and happy community. How would these have laughed, had they heard it said of FRANKLIN, when laboring with his hard and blackened hands at a printing press, that "he would snatch the lightning from heaven, and break the sceptre of a tyrant king;"—how would they have been smugged, if it had been prophesied of SHREVEASE, while mending an old shoe, that he would sign the "great paper," and pledge his honor (a cobbler's honor!) to support its glorious declaration—aye, and that such pledge would be held valid, though the gibbet was built to punish the cobbler's presumption? Let them look to it, and find out, if in all their own generations since the flood, they have had such a man as was that printer or that cobbler! But there was "no mistake" in these persons—they were the ALMIGHTY'S own noblemen; and extorted that homage which even the contemptible pays to ad-mantime principle and useful talent.

Bring down the wages of a laboring man in the United States to 8s. sterling, or 175 cents per week (on which he must subsist himself and his family!) and we shall have no need of laws to protect the national industry!!!

There would be nothing worth protecting—so far as such persons were concerned; not even LIFE itself, except to PUNISH such a degradation of the human kind! A member of the house of representatives of the United States, with reference to the tariff bill of 1824, swore "by heaven," that if that bill should pass, "Georgia would not submit to it." We shall not swear, but venture to say—that the people of the United States will not submit to a living on POTATOES ONLY, that England may have "free trade" with us—to feed the distempered imagination, or gratify the sordid passions, of an unproductive, labor-hating few. I say "sordid passions," for it begins to be manifest that a mean self-interest is at the bottom of the opposition to the protecting principle, aided, perhaps, by "accusatory politicians," with "glass eyes," "seeming to see the things they see not!" The musket-bearers of the land—the "MEN" who know their rights and know where duty lies, cannot submit to that legislation which shall grind themselves into poverty, that the wild fancies, or avaricious propensities, of a few of the nation of South Carolina, and some in lower Virginia, may be indulged. What would these think of subsisting themselves, with their wives and children, on 178 cents per week? Why—even a cruel master gives better provision and shelter to his black slaves, than this amount of money purchases in England—where provisions are dearer, though labor is cheaper, than with us. And what do these persons mean by "free trade?" It is simply this—that they may export their cotton to England, and exchange it for what is the cheaper labor of that country, though cheapened by the competition of the United States, France, Germany, &c. It has appeared to me, that the whole crop of cotton-manufacturers—(a small part, however, of the cotton-growers, as I shall mention below), are prepared to crawl beneath the throne of England, and say, "O, king live for ever!—be graciously pleased to buy our cotton,—but prohibit, if it seemeth good in thy sight, all other products of American forests, American fields, American workshops, American fisheries, and even, O, king, those of America—sugar, and tobacco and rice plantations—also!" "Do as thou wilt with all these, but let there be 'free trade' between thee and us—our cotton, the product of our slaves, being exchanged with thee for calicoes and negro cloths, the product of thy slaves." And herein, I think, if any one will look seriously into the matter, he will find the whole merit of the question which has been so violently raised in South Carolina! And what is this cotton, after all? It has hardly a greater value, (if so large a one), as its manufacture in the United States, and its culture subsists not one-third so many of the people as its manufacture plentifully feeds. In the gross amount of annual production in the U. States, it stands about as 30 millions of dollars is to 1,200 millions! It has less value than several branches of manufacture, respectively—such as of iron, or wool, or leather; and, compared with the supplies of grain and meats, raised to feed the manufacturers and mechanics, it is a pitiful concern.

But why all this excitement in South Carolina! I ask WHY? This state contains less than a fortieth part of the people of the United States, and grows less than a fifth part of the whole quantity of cotton! Louisiana has a much deeper interest in this product than South Carolina—but the voice of complaint is not heard from her cotton planters. No doubt, they would like a higher price; but many of the most intelligent of them inform us that they expect a yet reduced one, because of excessive cultivation! but say, they can "make cotton" at six cents, or less, the pound—and still do "pretty well"—and besides, the cotton of Louisiana is worth one cent a pound more than that of South Carolina, her small crop of Sea Island excepted. I have direct information from one of the most wealthy and extensive planters of cotton in Louisiana, (a very correct and careful gentleman too, who attends to all his own business, and adds up his two accounts of cash paid out or received), that his WHOLE PLANTATION EXPENSES, even including the abominable "taxes" on cotton bagging and negro cloths, does not exceed three cents per pound on his crop of cotton—and that all which he receives above that price is for interest on capital or personal profit, for the support of himself and his own proper family. His product is about 300,000 lbs.—then if the price be only 8 cents, he gains 15,000 dollars a year; one third of which gives him 5 per cent. on his capital, and he has 10,000 for his personal profits, not counting his interest on capital as such, though it should be so regarded. Nearly the like facts occur on other states—but this example is sufficient; and, with such things before us, may we not well ask what this wild riot and boisterous elmsor in South Carolina? Let the nullifiers be consoled with the certainty that cotton will descend to six cents per lb. annulled by the tariff, and not to be prevented by "free trade"—for the rich lands of Louisiana and Alabama, alone, can produce twice as much cotton as all Europe will receive from us—though our own consumption be deducted from the mighty aggregate. The sun will not retire behind a cloud because gov. Hamilton will it, or gov. Hayne commands it!—nor will Mr. McDuffie talk day-light into darkness; and the LAWS OF TRADE, as affected by scarcity and supply, will no more be set aside for the special benefit of the cotton makers of South Carolina, than the sun nullify his benign influence over the world, on the requisition of the honorable gentlemen named.

And what is it these people seek? I have before me a full and precise statement of all the cotton manufactures of England exported in 1850, to all parts of the world, with many important collateral facts. In that year the value, or first cost, of all such manufactures exported to the United States, (it appears by the treasury tables), was nearly six millions of dollars—but the whole quantity of cotton consumed in these manufactures, making a full allowance for waste, was equal to only about 27,000 bales of 355 lbs. each, which, I understand, is nearly the real average weight of the bales exported from the United States—about 9,000,000 lbs. and worth less to us than 900,000 dollars. What then is the English market for cotton, as dependent on her supplies of cotton goods for the United States? About that of some of the manufacturing villages to the eastward! We shall soon bring out these facts in a way that will cause them to be felt. Aye, and they will speak—if not with the logic of a nullifier, in all the power of truth. They shall be pushed "home" upon those who desire to reduce a free white man and his family to a subsistence on 178 cents per week, including house-rent and clothing, &c. for of these we are disposed to speak plainly—and we will! We are not of those who would reduce the laboring white men of the United States (who have to bear "the burthen and heat of the day" in peace as well as in war), to a subsistence on potatoes only (and not enough even of them), that England may glory, because that our people are as miserable as her own; and "nullifiers" rejoice, that LIBERTY endures no blessings, save on those who live upon the labor of others! So long as the "Father of waters" rolls one drop to the sea, so long may any compromise be rejected with such selfish and proud men;—and if they will go to—It hixix, as many (opponents of the majority) did in times past—let them!—for the few shall not expound the constitution and prescribe the law to the many. The majority, in self-preservation, will nullify nullification—though always, we hope, disposed to listen to argument and render justice, having regard to the greater interests to be served, on all questions of expediency; but yielding no principle which shall send the free American superfluous to bed, that white slaves in England may gain more to feed their king and his nobles, his armies of priests, legions of soldiers, and mighty herd of squalid paupers—mere remnants of mankind. The gift of life without the means of living, is—valueless; and we have no feeling with that corruption of mind (as made known by a high dignity of the south), which prefers black slave labor to that of free white men.—As there, and such as these, "make their bed, so let them lie." If slavery pleases them best—let them have their all of it; it is not our concern. We only ask that they will suffer us to prefer ourselves—but we will do that, whether they consent or not; and shall see the end of it—glorious or wretched, as the case may be; fields clothed with the richest verdure of nature, and the busy hum of happy industry resounding—or becoming again the habitation of the fleet and timid deer, and the voice of gladness be uttered only by the owl, as, at midnight, he rejoices in having fixed the home of his young in the former chamber of the wealthy and the proud: which latter process is already going on at a rapid rate, in parts that might be named, because that free labor has been dishonored there. The fox shall burrow in the wine vault,—the rattlesnake repose among the rubbish of the green house, and bats take possession of the ball room. IT IS THE WILL OF HEAVEN—AND JUST.

* Except because of foreign events—such as civil wars in Brazil, India, Egypt, and other cotton growing countries, which may, for a while, diminish supplies and advance prices.

* Say two millions of persons!

We have heard much from the south about the "monopolists" and "nabob-manufacturers" of the north. It was a favorite saying of president Jackson, that "the tree is known by its fruits," and—so, also, we are told on higher authority. When a traveller gets within the influence of a manufacturing establishment, he instantly discovers a change in every thing about him—the fields are better enclosed and more carefully cultivated—the buildings are in better repair, neat and comfortable; and the very animals, horses, cattle or swine, seem to rejoice in their fitness—though it may only render them more fit for the uses of man; and he will find, on inquiry, that thousands of acres of farming land, within the range of the influence spoken of, bear from 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ to 50, or even 100 per cent. greater value, than equally good lands in other, though neighboring, locations. Such is the fact—let sophists account for it as they please, it is sufficient to us that it is so. And, as he more nearly approaches the village or hamlet, the traveller will see many little neat and snug houses, wherein he must believe that there is comfort and peace, with small lots of land attached—the freeshoot, perhaps, of a spinner or weaver—fire-man, hammer-man or machinist—or of the carpenter or shoemaker, who there ever finds plentiful employment and prompt pay—and, if he enters, he will see these houses filled with children, whose rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes will excite much pleasure, if envy has not cankered the kindness of his heart. And when arrived in the village or hamlet, he may see hundreds of sober, discreet and temperate and intelligent people, of whom many are young women, whose personal attractions and state of health, he may wish for his own daughters, and whose moral deportment is as correct as theirs. Such is "nabobism" in the north—but what is the "nabobism" of South Carolina? There, as I am informed, the traveller is warned of the desolation and gloom that more closely surrounds him—the ruined huts and squalid poverty that here and there he meets with, for this nabob has consumed every "green thing," and filled the whole range of his influence with slave machinery, monopolizing all comforts to his own precious self. What a picture might be drawn of the facts—but I shall refrain. It was thus in France before the revolution—the approaches to a palace were always known by the increased wretchedness of the cottages, and the lessened comforts of their inhabitants. Such are the "fruits" of the different systems! If any prefer the latter, let them enjoy it—it they like ruined houses, and fields planted with scrubby pines and brambles, let them have them, in all abundance; but the liberty that we give to these must be granted to others, who prefer comfortable houses and happy faces—valleys covered with crops of golden grain and mountains, whitened by flocks of sheep—all things shewing the fulness and fatness, increased number and growing wealth, of intelligent and savvy laboring freemen. There the hand which is hardened by toil is not rejected by those whom its power might smite to the earth; nor is the young lady who spins, dishonored, because she does something better than strike the keys of a piano with delicate fingers. She is prized because of her industry—she knows the value of property—and her virtuous and useful life qualifies her for offices in society further than those of "sneaking fools and chronicling small beer." She looks beyond the class in which she is placed—she aims at higher movement, and obtains it; and thousands of "factory girls" are already among the most respected and worthy wives or matrons, in the land. The stand-still policy is not theirs—forward, always forward, is their motion and forward they go.—Those that were poor have become rich—and those who are rich do not despise labor. In the last is the "secret worth knowing"—but the "darkness comprehendeth it not." How should it? It is too lazy to investigate—too proud to acknowledge; and so it lies still, and curses that prosperity which it will not strive to obtain—and prays, (it pray it can without labor!) that its own misery may be the portion of others! But the prayers of the wicked shall not prevail.

CASE OF MR. LOWRIE, SECRETARY OF THE SENATE. The practice of more than twenty years in the publication of the REGISTER, will relieve us of the charge of affectation when we say—that it always renders us unhappy, when the rightful exercise of our vocation, or a sense of duty, leads to the insertion of any thing which in speeches private character, or reveals circumstances which, from the nature of them, have a questionable propriety, when offered to the public eye and ear. Some few times in self-defence, or when sinning against in that way, we have, perhaps, overstepped the line of conduct which we had marked out for ourselves—but always a male haste to regain it, wishing never to depart from it again; and this rule for personal proceeding we have desired to extend to the contents of our work, generally, so far as fidelity to the record would admit—and many thousands of articles which, at the first glance, seemed proper for publication, have been rejected on a little consideration, and the inquiry,—what will they lead to?

But that spirit of inquiry was not on the alert, when we gave place to the justificatory remarks of Mr. Lowrie, in our journal of the proceedings of the senate last week—and simple justice towards Mr. Simpson, so severely assailed, demands that we should go further into the merits of this affair, as stated by the latter party—which we shall do with all possible brevity.

Mr. Simpson had charged Mr. Lowrie with communicating to the president the confidential proceedings of the senate, in relation to appointments to office. In proof of this, he published a letter from Mr. William F. Lewis, 2d auditor of the treasury, and written as he [Mr. L.] said, at the "request" of the president, in which it is said—"He [the president] felt no uneasiness in your situation until the morning of the day your nomination was finally acted on, when he learned from the secretary of the senate, for the first time, that you were in danger." And this letter from Mr. Lewis, was "in possession of the senate"—that is, it was acquired in the hands of the member who instituted the inquiry, at the time when Mr. Lowrie was permitted to make the remarks which we have published. Mr. Simpson also states, that the president had personally said the same in substance to himself—that he [Mr. S.] saw the "private journal" [of the senate] in the hands of the president, who said "it was a pure party vote," and that Mr. Simpson had "received the votes of all our friends." Among other things, Mr. S. publishes a letter from Mr. Lowrie to gen. Samuel Smith, dated 11th March 1831, which runs thus—"Hon. S. Smith. Dear Sir—the vote on Stephen Simpson's nomination was yeas 18, noes 25. You voted in the affirmative;" and that this letter or "certificate," as Mr. Simpson calls it, was franked by gen. Smith and sent to him [Simpson].

Many other things are stated by Mr. Simpson, a notice of which would only further lead us into the difficulty we should have avoided by refusing to publish Mr. Lowrie's remarks; but having given them, we could do no less than thus notice the facts on which the charge against him was founded; and his letter to gen. Smith shews, that the rejection of Mr. Lowrie was not so much a matter of course as Mr. Lowrie makes it out to have been, seeing that the venerable senator had, after the rising of congress, asked the official testimony of the secretary, that he [gen. S.] had voted for Mr. Simpson. And here we shall leave the matter to the judgment of our readers.

"THE CHURCH IS IN ERROR," or rather that the church establishment in England has been "misled," a freely said in that country, because of the votes of the bishops on the reform bill. The speech of the lord chancellor, with reference to these votes, was very sarcastic and severe. He lashed the prelates with a whip of scorpions; and even earl Grey, a staunch churchman, in repelling something said by one of the bishops observed, "it little became the garb that he wore"—"that there was not a word of truth in it—that it was a foul calumny." These things have the hearty approbation of the people—their long established hatred of the bench of bishops is highly gratified in such proceedings of distinguished men; and they begin roughly to inquire, what business have the bishops in the hall of legislation? They are called upon to "set their house in order," and we think that they may be regarded fortunate if they escape the infliction of personal injury by the people, resorting to the "law of nature" to redress their wrongs. It is said by one of the orators that "there is no better sword than that which has been made from a ploughshare"—and resort to force is frequently intimated. As to the bishops, they have no hold on the hearts of the people—their dominion is the dominion of the sword—their tathness the tathness of protection under the bayonet. It is said of them, "where shall we find words to express our feelings with regard to the conduct of those mitred enemies of our rights and our happiness, who, rolling in wealth and lodged in princely palaces, by means drawn from our property and labor, and thus exalted as the immaculate guardians of piety and virtue, have, by their vote, stamped the seal of their approval on scenes of drunkenness, fraud, corruption, subornation, and perjury, more flagrant, more shameless, more teeming with abominations, than were those on the actors in which God, by the mouth of Job, pronounced that the congregation of hypocrites should be desolate, and that fire should consume the tabernacles of bribery; more flagrant, more full of abominations than the acts of the apostate sons of Samuel; equal in turpitude and cruelty to the despoilers and destroyers of Naboth; and yielding in point of wickedness to the deeds of none but Judas Iscariot himself?"

The reform bill will pass or revolution ensue. Indeed, reform is revolution, constituted as the government of England is; and this, at least, may be hoped, that the bishops will be driven from the house of lords into their own dioceses—and, compelled to give up their enormous revenues, be required to attend only to concerns called spiritual. "The successors of the apostles are not to be looked for in palaces and purple." "The coil of wealth has corrupted their holy office." "They have bought and sold in the temple," and must be "encouraged out!" Such are the cries against them.

The Glasgow meeting in favor of reform contained 30,000 men. The bishops were called "dumb dogs," "greedy dogs"—"who let their flocks go to the devil!" Thus, at many other places, especially at Manchester. The archbishop of Canterbury was received with a general hiss at Corydon, where he attended as president of the society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts; and when he retired, it was in the midst of fearful yellings of the people, mixed with groans. He seemed much alarmed for his personal safety, and departed at a rapid rate. The bishop of Bath and Wells, retiring from service in the church, was hated, and stones were thrown at him. The bishop of Exeter has been burnt in effigy; and the bishop of Durham received many marks of the popular indignation. These are fair specimens of what is going on. The end is yet to be seen.

SHEEP IN THE UNITED STATES. We publish the following as a specimen of that sort of information which the committee on the growth of wool were desired to collect, for the public instruction. But official returns of the numbers of sheep can be obtained only in a few of the states—and individual exertions must be relied on for all information concerning the product of wool in other states. It is earnestly wished that the gentlemen to whom this subject was committed, will speedily do what they can—that the permanent committee may have the use of the facts collected.

As suggested by Mr. Wingate, we think it probable, (from several inquiries that we have made on the subject, at different times) that the official returns for Maine, and other states, do not nearly shew the real amount of the sheep in them, being subjects of taxation in some; and those under six months old are not included. Taking these things together, the opinion was given to us at New York, by several intelligent gentlemen, that one-third should be added to such returns, to shew the probable number, in the states referred to.

Portland, state of Maine, Dec. 12, 1831.

SIR—In compliance with the views and wishes of the convention which met at New York, on the 26th of October last, "for the purpose of taking into consideration what proceedings may be necessary for the support and further extension of the American System, as it relates to the various pursuits of domestic industry," I herewith transmit you a report of the number of sheep, grown in wool, &c. in this state.

The following table shews the number of sheep there were in the several counties in 1830, as taken from the returns on file in the office of the secretary of state, viz:

COUNTY.	No. of sheep of the native breed, over 6 months old.	No. of sheep of the Merino or mixed breed, over 6 months old.
York	43,304	1,990
Cumberland	45,281	7,939
Lincoln	58,191	4,843
Hancock	26,508	2,645
Washington	13,774	482
Kennebec	39,654	36,378
Oxford	41,117	15,904
Somerset	49,372	9,069
Penobscot	23,079	6,287
Waldo	35,172	6,090
	375,452	91,342

RECAPITULATION.

Number of native sheep.....375,452

Number of Merino and mixed breed.. 91,342

Total number of sheep in Maine.....466,796

It is estimated there are 1,400,000 pounds of wool produced, annually, in this state.

It appears by the preceding table, that four-fifths of the wool produced was from native sheep. It is, however, believed that there is a much larger number of sheep in Maine than have been returned to the secretary's office—and that the mixed breed are in a much greater proportion to the whole number of sheep, than said returns exhibit. The cost of keeping a sheep is about one dollar and twenty-five cents per annum. I have no knowledge of any wool having been imported into this state for several years—neither have I any means of ascertaining the increase of sheep in Maine since 1823; nor of the flocks or number of sheep kept solely for raising wool for market.

I have never heard it suggested by the manufacturers, or the wool growers, that their interests were diverse.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. WINGATE, jr.

Thomas McGiffin, esq. Washington,
Washington county, Penn.

We shall take this opportunity to add the following account of sheep in Massachusetts and Vermont. In the former, and as we suppose, also in the latter, those less than six months old are not counted, as in Maine.

Sheep in Massachusetts.—A correspondent of the Hingham Gazette states the number of sheep in this state, as contained in returns to the valuation committee, to be as follows:—

Berkshire.....	90,254	Barnstable.....	10,868
Hampshire.....	54,714	Middlesex.....	10,777
Franklin.....	46,273	Essex.....	9,900
Worcester.....	41,100	Nantucket.....	6,124
Hampden.....	34,820	Norfolk.....	3,639
Bristol.....	17,099	Suffolk.....	520
Plymouth.....	14,603
Dukes.....	11,692	Total.....	360,692

[Massachusetts does not grow much wool—but consumes vast quantities, the product of other states.]

Sheep in Vermont.—The following, we believe, is taken from what is called the "grand list."

Bennington county.....	52,416
Windham.....	53,542
Rutland.....	129,996
Windsor.....	109,787
Addison.....	112,784
Orange.....	78,155
Chittenden.....	55,449
Washington.....	40,856
Caledonia.....	43,748
Franklin.....	41,638
Orleans.....	23,797
Essex.....	6,976
Grand Isle.....	8,636

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. The Richmond Enquirer, previous to the report of the secretary of the treasury, said—that “the only chance for the bank of the United States, is the two-thirds in both houses of congress.”

The Telegraph, with reference to the report of the secretary, asked—“But what will Mr. Ritchie do with the bank? What will he think of this ‘almourable state paper,’ when he learns that a bill to re-charter the bank, the joint production of the treasury and of the bank, had already received the sanction of the president, before the message was transmitted to congress?”

And Mr. Ritchie, having seen that report, said—“It is with much regret that we have seen this suggestion of the secretary of the treasury to re-charter an institution, which is contrary to the federal constitution: and which, as it is at present organized, is subject to such serious objections.”

On which the “Richmond Whig” observes, that the words “as at present organized” is a “charming note to creep through!” “As at present organized,” indeed! What has its present or past, or future organization to do with the grand question of its constitutionality?

From the Globe. In the “Telegraph” of the 12th inst., in an article respecting the bank, it was asked, what will Mr. Ritchie think “when he learns that a bill to re-charter the bank, the joint production of the treasury and of the bank,” had already received the sanction of the president before the message was transmitted to congress? And in the same paper of the 16th, the information of the “Telegraph” is stated to have been derived “from a member of congress, who received the fact from the secretary of the treasury in person.”

We are authorised to state that no such bill has ever been produced or projected between the bank and the treasury, nor has any understanding or negotiation for that purpose taken place between the parties, and that neither such a bill nor any project whatever for re-chartering the bank, has, in any manner or at any time, received the sanction of the president.

We are further authorised to state, that neither the allegation in the “Telegraph” nor any thing resembling it, in the remotest manner, authorised by any observation of the secretary of the treasury to a member of congress or any other person.

On which the Telegraph explained, and said—We are informed that there was a misapprehension on the part of the member of congress, who had a conversation with the secretary of the treasury on the subject of the bank of the United States; and that the secretary, in a conversation in reply to an inquiry of what modification would be acceptable to the president, said that a bill could be prepared which would meet the approbation of all parties. We give this explanation with pleasure, in justice to all parties concerned.

A subsequent number of the Richmond Enquirer has the following half-pint of “soft corn”—It is soft enough, indeed.

The Philadelphia “United States Gazette” has “but little doubt, that a bill to renew the charter of the United States bank will be presented to congress early in the session.” The object of this movement is at once avowed, viz: that the bank may avail itself of the peculiar situation of the president. His election comes on next year; and they think, rather than run the risk of encountering the odium, which it is supposed will arise from the rejection of the bill, that he will sign it.—This cunning calculation might be just in most cases and with most men. But, if there be any one quality more remarkable in the character of Andrew Jackson than any other, it is that moral force—that unflinching courage—that indifference to temporary consequences, which have made him what he is. What can it be expected of a man, who has said that he would scarcely turn on his heel to secure his re-election, that he will sign a bill of this description? We, for one, do not believe it. If the bank is guilty of the indecency of placing him in this dilemma, we trust that he will have the firmness to tell them so—and return it to congress without his signature.

And so stands the case among the parties. This, however, is manifest, that there is a softened tone about the bank, as many predicted would be shown when congress assembled—though others confidently said that the president would place his re-election on the question. Some evidently wish to postpone it—“until after the election!” though the president has severely pushed a consideration of the subject.

THE WINTER. Because of the sudden stoppage of the navigation, three weeks sooner at New York, and four or five at Baltimore, &c. earlier than usual, an uncommon degree of privation or distress has prevailed. All the cities were exceedingly short of supplies of fuel—and wood and coal have advanced to enormous prices at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, &c. The stock of coal is also exorbitant in the Baltimore market, yet, because of our rail road, oak wood has not exceeded six dollars a cord. Salt was worth 2 dollars a bushel at Albany, though located between the domestic and foreign supply. We learn that it has sold as high as five dollars a bushel in certain parts of the Eastern Shore of Maryland, which depended on water communications—and the stocks of sugar, coffee, spirits, &c. were almost entirely consumed at many places distant from the chief cities, at which are the seats of deposit for such goods.

The wild speculations in the coal lands of Pennsylvania last season, and the ruinous decline of price because of the extra supplies, paralyzed the industry and enterprise of many, and forced them into new employments—and hence, though the quantity of coal brought to market was yet large, it has not nearly equalled the extraordinary demand. Instruction will be obtained from this state of things, and individuals will hereafter lay in their stock of coal in the right season—thus encouraging the miners to supply it, and preventing such deficiency as is now felt so severely. To relieve this temporary inconvenience, a repeal of the duty on foreign coal is loudly called for at New York; the effect of which, if attended to, we apprehend, would be to render almost permanent the evils now complained of, in checking the domestic supplies, because of the uncertainty of the market that would naturally follow a proceeding of the kind.

OLD TIMES. The late respectable and worthy Mr. Claxton, so long a door keeper of the house of representatives of the United States, used to say, that when he was first appointed to that office, it was a part of his business to attend the arrival of the mails at the post office, and carry to the house the letters and papers addressed to the members, which, in general, he could conveniently do in his pockets,—but, sometimes, had to put a few in his hat. We believe now that considerably more than an average of two Dearborn wagon loads of letters and papers are daily received at the house of representatives, and as many sent away.

“CIRCULATION OF VALUES.” Mr. Isaac McKim, of Baltimore, exports, in his own ships, large quantities of American manufactures to the Indian and Pacific oceans, freely using cotton canvas, and receives in return copper ore and pig copper, which he himself manufactures at his great establishment in Baltimore, which is again exchanged for other goods, or goes to pay for various labor, by which the farmer finds a market, and is enabled to come in for his share of the “circulation of values.”

OUR RAIL ROAD. A great quantity of articles are brought to market by this road—among them 300 barrels of flour per day, and many cords of wood, &c. The demand for transportations has exceeded the ability of the company to supply wagons and cars—going beyond their expectations; but this defect will soon be remedied. The frost, which locks up our rivers and canals, seems rather to aid the facilities which this road affords. Enough has already been seen to assure us that no one can "calculate the value" of this road (completed), to Baltimore, and the region of country through which it shall pass, or unite itself to. Twelve new cars, of an improved construction for passengers, are about to be placed on this road, named the Pennsylvania, Patapsco, Longmore, Potomac, Monocacy, Catoctin, Shenandoah, Antietam, Conococheague, Monongahela, Alleghany, and Youghogany.

MR. GIRARD. This venerable citizen died at Philadelphia on the 26th instant. As a philanthropist, merchant and banker, he has long been celebrated. His personal exposure and unflinching efforts to stay the pestilence that prevailed in Philadelphia in 1793,—his incorruptible integrity and uniform regularity in business, as a merchant and banker, for more than fifty years at Philadelphia,—may he said to be known every where, because of the wide range and large amount of his operations; and, of later years, he disbursed mighty sums in substantial or elegant buildings, and, with great freedom, invested money in works of internal improvement. Many, perhaps, wild calculations of his wealth have often been made—but no one could speak understandingly on that subject, except himself: it is probable, however, that he left behind him the largest fortune in America—the whole of which was accumulated by himself.

Mr. Girard was 84 years old. The net value of the estate left behind him is supposed to be at least ten millions of dollars.

Mr. Girard began the business of life as a cabin boy, then the mate of a vessel, next the keeper of a tip-shop, selling drinks and cigars—then passing forward continually gathering money and enlarging his trade—in which his chief happiness seemed to consist; and, though liberal on certain occasions, his disposition seemed always bent upon making and hoarding money. He started his bank with a capital of $1,200,000, and since increased it to $5,000,000. This bank will continue its operations, under the direction of several highly respectable gentlemen, to whom he left the charge of it. The distribution of his great wealth, is not stated. He had a brother and sister living at Bordeaux, and his several nephews and nieces in Philadelphia.

DR. COOPER. A resolution was offered in the Legislature of South Carolina, that the board of trustees be requested to remove Dr. Cooper from the presidency of the college, because that his religious tenets, held and propagated, are dangerous to the youth and abhorrent to the feelings of the mass of the community, who are by law bound to advance the money which sustains the college.

This resolution finally assumed a shape directing the trustees to inquire into the matters preferred against President Cooper; who is ultra in every thing, and seems never happy except when riding on a whirlwind.

The trustees have held a meeting on the subject, but that a fuller board might be had, postponed the consideration of the case until the meeting in May. The doctor, it is said, will justify himself on constitutional grounds.

TEMPERANCE. The fine ship Martha, of Hulsom, capt. Young, lately went to sea on a whaling voyage of 18 months, with experienced officers and a crew of twenty-two fine young men, with only 4 gallons of spirits, and as much of wine, intended exclusively for medical purposes. The extent of the supply was well understood by the officers and men, and the insurance offices deducted 5 per cent. from the premium, because of this arrangement. The usual supply for such a voyage is from 15 to 30 barrels. But the Martha took extra quantities of coffee, sugar, tea, &c.

BOSTON. Charles Wells, esq. has been elected mayor of Boston by a large majority. Because of the cast of several parties, this election was one of extraordinary animation.

GEORGIA. Mr. Clayton, displaced by the legislature from his judgeship, has been elected to congress to supply the place of Mr. Lumpkin, elected governor.

FAYETTEVILLE. The "Observer" says—A friend has suggested to us the propriety of stating, that, in addition to the long list of contributions so liberally made for the relief of the sufferers by our great fire, there have been about $15,000 collected for the rebuilding of the Episcopal and Presbyterian churches; about 1,000 sent to different individuals in town, to be disposed of at their discretion, for the relief of urgent cases of distress, and a large amount of contributions to different individuals from their respective friends abroad. The donations of all kinds probably amount to $112,000.

TENNESSEE. Certain resolutions which passed the house of representatives of this state, instructing the actuators and requesting the representatives in congress to vote against a renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States, failed in the senate of the state by an equal division of the votes in that body.

THE SMALL POX is committing great ravages among the Creek Indians. A letter from Fort Mitchell, Alabama, says that between 7 and 8,000 of them have been vaccinated at the agency alone; and adds—"Too much praise cannot be given to Dr. Wharton who, in pursuance of his arduous duty, travelled over a great extent of country; and had not only to encounter the fatigue incidental to such a journey, but, in many instances, to combat the prejudices and superstitions of the natives. Many melancholy, and some ludicrous events, took place during the prevalence of the disease: among the former, there is but a too well authenticated instance of an Indian woman murdering her own sick husband, with the hope of escaping infection—poor wretch, she died in a few days after. I knew of another action of a far nobler, but not less tragic cast, and which, in the days of Greece, would, perchance, have been deemed worthy to have been commemorated by a statue. A chief's sister, in the bloom of youth, residing in the interior of the nation, felt herself to be infected, she called her relatives around her, and told them she knew that she had imbibed the disease; she might recover, or, (to use her own expressive language), might soon be called by the Master of breath. She knew that it was contagious, and determined not to suffer her life to be prolonged a few days, or as many hours at the hazard of causing death to those dearest to her on earth; "she went and hanged herself." The Indians almost universally abandoned the huts of those who died, and for months shunned all approach to their vicinity."

SLAVES. The legislature of Virginia passed a law in 1823, by which it was enacted that for certain offences, in addition to other punishment, free negroes and mulattoes might be sold for slaves. A mulatto named Baikin was convicted of felony, and sold under the law. He was born in the state and his mother was a free white woman. He passed into the hands of different masters, and was last purchased by a Mr. Slide, in Tennessee. He filed his petition in a circuit court of that state for a recognition of his freedom, and the court held that he was entitled to it, as the section of the act in question was a violation not only of the bill of rights of Virginia, but of that clause in the constitution which prohibits the passage of bills of attainder, &c.

LAW CASE. An important decision of the chancellor refusing an injunction, in the case of J. K. Beckman, vs. the Saratoga and Schenectady rail road company, is published in the Saratoga Sentinel.

The application for an injunction appears to have been made on the ground that the act granting a charter to the rail road company, and authorizing them to take possession of private property, at a fair compensation, for the use of their road,—was unconstitutional; for that, 1st. Rail roads differ from other public improvements, and especially turnpike roads and canals, because travellers cannot use it with their own vehicles. 2d. That the company are not obliged to transport passengers or produce, and 3d that the tolls which may be exacted, are unlimited: there were also other grounds of objection. All, however, were overruled by the chancellor who decided that the company had the right to take the land in question.

AN INGENIOUS ROGUE. The Boston Traveller has this paragraph—"An individual has been examined by the grand jury, the present week, for mutilating bank notes and dissecting 14 fifty dollar bills, in such a manner, as of the pieces to make fifteen. The charge was susceptible of proof; but no indictment could be brought for the act, as we have no statute making it penal thus to multiply paper money. A similar case occurred a few years ago, in Maine, before that commonwealth was detached from our own state, and the judge then suggested the introduction in the laws, of a provision touching such transactions. But his counsel passed unheeded: and the present offence will be seized upon by ingenious counterfeiters, to drive a profitable business at this kind of money making, unless our civil legislators affix thereto some heavy penalty."

THE PENSION LIST. The report from the pension office states the number of revolutionary pensioners on the rolls of the department, on the 17th day of October, 1831, to be 11,876, and that of invalid pensioners to be 3,868. Total 14,744.

The amount of warrants issued during the year 1831, for the payment of revolutionary pensioners, is $1,005,632 78, and for invalid pensioners, $168,512 10. Total $1,174,144 88.

The number added to the list during the year, is of revolutionary pensioners 201, of invalid pensioners 67. Total 268.

The number dropped from the list, by death, and the operation of the act of March 3d 1819 is, of revolutionary pensioners, 373; of invalids 72. Total 447.

TEAS. The secretary of the treasury has transmitted to the chairman of the committee on finance of the senate the following statement, exhibiting the quantity of tea imported during the year 1830, after deducting that which was exported, entitled to drawback, and the duties thereon, calculated at the present rates, at the rates payable after the 1st of January, 1832, and at the rates proposed by certain importers.

THE NEW ISLAND. Sometime since we saw an article, headed "A knotty point for diplomatists," in which it was stated that the question of the ownership of the new island, which has lately made its appearance in the Mediterranean, would probably occasion a diplomatic contest between the different powers of Europe. Such, according to a late Paris paper, has turned out to be the fact. It is stated that this island (the isle of Seracis as it is called by the Neapolitans, or Graham's island, by the English, after the name of its first discoverer) is at present a bone of warm contention between the kingdom of the Two Sicilies and England.

UPPER CANADA. According to the returns laid before the provincial parliament, the population of Upper Canada is 234,865, as follows:—

Districts.	Population.

BRIEF NOTICES

The Blackstone canal has been closed by ice more than five weeks. But it is stated, that the income of the canal has increased so much as to enable the directors to pay the corporation and to make a dividend of profits on the shares this year. The traders had not obtained their full supply of goods previous to the closing of the canal, and there would have been full employ for the boats for a fortnight longer at least. It is at this season of the year, remarks the editor of the Worcester Ægis, that the superiority of rail roads over the canals for transportation, is more fully appreciated than at any other. The cars upon the rail road are detained but a short time in consequence of a snow storm, and cold weather alone presents no obstacle to their progress.

Freights are very brisk at Savannah—and three farthings (sterling) per lb. are freely paid for the transportation of cotton to Liverpool.

The Montreal Gazette of the 22d ult. announces that it is the intention of the British government to dispose of the ships of war at the dock yard at Kingston, by public auction on the 17th January next. They consist of the St Lawrence, 102; Kingston, 56; Burlington, 42; and Montreal, 24; now moored off the dock yard at Kingston, and of the frames of the Wolfe and Canada, both on the stocks and pierced for 110 guns each.

A fine lad, the son of a respectable gentleman of Brooklyn, N. York, recently died of the hydrophobia.

The president's message was carried from Providence to Boston, 42 miles, in one hour and fifty-two minutes—eighteen persons and horses were employed.

A bed of iron ore has lately been discovered in New York, fitted to be rendered into the best steel. There are several mines of like quality, and the manufacture of steel will soon be adequate to the demand.

Some very interesting experiments of forcing a way through the ice, by means of steam boats, were recently made at Baltimore, and several vessels towed out of the harbor and others introduced. The power of these boats, when fitted for such business, is spoken of as truly astonishing. The ice, for about 12 miles, was hard and about 8 inches thick—but the Independence broke and sunk it in her track.

History (says the "Village Recorder"), does not furnish a more striking instance of republican soundness of principle and simplicity of manners, than that afforded by Mr. ADAMS, in accepting a seat in congress and taking his place without ostentation.

Upwards of 5000 tons of coal are frozen up in the canals, within 40 or 50 miles of Philadelphia.

The U. S. frigate Guerriere, and ship St. Louis, have recently arrived from long cruises in the Pacific.

The duty on advertisements during 1830, in England, amounted to nearly $3 000,000; in Scotland, $300,000; Ireland, $461,478, or a total of about three millions seven hundred thousand dollars.

A. Mr. Butler now a resident in Philadelphia, is about 100 years old. He was a soldier at Braddock's defeat, and still walks the streets with much firmness. There is a woman living in the same city, who is 107 years old.

The tribunal of Isoulon, (France), has given a decision on the much vexed question of the marriage of the priesthood. Its decision was in favor of the legality of such marriage. Of course, this cannot affect the laws of the church, as a church, but it involves a great principle, since, prior to the revolution, the marriage of a priest was contrary to the laws of France.

One of the most singular celebrations of the last coronation was that of Mr. Fultone, surgeon, of Congleton, who had a tea party of fifty women, mothers of eight hundred and thirty-nine children! twelve of the dames alone having given birth to two hundred and two of the number!! One of them was the mother of thirty-one children!!!—Staffordshire (Eng.) Mercury.

From some success in raising the ribband cane, the people of Ohio are encouraged to think they can have sugar plantations in that state.

Messrs. Ridge, Martin, Condy and Boudinot, a delegation from the Cherokee, arrived at Washington some days ago.

It is estimated that 14,000 persons, (two-thirds of them from the south and west) travelled from Albany to Saratoga springs in 1831.

Sugar and some molasses has been produced in Scriven county, Georgia. A lot of twelve acres yielded seventy-six barrels of fine and eight barrels of coarse sugar, besides one and a half hhd. of syrup.

China, (says the U. States Gazette), has received annually from British India, 300,000 bales of raw cotton. Should the recent misunderstanding between the Hong merchants and the English factories grow into any permanent rupture, there may be a demand, even in that distant region, for the staple of South Carolina, which might warrant the cost of conveyance as before.

A man, named James Sanders, is now living near Rockingham court house, S. Carolina, whose age is one hundred and seventeen years. He has nine children living—the oldest is upwards of 80, the youngest 45 years of age. He formerly used spectacles, but now reads the smallest print without glasses, and his hair, that had long been white, has turned to a dark color. He is in good health, and takes his walks freely.

Pennsylvania is now represented in the senate of the United States, by two brothers-in-law, Messrs. Wilkins and Dallas.

The New Orleans Courier of a late date, says:—"Mr. Bertoulin, one of those gallant Frenchmen who came from Europe to this country to lend their assistance in the glorious war of our independence, yesterday morning, terminated his long and honorable career. This morning a detachment of 50 U. S. troops, stationed at this place, under the command of captain Allen, the staff of the legion, and a large concourse of his fellow citizens, followed the remains of that worthy man to his last abode."

Montfort Stokes has been re-elected governor of N. Carolina, by the legislature of that state. For Stokes 98—Spaight 83.

The official majority of gen. Ashley over Mr. Ellis for congress, from the state of Missouri, is 209.

The Pottsville Journal of Dec. 17, says—We understand that several wagons laden with coal, set out for Philadelphia during the week, anticipating return loads of merchandise. The transportation of our mineral by land to such a distance is, at present, a novel occurrence. Price of transportation, $7 per ton.

In consequence of the scarcity of salt in Zanesville, and the difficulty of procuring supplies since the closing up of the river by ice, it has risen within a few days from 37½ to 62½ cts. per bushel by the barrel, and retail in proportion. Wheat is worth 56½ cents per bushel.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrivals at New York bring Liverpool dates to the 25th November, inclusive.

ENGLAND.

Considerable excitement prevailed in England on account of a report that the cholera had been introduced into Sunderland from Riga by a seaman's chest, on opening which an old woman had taken the contagion and died, and that six other cases had supervened, five of which had proved fatal. The alarm seems however to have originated without just grounds, as the cases of cholera which occurred were discovered to have been of domestic and not of foreign origin. The physicians who attended the most alarming case state, that extreme cases of English cholera have occasionally proved fatal even in a shorter time than that of their patient.

Tranquility had been restored at Bristol. The total damage done by the late riots in that city is estimated at £500,000 sterling. The loss of lives is less than had been imagined—the total killed and wounded does not exceed 94. The return of killed and wounded, as far as ascertained is, burnt 6; shot, 2; excessive drinking, 2; sword cuts, 2; total, 12; wounded from shots, 10; sword cuts, 48; excessive drinking 2; other causes, 54; total, 94. The wounded are in general doing well.

One hundred and eighty prisoners had been committed, 50 of whom were capitally charged with rioting and burning. Constables were at that time flocking in with prisoners, and the magistrates were sitting in different rooms hearing the charges against them.

The citizens of Bristol have entered into a liberal subscription for the immediate relief of the sufferers, many of whom have lost the whole of their property, and were not even in possession of a change of linen.

A meeting had been held at which a series of resolutions were passed, addressed to the home secretary, lord Melbourne, praying an inquiry into the conduct of the magistracy of the city, and of colonel Brereton, the commanding officer of the district.

Other disturbances had taken place at Macclesfield, Coventry, Preston and Worcester. At the latter place two of the rioters were taken and committed to prison; but, on the request of the mob, were released by the police, when the rioters became more furious, and were not dispersed until after the reading of the riot act by the mayor, aided by a troop of the 27th Hussars, who, on being pelted with stones, charged on the mob, using the flat part of their sabres freely on the backs of their assailants, 29 of whom were taken prisoners.

A meeting which had been called at White Conduit Fields had caused serious apprehensions; but owing to the decisive steps of the government the meeting was prevented. The bank of England had been strongly guarded.

At the instance of his majesty, in privy council, the archbishop of Canterbury had prepared the form of prayer to Almighty God, to be used in churches during the continuance of danger from the cholera. A large hospital is to be fitted up for the reception of patients should the cholera reach London. In consequence of the board of physicians having recommended the use of camphor, that article had advanced from £4 15 to £14.

All the vessels fitting out for the expedition of Don Pedro, at Deal and Gravesend, had been seized by order of the British government.

Mr. Van Buren transacted business at the foreign office on the 5th November.

Dublin, Nov. 5.—Mr. O'Connell entered the court of chancery to-day at half-past twelve o'clock, with a silk gown and full bottomed wig, and stood at the side bar. The lord chancellor said—"Mr. O'Connell, his majesty has been pleased to issue his letters patent authorising you to take precedence next after the attorney and solicitor general, and the two senior sergeants. You will therefore take your place accordingly." Mr. O'Connell then bowed and proceeded to take his seat above serjeant O'Loghlen, and next to the solicitor general, who congratulated him, and shook him by the hand.

FRANCE.

The finance projects of the ministers had been carried in the chamber of peers by a vote of 67 to 8. The peerage bill was to have been carried to the chamber of peers on the 7th Nov. and from 30 to 60 new peers were to be made. The idea of colonizing Algiers had been abandoned. The Muselman inhabitants of which were said to be greatly incensed against the French troops, in consequence of the sanctity of their mosques having been violated by them.

PORTUGAL.

Don Miguel had become so alarmed by the apprehension of the approach of Don Pedro's expedition, that he suspended the execution of the sentence of death upon 37 soldiers, who had proclaimed Donna Maria.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.

The senate had authorised the king of Belgium to sign the treaty of peace as proposed by the five powers; but the people were dissatisfied, and it was thought that Leopold would hesitate before he gave it his signature. That article in the treaty which authorises the Belgians to dig canals from Antwerp to the Rhine, was not relished by the king of Holland.

GREECE.

The assassination of the president of Greece was confirmed, and had caused a general thrill of horror throughout the country, as assassinations had not before been heard of in Greece since the revolution.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

December 23. The vice president communicated a letter from Ebenezer H. Cummins, transmitting tabular statements shewing the result of any ratio of representation from 48,000 to 55,000 souls for each representative, under the last census; and

On motion of Mr. Dickerson, 10,000 copies thereof were ordered to be printed for the use of the senate.

Mr. Murcy, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill entitled "an act to provide for the reports of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States."

Various leaves to bring in bills for the relief of private individuals were granted, and bills of a similar character reported.

The resolution of Mr. Holmes, relative to causing a map to be made of the disputed north eastern boundary, shewing the territory in dispute, and exhibiting the marks, monuments, natural and artificial, and to cause lithographic impressions thereof to be executed for the use of the senate, was taken up and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Kane, it was resolved to instruct the committee on public lands to inquire into the expediency of amending the act granting the right of pre-emption to settlers on the public lands.

On motion of Mr. Hendricks, it was Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to improve the navigation of the two White rivers in the state of Indiana, from the junction with the Wabash as high up as they may be considered navigable; and also that the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing a survey of the mouth of Trail creek, at the southern end of lake Michigan.

The engrossed bill to enable the president to extinguish Indian titles within the state of Indiana, was read the third time.

The senate then adjourned.

December 27. Mr. Prellinghuysen, of New Jersey, appeared and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. Watkins, so much of the president's message as relates to insolvent debtors, was referred to the judiciary committee.

A great many memorials from private individuals were presented and referred.

Mr. Benton reported the bill to authorise the mounting and equipping a part of the army of the U. States, and the bill providing for the armament of the fortifications.

On motion of Mr. Johnston, the committee on commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of improving the harbor of port Ponchartrain.

On motion of Mr. Buckner, the committee on commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a national hospital at the town of Cape Girardeau, in the state of Missouri.

On motion of Mr. Smith, the committee of commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting an appropriation to the mayor and corporation of Baltimore, to assist them in the preservation of the navigation of the port and harbor of that city.

On motion of Mr. Buckner, the committee on roads and canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of improving the navigation of the river St. Francois.

On motion of Mr. Hanna, the committee of roads and canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to be expended on the Cumberland road in the state of Indiana.

On motion of Mr. Hendricks, the committee on public lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorising the issuing scrip receivable in the payment of public lands for moneys forfeited in land purchases, in all cases not heretofore provided for by law.

On motion of Mr. Holmes, the secretary of the treasury was directed to communicate to the senate, copies of all the instructions to collectors of the customs and their officers, in respect to the British colonial trade, given or issued since the proclamation of the president of the 5th October, 1830.

Mr. Robinson, reported a bill to authorise the state of Illinois to sell certain portions of saline lands in that state.

Mr. King reported a bill supplementary to the law granting pre-emption rights to settlers on public lands.

The resolution of Mr. Hendricks, relative to the improvement of the navigation of the two White rivers, was agreed to.

The resolution of Mr. Benton relative to repealing the resolution adopted on the 4th May, 1830, directing the secretary to obtain extra copies of documents printed for the house of representatives, was taken up and agreed to.

The bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "an act to provide for reports of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States;" and

The bill supplementary to the several laws for the sale of public lands, were severally read the third time, and ordered to be engrossed.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the senate resumed, in committee of the whole, the bill supplementary to the act "for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution;" and

On motion of Mr. Hayne, Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the order of the day for Wednesday week.

After the consideration of executive business, the Senate adjourned.

December 28. Several petitions were presented.

Mr. Hanna reported a bill authorising the establishment of an additional land office in the state of Indiana, read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. King obtained leave to bring in a bill to lay out and construct a road from Lime creek to the Chatahoocche, and for repairing the road on which the mail is now transported.

Messrs. Robbins, Prellinghuysen and Poindexter were appointed the library committee on the part of the senate.

The resolutions moved yesterday by Messrs. Holmes, Hendricks, Hanna, Buckner, Smith and Johnston, were severally taken up and agreed to; also the one submitted by Mr. Buckner, on the 23d instant, instituting an inquiry into the situation of unconfirmed land claims in Missouri, and for providing for their adjustment.

The bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "an act to provide for the reports of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States;" and

The bill supplementary to the several laws for the sale of public lands, were severally read the third time and passed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize the mounting and equipment of a part of the army of the United States.

Mr. Benton explained the object and expediency of the proposed measure, and moved to fill the blank for the appropriation with 25,000 dollars; which, after some inquiries by Mr. Smith, and reply by Mr. Benton, was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate next took up the bill making an appropriation of 200,000 dollars for carrying on the armament of fortifications.

[The annual appropriation has heretofore been 100,000 dollars. The present bill was introduced by Mr. Smith, on leave, and was referred to the committee on military affairs, which committee reported the bill with a recommendation that it be rejected. Accordingly, when the bill came up to-day—]

Mr. Benton, (chairman of the military committee) moved its indefinite postponement. He stated (in the course of the debate that ensued) that the committee had submitted the bill to the secretary of war, who returned it, with the intimation that the executive and the department made no objection to its passage, but declined recommending it.

A debate of some length and interest ensued on the bill, in which it was strenuously advocated by Mr. Smith, and was opposed by Mr. Hayne, who, with the view of giving the greatest emphasis to the decision of the question, and of placing the precise sense of the senate on record, called for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on the indefinite postponement, it was decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Brown, Buckner, Clay, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hanin, Hayne, Hill, Holmes, Kane, Mangum, Marcy, Miller, Moore, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Symour, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, White, Wilkins—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Dallas, Dudley, Johnston, Knight, Silsbee, Smith—7.

So the bill was REJECTED.

The bill to authorize the state of Illinois to sell 20,000 acres of the saline lands in said state—

The bill supplementary to an act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on public lands, were severally considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. Robbins submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a naval depot and port of expedition and rendezvous within the waters of the Naragansett bay.

Resolved, That so much of the report of the board of navy commissioners, made October 19th, 1829, and of the report of the secretary of the navy, made December 6th, 1830, as relates to the establishment of a depot in said waters, be referred to said committee.

After the consideration of executive business, the senate adjourned.

December 29. Among the petitions presented this day, was one by Mr. Frelinghuysen of sundry citizens of the state of New Jersey, who were officers and privates of the state troops, volunteers, and militia, of the revolutionary war, praying that such remuneration may be made to them for their toils, privations, and perils, in that war, as will afford the means of sustenance for the remainder of their lives.

Mr. Foot presented a joint resolution of the general assembly of the state of Connecticut, instructing the senators, and requesting the representatives from that state in congress, to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law for the more perfect organization of the militia of the several states.

Agreeably to notice given, Mr. Benton asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to abolish the duty on alum salt; which was ordered to a second reading.

The resolution offered yesterday, by Messrs. Prentiss and Robbins, were severally taken up and agreed to. The bill to authorize the mounting and equipment of a part of the army of the United States:

The bill to authorize the state of Illinois to sell 20,000 acres of the saline lands in said state:

The bill supplementary to an act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on public lands, were severally read a third time and passed.

As were some other bills of a local or private character.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Dec 23. Mr. Hoffman, from the committee on naval affairs, reported sundry bills, viz:

A bill to provide for the payment of arrearages in the naval service, chargeable to the enumerated contingent, prior to the 1st of February, 1832;

A bill to establish ropewalks for the use of the navy of the United States;

A bill regulating the enlistment of seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen and boys, in the naval service of the United States;

A bill to provide iron tanks for the use of the navy of the United States;

A bill to provide for constructing two steam batteries;

A bill to provide for completing the removal and erection of the naval monument;

A bill to provide for paying certain arrearages for surveys made by naval officers;

Which several bills were twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Several bills of a private nature were reported and disposed of, and among these one for the relief of the representatives of David Dardin, [owner of the horse Romulus.]

Mr. Drayton, from the committee on military affairs, reported three bills, viz:

A bill providing for the organization of the ordnance department;

A bill for the organization of the topographical engineers;

A bill for the gradual increase of the corps of engineers;

Which bills were severally twice read and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Mr. Carson reported a bill to compensate Susan Decatur, widow and legal representative of commodore Stephen Decatur, deceased, and others, which was twice read and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. Hickiffe reported a bill to establish a land office in the territory of Michigan—twice read and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. Wickliffe also reported a bill concerning land claims in Florida—twice read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

Mr. Verplanck, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill remitting a part of the duties on a cargo imported in the brig Liberator—twice read and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. Washington reported a bill authorising the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company to construct a turnpike road on the border of the canal from Georgetown to the Little Falls bridge—twice read and committed to to-morrow.

Mr. McDuffie, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1832; which was twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Various bills for the adjustment of private claims were reported, read, and referred.

Mr. Beardley reported a bill altering the time of holding the spring term of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York—twice read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

Mr. Polk, from the committee on the fifth census, and the appointment of representatives under it, reported the following resolution; which, by consent of the house, was immediately taken into consideration and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to communicate to this house a statement, showing the aggregate number of persons in each of the states, according to the fifth census, and distinguishing the slave from the free population in each state, as soon as he shall have noted and corrected the clerical errors in the returns of the marshals and their assistants, as required by the act of the 3d of February, 1851, entitled, "an act to amend the act for taking the fifth census."

Engrossed bills

For the adjustment and settlement of the claims of South Carolina against the United States.

For the relief of the president, directors, and company of the Miami exporting company, and 26 others for the settlement of private claims, were severally read a third time and passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of general Hull was negatived by a large majority. The bill contemplated the payment to the heirs of general Hull, the arrears of pay to which that officer was entitled as major general of the army of the United States and governor of Michigan, from the 16th of August, 1812, the date of the surrender of Detroit, to the 1st of February, 1813, when he was arrested.

By unanimous consent, Mr. Vance offered the following resolution, which was adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the employment of an assistant engineer, by the repeal of a joint resolution, approved 29th of April, 1816, authorizing the president to employ a skillful assistant in that corps of the army of the United States.

Mr. Hoffman then moved that when the house adjourns to-day, it will adjourn to meet again on Tuesday next, which being agreed to,

The house adjourned.

Tuesday, Dec. 27. Mr. Wickliffe reported a bill explanatory of the act for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line and navy, and of the continental army during the revolution, approved May 30, 1830.

Mr. Drayton made a report on desertions in the army, accompanied by a bill to improve the condition of the non-commissioned officers and privates of the army of the United States, and to prevent desertion—twice read and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. Thompson, of Georgia, from the committee on Indian affairs, to which the subject was referred on the 12th inst. made a report, accompanied by a bill, to carry into effect the fourth article of the treaty of the 8th of January, 1821, between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, so far as relates to the claims of citizens of Georgia against said Indians for injury done prior to the passage of the act regulating intercourse with Indian tribes; which bill was twice read, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. McDuffie reported a bill concerning the accounts of the treasurer of the United States—twice read and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. Barringer reported a bill for organizing the militia of the District of Columbia.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of the late general Hull, was reconsidered and laid on the table.

The bill to authorise the president to extinguish the Indian title to lands within the states of Indiana, Illinois and Michigan, was considered and referred to the committee on Indian affairs.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the 3d auditor of the treasury, accompanied by the papers called for by the house on the 15th instant, on the motion of Mr. Howard, in relation to the claims of the owners of vessels sunk for the defence of Baltimore in the late war with Great Britain; which letter and accompanying papers were referred to the committee on claims.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution, offered by Mr. Blair, of Tenn. on Thursday last, proposing the appointment of a committee "to inquire into the expediency of distributing (according to population) the proceeds of the public lands amongst the several states and territories—when made, shall be expended on works of internal improvement, or to reimburse moneys already expended on such works, as the legislature of the respective states shall direct"—The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hunt, of Vermont, who had moved to insert, after the words "expended on such works," the words "for purposes of education."

Mr. Vinton, of Ohio, suggested a substitute for the resolution, which he thought would meet the views both of Mr. Blair and Mr. Hunt, and which, being read, both gentlemen acceded to it. The substitute was as follows:

"That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing an uniform system of gradually closing up the sale of the public lands now in market, or that may be hereafter brought into market; Also, to take into consideration the expediency of appropriating the proceeds of the public lands after the payment of the public debt to the promotion of some national object or objects."

This being accepted by Mr. Blair as a substitute for his resolution—

Mr. Duncan, of Illinois, moved to strike out all of the resolution after the word resolved, and insert the following:

"That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating one-third of the proceeds of the future sales of the public lands, to objects of internal improvement within the states in which said lands are sold, and that the same committee inquire into the expediency of appropriating (after the national debt is paid), one-third of the proceeds of said land sales, for the construction of roads and canals, from the Mississippi, the Ohio, the lakes, and the St. Lawrence, to the commercial cities of the Atlantic; and of appropriating the remaining third of said proceeds for purposes of education; the works or objects of improvements to be designated or approved by congress, and the money to be expended under the authority of the states in which said improvements are made."

Mr. Carson, of N. C. made a few remarks to show that the acts of the several states ceding the lands now owned by the United States, had immovably settled the manner of distributing among the several states the proceeds from them (after the payment of the public debt), and that congress could not, by any legislation, depart from that mode.

Mr. Mercer went into an argument, and referred to the acts of cession, also to show that the states which ceded the lands to the United States had prescribed the application of the proceeds from their sale, after the payment of the public debt, the objects and mode of which application he explained at large. He had, however, no objection to the second branch of the proposed inquiry; but strenuously opposed any new system of land laws, or new mode of disposing of the public domain, the present being, in his opinion, the wisest that had ever been, or could be, devised by the wisdom of man—the beneficial effects of which he briefly pointed out, in contrast with the evils which prevailed in those of the new states east of the Ohio, where a different system had been pursued.

When Mr. M. concluded his remarks, Mr. Blair, of Tenn. rose, but the hour for considering resolutions had expired, and the debate was suspended.

Mr. Mitchell of S. C. laid the following resolution upon the table for consideration to-morrow:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inquire of the collectors of the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Charleston what condemnations of smuggled goods, and what suits had occurred between the collectors of those ports and the citizens of the United States, or the subjects of any foreign power, in relation to frauds practiced on the revenue laws, specifying the amount of property involved, the date, the names of the parties, and the decrees of the courts in each case from the 1st of January, 1820, to the 1st of September, 1851.

On motion of Mr. Stewart it was Resolved, That the committee of internal improvement be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the continuation of the improvement of the steamboat navigation of the waters of the Ohio and Mississippi, by extending the same up the Monongahela river to such point as they may deem practicable and expedient.

Mr. Sevier laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house, (if it be not incompatible with the public interest), what measures have been taken, (if any), to ascertain and establish, permanently, the boundary line between the territory of Arkansas and the Mexican government.

On motion of Mr. Hogan, it was Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the facilitation of intercourse between the United States and the neighboring provinces of Great Britain, by land and inland navigation, and for preventing violations of the revenue laws on the inland frontier.

Mr. Bouldin moved the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, by the laws of the United States, ad valorem duties are laid on various articles of import, but the per centum duty required is not laid on the cost or value at the place of production, but on that cost with all charges, (except insurance), added; and with 10 or 30 per cent. added to that aggregate:

And whereas, also, various minimum values or prices are affixed by law; (by which to ascertain the amount of duties chargeable on the same goods), differing widely from the cost thereof; so that from the law itself the rate of duty to be paid on the importation of any given article, subject to ad valorem duties, cannot be ascertained:—

Resolved, therefore, that the committee of commerce be instructed to inquire into the practical effect of these laws, and report to the house the actual per centum on the prime cost, which is imposed by them. That they also inquire how far these duties are, in effect, prohibitory, acting both as distinctly as they can, the various descriptions of imports that are thus interdicted our shores, and, so far as may be practicable, to state the costs and charges, at which such interdicted goods might be imported.

The preamble and resolution were laid on the table. Mr. Cumbrereng laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to furnish this house with an annual statement of the net revenue collected on woollens and cottons; on each description of iron paying a specific duty; on all manufactures of iron paying an ad valorem duty; on brown, white and refined sugar, discriminating between each kind; and on hemp and cordage, from 30th September, 1794, to 30th September, 1831, together with a statement of the net revenue annually collected for the last ten years, ending 30th September, 1831, on the manufactures of silk, of flax and of hemp; on wool, indigo, wines, spirits, molasses, teas, coffee, fruit, spices, salt and coal.

Adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 28. Mr. Wickliffe reported a bill to give effect actual settlers upon the public lands, the right of pre-emption on the purchase of quarter sections, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre—twice read and committed.

Mr. Hubbard, from the committee on revolutionary pensions, reported a bill to amend the act entitled "an act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the army of the revolution;" which was twice read and committed.

Mr. Hubbard, from the same committee, reported a bill in addition to an act entitled "an act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the revolutionary war," approved March 18, 1818; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. Vinton, from the committee on internal improvements, reported a bill to authorise the surveying and laying out of a road from Detroit, westwardly, by way of Sciawasse, to the mouth of Grand river of lake Michigan, in the Michigan territory; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. Branch, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill to provide for the allowance of the travelling expenses of naval officers, in certain cases; which was twice read and committed.

Various bills for the adjustment of private claims were reported, read and referred.

Mr. Bell, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported a bill authorising the secretary of war to pay to the Seneca tribe of Indians the balance of an annuity of six thousand dollars usually paid to said Indians, and remaining unpaid for the year 1829; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. Bell, from the same committee, reported the bill from the senate "to enable the president of the United States to extinguish the Indian title within the states of Indiana and Illinois, and territory of Michigan," without amendment, and it was committed.

Mr. McDuffie, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1832; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. Leitch, from the committee on internal improvement, reported a bill to authorise the surveying and making a road from La Plaisance bay, in the territory of Michigan, to intersect the Chicago road; which was twice read and committed.

The house then resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. Blair, of Tenn. on Thursday last, as modified yesterday, at the suggestion of Mr. Vinton, the question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. Duncan.

A debate ensued thereon in which Messrs. Duncan, McDuffie and Root took part. The hour allowed to such discussions having now elapsed, an unsuccessful attempt was made to suspend the rules so the debate was here arrested.

The bill making an appropriation for the purpose of satisfying the claims of the state of South Carolina, for monies advanced by that state during the late war, in the purchase of military stores, and the payment of the militia called on for the defence of the state, came up as the special order of the day for this day; and the house went into a committee of the whole, Mr. Davis, of Mass. in the chair, on that bill.

The bill having been read,

Mr. Drayton, who had reported it from the committee on military affairs, called for the reading of the report of that committee, accompanying the bill; and it was read accordingly.

He then moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the house—

Whereupon,

Mr. McCoy called for the reading of a report made last session, by the committee of claims, (of which he was then chairman), in opposition to the claim; and it was read.

The committee then rose and reported the bill, which was amended by the insertion of the following item:

Fifth. The sum of 7,500 for blankets purchased by the state for the use of a portion of her militia, whilst in the service of the United States.

Messrs. Williams, of N. C. Drayton, Ward and McCoy made some remarks, and before Mr. McCoy had concluded, he made a motion for adjournment—which motion succeeding, the house adjourned.

Thursday, Dec. 29. Mr. William H. Ashley, of Mo. appeared to-day, was qualified, and took his seat.

A message from the president, concerning the boundary line between Georgia and Florida, was received, read, and ordered to be printed.

Many reports on private claims were made by different committees.

The debate on the resolution offered by Mr. Hunt, with the proposed amendments thereto, concerning the receipts from the public lands, was further considered, and Mr. Root delivered his opinions, at length, on the subject—but the hour expired before the debate was concluded.

The speaker laid before the house certain depositions in relation to the election of William Fitzgerald, returned to serve as a member of the house of representatives, from the district in the state of Tennessee lately represented by David Crockett; who contests the seat of the sitting member; which were referred to the committee of elections.

The remainder of the day was occupied with discussing the bill relative to the claims of South Carolina for military services and supplies, as noticed above. The debate was not finished when the house adjourned.

MASONIC.

From the Franklin, (Pa.) Telegraph.

At a special meeting of the members of Geo. Washington lodge and George Washington royal arch chapter, at their hall, in Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, on the 30th of November, 1831, the following resolution and declarations were adopted, ordered to be entered on their minutes, and published.

Resolved, That the charters of George Washington lodge No. 143, and of George Washington chapter No. 133, be returned to their parent institutions on the 27th of December next, and that the said lodge and chapter thenceforth be discontinued.

The members of George Washington lodge and Geo. Washington chapter, in dissolving their associations, have been actuated by a proper regard for the opinions of a portion of their fellow citizens. That there are many who believe that the institution is dangerous to society, and who apprehend the most serious consequences if it is continued, is undeniable—while there are some who avail themselves of this honest opinion to advance their private views. We do not complain of this, for so it always has been and ever will be; but we do desire, as far as we can, by removing the cause, to remove with it the injurious opinion that prevails against the masonic fraternity. In thus yielding deference to the community around us, we ask leave to say, that freemasonry, as we have known it, and seen it practised, contains no obligation or injunction inconsistent with the most full discharge of our social, political, civil and religious duties—and that we have never known it perverted or prostituted for electioneering purposes, or the political advancement of a member of the order. Conformity with its precepts, will, as we think, promote and aid the cause of charity, morals and religion; but at the same time we do not wish to conceal the fact, that unworthy men have become members of it, and probably abused it—to say so is only to assert that which is true of every association under the sun.

If the greatest crime has been committed in a neighboring state under the name, and by the prostitution of masonry to the most fell purposes, (and perhaps it has), no member of the community in which we live, condemn us with more just indignation and severity than does each of us, and every mason we have ever heard mention of, the guilty men who perpetrated it—nor would the hand of punishment be more heavily laid upon them by any of our fellow citizens than by ourselves. We ask that we may not be contaminated by guilt, of which it is impossible we could have been personally partakers, and which we solemnly aver has not, and could not reach us by any masonic duty, obligation, injunction or connexion, with which we are acquainted. It masonry then is what it is charged to be by those opposed to it, we can only repeat, it is not the masonry we have been taught, nor that which we have communicated to others. We know no duty which requires of us to continue an association, when such continuance may distract society—and separate those who ought to be friends; nor are we aware of any beneficial results likely to flow from an adherence to the order, that will not be more than counterbalanced by the excitement which such an adherence may perpetuate.

In this spirit we have come to the determination expressed in the foregoing resolution."

IMPORTANT CORRESPONDENCE!

Mr. Samuel Gwin, being transferred from a clerkship in the general post office to the place of register of the land office in Mississippi, caused the following publication in many newspapers.

Hon. Wm. T. Barry—Sir, you will please to receive this as my resignation of the appointment as clerk in the post office department.

In thus separating myself from your employment, I hope I may be permitted to return you my most heartfelt acknowledgments for the many acts of kindness that I have received at your hands. Of the flourishing condition of the department under your guidance, though it is known and felt in every part of our happy country, it does not become me to speak, except to express my regret on leaving a department whose affairs are prosperous beyond precedent. That the same prosperity may continue, and that the meed of praise so justly due may be awarded you by your country, through a long life of happiness, is the prayer of one who will be happy to call you friend as he shall ever be yours.

SAMUEL GWIN.

Post office department,
Washington city, Oct. 26th 1831.

MY DEAR SIR:—My absence from this city has prevented my acknowledging sooner the receipt of your letter of resignation. I separate from you with regret. The personal regard you have shown me, and above all, your faithful discharge of duty, AND DEVOTION TO THE PRESIDENT, has awakened in my bosom feelings of respect and friendship that will long be cherished. The manner in which you speak of the "flourishing condition of the department" is gratifying. It is the result of the joint labors of the talented and faithful agents who have co-operated with me—of whom you are one. With such men I feel confident I can act safely, and I hope successfully. I am pleased to know that whilst the public lose your services in the general post office, they will have the benefit of them in another department. I wish you success in the new employment that you are about to enter upon, and happiness to yourself and family in any station where Providence may place you. I reciprocate cordially the sentiments of friendship contained in your letter, and am happy that you call me friend, for I am, yours, most sincerely,

W. T. BARRY.

Samuel Gwin, esq.

[It seems, however, that the senate refused to ratify the appointment of Mr. Gwin, as register of the land office.]

NEW YORK CANALS.

From the Albany Daily Advertiser of Friday, we copy the following interesting statements—showing an increase of the canal tolls for the last ten years, as well as a general account of the funds. Namely for tolls

In 1821	$2,220
1822	44,486
1823	89,988
1824	319,320
1825	521,343
1826	750,759
1827	847,759
1828	897,263
1829	771,685
1830	1,056,922

The account between the state of New York and the canals, as a matter of finance, stands thus:

Tolls for 1830	$1,056,922
Deduct—Interest on debt	$379,695
Repairs	211,044
Sundries	29,210
	619,949

Surplus of tolls towards sinking fund $436,973

The surplus of the tolls, after paying for collection, interest and repairs, is actually above 7 per cent. on the present debt!

To that are to be added the duties and other items that accrued last year, appropriated to the liquidation of the debt.

Surplus of tolls 1830, brought forward	$436,973
Auction duties, 1830	180,513
Salt duties, 1830	154,332
Other items, 1830	40,403

Total surplus for 1830. $812,221

Canal fund for 1830.

Tolls as above stated	$1,056,922
Auction and salt duties, &c.	375,248

$1,432,170

The following view of the Erie and Champlain fund, from 1817, till January 1st, 1830, is interesting:

Canal tolls	$4,244,809
Auction duties	2,257,449
Salt duties	1,035,346
Steam boat passengers	73,509
Western lock navigation company	8,758
Rents of surplus waters	4,103
Canal fund lands	10,003

Exclusive of the expense of collection, $7,633,937

The debts on the New York canals, was, on the 1st of January, 1831 $7,825,036

Sinking fund as follows:—

Balance in hand	$1,481,475
Delaware and Hudson canal stock	200,000
Bond of corporation of Albany	50,000
Never-Sink stock	10,000

Total sinking fund, 1,741,475

Nett debt $6,083,560

We come to the following conclusions:

1. That the debt will or may be paid off in six or seven years.

2. That the state of New York will have a surplus revenue of a million of dollars per annum.

We are informed,

3. That our revenue from the canal during the present year, will be about $160,000 more than during the last year.

RIGHTS OF THE INDIANS.

The New York Evening Journal publishes the following proclamation of president WASHINGTON. At that time, certainly, it was supposed that the Indians had rights within the limits of their own territory, and were entitled to the protection of the United States.

By the president of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, I have received authentic information, that certain lawless and wicked persons, of the western frontier, in the state of Georgia, did lately invade, burn and destroy, a town belonging to the Cherokee nation, although in amity with the United States; and put to death several Indians of that nation, and whereas such outrageous conduct not only violates the rights of humanity, but also endangers the public peace; and it highly becomes the honor and good faith of the United States to pursue all legal means for the punishment of those atrocious offenders; I have therefore thought fit to issue this my proclamation, hereby exhorting all the citizens of the United States, and requiring all the officers thereof, according to their respective stations, to use their utmost endeavors to apprehend and bring those offenders to justice. And I do moreover offer a reward of five hundred dollars, for each and every of the above named persons, who shall be so apprehended and brought to justice, and shall be proved to have assumed or exercised any command or authority among the perpetrators of the crimes aforesaid, at the time of committing the same.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the twelfth day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and of the Independence of the United States, the seventeenth.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

By the president,

TH. JEFFERSON.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

In senate—report of the committee on federal relations.

The committee on federal relations, to whom was referred that part of the governor's message which relates to a letter bearing date the 14th of June, 1831, which the president of the United States thought proper to address to a portion of the citizens of this state, beg leave to report:

That the letter adverted to seems to your committee a manifest and most unauthorized interference of the executive of the union with the domestic parties of a separate state; attempting to give the preponderant weight of governmental authority to one of two political disputants, who might have been permitted to settle their own disputes without this intermeddling of the president in a case out of his constitutional cognizance, and not connected with any of his delegated powers.

His letter contains a plain and positive threat of military coercion against South Carolina, because her citizens are seriously but peaceably contending against an unconstitutional impost fatal to their prosperity: not by forcible resistance, but by quiet and orderly appeals to the laws of the land, the tribunals of justice, and, if necessary, to such further means of self-protection which other states have not only sanctioned in theory, but have repeatedly adopted in practice, and which a true construction of the charter of our liberties no where forbids. It is admitted that the federal executive is bound to execute the laws of the land, but in the exercise of that high prerogative, military force can be used only when "the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed in any state, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings." But even in such a contingency, "the president shall first by proclamation command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time" before the military force can be called forth. Over the militia he has no control by the constitution. He has the command only of such part of that arm of the national defence as by legislative provision may be called into the actual service of the union, and even this call is utterly ineffectual until the permission of the governors of the separate states shall have been obtained. As commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, the constitutional power of the president of the United States is altogether nominal. "It amounts to nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the military and naval forces, as first general and admiral of the confederacy."

Even if a state conceiving its sovereignty to be infringed, should find it expedient to resort to actual resistance, congress itself has not the authority to interpose the force of the union, and plunge the country into civil war. The powers of congress are confined to the express delegations of the constitution. In what part of that instrument is congress authorized to make war on a sovereign state, which refuses to obey a law passed on dubious and disputable authority? Not a convention of the states is the plan and constitutional method of deciding the matter in dispute. To this appointed decision every state must yield, or else it must determine on a secession from the union. But in neither case is warlike hostility called for on either side.

The general government is the agent of the states. It is not a party to the federal compact.—The idea of the agent coercing by physical power, the parties to the compact, involves a political anomaly, and is based on the dangerous and alarming assumption that congress is the irresponsible judge of its own acts—a doctrine at war with the origin, practice and principles of the federal government.—But if the authority of congress be incompetent to the forcible coercion of any state belonging to the American confederacy, upon what reasonable grounds can the president of the United States, on his own assumed authority, make such a threat as his letter manifestly discloses? Even though the greater part of the citizens of South Carolina should be of opinion that an act passed by congress beyond the limits of its delegated powers is null and void—and being so persuaded, are determined to use every constitutional means of protecting themselves from the destructive effects of gross usurpation,—will this justify the invasion of their country by an hostile force, because the president of the union disagrees with them in opinion? If any doubt, however, exists as to the true construction of the federal constitution on the subject of the powers of the president, or of congress, over the military force of the United States, that doubt is removed by reference to the journals of the federal convention.

The following resolutions, the one introduced on the 29th of May, and the other on the 15th of June, were both rejected by decided majorities:

Resolved, That the national legislature ought to be empowered to call forth the force of the union against any member of the union failing to fulfil its duty under the article thereof.

Resolved, That if any state, or any body of men in any state, shall oppose or prevent the carrying into execution such act or treaty (made and ratified under the authority of the United States), the federal executive shall be authorised to call forth the powers of the confederated states, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enforce and compel an obedience to such acts, or an observance of such treaties.

After this brief exposition of the powers of the general government and its chief executive officer, in relation to the military force of the country, your committee would remark that the pertinacity with which congress adheres to the enforcement of laws, unwarranted by the federal compact, and the recent avowal of the president, that high and sacred duties will compel him to sustain the usurpation by physical means, constitutes a case, on the decision of which the existence of the federative feature of the government is essentially involved. If the position thus assumed by the president be true, the constitution of the United States is a nullity, and the people of the union are practically controlled by a military despotism.

The committee, in conclusion, would distinctly declare, that the threat contained in the president's letter is equally impotent and unwise; and that South Carolina, regardless of menace from whatever quarter it may proceed, will persevere in using such means of protecting her citizens against manifest oppression, as the necessity of the case shall demand, and her constitutional rights will justify.

Influenced by these considerations, your committee ask leave to submit the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That the letter of the president of the United States to a portion of the citizens of Charleston, bearing date 14th of June, 1831, is at once at variance with his duties and the rights of the states.

Resolved, That whether the threat contained in that letter was aimed at the freedom of discussion, or at the sovereign authority of South Carolina, it is equally entitled to the decided reprehension of this legislature, and is incapable of exciting any other than an augmented resolution to maintain inviolate the federal principles of the compact.

FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, NEW YORK.

Before his honor, Judge Bots.

The United States vs. three bales of woollen cloths, marked S. Nos. 26, 27, and 28.—Claimant, George Adshad.

This was an action brought to establish the forfeiture of the cloths for a violation of the revenue laws, incurred by their having been invoiced below their real value, with a view of defrauding the revenue of the United States.

The cloths were invoiced at six shillings and sixpence, and six and ninepence British, per yard, a valuation at which the duty upon them would be 436 dollars and 60 cents, whereas, according to the appraisement made by the custom house officers, the duty would amount to 1,084 dollars and 40 cents, making a difference of 648 dollars and 80 cents.

The claimant objected, at the time of the seizure, to the valuation made by the appraisers, upon which two merchants were chosen to inspect the goods. These gentlemen supported the opinion given by the custom house appraisers, and even set a higher value upon a portion of the goods than the officers had. The claimant gave a bond in the sum of 3,320 dollars—about 5 dollars and 68 cents per yard—to the United States for the goods, in order to obtain possession of them.

Mr. Daniel Jackson, who was chosen, on behalf of the claimant, as one of the appraisers to make the second valuation, testified, that cloths which cost in England about six shillings and sixpence, are worth, here, from 2 dollars and 50 cents to 2 dollars and 78 cents per yard; and cloths worth 5 dollars and 68 cents here, ought to cost at least twelve shillings in England.

In charging the jury, his honor the judge remarked to them, that whatever their private opinions might be as to the expediency of the present tariff, yet they were bound as good citizens, and as jurors to support it while it was the law of the land. There was at all times a difficulty in establishing such a mode, or ascertaining the proper rate of duty as would prevent an evasion of the law. In 1826, the congress, with a view of making such a regulation as they deemed least liable to evasion, enacted a law subjecting all woollen goods worth less than 50 cents to one rate of duty; all goods worth above that sum, and below 1 dollar to a higher duty, and above that sum, and below 2 dollars and 50 cents to a still higher sum. In 1830, the congress enacted another law, by which it was provided that to regulate the duty on any particular package of goods, it was merely necessary to examine the best piece in each package, and consider all the other pieces in the same package to be of the same value. Of these laws the importers and manufacturers cannot be ignorant—even were they so, the jury is bound to suppose they are perfectly aware of them. By the law of 1830, all goods invoiced below their value, for the purpose of defrauding the revenue, are declared forfeited to the United States. The question, therefore, which the jury had to consider were, first, were these goods invoiced below their value, and next, was this difference made with a fraudulent intent.

The jury gave a verdict for the United States.

David B. Ogden, esq. was associated with James A. Hamilton, esq. district attorney on behalf of the United States.

The United States vs. one truss of cloth marked X, No. 289, George Shaw claimant.

The grounds upon which this action was brought, were of the same character as those on which the preceding action was brought.

The difference between the prices set down in the invoice, and that fixed on by the custom house appraisers, and the appraisers subsequently chosen, varied about six pence British per yard.

On behalf of the claimant, witnesses were examined to show that appraisers will vary in their valuation from 6 to 16 per cent. and that at some times, goods can be purchased cheaper than at others.

The judge in charging the jury, informed them that to justify the officers of the custom house in seizing imported goods, it was only necessary for them to show that they had a reasonable cause for suspicion. It remained for the person who claimed the goods, to explain away all the suspicious circumstances, to show that in the purchase of these goods they made use of more than ordinary skill, superior capital, or had better luck—circumstances which could be shown by the letters of their agents or correspondents.

The difference in the valuation was only slight; but it the jury believed that it was regulated at a sum so slight with a view of the more effectually carrying into effect a fraud on the revenue, they should give their verdict in accordance.

The jury gave a verdict in the case for the claimant.

For the United States, D. B. Ogden and James A. Hamilton, esqrs.; for the claimant, J. H. Hatch, and S. Cambreleng, esqrs.

In the progress of the case the district attorney offered in evidence, the bond given by the claimant at the time of the seizure, whereby he agreed to pay a certain sum if the cloths were found to be of greater value than the price charged in the invoice.

The counsel for the claimant objected to the production of this testimony, on the ground that the amount of the sum for which the bond was given, was fixed by the United States, not by the claimant. On this point the judge decided that the evidence was admissible; and in his address to the jury, said that although the sum fixed in the bond was not sufficient evidence of the value, yet it might be supposed that no prudent man would give a bond for more than the value.

GEORGIA LEGISLATURE.

In senate, Friday December 9.

The committee to whom was referred the communication of his excellency the governor, transmitting to the general assembly, copies of a paper purporting to be signed by Henry Baldwin, esq. one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States, and to be a citation of the state of Georgia, to appear in the supreme court on the second Monday in January next, to show cause before that tribunal, why two several judgments should not be set aside, which have lately been rendered in the superior court of the county of Gwinnett, against Samuel A. Worcester and Elizar Butler, for a violation of an existing law of the state, committed within its jurisdictional limits, also a paper purporting to be a notice, signed by Wm. Wirt and John Seagrass, as counsel for Samuel A. Worcester and Elizar Butler, informing his excellency the governor, of an intended application to the supreme court for a hearing on writs of error filed by said Worcester and Butler—

They leave to recommend to the general assembly, the adoption of the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the state of Georgia in general assembly met, That the act of the last legislature, making it penal, to reside within the limits of the lands belonging to the state, in the occupancy of the Cherokee Indians, without having taken a license from the governor, and without taking the oath to support the constitution and laws of Georgia, under which Samuel A. Worcester and Elizar Butler, were convicted at the last sitting of the superior court of Gwinnett county, is not in violation of either the letter or the spirit of the federal constitution.

That the state has a right of civil and criminal jurisdiction over the whole of the lands within her chartered limits, and that her jurisdiction does of right, extend to the persons and things within these limits.

That "the powers not delegated by the constitution to the U. States, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively." And that a right to interfere with and control the criminal jurisdiction of the states, has not been delegated by one country to the United States or to the world, nor is the right of exclusive and final jurisdiction in all criminal cases, prohibited by the constitution to the states.

That by the constitution of the state of Georgia, final and conclusive jurisdiction in criminal cases, is vested in the superior courts of the several counties of this state; and when these courts have pronounced the sentence of the law, no court has the right to rehear, overrule and reverse their decisions; or in any way impede the execution of their decrees.

That any attempt to reverse the decision of the superior court of Gwinnett county, in the case of Samuel A. Worcester and Elizar Butler, by the supreme court of the United States, will be held by this state, as an unconstitutional and arbitrary interference in the administration of her criminal laws, and will be treated as such.

That the state of Georgia will not compromise her dignity, as a sovereign state, or so yield her rights as a member of the confederacy, as to appear in, answer to, or in any way become a party, to any proceedings before the superior court, having for their object a reversal or interference with, the decisions of the state courts in criminal matters.

That his excellency the governor, be, and he and every other officer of this state, is hereby authorized and requested to disregard any and every mandate, order, process, or decree, that has been or shall be served upon him or them, purporting to proceed from the chief justice or any associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, for the purposes of arresting or impeding the execution of the sentence of the state courts, in criminal cases.

That his excellency the governor be, and he is hereby authorized and required, with all the power and means placed at his command by the constitution and laws of this state, to resist and repel any and every invasion, from whatever direction it may come, upon the administration of the criminal laws of this state.

"THE WEST INDIA TRADE."

The following brief sketches of the speeches of Mr. Smith, of Maryland, and Mr. Holmes, of Maine, in the senate of the United States, on the 22d inst. will serve to show what may be expected from a close investigation of the loudly-tempted arrangement with Great Britain, concerning the colonial trade.

On motion of Mr. Smith, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Holmes, calling on the president of the United States for information on the subject of the West India colonial trade.

Mr. Smith said, that he had looked over the subject, and had come to the conclusion not to object to the final vote on the resolution. He suggested the propriety of striking out some part thereof. Said that the captains of vessels employed in this trade had enjoyed the advantages of the trade and had been able to avoid the duties imposed on the articles exported, and thus deprived the revenues of England of the discriminating duties.—He considered this a sort of proceeding unfair—it opened the road for fraud; and if those engaged in the trade felt disposed they could act the knave or play the fool. He thought that the custom house officers employed to collect the duties, might have been deceived in many instances. Vessels could go out of port with American clearances, and by management, enter the colonial ports under British clearances, which he considered a fraud upon the English revenue. He did not see how vessels pursuing this practice, could avoid making misstatements to the collectors of those ports. He understood the gentleman from Maine, to say that but two months had elapsed, after the opening of the ports, before the American merchants were informed of the result. He believed it was longer—could not be much less than three months. This was a failure of course, arising from the distance between the two countries, and the necessary time employed in transmitting information from one to the other—besides the merchants were not prepared to enter immediately into the trade upon receiving such information. He said that merchants were cautious in embarking in new enterprises, until they had time to weigh the probable results of them.

The gentleman from Maine might be correct in his views on this subject, but he considered that the arrangement had not been persisted in sufficiently long to give a decisive result. He was disposed to allow it further time to operate, before he condemned it in toto—say till the first of March next, or even until next session of congress. Mr. S. objected to the statement of the duties made by the gentleman from Maine yesterday; the schedule from which the statement was made, differed from the present rate.—He should have stated from the office document. The merchants of Baltimore had not at first entered into the trade, but they were now doing so; their trade with the colonial ports was rapidly increasing—he was disposed to wait and see the result of their enterprise. Another way, at least, would enable them to ascertain whether the present arrangement was beneficial to them or otherwise, and there would be more facts than now on which to ground a report from a committee. Mr. S. animatedly adverted on the custom of prefacing resolutions with explanatory remarks, and said he could not at once recall his recollection to things which had been forgotten; was unprepared to enter into a discussion of the question yesterday, but he would now speak positively on the subject of the parliamentary bill. He could not affirm that it had passed into a law and never was acted on: he knew of no arrangement that had been made injurious to our commerce by the British government since the negotiation was concluded; he had heard of none, and presumed there was none. He said that American produce was carried to Canada and Nova Scotia in our vessels, and from there exported in the British vessels without charge of duty. The British vessels had an advantage of ours, arising from the circumstance of situation; they were nearer and were more distant from the channel of trade. But supposing it were, that our vessels were, in a manner, excluded from the northern colonies, we have still the West India trade, and in that part of the commerce of New York, Ohio, Michigan, &c. might find out in the West India colonies, in the same manner as if no arrangement had been made—there would be a loss to the commerce of the country from the regulations of parliament, as the gentleman maintained, it had been more than overbalanced by the benefits which had resulted to agricultural interests, and therefore he thought we should rest satisfied. They were not to legislate for a part of the union, but for the whole country at large. It would sometimes be the case that one portion was less fitted for than another, but this was unavoidable. Mr. S. apologized for transgressing on the patience of the house, and resumed his seat.

Mr. Holmes said, that he perfectly agreed with the gentleman from Maryland that he did not understand the subject; for if he had, he was sure he would not have made the statement which he did yesterday, that England had made no such arrangement as was supposed by them, and then claim the advantage of such an arrangement, as having been evidently beneficial to our agricultural interest.

He should be glad if the gentleman, after he had informed himself on this subject, would undertake to show how Mr. McLane's arrangement with England, had or could produce a beneficial effect. Our produce before this arrangement would necessarily rush out through the channel of the northern colonies; but what was the fact now. He should be happy to hear the gentleman from Maryland inform the senate, what had been gained by this arrangement, that would not have been equally enjoyed by the previous arrangements of 1833 and '35. He should attempt to show, that the relinquishment of our circuitous trade, was equivalent to the destruction of our commerce in that quarter—as the trade was now exclusively in the hands of England. He was prepared to show the state of our trade with the colonies, during the years 1821, 22, 27, and 30, up to the date of the president's proclamation, announcing this unexampled arrangement to the world. If the government will furnish us with a statement of the trade since that time, by comparing notes we shall be able to discover the advantages which have resulted to the country since the opening of this wonderful colonial trade; which the government have so humbly begged Great Britain to grant us, and for which boon, they were ready and anxious to sacrifice any thing that England might demand or desire.

The gentleman from Maryland, had objected to the document from which he had stated the duties imposed on our exports, but if he would take the trouble to look into the Albion, he would find himself in an error. He did not say that it was the same tariff as the present. He stated the time which elapsed, before we were informed of the opening of the trade from recollection, and he did not intend it to be understood as a precise statement—for he believed there was no news of arriving at the precise time, this side of the Atlantic. He still believed the time did not much exceed two months, possibly it might have been two and a half month after. The gentleman had said that our merchants were not prepared to enter immediately into this trade. This he conceived was not the reason of their not embarking in it. It was because the vessels were bound to these ports, had nothing to deposit when they arrived there, and therefore, they were obliged to turn about and proceed to England or some where else. We cannot carry produce from there to the other colonies, and then can. The British vessels can start from their ports and proceed directly to the West India, and pay only one shilling duty, and thus save about 300 dollars on each cargo, which we are forced to pay, making a saving of 600 dollars on every voyage.—These and other facts of a like nature, are among the reasons which prove the importance of passing the resolution. With these reasons before them, it is not to be wondered at that the people should wish to know what is going on, and why they have lost so much of their trade. Perhaps there may be some light thrown upon the subject, by the executive, the custom house officers or others, which will be useful, and for this reason he wished the resolution should pass.

The resolution was then agreed to.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 19—VOL. V.

BALTIMORE, JAN. 7, 1832.

[VOL. XLI. WHOLE No. 1,059]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ The editor gratefully presents the "compliments of the season" to his very numerous and respectable friends and supporters. If they have been as well pleased with him during the past year, as he has been with them—both parties may hope to jog on pleasantly together in the time to come: the editor contemplating no change in his course, desires that his friends may make none in their's. He renews his promises of fidelity and zeal—and they will do what is rightful that he may maintain them. In looking back, he sees not much to regret—and so he looks forward with confidence, chastened, he hopes, by the fear of doing wrong, but resolute in doing right.

☞ By the free use of our small type, we have disposed of much matter for record—and, perhaps, made room for about one-half the articles that we had ready prepared for the present sheet—some of which cost us a good deal of labor, and may become useless from being deferred. Well—we "can't help it."

☞ The report of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company to the governor of Maryland, is a triumphant exposition—and relates many facts of powerful interest to all the people of the United States. It will be found in a subsequent page. It is thought that the travelling between this city and Frederick, will give employment to not less than twenty large stages, next spring—when steam power will be permanently introduced.

The train of wagons which leaves Frederick every day at 3 o'clock, now consists of fourteen, and will soon be further increased. It is stated that about 2500 barrels of flour, with many other heavy articles, left Frederick for Baltimore during the present week.

The lines of rail roads, now made or making in the United States, are about eighteen hundred miles long. Those which are, with much seeming seriousness, contemplated, will extend a greater distance when located; and the joint capital of the whole will amount to a mighty sum. It is much to be regretted, that, from the want of some reasonable arrangement, a part of the surplus funds of the U. States may not be invested in such roads, or canals, if preferred. Five millions a year, abstracted from the public treasury, would probably save the people, in the cost of transportations and time, (which is "money"), at least as much every year, or yield an interest of 100 per cent. In a free government especially, the wealth of individuals may be said to pass directly into the national power—every citizen making an integral part of that power, each being expected, "at the call of the law, to rally round the standard of the law, and unite in common efforts for the common good." The plan which I had the honor to submit some time ago, that the national government should subscribe a third, or a fourth, or a fifth part of the stock in all such improvements, not to exceed, however, a certain fixed amount in any one year, would greatly encourage the making of them; and be free from those objections that have been offered to the manner in which appropriations for public works have hitherto been made. There is, perhaps, no way in which the "general welfare" can be better promoted than in lessening cost and time expended in transportations of persons and commodities; and, by the plan proposed, all parts of the union, possessed of a sufficient degree of public spirit, would be equally benefited.

A rail road from lake Erie, midway between Cleveland and Erie, to strike a point on the Ohio river in the eastern part of the state, is projected, and will probably, be commenced at an early day.

Baltimore and Ohio rail road. On the 4th inst. the court of appeals, sitting at Annapolis, reversed the decree of the chancellor and dismissed the bill of the complainants with costs, on No. 274, the Chesapeake and Vol. XLI.—No. 24.

Ohio canal company vs. the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, Archer and Dorsey, judges dissenting.

This decision against the rail road company was not expected. There were five judges on the bench, two of whom dissented from it. If such is the fixed law of the land,—future legislatures will do well to use extreme caution in granting acts of incorporation! The power which is said to have been extended to the old Potomac company, merged in, or transferred to, the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, remained dead for very many years—and yet it seems that such a power, once granted, may forbid improvement forever, so far as the "right of way" is concerned.

The consequences of this decision are looked to with great anxiety—for it seems that the rail road company have no appeal to the supreme court of the United States, and there are conditions in the charter of this company, by the state of Maryland, as to the line of the road, that will cause much perplexity, or involve a great expenditure of money. There would be some consolation, if that which so much injures us, benefited others—but of this there is no present prospect. The board, however, is not discouraged.

Rail roads in New York.—Applications will be presented to the next legislature of New York for acts of incorporation for twenty-five different rail roads, with an aggregate capital of forty-one millions of dollars!—Of these, however, three are for roads between lake Erie and the Hudson, with an aggregate capital of twenty-seven million.

Rail Road Journal.—The first number of a weekly publication, under the above title, has been issued at New York. It is published by D. K. Minor, esq. of that city, the publisher and part proprietor of the New York American. The Journal is ornamented with the appropriate engraving of a locomotive engine and passenger car. It is issued on a mammoth sheet in the octavo form, and contains a large mass of interesting matter on the subject of rail roads and other public improvements. We have no doubt this Journal will be ably conducted, and consequently prove a useful publication.

NEW YEAR'S DAY happening on Sunday, president Jackson, ex-president Adams, and Mr. Clay, received the visits of large number of persons at Washington, on Monday.

THE TARIFF. It will be seen that on Mr. Benton's resolution about alum salt, a brief, but decided debate took place, and the reference of the resolution clearly shows the state of feeling in the senate. Because of some things that have been stated, we quote the following from the National Gazette—

"Mr. Clay 'came out' decidedly and manfully respecting the American System. He eulogised it in warm terms, and stated, that on a suitable occasion, he would detail its advantages. His plan of action is one of compromise, as to particular points, but of unequivocal support of the principle of protection."

On the latter point, we well know that Mr. Clay will yield nothing—except to the will of the majority. He has no desire to "nullify" that—if argument and the rightfulness of the cause, shall fail to support it.

☞ The direction given by the senate to Mr. Benton's blanket-bill, leaves not the shadow of a doubt as to the course which that body will pursue; showing a settled determination not to sacrifice the principle of protection to manufactures, and in that view is highly interesting.

"HEP-MURRAY!" The "Boston Patriot" says—Captain Catesby Jones has been appointed to the command of the U. S. sloop of war Peacock, which, with the new schr. Boxer, are now fitting out at the Charlestown navy yard for the Falkland Islands and East Indies.

"PROTECTION"—or the "American System." It was stated in our last, that the president, in compliance with an application addressed to him by the ladies of Newbern, had given directions for a company of U. S. troops to be stationed in this place. The answer of the president to the petition of the ladies, and a letter from the secretary of war on the same subject, are as follows.

Washington, Dec. 5, 1831.

To ———

Ladies,—On the receipt of the memorial of the ladies of Newbern, North Carolina, I lost no time in referring the same to the secretary of war, with directions, if captain Whiting's company had been removed from thence, to order another company to Newbern for their protection and safety. I herewith enclose the reply of the secretary of war. That will shew with what promptness I have met the prayer and wishes of the fair petitioners. Be pleased to communicate this to the memorialists, and believe me, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

War department, Dec. 5. 1831.

The secretary of war has the honor to return to the president the letter of the ladies of Newbern, enclosing their memorial, and to inform the president, that captain Whiting's company was sometime since withdrawn, but that another has this day been ordered from Old Point Comfort to supply its place.

[Newbern Sentinel.

COTTON MANUFACTURES. A South Carolina paper states that the Walham company averages 83 per cent. on its capital, the Merrimac 7 1-8, the Hamilton 10 1-2, the Lowell 6. Surely, these dividends cannot be thought extravagant. For the two last years, the cotton manufacture has been regarded a good business—three years ago it was a bad one; and now, because of over-production or the pressure for money, the profits are much less than they were. The capital vested in such factories should yield at least 10 per cent. to meet casualties, encourage enterprise, and reward industry and talent.

COFFEE. An idea prevails that the production of coffee is not equal to the present demand, and large quantities of it have been stored in Europe and the United States, for higher prices. The stock in England is very large—but that at Antwerp is said to be 25,000,000 pounds less than at the same date last year! It is lively in the West Indies—and, at Havana, was in request at 9 1/2 to 12 cents—equal to the price in the United States when the duty was five cents, which is now only one cent per lb. There is a great deposit of coffee at Salem, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other ports, and large quantities have lately arrived from the East Indies, or are on their way—600 tons in one ship. Indeed, some say that our merchants have the present command of the coffee market; and there are persons who seem to believe that it will go up to 20 cents per lb. We shall see.

How dull must be those who cannot see in such operations the effect of scarcity and supply, on price? Had the duty on coffee been advanced to 10 cents a pound, instead of reduced to one cent,—what "free trade" man is there who would not have asserted that the "tax" was the cause of it—and yet it might as well be said that the moon is a green cheese.

SPECIE. The Journal of Commerce says—the advance of about one per cent. in the price of specie in the London market, we hear attributed to the considerable purchases made by persons alarmed by political events. The advances will probably cause some shipments to be made early in January. In the meantime, the arrivals are more than equal to the probable shipments.—Two vessels from Vera Cruz, have brought nearly $100,000.

* The letter is addressed to the three first signers of the petition.

GOLD. The business of gathering gold is greatly extending in the south, and appears to yield a fair profit on labor and capital. We have no correct idea of the aggregate value produced, but suppose that it must be two or three millions a year. Some of the mines are said to be the richest that are known in any part of the world. The chief quantity is obtained by mining, proper; much gold, however, seems to have been deposited while in a state of fusion, and the washings of the beds of rivulets afford a considerable amount.

Mr. F. EVERETT, has been presented, by the American Institute at New York, through the hands of Gen. Tallmadge, its president, with a splendid gold medal, in testimony of respect for his patriotic address delivered 14th Oct. 1831.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR. We see that the ground taken by Mr. Cass, concerning the Indian tribes, is warmly contested in some of the papers. But the late of this people is "sealed"—all on the eastern side of the Mississippi are to be hurried from the tombs of their ancestors, unless suffering themselves to be incorporated in the states; and the best efforts that can be made in their behalf, we are forced to believe, are such as shall most lessen the amount of privation and suffering to which they are exposed. It is clearly decided that they have no rights—because they have not power to defend them! They are rapidly declining in population, and will soon pass away—but history will tell the story of their wrongs, and say, that not a remnant was saved to shew the sincerity of our professions that the benefits of civilization might be extended to them: that our system was only a system of force.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. From the United States Telegraph, of December 31.

"Nothing but the sign manual of Andrew Jackson himself to such a bill, can overcome the strongest conviction we entertain he will sign no such bill."

So says the Richmond Enquirer.

Now mark what says the New York Enquirer, the special organ of the "fair apparent!" The oracle of the deity whom Mr. R. worships.

The New York Enquirer says:

"In the foregoing extracts we have the material parts of the several messages of general Jackson, relating to the bank of the United States. The very favorable view of the subject taken in his last message, and his wise determination to leave the subject to 'an enlightened people and their representatives', has been in a measure rendered nugatory, by an editorial article in the Washington Globe; which, by the enemies of the president, and those professing to be his friends who are interested in arraying him against the bank, has been represented to convey the opinions and views of the executive. It has always been the aim of our political opponents to hold the president responsible for the sayings of the Globe; but that paper and all who are sincere in their attachment to the venerable chief, have taken especial pains to avert from him any such responsibility. What shall we think then of those who, from opposition to the bank, are industrious in producing the impression that the remarks referred to were intended to be considered expressive of the feelings and views of the executive? The use which has been made of the article in question, and the total want of principle by those who could be induced thus to pervert its obvious meaning, compel us to say, that we know from the most unquestionable authority, the article referred to was not published with the knowledge of the president—expressed merely the private opinions of Mr. Blair—and was penned by him without knowing at the time that the report of the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY HAD BEEN SUBMITTED TO THE PRESIDENT PREVIOUS TO ITS TRANSMISSION TO CONGRESS. Mr. Blair had an unquestioned right to say all that he did, and we doubt not but he has witnessed with regret the evident perversion of his intentions, by attributing his remarks to the executive of the United States, or inducing the belief that they were written at his request. Having as we have shewn that the language of the president in his last message—language used after reading Mr. McLane's m-port—is the latest expression of his views on the subject of re-chartering the United States' bank, we will now proceed to review that language and its meaning, as compared with the opinions previously expressed by the same high functionary."

We have waited to see what notice Mr. Ritchie would take of this official announcement of a fact which Mr. Ritchie has denied to be true. Does no one understand why it is that Mr. R. denounces us as unworthy of all credit, for saying that which the New York Courier asserts without being censured?

Is this the way to preserve the liberty and independence of the press? Does Mr. R. believe what the Courier and Enquirer says to be true? If so, why does he denounce the Telegraph? Does he believe the statement in the Courier to be false? If so, why is he silent? Is this vigilant sentinel on the watchtower? For, Mr. Ritchie, fit! Is this the way that you would win a FOREIGN MISSION?

"THE CABINET." The "National Intelligencer" of Saturday last says—It is understood, that of the higher appointments made by the president of the United States during the recess of congress, those of Mr. Secretary Woodbury, and Mr. Attorney general Tully, have been confirmed by the senate; and that the residue have not yet been acted upon. There is much speculation as to the result on the nominations of Messrs. Livingston and McLean; especially the latter, whose late seems linked with that of Mr. Van Buren, because of the instructions, and acts under them, concerning the British West India trade. The nomination of James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, as minister to Russia, has just been ratified.

WOOL. The New York American Advocate mentions a decline in the price of wool—and estimates that 17,000 bales, or 6,000,000 lbs. of foreign wool, were imported into the United States in the year just ended. Such was the consequence of the speculations that we have several times spoken of; they very extensively injured those engaged in them, and the public—but wisdom, perhaps, may be gained from experience, though her school is a "dear one."

The "Advocate" says—the quantity of wool in the country is believed, by those most capable of judging, to be more than enough to supply the machinery of the country until shearing. In addition to the ample supply held by dealers, much is yet in the hands of growers, who were not willing, in May, to have taken 70 to 80 cents per pound, and some even refused 94 cents, because they had made up their minds to have a dollar per pound.

BOSTON. The editors of the "Courier," warm friends of the successful candidate for the office of mayor, Charles Wells, esq. says that city "will be obliged to 'endure the disgrace of having a mechanic for its mayor' for the next year, after all the labor of the Jackson party, the free trade party, the workingmen's party, the antimonopoly party, the independent party, and the fragments of all the parties."

Baltimore has been in the same state of "disgrace" for several years—the last and the present mayor being practical mechanics, at the time of their elections, and since. We do not know, however, that the public service has suffered because of these things!

The vote at Boston was for Mr. Wells 3,516. gen. Lyman 2,380—a very worthy gentleman. The "Statesman" says that he was not the "Jackson" candidate, being decidedly opposed to the administration; but that the "Jackson democrats" preferred and supported him, with a large portion of other persons.

MARYLAND. On Tuesday, the 26th ult. Richard Thomas was elected speaker of the house, he receiving 43 votes, L. D. Trachte 2 votes, and 15 of the ballots (the administration votes) being blank. George G. Brewer was appointed chief clerk of the same body.

In the senate, Benjamin S. Forrest was chosen president, and Joseph H. Nicholson chief clerk.

NORTH CAROLINA. From a recapitulation of the treasurer's report, which has been sent to the assembly, we find the following balances of cash to have been in his hands on the 1st of last month, viz:

Amount as public treasurer,	$35,022 99

As treasurer for the literary fund,	75,025 96½

TENNESSEE STATE BANK. If the Yankees know how to get clear of their wooden nutmegs, by deceiving the senses of the purchasers, they have their match in sundry officers of the Tennessee state bank, or some other persons who have abstracted its funds, and left no trace of them behind. The Argus says—The affairs of the institution are without a parallel. A large amount has been abstracted—and not only have all attempts to recover it been frustrated, but even the persons who obtained it, and who should be accountable for its return, are unknown to the public. It is known that the money has been illegally withdrawn; but what is much to be wondered at is, that, owing to the family influence of the offenders, public sentiment and even attempts at investigation by the legislature, are successfully put at defiance.

CLIMATE OF FLORIDA. The following account of the temperature of the air in Florida, during part of the late severely cold weather here, is communicated to us, (says the National Intelligencer), by a gentleman residing at Micauopy, in that territory:

FOR AFRICA. The ship James Perkins has just sailed from Norfolk for Liberia, with emigrants—eighty of them manumitted slaves from Southampton. They were well provided, and reported as being valuable persons. Their accommodations for the voyage appear to have been excellent.

THE INFLUENZA has caused the loss of many valuable lives in our chief cities. It has passed through some entire families—none escaping. Abstinence, and a close-keeping within a mild temperature, seem to be the best remedies for this disease. Irregularities and exposures make it fatal.

ORDNANCE. According to the annual report from the ordnance office, the work performed at the several arsenals and armories, in the year ending 30th September last, was as follows:—110 gun carriages and equipments, 997 holsters, about 830 sets of accoutrements for small arms, have been made at the arsenals; and that 16,741 small arms have been cleaned and repaired, and 26,481 muskets and their appendages, have been manufactured at the national armories. Of these, the army and marines have obtained 54 field gun carriages, 33 field guns, 2,209 complete muskets, and about 700 sets of accoutrements for small arms. The militia have procured, under the act of 1808, for arming and equipping the militia, 53 six pounder cannon, 103 field carriages with equipments complete, 150 sets of timber for gun carriages, and 10,230 stands of muskets and rifles. The total number of the militia is given at 1,262,315 (1,756 being of the District of Columbia); and the total of arms delivered to the militia during the year, is 1 brass mortar, 47 fourteen pounder cannon, 22,575 muskets, 6,463 rifles, 2,913 pistols, 921 artillery and non-commissioned officers' swords, 1,461 cavalry sabres, and the necessary accompaniments of caissons, harness, accoutrements, belts, holsters, and cartridge boxes. [Natl. Jour.]

LEAD MINES. The amount of lead made at the United States lead mines, at Fever river and Missouri, during the year, is 6,449,080 pounds. In 1829, the amount was 14,541,310 pounds. The rents of these mines are paid in levy; and in January, 1830, they were reduced from 10 to 5 per cent. in the amount of lead made. Yet there was, last year, less made by 8,091,230 pounds, than there was in the year 1830. [Ibid.]

ARMY DEATHS AND DESERTIONS. The number of deaths in the army during last year, is 126; of which 22 were from intemperance, and 21 from consumption. The desertions during this year, amounted to 1,450.—The annual loss by each desertion, is estimated at $81 60. It is suggested that an increase of pay to this amount might remedy this evil. [Ibid.]

FUGITIVES. Our papers have teemed with accounts of the flight of robbers and thieves from England to the United States. These adventurers generally make a bad business of it—being caught and re-exported. We desire that Mr. Bull will keep his thieves, as well as his paupers, and his fustians and calicoes, at home. We like not "free trade" in either. Suppose we send him a few cargoes of worn-out negroes, in return for his many ship loads of paupers? We don't like to owe Mr. Bull any thing. Let there be a reciprocity between Jonathan and John.

WASHINGTON. It has been observed that Washington seldom smiled and never laughed. This, however, is not correct. I was informed the other day, by a gentleman venerable for his age and information, that he had seen Washington nearly convulsed with laughter. One instance he mentioned with a great degree of amusement. At the time that our troops were encamped at Cambridge, information was received at head quarters that the English were about leaving Boston to give them battle. All was bustle and confusion. The soldiers were strolling over the town, and the officers were busily prepared for the approaching encounter. Some of the generals were calling for their horses, and others for their arms, and among the rest was general Green, at the bottom of the stairs, bawling to the barber for his wig—bring my wig, you rascal; bring my wig. General Lee diverted himself and the company at the expense of Green. "Your wig is behind the looking glass, sir." At which Green, raising his eyes, perceived by the mirror that the wig was where it should be—on his head.

Washington, in a fit of laughter, threw himself on the floor, and the whole group presented rather a ludicrous spectacle. However grave the commander-in-chief may have been in general, the reader will surely excuse the illustrious Washington in this deviation from his usual character. [Vermont Courier.]

MR. PLEASANTS. It will be recollected that this gentleman's case made a large figure in the famous book on "retrenchment," concocted at a late session of congress. He thus goesads his accusers—and may add another like case, if he pleases:

"We may, perhaps, be suspected, and we confess not without some reason, of denigrating Mr. Randolph through interested motives, seeing the close affinity between our respective trips to St. Petersburg and Buenos Ayres! A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind, and nobody ought to wonder, that, palled as we have been by Jacksonians for six years, on account of that famous expedition to the La Plata, we should wish, Teucer like, to take shelter behind the seven-fold shield of Mr. Randolph."

"CAUSE OF THE GREEKS." Much is said in the papers about gathering money in the United States, to raise up a college in Greece! There are thousands of persons in Maryland, Virginia, and other states, who need education as much as the Greeks. Charity is not constrained—but he that provideth not for his own household is worse than an infidel. The motive, perhaps, is good, but the direction a bad one.

FREE NEGROES. The contemplated arrangements in several of the slave-holding states, (without the shadow of right, or reason, on the subject, so far as we are informed), to cast out the free persons of color respectively, have roused the attention of the people in some of the non-slave-holding states; nor will Maryland receive those of Virginia, or Virginia those of North Carolina, or either of the slave-holding states any from elsewhere—each having the same inquietudes, and oppressed with the same real or imaginary burthen or cause of fear; though, so far, it is to the great credit of the free people of color that they have rather acted in defence of, than against, the white population, in disturbed parts of our country.

We refer to this matter just now because of the following proceeding in the legislature of Pennsylvania—and that, in legislating free people of color out of any of the states, some may be induced to ask, where shall they find a place of refuge? Shall they be hunted from state into state like wild beasts, merely because of the unfortunate color of their skins?

In the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, on the 17th ult. Mr. Vansant offered the following resolution, which was laid on the table:

Whereas, The states of Virginia and Maryland are about to pass some penal enactments for the purpose of expelling their free black population from their respective states, amounting to the number of about 125,000; whereby the adjoining states, without some countervailing provision by law, must be over-run, by an influx of ignorant, indolent and depraved population, most dangerous to the peace, rights and liberties of our citizens, and tending to undermine the fundamental principles of the republic.—Therefore,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary system, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law to protect the good citizens of this commonwealth against the evils arising from the emigration of free blacks, from other states, into Pennsylvania."

THE COLORED POPULATION. The best judgment of the people of Virginia and some of the other southern states, is earnestly exerted to discover what may be done with the colored population. It is a subject that must be grappled—a refusal to consider it will not prevent its accumulating force to do evil—it "let alone." But the public attention, we think, is unfortunately chiefly called to the free blacks. The elements of mischief, we apprehend, are not so much in them as in the slaves. The first have some and powerful motives to behave well, which cannot have influence over the second, when tempted to commit outrages on white persons.

Large numbers of liberated negroes have lately been sent from Virginia to Liberia. The colony is not prepared to receive one half that would be sent out in the present state of the public feeling—nor can it be, without much increased means.

ANOTHER INSURRECTION. The Western Freeman [published at Shelbyville, Tenn.] of the 6th ult. has the following:—

"We have been credibly informed, that there has been a considerable excitement among the citizens of Fayetteville, Tenn. within a few days past, in consequence of the discovery of a plot, among the negroes of that place and its vicinity, for an insurrection, all the particulars of which we have not yet learned. The plot was discovered by a female slave, who, it appears, had honey enough to communicate the foolish designs of the blacks to some white person, perhaps her master. Their object was to set fire to some building, and amidst the confusion of the citizens, to seize as many guns and implements of destruction as they could procure, and commence a general massacre. Many of those, who were engaged in this infernal conspiracy, have been slashed with all the severity, which the iniquity of their diabolical schemes, so justly deserved."

"BLACK LIST." The New York Courier and Enquirer have a placard or broad-sheet just imported from England, which presents at one view the names of the peers who voted against "the bill," and the "annual amount of pickings," which they and their families receive. The total is £2,181,567. "We will leave the world to judge," says the handbill, "whether this way of distributing the labor of the people, is the best calculated to do good or evil to the country. No doubt they dreaded the result of a reformed parliament; therefore joined heart and hand to destroy the people's rights by opposing the reform bill."

EMIGRATION TO CANADA. The following is a schedule of the arrival of vessels and passengers, from Great Britain, at Quebec, for the last 5 years:

	Vessels.	Passengers.
1827	602	16,862
1828	701	12,697
1829	863	13,357
1830	837	21,391
1831	962	49,062

The last year is only brought to October 25th.

LAW CASE—interesting. We are indebted to a friend for the following report of a case lately decided in the supreme court of this county, which is of some importance to the mercantile community. Boston Cour.

Hastings et. al. vs. Peppr. This was an action upon a bill of lading signed by the defendant, master of the brig Mexican, by which he acknowledged to have received at Philadelphia, for account and risk of the plaintiffs, a box containing a quantity of the oil of cloves, put up in a glass bottle and packed with straw into said box, and the box was marked, in addition to the initials to the plaintiff, "firm, glass with care, this side up." Said box was proved to have been delivered to the defendant at the wharf in Philadelphia in good order. On the arrival of said vessel at Boston, the bottle was found to be broken and its contents had run out upon the tea whereon it was stowed in the hold of said vessel, and the marked side of said box was not upwards, but upon the side, so that the bottle instead of standing upon its bottom lay upon its side. The court decided that as the carriage is a matter of contract, and as the owner has a right to judge for himself what position is best adapted to carrying goods of this description with safety, and to direct how they shall be carried, and the carrier has a right to fix his own rate for the carriage, or refuse altogether to take the goods with such direction, if the carrier accepts the goods for carriage thus marked, he is bound to carry the goods in the manner and position required by the no fee upon the box; the storage of the box, contrary to directions, is such negligence in the carrier that he is bound to pay the loss, unless he can prove clearly that the loss was not occasioned, in whole or in part, by such disregard of the directions.

"CANTON." This is the name of a tract of land adjacent to and S. E. of the city of Baltimore, bounding on the Patuxent river. A company, with a large capital, was some time since formed to improve the ground, erect buildings and wharves, and sell out lots, &c. A great deal of work has been done in the way of levelling hills and filling up, or draining, swamps—and, at present, we are receiving a large supply of wood from Canton, the cutting and hauling of which employs many hundred persons.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. By and with the advice and consent of the senate.

Moses T. Williams, of Cincinnati, to be surveyor general of public lands, in the states of Ohio, Indiana and Michigan territory, vice William Little, deceased.

Hore Browne Trist, of Louisiana, to be surveyor general of public lands, in the state of Louisiana, vice Joshua Baker, resigned.

Edmund Christian, of Virginia, to be marshal of the United States, for the eastern district of Virginia, vice John Pogram, deceased.

Abiah Sharpe, of Pennsylvania, to be marshal of the United States, for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, vice George B. Porter, appointed governor of Michigan territory.

James Points, of Virginia, to be marshal of the United States for the western district of Virginia, vice Benjamin Redler.

Henry D. Giffin, of Pennsylvania, to be attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania vice George M. Dall, resigned.

Nicholas Biddle, Joshua Lippincott, John T. Sullivan, of Pennsylvania, J. Campbell, of New York, and Hugh McCleerry, of Maryland, to be directors of the bank of the United States.

John Spencer, to be receiver of public moneys for the district of lands subject to sale at Fort Wayne, in the state of Indiana, vice Jonathan McCarty, resigned.

Francis Baylies, of Massachusetts, to be charge des affaires to Buenos Ayres, vice Mr. Forbes, deceased.

John Nelson, of Maryland, to be charge des affaires to Naples.

—Davezac, of Louisiana, to be charge des affaires to the Netherlands.

COLD COMFORT. We have heard it remarked that no winter has commenced with so much rigor as the present, since 1798. By reference to the file of our paper of that year, we find that on the 18th Nov. a violent snow storm commenced, which continued with little intermission for four days. "The quantity of snow which fell seemed almost incredible, and the oldest persons assert that they never knew such a storm so early in the season."

"The country posts inform that they were obliged to ride through fields for miles together—and in some places where paths had been shovelled the snow on both sides was as high as their heads when on horseback! In some instances arches were made under the snow for entrances to houses."

In the paper of April 6, 1799, we find the following extract from a Portland paper of March 26.

"Here in the District of Maine we have had above forty heavy snow storms, since the 18th Nov. and we yet feel all the severity of winter. A great quantity of snow covers the earth, and from appearances we may be led to anticipate good sleighing until May or June! So severe a winter has not been experienced since 1784."

[Portland Gaz.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrivals at New York bring Liverpool advices to the 17th November, inclusive.

ENGLAND.

Rumors of an intended resignation of the ministers had prevailed for several days, though contradicted by the Courier. The indecision in the policy of the ministry had, it was thought, strengthened the opposition. The hope of passing the reform bill by conversions among the lords, is admitted by that paper to be fallacious—twelve being the largest number of changes in favor of it, and there being three or four that formerly supported the bill who will now oppose it. Further delay in the creation of new peers, with a view of carrying the measure, is condemned.

The alarm about the cholera had greatly subsided, although there has been an increase of cases at Sunderland, and one had present-d itself at Newcastle—it being considered generally to be of domestic, and not foreign origin; though the London Courier has no hesitation in pronouncing it the Asiatic cholera, modified and changed by the climate of England.

Mr. O'Connell had proposed to form a grand national union, with a view of giving effect to the expression of opinion on political subjects.

FRANCE.

The peerage bill had not yet been presented to the house of peers. Its passage in that body was doubted, unless new peers were created, which project presented serious difficulties. A debate recently occurred in the chamber of deputies on the subject of ministers having received the sons of marshal Ney into the French army, from a foreign service. The propriety of which measure was conceded by the chambers.

The minister of marine had despatched telegraphic information to all the sea-ports, directing the most rigid quarantine to be enforced upon all vessels coming from England, to avoid the introduction of the cholera.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.

Some uneasiness was felt in consequence of the continued silence of the king of Holland upon the subject of the approval of the treaty between these two powers, and a report that he had appealed to the emperor of Russia—it was, however, thought that he would ultimately accede to the terms of the treaty.

SPAIN.

There had been some movements in the army of Spain, which had given rise to active speculations among the political circles of Paris, as to the objects of Ferdinand.

RUSSIA AND POLAND.

There is nothing from these countries, except the official report of prince Paskewitch, of the storming and capture of Warsaw. The whole loss of the Russian army is computed at 3,000 killed, including 63 officers, and 7,500 wounded, including 445 officers.

TURKEY.

There had been an extraordinary phenomenon in Constantinople. After an uncommonly sultry night, threatening clouds rose about six in the morning of the 5th of October in the horizon to the south west, and a noise between thunder and tempest was heard, and yet not to be compared with either—it increased every moment, and the inhabitants, roused from their sleep, awaited with anxious expectation, the issue of this threatening phenomenon—lumps of ice soon fell, as large as a man's foot, falling first singly, and then like a shower of stones, which destroyed every thing that they came in contact with. Some of these were picked up an hour afterwards, which weighed above a pound.

This dreadful storm passed over Constantinople and along the Bosphorus, over Thierapia, Bujukdere, and Belgrade, and the fairest, nay, the only hope of this beautiful and fertile tract, the vintage, just commenced, was destroyed in a day. Animals of all kinds, and even some persons, are said to have been killed; an innumerable quantity are wounded, and the damage done to the houses is incalculable. Besides that, scarcely a window has escaped in all the country. The force of the falling masses of ice was so great that they broke to atoms all the tiles on the roofs, and shattered, like musket balls, planks half an inch thick. Since that day the rain has not ceased to pour down in torrents, and, from the slight way in which the houses are built, almost wholly consisting of windows, and with very flat roofs that have nothing to keep off the wet besides tiles, innumerable families are not much more comfortable than in hivouae.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

December 30. Several petitions of a private character, and others relative to the public lands, were presented and referred.

Mr. Hayne reported a bill regulating the duties and providing for the compensation of pursers in the navy.

Mr. Johnston obtained leave to introduce a bill to authorize the inhabitants of the state of Louisiana, to enter the back lands—twice read and referred.

The Vice President laid before the senate sixty copies of a map of the north eastern boundary, now in dispute between the U. States and Great Britain—transmitted by the secretary of state, in conformity with a resolution of the senate. The letter accompanying the same, being read.

On motion of Mr. Holmes, it was resolved, that five hundred additional copies of the engraved impression of the disputed boundary, be furnished by the secretary of state, for the use of the senate.

The bill to abolish the duty on alum salt, having received its second reading, a motion was made by Mr. Benton to refer it to the committee on finance.

Mr. Dickerson moved to refer the bill to the committee on manufactures—saying:

"In relation to manufacturers, it was of high importance. It was a question whether the policy of protection in regard to this article should be abandoned. Though the bill embraced only that kind of salt which was obtained by evaporation with solar heat, yet in its effects, it extended also to that sort which was obtained by evaporation with fire. It affected the whole subject of manufacture of salt, and aimed at its total destruction."

Mr. Clay.—"This was not a time to discuss the subject of the bill; but he would remark that, in his opinion, it was inexpedient to legislate on this subject again, without waiting to see the operation of the bill of the last session. It was a subject of the greatest importance; for salt, he said, belonged to those essential articles of manufacture which it became us to foster by legislation. He was aware of the necessity of adapting the revenue of the country to the wants of the country, upon the extinction of the public debt, and he was ready to consider the debt as extinguished, and to proceed at once to the formation of the system on which the revenue was heretofore to be based. But if single articles are taken up, and, one by one, referred to the committee on finance, it would deprive us of an opportunity to form any system upon a general view of the whole ground. He wished that salt, iron, molasses, hemp, cotton, leather, all the essential articles of manufacture, might be embraced in one view."

Col. Benton "called on the American senate, who were willing to relieve the people—and, he said, no people in the world, except the English, were so heavily taxed as we were, and this was the opinion of Talleyrand—he called on every member to look at the practical consequences of this odious and oppressive tax. On the same principle on which we retained the duty on salt, we might also retain every other duty. If it be proposed to reduce the duty on worsted stuff goods, an article of universal use, it will be objected to, because it will diminish the consumption of woollens. If the reduction of the duty on tea be proposed, it will be objected to, for the reason that it will diminish the consumption of mush and milk, &c. The doctrine might be carried to that extent, and the whole burden will be kept up. The greatest sensibility was felt and expressed towards the interest of manufactures. He hoped he felt a proper interest in that branch of industry; but he also felt the same interest in agricultural, commercial and navigating pursuits. These have their degrees of importance. If he were to class them, he would place agriculture first, as the basis and source of all wealth. Manufactures, which changed the form of productions, so as to adapt them to the convenience and comfort of man, he placed second; commerce, which changed the place of all articles of consumption, and promoted civilization, stood next in his estimation. They were all great interests and entitled to our support. The agricultural interests were, however, chiefly concerned in the salt duty. The salt duty was to be kept up for the benefit of a few salt-makers in North Carolina and New York, to the prejudice of the vast agricultural interests of the west. While two hundred thousand dollars a year was drawn from the government as a drawback on fish, the west, from which ten times the value of all the fish was exported in beef, &c. was to have no relief whatever. He hoped to have an opportunity to prove what he had said before a select committee; for he was sufficiently experienced in legislation to know that argument was of no avail."

Mr. Clay.—"Sir, no one is more sensible than I am, of our duty to take care of the agricultural interests; and it was because he believed the success of manufactures essential to the prosperity of agriculture, that he had endeavored to promote the interest of manufactures. The gentleman from Missouri had argued the question as if it was certain that salt would be rendered cheap by the reduction or abolition of the duty. He wishes to make it cheaper, so do I. We repealed the duty, in part, in May, and what has been the effect? The price of salt is now higher than it has been for fifteen years past. In this case then the reduction of the duty was not followed by a reduction of price. Even an augmentation of duty sometimes occasions a reduction of price. The reason that the price of salt had not fallen, was, that our navigation had been profitably employed. The Liverpool salt is introduced only as ballast; and the salt of the Bahamas is not imported, when any better freight can be procured. The gentleman compares our salt duty with the salt tax of England. Can there be any comparison between our moderate duty and the tax of fifteen shillings a bushel, which was its amount when he was in England? He knew not what might have been the oppression of the gabelle in France, to which the gentleman also compared our salt duty; but he did know that the prosperity of this country took its date from the adoption of the protective policy, of which this salt duty formed a part. To the tariff, not of '16, but of '24, we were indebted not only for our prosperity, but for the extinction of the public debt, which was now at hand. He was aware that this discussion belonged to another time, when, no doubt, the subject would undergo a most rigid examination; but he must be allowed to comment on the remark made by the gentleman from Missouri, that alum salt is exclusively required for the western consumption. I undertake to say, said Mr. C. that not one bushel in fifty thousand of this sort of salt is used in the west. I am a farmer, and I never saw a bushel of it on my farm. He had witnessed, in the west, the reduction of the price of salt from fifteen dollars a bushel to seventy-five cents, which was the present price of the Kanawha salt, in consequence of the protection which had been afforded to the manufacturers of salt in that country."

The question being taken on the first motion, (to refer the bill to the committee on finance), was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Smith, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler and Whit—17.
NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Buckner, Clay, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Foot, Frilinghuyten, Hanna, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Marcy, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Symour, Silsbee, Tomlinson and Wilkins—22.

The bill was then referred to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Johnston submitted a resolution requiring the secretary of the treasury to report to congress, such further information as he may have received, since his report of Dec. 1830, relative to the claims of merchants, for return of duties paid under the law of May, 1828.

Several bills for the relief of private individuals, were received from the house of representatives—severally read twice and referred.

On motion of Mr. Holmes, it was ordered, that when the senate adjourns, it be to Tuesday next.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and sat with closed doors until 4 o'clock; and then adjourned to Tuesday.

January 3. Mr. Huggamun, of Louisiana, and Mr. Tipton, of Indiana, appeared to day, were qualified and took their seats.

Several memorials and petitions were presented—among them one by Mr. Dallas from sundry citizens of Philadelphia, asking an appropriation for improving the navigation of Back creek—another by the same gentleman, as also one by Mr. Silsbee, from certain citizens, asking for the repeal of the duty on imported coal.

Mr. Hayne reported a bill to provide for the distribution of the duties of the commissioners of the navy—and a bill concerning navy agents—severally read and ordered to a second reading.

The vice president communicated a report from the secretary of the navy shewing the names and salaries of the clerks in his department—also a report from the general land office on the subject of unconfirmed land claims in Missouri—severally ordered to be printed.

The vice president also communicated a report from the secretary of state, shewing the names and salaries of the clerks in his department.

The vice president also communicated a report from the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of representatives of their proceedings under the act of congress of 2d March, 1831, directing a subscription to the compilation of congressional documents, proposed to be published by Gales & Seaton—shewing the order of arrangement of the intended publication, &c.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Several bills providing for the adjustment of private claims were reported, twice read, and referred.

Mr. Marcy reported a bill providing for the final settlement of the claims of states for interest on advances to the United States, made during the last war, without amendment.

The resolutions submitted on Friday last, by Mr. Johnston, Mr. Hanna and Mr. Hendricks, were severally considered and agreed to.

Mr. Johnston, of Louisiana, submitted the following: Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the territory of Arkansas, one thousand acres of the unappropriated land below and adjoining the town of Little Rock, for the purpose of building a jail and court house, for the use of the United States and said territory; and that said land be selected by the governor of said territory, and laid off into lots, of such size as he may deem expedient, and sold when said governor may think it proper to be done; and the surplus, if any, after building said jail and court house, to be appropriated in building a house for the use of the present and future governors of Arkansas.

Mr. Dallas was appointed a member of the committee on the militia. The bill providing for the compensation of the pursers of the navy was taken up, and, after some remarks from Mr. Hayne, was, on motion of Mr. Dickerson, postponed until this day week.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and sat with closed doors for some time, when the senate adjourned.

January 4. The vice president communicated a report of the navy department, shewing the contracts and purchases of that department for 1831.

The vice president also communicated a letter from Messrs. Gales & Seaton, relative to the American state papers publishing by them, under a resolution of the last congress, together with two volumes of the work.

On motion of Mr. King, of Alabama, the letter was ordered to be printed, and was referred to the library committee.

Various private memorials were presented, and amongst them one from sundry lieutenants in the navy, praying for an alteration in the present organization of the naval establishment.

Mr. Grundy reported the bill, without amendment, for laying out and constructing a road from Lime creek to the Chatahochee, &c.

Mr. Hayne reported a bill to establish the office of surgeon-general of the navy.

Mr. Benton reported a bill for the erection of barracks, quarters and store houses, and the purchase of a site, in the vicinity of New Orleans. Also the bill providing for the organization of the ordnance department.

Mr. Benton also reported a bill to reduce the duty on Indian blankets and certain other Indian goods, which was read.

The several resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. Holmes, Johnston, Forsyth and Wilkins, were considered and agreed to.

The bill providing for the final settlement of the claims of states for interest on advances to the United States, made during the last war, was taken up in committee of the whole, and after some remarks by Messrs. Chambers and Forsyth, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill concerning navy agents, was made the order of the day for Friday next.

After the consideration of executive business,

The senate adjourned.

January 5. The vice president communicated a letter from the secretary of the treasury shewing the annual amount of drawback, of bounties on salted provisions, pickled fish, and allowances to vessels employed in the fisheries from 1792 to 1830 inclusive—also quantities of fish, pork, beef and bacon exported during the same period.

The bill to reduce the duty on Indian blankets and certain other Indian goods was read the second time; when

Mr. Benton moved to refer it to the committee on finance—Mr. Dickerson moved its reference to the committee on manufactures.

An interesting debate ensued, and on the question being taken to refer the bill to the committee on Indian affairs, was decided in the negative by a vote of, yeas 17, noes 25.

The question then occurred on referring it to the committee on manufactures—when

A debate again ensued—and on the question being taken, it was decided to refer the bill to the said committee, by the following vote,

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Buckner, Clay, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Marcy, Naudain, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster and Wilkins—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Benson, Bibb, Brown, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Hill, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Smith, Tazewell, Tipton, Tyler and White—15.

So the bill was referred to the committee on manufactures.

The bill providing for the settlement of the claims of states for interest for money advanced during the late war, was passed and sent to the other house.

After disposing of various private bills, the senate went into the consideration of executive business.

The senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Dec. 30. On motion of Mr. Drayton the library committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of subscribing to the continuation of Waterston and Vanzandt's tabular statistics, and of purchasing the remaining copies which the compilers may have on hand.

Various resolutions contemplating the adjustment of private claims were presented read and referred.

On motion of Mr. McCarty, the committee on internal improvements were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting an appropriation for the further extension of the Cumberland road in the state of Indiana.

On motion of Mr. Watmough, it was Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the collector at any port to receive the bonds of importers not resident there, where the same shall be accompanied by a certificate from the collector of the port at which said importers reside, that the bondmen are good to make such bond payable at the place of importation.

On motion of Mr. Wing, it was

Resolved, That the committee on internal improvements be instructed to inquire into the expediency of further extending the improvements at La Plaisance bay, at the head of Lake Michigan, and of connecting, by a short canal, the waters of the bay with the river Raisin.

By the same, and ordered to lie one day:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to report to this house the plans and estimates of major Maurice, of the engineering corps, in reference to farther improvements at and near La Plaisance bay harbor, in the territory of Michigan.

Mr. Davis reported the bill from the senate to provide for the reports of the decisions of the supreme court, without amendment.

A number of reports, accompanied by bills for the settlement of private claims, were made, read and referred.

Mr. McDuffie reported bills making appropriations for the Indian department and for the fortifications for the year 1832, which were severally twice read and committed.

Mr. Blair, of Tennessee, from the committee on internal improvements, to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill to appropriate certain lands within the state of Alabama, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Tennessee and Coosa rivers, and connecting their waters by a canal or rail road; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. E. Everett, from the committee on the library, reported a bill, providing for the purchase of certain copies of the debates on the federal constitution, which was twice read and committed.

The debate on the resolution offered by Mr. Hunt, and proposed to be amended by Mr. Duncan, in relation to the disposition to be given by the public lands, was resumed.

Mr. Root of New York, Mr. Mitchell, of S. C. Mr. Taylor, of New York took part in the debate—and on motion of Mr. Taylor, the resolution, together with the amendments, were referred to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

The house then went into the consideration of private business, when eleven bills passed through committees of the whole house, and were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Hilde, of Georgia, the house then adjourned till Tuesday next.

Tuesday, Jan. 3. Mr. Drayton reported a bill to increase the pay of the master armorers in the service of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Burges,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of further extending, for the term of two years from the expiration of the present session of this congress, the law of May 16th, 1826, providing for extending the time allowed for redemption of lands sold, or which may be sold for non-payment of taxes under the law referred to therein, and in manner therein mentioned.

On motion of Mr. Pearce, the committee of commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the erection of spindles, on the Hall Way Rock, so called, near the south end of the island of Providence, in Narragansett bay, on the Little Lane Rock, in the harbor of Newport.

On motion of Mr. Hogan, the committee on internal improvements were instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a breakwater for the protection of the harbor of Plattsburg, and of erecting a light house on Cumberland Head, on Lake Champlain.

On motion of Mr. Taylor, the committee on the post office and post roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of revising the act to regulate and fix the compensation of the clerks in the post office department, upon an equal footing with the clerks in the other departments.

On motion of Mr. Dearborn, the committee on commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring the secretary of the treasury, annually to prepare and lay before congress statistical accounts of the commerce and navigation between the several states, for each preceding year, in the manner prescribed by the act of February 10, 1820, for the commerce with foreign nations.

Various resolutions were moved to place certain individuals on the pension list.

On motion of Mr. Everett, the committee on internal improvements were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Connecticut river.

On motion of Mr. Gilmore, the same committee was instructed to make a similar inquiry concerning the improvement of the navigation of the Alleghany river.

Mr. Pendleton, of New York, submitted for consideration the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a bill to regulate and declare the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court of the United States, in criminal cases arising in the state courts.

2. Resolved, That in the proposed bill, the provisions of the 25th section of the act "to establish the judicial courts of the United States," passed September 24, 1789, shall be declared to apply to the final judgments in criminal cases, which are now depending, or which shall hereafter arise in the state courts.

3. Resolved, That in the proposed bill, adequate provisions shall be inserted to enforce the return of all process and proceedings in the court below to the supreme court of the United States.

4. Resolved, That in the proposed bill, it will be expedient to provide, that in all cases a writ of error to be allowed in pursuance of the act, shall have the effect to suspend the execution of the judgment complained of, and that adequate penalties shall be imposed upon any person or persons who shall, in this respect, violate the provisions of the act.

These resolutions Mr. P. moved to refer to a committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Bendaley, of New York, objecting in the phraseology of the resolutions, wished to amend them so as to limit them to an instruction to inquire into the subject.

The speaker said that no amendment could now be made, because the pending question was on an amendment to a committee of the whole, for the purpose of being there considered.

Mr. Carson, of North Carolina, objected to their going to a committee of the whole in the present stage.

Mr. Pendleton intimated that he had no design, in the motion which he had made, to ask the house at all to commit itself at present upon the points embraced in his proposition.

Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, not willing to act hastily in a matter of such importance as that now under consideration, moved that the resolutions lie on the table and be printed for the use of the house.

Mr. Everett, of Massachusetts, referring to the difficulty experienced in getting up again business once laid on the table, and to the impropriety of giving the go by to a subject of such high importance as that now under consideration, wished his colleague to withdraw his motion, and let these resolutions go to a committee of the whole, as proposed by the mover.

Mr. Davis, yielding to the request of his friend, withdrew his motion.

Mr. Wilde, of Georgia, renewed the motion to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. Everett, of Mass. then said that this was a question so important, under the circumstances, that he left it to be his duty to ask that it be decided by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered accordingly; and the motion to lay upon the table not admitting of debate, the question was immediately taken up on that motion, and decided as follows:

Yeas 99 nays 89.

So the motion of Mr. Pendleton was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. Barber, it was resolved, that the secretary of war be directed to report a statement of the claims of the state of Connecticut against the United States for disbursements made by said state, and for the services and expenses of her militia, during the late war, and of such proceedings as may have been had at the department of war in relation thereto.

Mr. Mercer submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That as soon as the public debt of the United States shall have been discharged, or such provision made therefor as shall release the public lands from the claims of the public creditors, the nett proceeds of the sales of those lands shall be applied, under such regulations as the legislatures of the several states and territories may respectively provide, in the proportion of one moiety to popular education, and the other to the removal of such free people of color, thereof, as may desire to emigrate to Liberia, in Africa, or elsewhere, beyond the limits of the United States and of their territories.

Resolved, That in effecting the preceding purposes, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands be distributed among the several states and territories according to their respective numbers.

Mr. M. moved that it be committed to a committee of the whole house on the state of the union; when

A motion was made by Mr. Clay, that it be laid on the table; upon which latter motion,

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; but before the question was taken, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 4. The speaker laid before the house a report from the department of state, shewing the aggregate number of persons in each state, according to the 5th census, as required by a resolution of Dec. 1831. Also, a report of the secretary of war transmitting a plan and estimate for fort Griawohl, on Groton Heights, in the state of Connecticut. Also, a report from the secretary of the navy accompanied by a statement of the contracts and purchases made during the year 1831, on account of the naval service.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of representatives, accompanied by a report of their proceedings under the act of March, 1831, relative to the publication of congressional documents. Also, a letter from Gales & Seaton on the subject of the documents publishing by them, together with the two first volumes of the work.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted by Mr. Mercer, the question being on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, which was determined in the affirmative. Yeas 124, nays 54.

Mr. Drayton reported a bill to authorize the erection of an armory on the western waters of the United States.

Mr. White, of Louisiana, made a report on the petition of Duff Green, accompanied by a bill authorising a stereotype edition of the laws of the United States.

Mr. Polk made a report, accompanied by documents and a bill for the apportionment of representatives among the several states, according to the 5th census—twice read and committed.

Mr. Allen reported a bill granting a township of land for the benefit of the Transylvania university of Kentucky—twice read and committed.

Mr. Mercer reported a bill providing for the extension through the territory of Arkansas, the road from Washington to Jackson, in said territory—twice read and committed.

Mr. Drayton made an unfavorable report on the memorial of the legislature of the territory of Arkansas.

On motion of Mr. Leavitt, the committee on military affairs was instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the appropriation for arming the militia.

On motion of Mr. White, of Louisiana,

Resolved, That the committee on internal improvements be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act of the 34th May, 1834, entitled "an act to improve the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers," so as to embrace in its operations the deepening of the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi.

On motion of Mr. Drayton,

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay and emoluments of the officers of the United States navy, so as to place them upon an equality with officers of the same rank in the army of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Lyon the committee on internal improvements were directed to inquire into the expediency of improving the navigation of Cumberland river,

On motion of Mr. Wickliffe

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of vacating all present, and prohibiting all future appointments in the staff of the army from the captains of the army; and to require that each captain shall be kept with and in command of his appropriate company. That the executive be vested with a discretion to appoint from the non-commissioned officers of the army, when they may be found worthy of promotion, a certain portion of the second lieutenants. That, in order to enable the president to do this, the committee further inquire into the expediency of reducing the number of cadets in the military academy at West Point, and to prohibit the appointment of any cadet who has not attained the age of 17 years.

Mr. Boone moved an inquiry into the propriety of improving the Wabash river.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution moved several days ago by Mr. Blair, as modified by Mr. Vinton, with amendments as proposed by Mr. Duncan, and Mr. Mitchell, of S. C. proposing certain modes for hereafter disposing of the public lands, appropriating them to the use of the several states for the purposes of education and internal improvement, which, after a slight debate, was, on motion of Mr. Wickliffe ordered to be laid on the table, by a vote of yeas 109, nays 79.

A great many bills providing for the adjustment of private claims, were considered and disposed of.

The house adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 5. Mr. Drayton reported a bill making further provision for the military academy at West Point.

The resolution of Mr. Mercer, relative to amount of expenditures on breakwaters and moles, &c. was taken up and agreed to.

The resolution relative to newspaper postage was taken up and after discussion, laid on the table.

The resolution moved by Mr. Cambreleng, on the 27th ult. relative to the amount of nett revenue collected on woollens, cotton and certain descriptions of iron, was considered, amended, and agreed to.

The speaker laid before the house a statement from the secretary of the treasury of the cases in which duties had been returned.

The bill for settling the claims of South Carolina for advances during the war, was considered, and, after a warm debate on a motion of reference, the house adjourned without coming to a decision.

[Some particulars of this day's proceedings in both houses, will be given in our next.]

MASONIC.

Address to the people.

While the public mind remained in the high state of excitement, to which it had been carried by the partial and inflammatory representations of certain offences, committed by a few misguided members of the masonic institution, in a sister state; it seemed to the undersigned [residents of Boston and vicinity] to be expedient to refrain from a public declaration of their principles or engagements as masons. But believing the time to be now fully come, when their fellow citizens will receive, with candor, if not with satisfaction, a solemn and unequivocal denial of the allegations, which during the last five years, in consequence of their connexion with the masonic fraternity, have been reiterated against them, they respectfully ask permission to invite attention to the subjoined

DECLARATION.

Whereas, it has been frequently asserted and published to the world, that in the several degrees of freemasonry, as they are conferred in the United States, the candidate, on his initiation and subsequent advancement, binds himself, by oath, to sustain his masonic brethren in acts which are at variance with the fundamental principles of morality, and incompatible with his duty as a good and faithful citizen; in justice therefore to themselves, and with a view to establish TRUTH and expose IMPOSITION, the undersigned, many of us the recipients of every degree of freemasonry, known and acknowledged in this country, do most solemnly deny the existence of any such obligations in the masonic institution, so far as our knowledge respectively extends, and we as solemnly aver that, no person is admitted to the institution, without first being made acquainted with the nature of the obligations, which he will be required to incur and assume.

Freemasonry secures its members in the freedom of thought and of speech, and permits each and every one to act according to the dictates of his own conscience in matters of religion, and of his personal preferences in matters of politics. It neither knows, nor does it assume to inflict upon its erring members, however wide may be their aberrations from duty, any penalties or punishments, other than those of admonition, suspension, and expulsion.

The obligations of the institution require of its members a strict obedience to the laws of God and of man. So far from being bound by any engagements inconsistent with the happiness and prosperity of the nation, every citizen who becomes a MASON, is doubly bound to be true to his God, to his COUNTRY, and to his FELLOW-MEN. In the language of the "ancient constitutions" of the order, which are printed and open for public inspection, and which are used as text-books in all the lodges, he is "required to keep and obey the moral law; to be a quiet and peaceable citizen; true to his government and just to his country."

Masonry disdains the making of proselytes. She opens the portals of her asylum to those only who seek admission, with the recommendation of a character unspotted by immorality and vice. She simply requires of the candidate, his assent to one great fundamental religious truth—the existence and providence of God, and a practical acknowledgment of those infallible doctrines for the government of life, which are written by the finger of God, on the heart of man.

Entertaining such sentiments as masons, as citizens, as Christians, and as moral men, and deeply impressed with the conviction that the masonic institution has been, and may continue to be, productive of great good to their fellow-men; and having "received the laws of the society, and its accumulated funds, in sacred trust for charitable uses," the undersigned can neither renounce nor abandon it. We most cordially unite with our brethren of Salem and vicinity, in the declaration and hope that, "should the people of this country become so infatuated as to deprive masons of their civil rights, in violation of their written constitutions, and the wholesome spirit of just laws and free governments, a vast majority of the fraternity will still remain firm, confiding in God and the rectitude of their intentions, for consolation, under the trials to which they may be exposed."

The preceding declaration is signed by 1,300 or 1,400 persons. We have not exactly counted them up—but such is about their number. Among the names are many of the venerable remnants of the revolution—many aged more than "three score and ten"—with a large amount of clergymen of different persuasions, and some of the most honored and distinguished gentlemen of Massachusetts, of all political parties, except the anti-masonic. It should be observed that the list is confined to Boston, and its vicinity, and the Centinel says—"The number of signers could easily have been augmented to the number of all respectable masons throughout the state, but it was not deemed necessary to delay the publication long enough to collect their names. We invite the candid attention of all classes of men, whether masons or anti-masons, to the declaration."

The same paper adds—"It is not for the purpose of any ostentatious display that the declaration is now made. At a time when a relentless persecution for political purposes has been attempted to be excited against a benevolent society, the existence of which, like all other societies, is guaranteed by our laws and constitutions—it has been deemed proper for its own members to come forth and state their sentiments and views under their own proper signatures, and to appeal to the candor and common understandings of the community, against the calumnies and obloquies, which have been heaped upon them by unprincipled men for political purposes. On the characters of the signers, it is needless to dilate; they form a large proportion of the friends and neighbors of every reader in the community. Let them have credit according to the character of their lives."

MR. CLAY AND MASONRY.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

We never pretended that Mr. Clay had denounced the principles of free masonry; nor did we ever believe that he would, at least under the circumstances in which he has been placed by his friends, come forth with a denunciation of the institution, when the only effect would be to incur fresh personal attacks, and throw his motives open to suspicion. But we did believe that Mr. Clay, in common with a large portion of the best and most intelligent masons throughout the union, had ceased to have any active participation in the transactions of the society, under a conviction that all of its useful and benevolent purposes were better fulfilled by the agency of more recent and more efficient institutions; and this impression has been more strongly confirmed by the late letters of gen. Porter and judge Rochester, on this subject. Indeed, from the representations uniformly made by Mr. Clay's particular friends, as well as from the tenor of his letter to the anti-masons, as one which appertains solely to our social and moral relations and responsibilities, and as having nothing to do with our political duties; and that, in this point of view, he deemed it to be not only his right, but his duty, to resist every attempt, whether made by masons or anti-masons, to demand from any individual citizen, for political purposes, a public exposition of his sentiments on subjects which have no legitimate connexion with political duty. With these few brief remarks, intended at once as a vindication of our former assertions upon this subject, and also as a just exposition of what we believe to be the feelings of Mr. Clay, we subjoin the following documents—the originals of which may be seen at this office.

I do hereby certify that the honorable Henry Clay did legally and honorably deinit* from Lexington lodge No. 1, "on the 18th day of November, A. D. 1824." The foregoing is truly extracted from the records of said lodge.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the lodge annexed thereto, this 25th day of November, A. D. 1831.

JOHN HENRY,

Secretary Lexington lodge No. 1.

I, Harry J. Bodley, grand secretary of the grand lodge of Kentucky, do hereby certify that it appears from the returns of Lexington lodge No. 1, (which is subordinate to the grand lodge of Kentucky), that John Henry, whose name is attached to the foregoing certificate, is secretary of Lexington lodge No. 1; and that it further appears,

*To deinit, according to Webster, is to let fall; to depress; to submit; but is not used, excepting as a masonic term. Its meaning, in free masonry, is to let fall; to relinquish; give up; or withdraw from.

from the proceedings of said grand lodge, that Henry Clay demitted from said lodge No. 1, between August 1834, and August 1835.

In testimony whereof I have hereto set my hand, and affixed the seal of said grand lodge, this 26th November, 1831.

H. J. BODLEY, grand sec'y.

In justice to Mr. Clay, we may as well mention the fact, that he was in no wise necessary to the obtaining the foregoing certificates by us; nor did he know that they were in our possession until we had had them upwards of two weeks, nor until the above article was prepared for the press.

The following may be added as one of the "signs of the times"—we have omitted, however, a few words because of their political and personal severity, intending only to present the fact stated:

The Morristown (N. Jersey) Palladium, a respectably conducted and well established paper, took an early and decided stand for anti-masonry, and of course for anti-masons as candidates for office—this ground was pertinaciously maintained until last week—when it concluded the publication of the Baltimore national republican convention address, with some appropriate remarks, and the following declaration:

"Many of the substantial supporters of this press will, no doubt, be disappointed in the decision of the convention—indulging the hope that the opposition to the present administration would be concentrated on the distinguished individual who received the nomination of the anti-masons some months since. But it is determined otherwise, and the political influence of this state will go for CLAY—the constitution—the American System—and the supremacy of the law"—or for "Old Hickory," and the consequent continuance of the abuses of his administration. Notwithstanding our aversion to the principles of speculative freemasonry, we never can consent to pursue a course that may have a tendency to augment the influence of

We have, therefore, after mature deliberation, and candidly weighing the honest scruples and objections of the friends of Mr. Wirt, concluded heretofore to sail under the broad banner of "CLAY AND THE CONSTITUTION."

MR. GIRARD'S WILL

The Philadelphia (Poulson's) Advertiser contains the following authentic abstract from the will of the late Stephen Girard. The editor remarks:—"There is not perhaps, an instance recorded in the history of the world, of one human being devoting such an immense amount of wealth for the benefit of his fellow men, as the venerable deceased has given to the city of his adoption, for the laudable purpose of its improvement, and for the melioration of the condition of its inhabitants."

Stephen Girard's will,

Gives to the Pennsylvanian hospital, subject to the payment of an annuity of $20 to a female slave, whom he sets free $30,000
To the asylum for the deaf and dumb 20,000
To the orphane asylum 10,000
To the controllers of the public schools 10,000
To the city corporation, to be invested, and the interest to be applied, annually, in the purchase of wood for the poor 10,000
To the society of ship masters 10,000
To the free masons' lodge 20,000
For a school to be erected in the township of Passaic, for poor white children 6,000
Sundry legacies to individuals amounting to 120,000
Several annuities amounting to about 4,000
To the city of New Orleans 1,000 acres of improved land in the territory of Mississippi, and One-third of 207,000 acres of unimproved land in the same territory,
To the city of Philadelphia the remaining two-thirds of the said unimproved lands. [This land is said to be now worth $500,000.]
To the city of Philadelphia, stock in the Schuylkill navigation company 110,000

[Worth in the market considerably more than this sum.]

For a college for poor white male children and its proper endowments, the sum of 2,000,000

To the city of Philadelphia, for certain city improvements, to be invested, and the interest to be annually applied 500,000

All his remaining estate, real and personal (no part of the real estate to be sold) is to be applied as follows:—in further aid of the said college—improvements of the city, and in the relief of the taxes—This estate is very large, but not yet valued.

To the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to be applied to internal improvements by canals, provided the legislature shall, within one year from Stephen Girard's decease, pass laws authorizing the city of Philadelphia to make the intended improvements—otherwise to the United States for the same object 300,000

The gentlemen hereafter named are the executors of his will.—Timothy Paxson, Thomas P. Cope, Joseph Roberts, William J. Duane, John A. Barclay.

[The whole amount given to his relations, appears to be involved in the 120,000 dollars above stated—but he had made partial provision for some of them heretofore.

It has been said that he gave an annuity of 1,500 to each of his sea-captains: and the sum of $500,000 to the city of New York, where he first landed in America.

We shall, probably, have particulars alter a while. The manner in which this large property has been devised, renders it publicly interesting.

The total value of the donations to the college, may amount to twice as much as the money given.

The value of the estate of Mr. Girard is variously stated—the accounts run from six to eleven millions of dollars.

The trustees have stopped the operations of his bank, as to the reception of fresh deposits, or discounts of new paper.

It is computed that twenty thousand people attended the funeral of Mr. Girard, in their variously associated or individual characters; and the flags of the shipping in the harbor were at half-mast for three days. These marks of respect were well deserved. Mr. Girard was a blessing to working-men, of all descriptions; and his example had a powerful effect on the conduct of other capitalists, to circulate their money.]

[Mr. Girard has prohibited the entry of any ecclesiastic, missionary or minister, of any sect whatever, even as a visitor, on the premises of the college which he has endowed.]

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD.

Office of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company, 20th Dec. 1831.

To his excellency the governor and the honorable executive council of Maryland:

Since the last report of the president and directors of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company to the executive of the state, the operations of this company have been continued with unremitting activity and the rail road has been opened for travel as far as to Frederick, a distance of 61 miles from the depot of the company at the head of the basin in the city of Baltimore; a single line of tracks has also been so nearly completed to the "Point of Rocks," on the Potomac river, as to afford a full assurance that the communication between the tide waters of the Chesapeake bay and that river, will very soon be opened through this channel.

The president and directors believe it due to the interests of the great work over which they preside, as well as to the legislature of the state, that they should, on this occasion, refer to some of the circumstances which led to the formation of this company.

The establishment of an efficient, speedy and economical means of intercommunication between the different sections of our country, had been for a long time deemed of such importance, as to involve, not only the well being, but perhaps the very existence of our social compact. The citizens of Baltimore, deeply sensible of this truth, and appreciating the great benefits which would be derived from a participation in the commerce of the valleys of the Ohio and Upper Mississippi, which commerce has been forced to seek an outlet through several difficult and circuitous channels, were desirous of securing a more direct and easy means of communication with those fertile regions. It was therefore with intense anxiety they awaited the promulgation of the official report of the U. States engineers upon the subject of the proposed canal between the river Ohio and the waters of the Chesapeake bay. The facts however disclosed in that report only served to dissipate whatever favorable anticipations had been cherished in regard to a canal communication with the west. They saw with dismay, that a canal encumbered with 400 locks, a considerable portion of which would be elevated from 1,200 to more than 2,000 feet above tide, and which would be sealed up with frost three or four months in the year, with only a limited and precarious supply of water in summer, must be wholly inadequate to the demands of the immense trade, it was destined to accommodate.

Abandoning, therefore, all reliance upon such an insufficient means of communication, a number of the citizens of Baltimore held a meeting on the 12th day of February, 1827, for the purpose of devising the most effectual means of improving the intercourse between that city and the western states, on which occasion various documents and statements were submitted, illustrating the efficiency of rail roads for the conveyance of articles of heavy carriage at a small expense, which being examined, and the superior advantages of this mode of transportation over turnpike roads and canals being satisfactorily shown, the documents were referred to a committee, who subsequently reported a mass of facts, derived principally from English authorities, of a highly interesting character, observing in conclusion, "that the stock of information now in possession of this committee is admitted not to be very extensive, but they have gleaned from several communications and reports which they have examined upon this interesting subject, enough to leave no doubt upon their minds that these roads are far better adapted to our situation and circumstances than a canal across the mountains; they therefore recommend that measures be taken to construct a double rail road between the city of Baltimore and some suitable point on the Ohio river, by the most eligible and direct route, and that a charter to incorporate a company to execute this work be obtained as early as possible."

The facts developed on this occasion were deemed so weighty and conclusive, that it was unanimously resolved to apply to the legislatures of the several states through which the contemplated rail road might pass for acts of incorporation, authorizing the company to construct such a road. The legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, then in session, with a promptness which entitles them to the public gratitude, concurred in an act, incorporating a company as desired, and investing it with ample powers. This act was subsequently needed to by the legislature of Pennsylvania in the same liberal spirit.

The state of Maryland having provided, as a condition of its subscription to the stock of the company, that the road should be so located "that it shall go to, or strike the Potomac river at some point between the mouth of the Monocacy river and the town of Cumberland, in Allegany county, and that it shall go into Frederick, Washington, and Alleghany counties." The road was located accordingly, subsequent examinations having demonstrated, that the Potomac presented the only feasible route along which it could be carried in this direction, consistently with correct scientific principles.

The commissioners appointed, having opened subscriptions for the stock, the amount required by the charter was immediately filled; whereupon, a board of directors was elected, and the company being duly organized, proceeded without delay to cause the necessary examinations and surveys to be made for the location of the road.

On the 4th of July, 1828, the ceremony of laying the first stone was performed; but it was not until the au-turn of that year that active operations towards the construction of the work were commenced, since that period its prosecution has been pursued with energy and zeal.

Owing to the peculiarly unfavorable topography of the country, on the first division of the road, the difficulties there have been very great, and have necessarily involved a considerable delay and expense. Taking into view, however, the extent of the excavations, embankments, viaducts, bridges, and culverts, all of which have been accomplished in a manner, not surpassed in this or any other country; it is confidently believed that no similar undertaking has been advanced with greater despatch, either here or abroad.

Now that the company have accomplished the more difficult part of their undertaking, and acquired, by experience, much valuable information and many facilities, which, from the novelty of the subject could only be gained from a course of practical experiments, all doubts have been removed, and they are encouraged, by the most cheering confidence, in the entire success of their enterprise: at the same time, judging from the results ascertained since the valley of the Patuxent has been gained, they entertain no doubt but that the graduation, masonry and construction with a double set of tracks may be accomplished between the present termination of the road and the Ohio river, at or nearly within the original estimated cost of $20,000 per mile, and that in the event of the requisite funds being placed at the disposal of this company, the whole work might be completed and put in operation in five years.

From the extremely unfavorable surface over which the road was necessarily to pass for the first eight miles in order to reach the valley of the Patuxent, it was early perceived that the expenses across that district would be very heavy, but it had been ascertained that in adopting this route, a line of road would be secured, which, by some extensive embankments and deep cuttings near to the city of Baltimore, could be located with but a single summit for a distance of 180 miles, and with only two summits requiring stationary power along the entire line to the Ohio river, a result which, it is believed, has not been attained on any line of rail road projected for the same extent, in any other country. The approach to the first of these summits is by an acclivity so gradual as not to exceed an average of about 18 feet to the mile, and as the amount of tonnage passing westward will not be as great as that passing eastward, this line will consequently be more advantageous than if it were a perfect level.

The inclined planes over the first summit, at Parr Spring ridge, will be passed by an additional local power, and from the western side of that ridge to the coal mines near Cumberland, the route is so favorable as to be adapted along the whole distance to locomotive steam engines; taking therefore, the entire line together, it will be decidedly superior to a level road, since like that on the eastern side of the Parr ridge, the acclivity for a very great portion of the distance is, in the direction of the lesser tonnage which will pass upon the road.

From the eastern base of the Alleghany mountain a series of inclined planes will be required to overcome a summit of about 1,200 feet, from thence it has been ascertained that the road may be conducted to the Ohio river upon a line so nearly level as to be traversed without difficulty by locomotive steam power.

Although at the time of the commencement of this great national work, the individuals who embarked in the undertaking had arrived at the conclusion that the system was capable of affording greater facilities for the transportation of both merchandise and passengers than could be attained, either by the best constructed turnpike roads or canals, yet the anticipations then formed of its capabilities have been vastly more than realized. The many important improvements introduced within the last few years, both in the construction of rail roads and in the application of machinery upon them, having perhaps doubled their effective power. It is honorable to our country that the system is indebted for several of these improvements to the genius and science of American citizens.

The ordinary speed now attained upon the Liverpool and Manchester rail road, which work has not been so well executed as that part of our road laid on stone rails, is from 15 to 30 miles an hour, according to the horizontal position and structure of the road; and it is even asserted, that the whole distance of 33 miles, between these places, has been run in 33 minutes, or at the rate of 59 miles per hour.

From the experiments made upon the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, there is no reason to doubt but that the travelling on it may at least be safely carried at the rate of from 12 to 15 miles an hour by the aid of steam power, and that passengers may be conveyed from Baltimore to the Ohio river within from 24 to 30 hours, at all seasons of the year.

The successful accomplishment of this work, so far as it has been extended and within so short a time, under the numerous and complicated difficulties which opposed its progress, cannot but yield a high gratification to the people of Maryland, and affords a satisfactory guarantee that the resources of the state, aided to the aid which may be relied on from other quarters are fully adequate to the early and triumphant completion of the magnificent undertaking in which we have embarked.

Maryland has the honor of being the first state in the union to incorporate a company for the construction of a rail road. She was the first state to embark the public resources in support of this system, and she may now boast of having within her limits the longest continuous railway in the world. It is only necessary that she should continue her patronage to this great enterprise and she will certainly secure to herself the full development of all the advantages which her geographical position gives her in relation to the vast and rapidly increasing commerce of the west—She is happily so situated as to afford the shortest and by far the most convenient route of communication between the navigable waters of the west and of the ocean, and indeed between the Atlantic and those great inland seas which border upon our northern frontier, and which, at no distant day, are destined to become the theatre of an immense commerce; and although limited in her territory to a much smaller extent than some of her sister states, by securing to herself the channel through which the interchange of commodities between the eastern and western states will mainly pass, and which her position gives her an opportunity of effecting, she will soon find herself in point of commercial activity and capital, second to no state in the union.

It is certain, that whatever advantages may be anticipated from the rail road system in Europe they will be of minor importance when compared with the benefits we are destined to derive from the introduction of this system into our country. By the ease, convenient, and rapid intercourse which these rails afford, they are capable of placing, almost in juxtaposition the most remote sections of our widely extended republic, and will thus do more to perpetuate our institutions and preserve our union than any political compacts or physical force could ever effect. The system, if advantageously applied and sufficiently extended, will give to the people of the United States an identity of feeling, a harmony of interests, and a facility of social intercourse, which must long bind them together as one great family; and secure to our country all the advantages resulting from the productiveness of a mighty continent, with the conveniences of communication incident to a small island.

For a full and more detailed explanation of the operations of this company, within the past year, we ask leave respectfully to refer the executive, to the fifth annual report of the board of directors, a copy of which is herewith transmitted. On behalf of the board, I am very respectfully, &c.

P. E. THOMAS, president
B. & O. rail road co.

NULLIFICATION.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

This nonsensical term, nonsensical whether applied to matter, which man cannot destroy, or the constitution, which can only be abrogated by revolution, has puzzled the people of England a little, as appears by the following article from the London Morning Herald.

We understand that many of our readers are greatly puzzled at certain words recently brought into use in the United States in the discussion of the tariff question. We allude to the terms nullification and nullify. The literal meaning of these words is it is very easy to comprehend—the one signifying to the act of making null or none; and the other a none or null-maker. It is, however, we presume, the application of the term by the Americans to the question alluded to which puzzles the English reader. For his information, then, we have to state, that the opponents of high import duties in America are variously called anti-tariff men—free traders and nullifiers. They are called anti-tariff men as the phrase imports, because they are against the tariff—free traders, because they are opposed to the American system of import duties, and nullifiers, because they hold the doctrine that every state of the union has the right of rendering null and void, so far as such state is concerned, an act of the congress of the United States, providing—we believe, but we are not certain—such act be unconstitutional; that is, provided it oversteps the bounds prescribed to the congress, or the three estates, by the written constitution.

The foregoing is, we believe, as good a definition of the unintelligible and undesirable phrase, as the South Carolina people themselves can give. We have seen to happen comment on the strange doctrine set up by the southern people, than that contained in the reply of the Catholic bishop of the diocese to which Charleston belongs, to an invitation to the dinner recently given to Judge Smith and General Blair. It is as follows:

"I have been told that after eleven years close study and observation of constitutions, to support which, I have four times pledged my solemn oath, that because I happened to be born under a different form of government, it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for me to comprehend the manner in which 'our wheel within a wheel ought to work.' This may probably account for the inability which I could never surmount, of understanding the powerful and effectual remedy of providing for the indefinite number of states, of which our federation might consist, an effectual negative upon the acts of a congress, in which each of them had its equal representation in the senate, and its popular representation in the other house—and yet that mention should be made of this negative, nor any allusion thereto, in the constitution itself. Neither could I see when a specific mode of procuring a convention of the states, was regulated in a federative instrument, how it could be constitutional, to say that any one state could have the power of forcing this result, without the aid of the concerted number of her sisters. Still less could I understand, that it was constitutional for her to place herself in a state of opposition to the general act: until her special will should become paramount to the reluctance of her associates. I am, however, free to confess, as that it is possible the general government, sustained by a majority of states, might violate the constitution, or that under its forms they might ruinously oppress the minority. In such a case, if remonstrance shall fail, nature, the laws of society, and even the regulations of heaven, would proclaim the proper and effectual alternative. I trust that neither you nor your children's children, will ever have to resort thereto."

LEGISLATURE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Extract from the message of gov. Wolf.

"The policy of a protecting tariff and the encouragement given to works of internal improvement, of a national character, by the general government, are favorite measures with the people of Pennsylvania, and the former is esteemed by them as being identified with their best interests. The constitutionality of these measures is not questioned here, nor is there any doubt entertained of their entire expediency; and much as we may regret that the constitution of the federal government does not give more aid and bearing of one of these measures, should obtain elsewhere; yet from the universal prosperity that is admitted to abound in every part of our happy country, there is reason to doubt whether the prevailing discontents are well founded; and we are admonished to restrain our sympathies in behalf of our complaining brethren, lest, in lending ourselves to aid in relieving them from an imaginary oppression, we put ourselves in a condition to be seriously oppressed. Upon these all engrossing questions of national policy, the voice of Pennsylvania has been repeatedly expressed through her state legislature, as well as by her representatives in congress, and so long as she shall continue to place a proper estimate upon her own prosperity and the success of her infant manufacturing establishments, she will not cease to cherish the same sentiments in favor of measures indispensable to the successful fostering and encouragement of her domestic industry and enterprise."

LEGISLATURE OF MARYLAND.

Extracts from the governor's message—Dec. 29, 1831.

Since your last annual session, a melancholy and unexpected event has devolved upon me the discharge of the duties of chief magistrate of our state. His excellency, the late governor Martin, at a period of life, when he might reasonably have anticipated a long career of usefulness, was, in the wisdom of Providence suddenly withdrawn from the distinguished station which he filled with great honor to himself and advantage to the public. No citizen deplored his loss more than myself. The virtuous and manly cast of his character, was necessarily felt by all who approached him, and especially appreciated by those, who, as his counsellors, saw his true spirit in friendly and confidential intercourse. This bereavement imposed upon me public duties, from the due execution of which I did not feel myself at liberty to retire; and I am sure that the indulgence and kindness of my countrymen, will extend to me every allowance which so unexpected an occurrence demands.

A communication was made from this department to the last general assembly, enclosing copies of a letter from the president of the United States, and of a report to him by the then secretary of war, in answer to an application which had been made for the appointment of one or more of the United States engineers, to make a survey of the coast between Cape Charles and Lewis Town creek, on the bay of Delaware. These documents were regarded as such an explicit refusal, on the part of the president, to comply with the request of the general assembly, and the refusal was placed upon such grounds, as to destroy all rational hope of obtaining any aid from the national government, for the time being, in promoting the object of the general assembly. But notwithstanding the refusal was made upon the constitutional ground that the improvements suggested, could not be regarded as of a character to demand the attention of the national government," yet, in a few weeks afterwards the secretary of war, by instruction from the president, said, that after the service of the year provided for by congress, shall be arranged and agreed on an engineer will, if practicable, be detailed to report to the executive of the state of Maryland, to make the survey in question. A communication from general Smith, one of our senators in congress, enclosing the letter from the secretary of war, from which the above extract is made, also a subsequent communication from the secretary of war, to the late governor of this state, with a copy of the reply thereto, is herewith submitted for your consideration. They will apprise you of the manner and of the agency by which the abandonment of the ground assumed in the first instance, by the president was effected, as well as of the tender of a compliance with the request which was afterwards made, and a condition which, not having been anticipated and provided for, could not be accepted; and, that consequently, no benefit was derived from the seemingly favorable change in the president's views of the subject.

I herewith transmit a communication of the president and directors of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company, together with their life insurance policy, and the progress of that work. It is with much satisfaction that I am enabled to facilitate you upon the rapid advancement of this magnificent enterprise, which is so eminently calculated to develop the resources of our state, and by its continued extension attract to our commercial metropolis the vast and rapidly increasing commerce of the western country. Its value to our citizens, both present and prospective, has been so abundantly and thoroughly demonstrated, that it would now be difficult to add any thing to the force of the arguments before the public; but having seen the operations upon it, to its entire, present extent, I may add that the aspirations of its most sanguine friends, may be considered as fully gratified. At no distant day Maryland will be highly distinguished for advancement in internal improvement.

Nothing will be wanted to secure the almost triumphant success in her stupendous undertaking, but the requisite funds; and in a country where public and private treasures are, at all times, abundantly, devoted to enterprises of real utility, we have no occasion for fear on that head.

The Susquehanna railroad is progressing and promises great benefit; but its ulterior success cannot be estimated, until a charter is granted by the state of Pennsylvania to that company, or in furtherance of its objects.

These are the only parts of the message, that are not of a business character, and entirely local.

LEGISLATURE OF VIRGINIA.

Extracts from the annual message of Gov. Hilditch—Dec 6.

Whilst we were enjoying the business of last season, representing in the peace and quietude of domestic industry and safety, we were suddenly aroused from that security by receiving information, that a portion of our fellow-citizens had fallen victims to the relentless fury of assassins and murderers, even whilst wrapped in profound sleep, and that those bloody deeds had been perpetrated in a spirit of wantonness and cruelty, unknown to savage warfare, even in their most revolting form.

In August last, a banditti of slaves, consisting of but few at first, rose upon some of the unsuspecting and defenceless inhabitants of Southampton, and under circumstances of the most shocking and horrid barbarity, put to death sixty-one persons, of whom the greater number were women and helpless children.—Much of this bloody war was done on Monday morning, and on the day following, about ten o'clock, the last murder was committed.—The citizens of that and the adjacent counties promptly assembled, and all real danger was speedily terminated.

The conspiracy was at first believed to be general: wherefore I was induced to call into service, a force sufficient to crush, at a single blow, all opposing power, whatever might be its strength. To this end, detachments of light infantry from the seventh and fifty-third regiments, and from the fourth regiment of cavalry, and fourth light artillery, under the command of Harts and Richeson, were ordered to report to the scene of action with all possible speed, and report to brigadier general Eppes, who had been desired to assume the command, and call out his brigade. Arms and ammunition were amply furnished and thrown into all the counties which were suspected of disaffection.—Two regiments in Brunswick and Greenville, were called into service by their commanding officers, and the law visiting them was put in force, for such purposes. These troops being within the brigade commanded by brigadier general William H. Brodax, that officer assumed the command, and remained in the field until all danger had passed.

It gives me great pleasure to communicate to the general assembly, the high satisfaction I feel in bearing testimony to the zeal, promptitude and despatch with which every officer discharged his duty, and the cheerful alacrity with which every citizen obeyed the call of the law.

Though the call upon the light troops was so promptly obeyed, yet before their arrival, the revolt was subdued, and many of these deluded fanatics were either captured or were placed beyond the possibility of escape; some had already been immolated by an excited people.

I feel the highest gratification in adding, that the readiest aid was afforded by commander Elliot of the United States navy, and a detachment of sailors from the ship Natchez under his command, who, notwithstanding they had just returned from a long and distant cruise, repaired to the scene of action with a highly creditable alacrity. Much is also due to col. House, the commanding officer at fortress Monroe, for the promptitude with which he detached a part of his force to our aid, under the command of lieutenant colonel Worth, to whom similar praise is due; as likewise to the officers and soldiers under his command, for the promptitude with which they also repaired to our assistance as soon as it came to their knowledge: all necessity for their co-operation had ceased before they reached their point of destination; but they are not the less entitled to commendation on that account.

All of those who participated in the bloody tragedy have expiated their crimes, by undergoing public execution, whilst some who had been condemned, have been reprieved for reasons which were deemed satisfactory.—There is much reason to believe that the spirit of insurrection was not confined to Southampton; many convicts have taken place elsewhere, and some few in distant counties. From the documents which I herewith lay before you, there is too much reason to believe these plans of treason, insurrection and murder, have been designed, planned and matured; by untrained fanatics in some of the neighboring states, who find facilities in distributing their views and plans amongst our population, either through the post office, or by agents sent for that purpose throughout our territory.

Upon inspecting these documents, and contemplating that state of things which they are intended to produce, I felt it my duty to open a correspondence with the governors of some of the neighboring powers of this confederacy, to preserve, as far as possible, the good understanding which exists, and which ought to be established between the different members of this confederacy. The result of this correspondence will be made known to you, as soon as it is ascertained.

The most active among ourselves, in stirring up the spirit of revolt, have been the negro preachers. They had acquired great ascendancy over the minds of their fellows, and infused all their opinions, which had prepared them for the development of the final design.—There is also some reason to believe, those preachers have a perfect and restraining relation to these plans, throughout the eastern counties—and have been the channels through which the inflammatory papers and pamphlets, brought here by the agents and emissaries from other states, have been circulated amongst our slaves. The facilities thus afforded for plotting treason and conspiracy, to rebel and make insurrection, have been great, through the indulgence of the magistracy and the laws, large collections of slaves have been permitted to take place, at any time through the week, for the ostensible purpose of indulging in religious worship; but in many instances the real purpose with the preacher, was of a different character. The sentiments, and sometimes the words of these inflammatory pamphlets, which the meek and charitable of other states have seen cause to distribute as fire-brands in the bosom of our society, have been real. What shall be thought of those fanatics, who, having no just rest in our community, nevertheless seek to excite a servile war?—a war, which exhausts itself in the massacre of unoffending women and children on the one side, and on the other, in the sacrifice of all who have borne part in the savage undertaking. Not only should the severest punishment be inflicted upon those found guilty of this crime, when they or their emissaries are found within our reach, but the civil authorities should be urged to make all their measures alacritous. The public good requires the negro preachers to be silenced, who, full of ignorance, are incapable of inciting any thing but notions of the wildest superstition: thus preparing fit instruments in the hands of the servile agitators to destroy the public tranquility.

As means of guarding against the possible repetition of these sanguinary scenes, I cannot fail to recommend to your early attention, the revision of all the laws, intended to preserve in due subordination the slave population of our state.—In urging these considerations upon you, let me not be understood as expressing the slightest doubt or apprehension of general results—all communications are first to suffer from the dagger of the murderer and midnight assassin, and it behooves them to guard against them.—With us, the first returning light dispels the danger, and soon withers the number in chains.

Though means have been taken by those of other states to agitate our community, and discontent our slaves, and incite them to attempt an insupportable object, some proof is also furnished that for the most part, the people of color, they have opened more enlarged views, and urged the achievement of a higher destiny by means for the present less violent, but not differing in the end from those presented to the slaves. That class of the community, our laws have heretofore treated with indignant kindness, and many instances of solicitude for their welfare have marked the progress of legislation.—If the slave is confined by law to the estate of domestic servitude, as it is advisable he should be, the free people of color, more robust and energetic, are incited by pamphlets and papers with which we are sought to be inundated. This class, too, has been the first to place itself in hostile array against every measure designed to remove them from amongst us.—Though it will be indispensably necessary for them to withdraw from this community, yet, in the spirit of kindness which has ever characterized the legislature of Virginia, it is submitted, whether as the last best fit which we can confer upon them, it may not be wise in appropriate annually, a sum of money to aid in their removal from this commonwealth.

Whilst recent events had created apprehensions in the minds of a few, some agitation was also more extensively felt, wherefore it was deemed prudent to arm the militia in a manner calculated to quiet all apprehensions, and arms were accordingly furnished to nearly all the regiments on the eastern frontier. The want of them, upon this sudden emergency, was so acutely felt by those in the vicinity of Norfolk, as to induce commodore Warrington, in command of the navy yard in Gosport, to distribute a portion of the public arms under his care. That gallant and patriotic officer did not hesitate to assume the responsibility of this step, and it is gratifying to perceive, that his conduct has met the approbation of the public functionaries. The policy of disarming the militia, it is believed, was pursued as a measure of economy, as the men and officers were being culpably negligent in their attention to their preparation, so that many were later by neglect became unfit for service. Now, however, the necessity for preserving them is distinctly felt, and a doubt cannot be entertained, that more care will be taken of them in future. I could not weigh the expense incurred by this measure, against the possible sacrifice of life, much less the possible reputation of the scene of Southampton.

[Next follows a great deal of matter about canals or roads contemplated to be made, and of the advantages that will be derivable from them when made—as it has been the custom to speak in Virginia for somewhere about fifty years past!]

It will be necessary to call your attention to the present condition of our militia, and to recommend a thorough revision of the law on that subject.—Much of the strength and efficiency of that kind of force depends upon the promptness with which they can be ready for action, and some knowledge of the first duties of a soldier.

Our light troops might be increased in every battalion and regiment with great advantage to the service, and might be encouraged by privileges and exemptions, as they were always the first called into service, and unlike the infantry of the line, they will be called out by whole companies instead of being detailed for duty, as is now the case, with the body of the militia. From the dexterity and skill of our citizens in the use of the rifle, and a fondness for that kind of arms, as well as the great care and time it requires to drill a regiment in the right manner, the propriety of organizing them into regiments is suggested.

From the position in which this state is placed and the attitude occupied by her, it becomes a matter of very serious reflection, whether a force more available than the militia may not be advisable and attainable at a small expense. By a well-organized, intermediate force, even a foreign war might be sustained without disturbing the quiet operations of the government or of the farmers. We have at this time an hundred and thirty new regiments full and strong.—Were one company to be authorized by law to be raised by voluntary enlistment from each regiment, or such number of regiments as would give the number of men required, and put upon the footing of the public guard, you would have a cheap and efficient army ready to perform any and every duty. These soldiers might be permitted to live at home and work their crops as heretofore, but at all times subject to the call of their officers. Some allowances should be made them, and the equipments of a soldier furnished, as an inducement to enlist, to be drilled once a month for as many days as the general assembly should think proper, and whilst on drill, to receive ample pay for his time; but neither pay whilst on drill, unless enabled for service—when his pay and allowances should be the same as that received by the public guard now in service.

[Next we have several paragraphs on local subjects. The university is mentioned with much approbation, and its prosperity promised.]

Our treasury will be found in a highly prosperous condition; and affords proof of the energies of the state, as it maintains its position under so much misrule in the government which acts upon our exports. The unexpended balance in the treasury, at the end of the fiscal year 1850, was $8,941 dollars and 86 cents; that which remained in the treasury at the end of the fiscal year, 1851, was 106,395 dollars and 71 cents. The actual amount in the treasury on the first day of the present month, was $24,069 dollars and 57 cents.

The constitution of our state has made it the duty of the governor "to communicate to the legislature, at every session, the condition of the commonwealth." To discharge this duty, it will be necessary for me to call your attention to our federal relations. The deep interest felt by all the states, in the measure in which that part of their concerns has been managed by the federal government, to which they have delegated extended and limited powers, would make me highly culpable if I failed to notice them, or omitted to speak of them to you as they deserve. The general assembly have never failed to keep a watchful eye over those rights which were reserved to the state, and to be applied by the compact or constitution—where the several states, for their own benefit and convenience, created the federal government. That government, merely the agent of the states, and only allowed to exercise those powers which were intended to operate externally, and upon nations foreign to those composing the confederacy, has too often transgressed the limits prescribed to it, and evinces an increasing regard to the rights of the states, by the passage of unconstitutional acts, and by expenditures for other acts, if it be possible, of a still more unconstitutional character. The complaints, memorials, and protests of some of the sovereign states of this confederacy have been unnoticed or disregarded, and the constitution seems about to be merged in the will of an unrestrained majority. No one can deny the tendency of that government, or the numerous evils which must ensue, unless speedily arrested in its downward career. If the will of that majority is unrestrained, and that government is suffered to search through their own records, for precedents upon which to found their claim to power, and thus melt away the solder of the federal chain, by making that constitutional now, because heretofore the same acts have been done by themselves, it is equivalent to the actual destruction of that instrument, and the substitution of a government unrestrained in its powers, and unlimited in its sway. It is even now strongly intimated that the states cannot interpose to arrest an unconstitutional measure; if so, there is already no limit to federal power, and our short experience has shown us the utter insufficiency of all restraints upon parchment.

Virginia resisted the usurpations of England, and encountered the hazard of war for political existence, and sought to guard against oppression, that her citizens might enjoy the liberty which belonged to them, and appropriate to their own use that which their labor had earned. The tariff law, of which all the southern states so justly complain, is calculated to take from our citizens the profits they have earned by their industry, and is also a violation of the constitution. Not only has this been done, but laws have been passed appropriating the public money for purposes foreign to, and unwarranted by, the constitution. Agents have been appointed to negotiate treaties without consulting the senate—and propositions have been made to seize upon the surplus revenue in the treasury of the United States, to be divided among the states according to representation, though some of them are doing nothing, and consequently contributing nothing to the fund—which is in reality reducing the states to the condition of vassals and pensioners, paid by funds illegally exacted from them.

If these laws, these acts, and this claim to power, be constitutional, the constitution of the United States has been misunderstood, and is insufficient to accomplish the objects for which it was designed—that preserving our liberties and our rights—if they are unconstitutional, the federal government has usurped the rights of the states, and by constituting itself the sole judge of its powers, has created a new political system, subversive of that to which all-generous is due.

If the legislative expediency is to triumph over constitutional rights, and the obligation of oaths be disregarded, then all human rights are at the mercy of a majority of the people, and freedom is gone forever.

We may as these laws continued by states, combining to advance their own local interests, and using their power to oppress the minority, which would then be without redress. These considerations ought not to be disregarded, at least by the southern states, who are the minority, but the producers and exporters of the products which bring into the treasury the wealth, to obtain which all the safeguards of liberty are about to be crumbled to pieces. No state has made so many sacrifices for this union as Virginia, to which she has been so much devoted. She has calmly awaited the period when a returning sense of justice would lead to an alleviation of her burthens, and an abandonment of those unconstitutional measures. Galling as the oppression has been, under which we have labored, we have been content to make our situation known through our members in congress, and by legislative resolves. Hereafter the public debt has been the pretext for this oppression. Now, however, it is upon the eve of extinction, when, for the sake of union, if not justice, we hope a change in these fatal measures.—But, I fear, doomed to disappointment, we must now prepare to combat a scheme which has been suggested, and has enlisted or is likely to enlist, strong interest in its support. I refer to the scheme of distributing the surplus revenue among the states. The legislatures of two of the large states have already expressed for it their approval; and the legislature of the United States has recommended it to congress in his two last annual messages. No scheme could be devised more ruinous to us and the other southern states, than this. Should it be adopted, all hope of relief from this oppressive system of measures will have vanished, as each year will show results which will prevent the strongest alliments to their increase; while those who pay most, will be tempted to urge forward the most oppressive expedients to increase their portion of the spoils—while those who pay least, at best receive back but a small portion of what they have contributed—thus producing the combination of large states, to tax the smaller for local purposes, and to draw money from the pockets of one portion of this confederacy to enrich another. All other questions which have already agitated congress and the people, will be lost in this most terrible evil, and calculated to appeal to the passions, and the jealous rivalry of the states, in a system which will lead to the greatest exactions upon the south; and must, if persevered in, lead to the utter subversion of this entire frame of government. If the lingering hope which is still entertained should again be disappointed, it will rest with the people, and with their representatives, to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to guard their rights against the evils of a system not of unconstitutional but of just, oppressive and ruinous—now will you be deceived by threats from any quarter from pursuing the course which duty requires. The strong arm of power will never be able to crush the spirit of freedom, or deter them from asserting their rights, and intercepting barriers to the growth of despotism.

With your obedient service and happy issue to all your duties, I am, gentlemen, your fellow citizen.

JOHN FLOYD.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

In the last Register, page 334 we gave a copy of the report of a committee of the senate of this state on federal relations, and now present the following statement, taken from a number of copies of the house of representatives. The letter of President Jackson to certain citizens of Charleston of 14th June, 1821—(see vol. 40, page 351) seems irreconcilable to have excited the opposition of the "nullifiers."

"No written form of government can be devised which may not be liable to various constructions—no free government can exist without party differences. Hitherto the wise and patriotic men who have administered the general government have been careful—as well from a sense of official dignity, as from the more important consideration of the dangerous weight of official authority, not to mingle in the party contests of the citizens. It is not only calculated to excite regret, but other feelings, which the committee will not trust itself to express, that the state of South Carolina has been selected for the first instance of this unauthorized intrusion—as the first example of an attempt to close political discussion, by the terror of executive power, or to throw into the scale of party the weight of the executive sword. While, as a member of this confederacy, and in the view of the dignity of its chief executive, the state of South Carolina cannot, but regret every occurrence which may degrade that dignity—yet her feelings are of a sterner and deeper character—when her citizens within her own jurisdiction, in the exercise of unquestionable constitutional right, are denounced as disorganizers and threatened with military interference. Whatever emotions, however, there may be, they are not those of terror. Ours is a government of law, and not of force. In the exercise of what is the prerogative of the law, we know that a president or a private citizen is equally amenable to its tribunal, and that a threat from either against the other is of equal validity.

If, however, the allusion of the president be not to the public discussion of opinions differing from his own, then it must be a proposed course of legislative action which he denounced as a plan of disorganization. In this view of the dignity of the legislature has to consider not an invasion of the rights of the citizen merely, but an attempt to fetter its own freedom of action.

The committee finds it difficult to find language at once suitable to the occasion and the dignity of this house.

Is the legislature to be rebuked and rated by the president of the United States?

Is it to regulate under the suspended sword of the commander in chief?

Is the will of one man to be substituted for deliberation—and the enactments of this body to be fashioned by an edict from a president not only avowing a right to annul a law when passed, but practically assuming a right to interpose while it is yet under discussion? The executive of a most limited government; the agent of an agency? but a part of a creature of the state, undertaken to prescribe a line of conduct to a free and sovereign state, under a denunciation of pains and penalties. It cannot but be esteemed a signal instance of forbearance, calmly to inquire into this assumed power of the president over the state. Under no part of the constitution or penal law of congress, known to the committee, is the crime of disorganization recognised or made punishable. It is to be lamented that in the exercise of crime and threatening punishment, the president had not used terms of more definite import.

If, by the vague generality of the word disorganization, be intended as the context may perhaps indicate, that a plan of disunion existed in this state, it will be equally difficult to fix upon any constitutional or legal authority, or any thing in the nature of our institutions, which imposes any duty or grants any power to the president to prevent it. This is a confederacy of sovereign states, and each may withdraw from the confederacy whenever it chooses—such proceedings would neither be treason or insurrection, nor a violation of any portion of the constitution. It is a right which is inherent in a sovereign state, and has not been delegated by the states to the union. Whether assuming such an attitude might be the cause of war on the part of the general government, may be questioned, but there can be no question that the president could not declare war. But the committee deem it unnecessary to discuss a mere hypothetical question, the possible occurrence of which, if the president has contemplated it, is the result of his entire ignorance of the feelings and purposes of this state.

No one denies that it is his right and duty to see that the laws of the United States be faithfully executed, and no portion of the union will be more prompt to recognise the right or to sustain and assist him in the duty, than the state of South Carolina—but at the same time, if in the deliberate judgment of this state, acting in her sovereign capacity, any enactment of congress is decided to be in violation of the constitution, and therefore not law, that judgment is paramount, and if the executive or all the combined departments of the general government, endeavor to enforce such enactments, it is by the law of tyrants, the exertion of brute force. If such a case should occur, which we pray a wise Providence to avert, the state will throw herself on the protection of that Providence, and if her destiny be slavery, she will not be mocked by the forms of a free government.

Resolved, That the letter of the president of the United States, to sundry citizens of this state, is an unauthorized interference in the affairs of this state, that the principles advanced in it are incompatible with the constitution, and subversive of the rights of the states; that the threatened course of executive conduct would, if acted upon, destroy the liberties of this country, and, as a threat, is of dangerous precedent, and highly repulsive to the feelings of a free people."

LEGISLATURE OF ALABAMA.

Extract from the inaugural address of Gov. Gayle, of Alabama.

"The power claimed for a state to interpose its authority to prevent the execution of an act of congress within its limits, has given rise to much intemperate discussion, and produced an excitement which threatens the harmony, if not the existence of the union. However desirable it may be to awaken the general government to a sense of the injuries which the restrictive and prohibitory system is inflicting upon the southern states, it is infinitely more important that this alarming controversy should be speedily and amicably adjusted. I say alarming, because in the opinion of many of the great and good men of our country, it will lead to the catastrophe of the republic.

On an occasion like the present, a brief outline of my opinion is all that can be expected, or could be expected.

The constitution of the United States was established, it is true, by the people of the several states as separate and independent communities; but it cannot be denied that the very act of its adoption, for all the purposes for which it was designed, converted them into one undivided whole. A government was formed for the people, and it acts on them individually as members of the same extensive community. The relation which the people bear to the state and general government is strikingly similar. Both originated from the same source—both operated upon the people in the same manner, and the same obedience is due to both. Each is emphatically the government of the people, and patriotism dictates that their affections should be placed as much on the one as the other. A distinguished patriot of the revolution, Patrick Henry, in speaking on this subject at a public address, once declared that a country is to a state what a state is to the union. The analogy is just in many respects, and particularly as it regards the right of either to set the laws at defiance. The people of a state bring a small minority of the population of all the states, have no greater constitutional right to resist the laws of the union, than the people of a county have to resist the laws of a state. When it becomes necessary to resist the laws of an unjust government, the only principle which precludes the right of any community to protect itself against oppression. If then, one is a government of the people, if the laws are made by the authority of all, and according to the forms of the constitution, it is inconceivable how the right can be set up in a single state to abrogate them.

If it be asked what means of redress are to be resorted to, in a case of usurpation by the general government of power undelimited? I answer to the same that are provided against the encroachment of the state functionaries—to the elective principle, and to the tribunal whose province it is to restrain the legislature within the pale of the constitution. If these fail it is to be ascribed not to any defect in the constitution, but to a want of political honesty—to an absence of virtue and patriotism, without which there is but little preference for one form of government over another.

It was obviously the design of the compact by which the union was established, to submit to the general government the control of our foreign affairs, while our domestic and internal concerns were to be left to the management of the states. When it is remembered that the constitution was constantly and necessarily made to be construed by thirteen states, all independent of each other, and acting without concert, in obtaining its sense and meaning; it cannot be supposed that the convention would overlook the collisions which would unavoidably arise between the federal and state authorities, concerning the boundaries of jurisdiction. It was indispensable to the success of the scheme, that these collisions should be guarded against, and hence the several provisions in the constitution on this subject form a prominent feature in its structure.

"The constitution and laws of the United States and treaties made under their authority, are declared to be the supreme law of the land, and the judges of every state shall be bound thereby." "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, and treaties made under their authority."

Should these provisions in the national compact be observed with a due regard to the objects which they were designed to attain, and be submitted to in the spirit in which they were adopted, occasions for complaining against the federal or state governments would be a idle dream.

Give to the judiciary the legitimate participation in the operation of the government, and it will be found a wall of defence—sacrosanct to which all may fly with all confidence for protection. It will be alike unmoved by the assaults of ambition and the excitements of prejudice. Unconnected with the strife of contending political parties, and uncommenced by the passions produced by party, it will hold the even tenor of its way; dispensing justice with an impartial hand, and deciding upon our rights in the very spirit of the constitution.

From these and other views of the national compact does not permit me to express, I am thoroughly convinced that the constitution does not authorize the power contended for, and that the exercise of it could have no other effect than to introduce evils greatly more to be deprecated than those of which it is intended to be the remedy. It may possibly serve for a time to mitigate the disease of the body politic, but it would at the same time infuse a poison into the system, that would not fail to bring on premature decay.

Should the president conceive that his duty requires him "to see that the laws be faithfully executed," of which there is but little room to doubt, the war of argument would cease; the strife of blood would commence, and the government would perish amid the perils and horrors of civil discord. But, if these apprehensions be groundless, if the prediction be verified which has been made by the advocates of this doctrine, that the executive would yield the right thus claimed for a state, the result would not be different. If it be allowed to one state to resort to this experiment, the example would soon be imitated by others; acts of nullification will become as frequent as the sessions of congress. In this way the constitution might linger for a few years through a sickly existence; but it would at last be driven to the same final destiny."

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY J. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

To get in a sketch of some of the leading speeches delivered in the house of representatives, on motions to refer the memorial of the bank of the United States, [without postponing or totally rejecting much other matter actually in type or prepared for this publication], we have issued a heavy and close-printed supplement—and the present number consists of twenty-four pages. If practicable, with due attention to current proceedings and events, we shall publish, next week, sketches of some of the other speeches on the bank subject, which we now simply notice—for it is a question about which the people should be well advised by being placed in possession of the facts.

The late "honorable" Mr. Hili's paper—the "New Hampshire Patriot," says "Hezekiah Niles contends that arduousness of the duty on coffee has raised the price." As the plea of stupidity cannot be offered to excuse the cunning managers of this journal—it remains only to observe that the statement is a wilful untruth. I am, however, so much accustomed to such things in that paper, that the occurrence is hardly worth this notice.

WAGES. It is well known that the price of glass and glass wares has fallen about one-third since the passage of the tariff law of 1824—and, that, though some articles are still received from England, they chiefly arrive in British ships and on British account. The general advantages derived from the establishment of this important manufacture, will be shewn in the report of the committee of the New York Convention, to whom the subject was referred; but, in a communication which has passed through my hands for the chairman of that committee, a glass manufacturer says—"I expend for labor 2,500 dollars a month—being double the amount paid in England, and three times the amount in Germany, for making the same quantity." And yet the price of glass has been reduced in the amount of the protecting duty imposed! There is something very important in the facts suggested. It is rendered manifest, that foreign manufacturers have speculated largely, and profitably, on our wants; and that the domestic competition may be safely relied on to reduce the cost of commodities to consumers, when duly encouraged to act against foreign supplies. Glass and glass wares imported are subject to a duty of from 2 to 3 cents per lb. and an ad valorem duty of 20 to 30 per cent. in addition*—which duty, instead of operating as a "tax," has had the simple effect to furnish us with home-made glass and glass wares at less prices than we paid for them before the protecting duties were laid; and to keep within our own country five or six millions of dollars a year, which would have been remitted to pay for the glass at present consumed. These millions are nearly as much a clear profit as if so large a sum, in eagles, were dug up ready coined—because of the new demand for labor, the tens of thousands of cords of wood, the thousands of tons of sand, the hundreds of thousands of bushels of coal, and other ponderous articles required—such as would have no market, or, at any rate, a much less valuable one, were it not for the manufactories of glass located in the neighborhood where such articles abound. And it is probably in the greater cheapness of these materials, that, though the cost of labor is much higher in the United States than in England or Germany, the price of glass has been reduced one third. But my present intention is to speak of the wages paid to the workmen in the glass-houses: perhaps, in part caused by the fact, that there are not yet native workmen enough to perform the labor required, and the frequent refusal of foreigners to teach apprentices, from which much injury has resulted—but this difficulty is passing away, and has no effect upon the general remarks that I propose to make on the subject of wages.

As the price or value of labor regulates that of every thing else—even of gold and silver, (being themselves only representatives of labor)—so the amount of wages generally paid must be accepted to shew the general prosperity or general adversity which prevails in a country. I do not know that I have ever seen this broad proposition so freely advanced—but there cannot be any doubt of its practical soundness. Recently, when potatoes were only 4 cents per stone of 14lbs. in Ireland, hundreds of thousands of persons were on the borders of starvation, because they could not obtain a sufficiency, even of potatoes, to support life; but at that time the laboring classes of the United States were abundantly fed with meat and bread, and the average price of potatoes here was 8 or 10 cents per 14lbs. The latter, however, because of the ability of American working men to obtain plentiful supplies of other food, were rather used as a dish on the table, by way of variety, than as being necessary to subsistence. A thousand cases might be presented of a character similar to that just given—but this one is sufficient.

High wages may be a burthen, under peculiar circumstances, on certain parts of the people, or some portion of a country—but if they are general, they must be generally advantageous, and especially in the United States—for it is their amount that really assesses the value of lands and their products—and, indeed, of every other kind of property, real or personal—even a property in slaves. Tens of thousands of persons in this country, having no other capital than labor, become annually proprietors of lands and houses—freeholders; opening the way to new candidates for independence, through industry and economy, in perpetual and glorious succession. The factories turn out thousands of these every year; and hence we have a population such as does not exist in any other country; and, I venture to say, such as cannot exist under a low state of wages paid to working men. But separated from these creations of intelligent, prosperous and liberty-defending persons of property, and the example which their success must have upon every class of society—who would exchange the full fed and saucy laboring people of the United States, for the gaunt laborers of India and China—the two millions of squalid paupers of England, the wild and half-starved population of Ireland, and the miserable multitudes that breathe in Spain, Italy, and other countries of Europe and Asia, where wages are low?

What is it that establishes the value of money, seeing that we cannot eat or drink eagles or dollars? Is it not the labor expended in the collection and coinage of gold and silver, that determines the value of these metals? If they were as plenty as iron and lead, they would not be more valuable. High wages depreciate, and low wages advance, the current value of these me-

*Sometimes high wages give evidence of the unthriftiness—perhaps I might better say, laziness of a country. Mechanics who obtain only one dollar a day in some parts of the United States, in others receive one dollar and a half or two dollars, for rendering the same services. The main cause of this is—that labor is honored in the first, and dishonored in the second; but yet in the latter, the price of labor, in general, is low, and for the reason that it is degraded. But such exceptions, proceeding from such causes, are indignantly rejected as coming within the range of my remarks.

*These duties are moderate, compared with those imposed on glass imported into England, unless the duty has been recently changed. By Pope's Customs, brought down to March 1830, the duty on glass manufactures, generally, was eighty per cent. on their value in England.

tals. A dollar is a dollar, and weighs the same in India, England and the United States—but its operative, or current value, is very different. It will hire a man in India two weeks, in England nearly a week, and in the United States a day. If prosperity, then, were measured by cheap wages, India would be the most prosperous country in the world, and the United States the most miserable. This shows that comparisons of price, between different nations, cannot be otherwise than absurd. Price is altogether artificial; or applicable only to things within a particular country. A learned and grave senator of the United States was lately willing "to relieve" our people of taxes—"no people in the world, except the English, were so heavily taxed!" I like this love for the dear people; but would ask, in what country do they live half so well as in our own? Here is a practical question! The ad captandum idea of taxation, is oppression—and so it is in England, but not in the United States. There is no more an ability to equalize the sum of oppression sustained by the amount paid in taxes, in England and the United States, than to assess the value of lands by the quantity of alligators which it contains to fence it! From the pointed reference of this senator to the "consumption of mush and milk," it might have been supposed that he was entirely familiar with the fact—that the "proof of the pudding is in the eating of it." There is much wisdom in this saying! If its leadings are correctly followed, it will surely appear, that the amount of every burthen is graduated by the capacity to bear it—that value is comparative, and that means constitute the measure of all things. A very common laborer in the United States receives 450 cents a week—such a laborer in England obtains considerably less than 200. A tax on the first of one cent per day is only a 75th part of his earnings, but on the second is a 33rd part of his wages—or more than twice as onerous, though of the same nominal amount. We hope that he will have reference to such facts, when he again expresses a willingness to "relieve" the people of the United States of a burthen which they have never complained of, being insensible that it exists—except in the speeches and writings of politicians, which they do not always comprehend, and less frequently accept, unless under the influence of a temporary excitement. The people of the United States are not the most heavily taxed of any people in the world, except those of England. If otherwise, they are more severely oppressed than those of Ireland—but who ever heard of 150,000 persons in a state of starvation, in one district of the United States? Will not oppression bear the same fruits every where? But further—a laboring man in this republic may obtain twenty or more pounds of wholesome meat, or forty or more pounds of good flour or meal, for one day's work—in England he cannot purchase these things at all, unless occasionally, and in small quantities. Such is the difference between high and low wages—or, in better terms, the cheapness or dearthness of what we call money.

But there is one yet greater and more important consideration belonging to this subject. Our government is one of the people—or as nearly so, perhaps, as it is practically possible that a government should be. The common laborer has the same political rights and power as the wealthiest landholder. How interesting is it, then, that he should be well fed and clothed, and have the means of educating his children, so that they may become good citizens? Without such comforts, the right of suffrage must run into a curse—for that right, unless generally exercised with intelligence, must needs be productive of evil. The wealthy can take care of themselves—but it is the advancement of the laboring poor that I am most anxious about. With low wages, these are little better off than Russian slaves or British paupers—they are fastened to the will of their employers—must take what is offered, or suffer, but when wages are high, labor must needs be in request—and working people become parties to all agreements with persons having money to purchase their services. What are the effects of this? Four-fifths, perhaps, of the wealth of the U. States is in the possession of the productive classes. In England, four-fifths may be in the hands of the non-productive classes. I have more than once stated the fact, derived from a most respectable captain in the navy, that the Constitution had two hundred freeholders in her crew, when she captured the Cyane and Levant. Are there so many such seamen in the whole British navy? In England, when wages are high, we hear nothing of public distress—when they are low, misery abounds, for the "circulation of values" is diminished, and money becomes distressingly scarce. Say, there are one million of persons in the United States whose labor yields what we shall call one dollar a day—the product is 300 millions of dollars a year: reduce these to 50 cents per day, and the annual circulation of values is directly reduced in the vast sum of 150 millions a year. But this is not all. The price of all things must descend with this diminished circulation; and the first loss of 150 millions would certainly be swelled to at least 600 millions, in the lessened values of lands and commodities. Persons cannot buy, if they cannot sell. The poor Irish would not purchase potatoes at one-third of a cent per lb, because they could not dispose of their labor, the only thing which they had to exchange for money, or potatoes. Herein is the principle and operation of protecting laws. If they advance the price of labor, as I am quite willing to admit that they do, they must necessarily benefit every class of society, and especially those who own labor, including possessors of slaves.

These are mere hints of the subject. It is one of vast magnitude, and intense interest. What is the state of the poor females among us, who earn from 12½ to 20 cents per day, whose cause has been so often and so feelingly advocated by my venerable friend in Philadelphia? They are almost as destitute of hope, (the grand incentive to honorable action), as the poor women who labor in the fields of the "nullifiers," and they live as badly. If these earned even the small sum of 50 cents daily, what a different aspect would their homes and their children assume! The factories, generally, afford the latter amount to tens of thousands of females, and the view of a manufacturing village is grateful to the heart of every benevolent man—for plenty abounds, and there is yet something to lay up—something to start in the world with. I would that all—those who are, or shall be, mothers of citizens of this republic, shall have "jewels" to shew, in well provided for, and intelligent children. "Princes or perris may perish or may fade"—but a "virtuous populace" is at once the pride and the glory of a free state, as well as the shield of its liberties. Nothing can be esteemed a sacrifice which promotes the happiness of the many. It is the first principle of our institutions; and "frenzy to the brain thou shalt plot" to impede its operation.

* Such was the state of things which followed the glorious "financial prosperity" of 1816 and 1817, when the revenue from importations amounted to sixty-three millions of dollars, and destroyed those domestic manufactures and that valuable interior trade which had grown up during the restrictions on commerce and because of the war. This revenue cost the people of the United States ten times as much as the government had expended during the war. It swept the land with the "besom of desolation"—extreme suffering prevailed; the attorneys and sheriffs were "as busy as Old Nick in a gale of wind!" but the action was not fully felt until 1820 and 1821 (in which years the revenue from importations amounted only to 28 millions of dollars, because we were unable to pay for foreign goods) and then thousands of therefore substantial men were reduced to actual poverty, and tens of thousands of respectable persons were willing to earn even 25 cents per day, besides their victuals, on the roads and highways. The amount of the revenue had cursed the land, in prostrating the value of domestic labor. I never look back to that awful period, without renewing my vows to support the "American System," until protection afforded shall produce essential prohibition, as has been the case in respect to American navigation. To which let all the people say AMEN!

"THE MORNING POLICE," as we see the protecting policy called in a southern paper, must be "totally renounced!" It will be—when free white men are content to be racked with black slaves; when the market bearers of the land shall confess a "divine right" in slave-owners to construe the constitution and prescribe the law, in all things; when "angels" shall descend and take the shapes of hogheads of Virginia tobacco, and archangels those of bales of South Carolina cotton, as being the only things which partake of their heavenly nature, being chosen products of involuntary labor, extorted by cruelty! then—THEN, will the "robbing policy" be abandoned, and task-masters have the honor of bringing into use a system of measures which shall render all the working-people of the United States as miserable as their own breech-clouted negroes—as wretched as English paupers—stupid as Hessians, and as rude as Russian bores. Might not these enlightened and liberal lords of the south be content with the fact,—that they have about twenty-two members in congress to represent the power and glory of their slaves?—though the horses of Pennsylvania, or the oxen of Connecticut, have no part in making the laws? No—they are not content with this—the yet large majority of power in congress must be yielded to the minority, else their Englishmen will "calculate the value of the union!" Let them "calculate!" Now is as good a time as any to sliew the result. If that contemptible part of the people who hold it right to make such "calculations" are to bring them into practice—the sooner they do it the better. We offer no sacrifices to fear—because of what they may do. We feel able to take care of ourselves—let them look to themselves!

But hard names hurt not. Though all the cotton bagging ever made in Scotland were used to bale-up frothy and furious denunciations, and all these were cast against the Alleghenias,—the mountains would not leave their location. It is the privilege of the improvident and the lazy, to grumble and grumble at that prosperity which attends economy and industry—and they may hate, if they please, those enjoyments in others, which they have not the virtue to earn for themselves: But here is the stopping-place. The majority, always respectful, as it should be, of the rights of the minority, will both construe the constitution and enforce the law. If what they believe just and most beneficial to the country may be "nullified," at the will of a few—let us know it immediately for the dominion of Russia is not more severe than would be that of these men: they would graduate all things by the measure of labor contained in the muscles of their own black slaves.

We would yield much to a spirit of conciliation—and respect what we esteem gross errors, if believing them to be honestly entertained; but it is not for the few to dictate conditions to the many.

CONDITION OF THE LABORING POOR IN ENGLAND. Since the publication of the article under this head in the REGISTER of the 31st inst. (and it was prepared about three weeks before), I have seen the following in an English paper. It is interesting—but only goes to strengthen the remarks made on the subject generally.

Since a few days before Christmas, a committee of the house of lords, appointed "to consider of the poor laws," have pursued their inquiries to a considerable extent, having examined about 30 witnesses, consisting of peers, commoners, clergymen, farmers, &c., and sat on 13 different days. After the recess their lordships will resume their labours; but though they have reported no observations on the evidence, because their investigation is not concluded, previously to the present recess, they reported to the house the evidence they had taken. From that evidence the following are extracts. (The Marquis of Salisbury is the chairman):—

The rev. James Beard, a clergyman and magistrate of the county of Bedford, and resident at Carnfield, examined.

The population of that parish is about 1,350, and the number of acres in it about 4,000; about two-thirds arable.

Have you many persons out of employment during the winter?—About one-fourth in the dead time of the winter.

In what manner are the poor employed during the winter time by the parish?—In digging gravel and taking care of the roads.

Can you state what rate of wages they receive when so employed by the parish?—8s. per week, the married men with families; a single man, until this last week, 3s. 6d. and possibly 4s.

What proportion of the able bodied laborers in your own parish were out of employment last year?—I should think from the month of November to the end of January, nearer 30 than 20 out of 100.

Have you adopted any means of providing employment for those laborers? I have endeavored to do it.

State the circumstances under which you have done it. My parish is an open field parish, and we have 70 or 80 acres of grass common land in it. Three years ago I called the parishioners together, being very anxious to put part of this into cultivation, for the benefit of the poor and the relief of the parish. Out of 92 occupiers 21 agreed; but the 22d, having the power of turning his stock in, he declared he would, and of course put a complete stop to any thing of husbandry. However, last week I called the parish together, and there was the same unanimity, and that individual did not disagree. The married laborers have now got a rood of land each allotted to them on Saturday, and the single men half a rood, at the rate of 10s. an acre.

To work for the parish, or to work on their own account? On their own account, under certain rules.

Is it intended to make advances to the laborers to enable them to cultivate this land?—I have done it myself individually, out of my own pocket; that is to say, I have advanced £20 towards fencing of the land, and given every man a new spade.

Can you state any particulars as to the employment of laborers on the roads in the parish of Kempston?—The last year, in the mere gravel digging, that parish expended £750; and I am sure I am not saying too much when I state I could get the same gravel dug for £50.

Can you state what the wages paid to the laborers were in that parish for that work? The married men 8s. per week; making up their families to a specified amount.

If a man gets 1s. 10d. per head per week for his family, is it the practice of the magistrates to order further relief? I have not done so until within the last three weeks.

Are there many laborers and their families who existed previously to the last three weeks on 1s. 10d. per head? Last Wednesday I went, according to the direction of the lord lieutenant, to swear in special constables. I met ten farmers, whom I swore in; they had brought 74 laborers also to be sworn in. Upon the laborers being asked at the door, they would not come in. I went out to them, and asked them the reason; they said they wanted food; upon which I selected four of the most intelligent of the party. I asked them to go into a private room. I inquired the character of the men from the farmers; and they said they were very honest industrious men. They gave me the earnings of themselves, their wives, and their children; they did not quite come to 2s. per head per week of the four families; they were the best and most industrious laborers in the parish. I went in to the farmers, and told them it was morally impossible to expect those laborers to go on at that rate of wages, and I trusted they would not think me unreasonable in begging of them to give them 2s. 6d. a head per week; that is to say, a married laborer to have 9s.; a single man of 20, 6s. per week; a single man of 18, 5s. per week; that if a married laborer has 9s., and has 2 or 3 children, they would make it up 2s. 6d. per head; if there were 6 of them, that would be 15s. per week. The farmers having consented, I went out to the laborers, and spoke to them; and I never saw a body of people so thankful in my life. This is the parish of Lidington.

I have but few additional comments to make. It is true, that the prices stated, or compensation paid, have relation only to agricultural laborers—the manufacturers, in the worst of times, (though perhaps worked harder, or at any rate, a greater number of hours in the day), have been better paid, if able to obtain full employment. But the latter are subject to great privations, in sudden discharges, through the fluctuations of trade—for as an example before me, one house at Kildermister, manufacturing carpets, lately withdrew 1,200 pounds, say 5,300 dollars, paid in weekly wages, and probably cast 7,000 persons out of their usual means of subsistence, though rated at more than twice the amount allowed to agricultural laborers in the preceding statement. But it is not worth while to extend remarks on this matter. The free white laboring people of the United States will neither agree to be placed in competition with the white slaves, or paupers of England, any more than with the black slaves of America. "This is the long and the short of it."

PAUPERS. Of the 2,256 paupers in the alms house, at Bellevue, New York, on the 51st ult. no less than 1,049 were foreigners.

All our cities are severely taxed to feed and take care of the beings that are cast out of the British poor houses, or sent hither, to starve or subsist, as the case may happen. Some strong regulations on this subject should be adopted. Let those who suck the orange, not throw the peel at us.

MULBERRY SEED AND SILK. A kind friend in Connecticut has sent to me a small parcel of the white mulberry seed, for the use of those who may please to plant them. He thinks this branch of the planting interest will come into common use, and that a few acres of trees will be worth more than a gold mine; and become blessings to the people of the United States, by engaging the slight attention and moderate labor of aged persons and young children, which is now so generally wasted—and rather amuse than oppress them. He has also sent a small parcel of silk, prepared for knitting stockings, which he assures me will prove the most pleasant and the best of any that I ever used—of which I have no manner of doubt, from the character of the material.

TOBACCO.—The actual value of all the tobacco, exclusive of any portion smuggled, annually consumed in the British Kingdoms, does not exceed £350,000, while the revenue derived from foreign tobacco amounts to £2,800,000 a year—eight times the sum.

Yet there are some tobacco planters in Maryland and many in Virginia, who laud England and her "free trade!" How was it that we levied a "tax" of 18 dollars per ton on the entry of French vessels, because France so taxed ours,—and that, though tobacco is thus taxed, and flour virtually excluded from England, except in starving seasons, we submit to John Bull? What have the people north of the Potomac to give the latter, (that he will condescend to take) for his bustians and calicoes? He requires that we should travel to and fro, and gather specie for him. Let him gather it for himself—and we for ourselves! If he won't take what we have got to sell, "hase is the slave" that will take what he has got to sell. John would have us to "make bricks without straw." And hence there arose a "Moses" in 1776. His race is not extinct—though the revolution is not yet over.

VERMONT. The official returns of votes in the 4th congressional district, on the eighth trial, leaves little hope of obtaining a representative from that district for the present session of congress.

PENNSYLVANIA. The "democrats" of this state—(and there are some eight or ten descriptions of them), are much divided; or appear so, from the noise which the different parties make. The old orthodox Jackson democrats, whose "organ" is the Philadelphia Sentinel, support "Jackson and Wolf"—the new orthodox, led on by the "rewarded" Philadelphia Inquirer, hurrah for "Jackson and Schulze"—the late governor, now named for a new election in opposition to Wolf. The latter is called, by its enemies, the Van Buren-Jackson democrats. Mr. Schulze, we had thought, was not a very warm-friend of general Jackson, when opposed by Mr.

Adams, for the presidency. And the Sentinel, in all appearance, bravely supporting the re-election of president Jackson, has the following paragraph about the bank of the United States!

"The question, both constitutional and expedient, is a question of necessity; and the necessity is overpowering. The United States cannot exist without a bank of the United States. They will not be without one for one year. Should there be a year of such void, it would be twelve months of great suffering and distress. All reflecting people, having no prejudices to gratify, must deprecate such a crisis, and pray that things as they are may be let alone. Modify, if you can for the better, but beware how you destroy."

This, we suppose, according to the new political ethics, is "going the whole" on the ancient democratic maxim,—"measures not men."

MARYLAND. Extract from a letter to the editor of the Baltimore Patriot, dated Annapolis.

By the last annual report of the treasurer of the Western Shore, it appears that the actual income of the state for the year which ended on the 1st inst. was $239,895 19

To which being added the balance in the treasury of the Western Shore on the 1st Dec. 1830

54,106 88

The available aggregate amounted to

$294,002 07

The disbursements for the year which ended on the 1st inst. were

216,824 43

Which, being deducted from the available aggregate, shows an unexpended balance of the entire income of the state for the years then ended of

$77,177 64

Subject to appropriations to that day then uncalled for 41,810 42

And leaving a clear unappropriated balance in the treasury on the 1st December, 1831, of $35,367 22

Which will enable the Committee on ways and means to discharge the entire amount of the public debt, which is payable at the pleasure of the state.

George Howard, esq. late acting governor, has been elected governor of Maryland for the ensuing year. William Potter, of Caroline, T. C. Worthington, of Frederick, Samuel Turner, of Calvert, Robert W. Bowie, of Prince Georges, and George W. Purnell, of Worcester, were elected his council.

BALTIMORE—bills of mortality for 1831. Whole number of interments, 1281 males and 1027 females—2,308; of whom 632 were colored persons—514 free and 118 slaves. Of the deaths 123 were still born, 514 under 1 year; 410 from 1 to 5; 272 from 5 to 21; 473 from 21 to 40; 279 from 40 to 60; 103 from 60 to 70; 64 from 70 to 80; 41 from 80 to 90; 6 from 90 to 100—two 105, one 106, one 112, and one 120.

Diseases—apoplexy 18; casualty 33; child bed 24; cholera infantum 248; consumption 340; convulsions 78; dropsy 30; do. in the head 33; drowned 20; dysentery 24; fevers—catarrhal 24; bilious 117, scarlet 161, typhus 39, intermittent 2; various inflammations 42; influenza 11; intemperance 45; liver complaint 19; marasmus 32; measles 23; old age 104; pleurisy 29; small pox 25; still born 123; sudden 51; teething 18; 417 unknown. All other diseases described were under 18.

The present population of Baltimore is about 32,000—of whom 15,000 are free colored persons and 4,900 slaves.

ARKANSAS. A memorial has passed both houses of the legislature of this territory, praying the removal of gov. Pope, who seems to have made a free use of the veto. It is intimated that the legislature of Michigan may prefer a like request against their governor, for non-residence. There seems to be much feeling in this latter territory, on account of those who have been appointed to "rule over them."

"GUY FAWK'S DAY." The 1st anniversary (Nov. 5) was celebrated in England in a very unusual manner! A strapping fellow, dressed in full canonicals, representing the archbishop, was paraded through the streets of Canterbury, and an effigy of "his grace" was burnt amidst the groans and execrations of the people. So it happened at several other places. Mock priests officiated, and gave out chaunts, which the people sung with great approbation! The following verse may serve as a sample of the mad feeling that prevails.

"Remember, remember,
That God is the sender
Of every good gift unto man;
But the Devil, to spite us,
Sent fellows with mitres
Who rob us of all that they can."

At Huddersfield, the effigy of the bishop of Landaff, curiously fitted up, was burnt. A mock priest read an address to the multitude, concluding thus—

"We commit his infamous body to the flames, earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust, in the certain belief that eternal damnation will be his portion, and that he will never inherit a glorious resurrection!"

"Good Lord, put down aristocracy,
Let boroughmongers be abhorred,
And from all tithes and shovel hats
Forthwith deliver us, good Lord!"

THE BODY OF CLERGY of England and Ireland cost £8,852,000 a year, their followers amounting to 6,400,000 people. The dissenters in England and Ireland amount to 14,600,000 people, who pay their religious instructors £1,024,000 per annum. The clergy of the whole Christian world (England and Ireland excepted), which contains about 188,728,000 people, receive altogether but £8,852,000 a year, so that the clergy of all descriptions in Great Britain and Ireland, which have a population of only 21,000,000, actually are paid more than that of the whole Christian world besides, by the sum of £1,098,000 per annum. Vide Mr. Coventry's work 'On the Revenue of the Church of England.' [Eng. paper.]

[England may well be called the paradise of priests.]

"BURKING." New Zealand savages are said to eat the bodies of their enemies slain in battle; but persons in Great Britain are charged with slaying inoffensive persons and eating them—or, what is the same thing, of selling their bodies to the surgeons, that they may obtain food for themselves. "Burking," which is the term used to describe the damnable offence, seems to make some progress, or, at least, to cause much alarm in certain parts of England, and some particulars are given that have terrific appearances. If there is truth in these things, the people ought to "doctor" the surgeons.—They are worse than the half-starved wretches who commit murder that their own families may have food. Among the "Burked," is supposed to be the mate of an American vessel at London.

EXPORT OF FEMALES. The British government is now devising plans to send out to the colonists unmarried females between the ages of 18 and 32. Money to pay their passage is to be furnished. As the export is only contemplated to the colonies, we do not know that this country is particularly interested in the scheme; but the case may easily be imagined in which a "prot. ctive duty" would be necessary, if many of the unmarried females should find their way in this country. It is probable that this shipment of females is to be made to supply the distant colonies with wives, as it is obvious that in all new settlements the number of males greatly exceeds that of females. The idea is, nevertheless, somewhat laughable, and if we were among the colonists, and a score of years younger, we should inquire closely whether the consignments equaled the warranty of the bills of lading, viz:—"in good order and well conditioned."

[U. S. Gaz.]

[This is sound policy—if it be desired to keep population "in check;" and such as we must resort to, it is ever shall be seriously determined to keep down the amount of our people of color.]

BRITISH NOTIONS. Mr. Bulwer, in an editorial article in the New Monthly, in which he compliments our literature, expresses kindly feeling towards this country. The time is fast coming, he says, when America will be a country whose friendship, above all others, England must cultivate, and whose manners and institutions she must accurately know.

In a late number of Blackwood's Alecto, North, after expressing his conviction that a revolution in England is approaching, adds:

"'Tis as well to be prepared." To which Tickler replies, "Inter nos, I have already put aside £10,000 in the American funds, my cock; and moreover, I have made a conquest, as we parliament house lads say, of a small crot of some fifty thousand acres, about forty of them cleared, towards the Allegheny region. Omnis fortis animum patria—that is to say, if you knock my friend John Bull on the head, I mean to take up with brother Jonathan—who, after all, is a very decent fellow, and in my opinion, more likely to have peace and quiet under his own fig tree, by and by, than any other gentleman of our acquaintance."

A late number of the London Literary Gazette has the following:—

"America is the Utopia of our pseudo politicians; and so, too, it seems to be of our poets, judging by the following ironical observation by the author of 'Corn Law Rhymes,' in his introduction to 'the Village Patriarch,' just published:—'The unhappy people of the United States cannot bear to read Crabbe: they think him unnatural, and he is so to them; for in their wretched country, cottagers are not paupers—young men are not compelled to marry or become preachers—marriage is not synonymous with misery—and partridge shooting is not religion to the elect.'"

POPULATION OF THE CANADAS. The returns of the population of Lower Canada, as ascertained by the census of 1830 are nearly complete. They are as follows:

District of Montreal,	287,119
.. Quebec,	151,167
.. Three Rivers,	56,279
.. Gaspé,	1,003

225,568

In the returns from the district of Montreal 17,000 are included for the Seigniorial part of Beauharnois and for the county of Stanstead, from neither of which have returns been received. In the district of Gaspé, also, the population of the county of Bonaventure is conjectured merely, being estimated at 500.

The population of Upper Canada, according to the returns laid before the provincial parliament, is 234,865.

MEXICO. We learn that the conducta from the cities of Mexico and Puebla, reached Vera Cruz on the 25th of November, with $1,126,834 62, escorted by 70 soldiers only.

The English packet Caluso sailed from Vera Cruz for England on the 2d Dec. having on board $900,000; of which sum $125,000 were destined for the payment of dividends on foreign loans.

PATENTS. The number of patents issued from the beginning of the present year to the 1st December, is 540; and from the establishment of the patent office in 1790 to the same date, 6,911; of which number 5,951 remain unrecorded. To bring up these arrears, says the secretary of state, would require the labor of five clerks for three years; and to keep up the current business of the office, and record, agreeably to the existing laws, the patents to be issued in future, would require two competent clerks in addition to the present number. He recommends an appropriation for this purpose. He also suggests the propriety of increasing the fee for obtaining patents, in order to check the numerous ap-

"A person, when resident in a certain part of the United States, which is receding into a wilderness, used to say—that he must seek a new location; for that, a while ago, he made out by eating one negro, but was then compelled to devour two yearly. That is, sell two, that the demands upon him might be satisfied.

plications from persons whose alleged improvements and discoveries have not the slightest claim to originality. [National Gazette.]

THE AMERICAN NATION. The nature of our political system is well described in the annexed passage of the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Cohen vs. Virginia, as delivered by the chief justice.

"That the United States form, for many, and for most important purposes, a single nation, has not yet been denied. In war we are one people. In making peace, we are one people. In all commercial regulations, we are one and the same people. In many other respects, the American people are one. And the government, which is alone capable of controlling and managing the interests in all these respects, is the government of the union. It is their government, and in that character they have no other. America has chosen to be, in many respects and for many purposes, a nation; and for all these purposes, her government is complete; to all these objects it is competent. The people have declared, that in the exercise of all powers given for these objects, it is supreme. It can, then, in effecting these objects, legitimately control all individuals or governments within the American territory. The constitution and laws of the state, so far as they are repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States are absolutely void. The states are constituent parts of the United States. They are members of one great empire; for some purposes sovereign, for some purposes subordinate."

THE CHOCTAWS. Fulsom's party of emigrating Choctaws, 500 strong, arrived at Port Arkansas early last month, in a steamboat.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY. From the Franklin, (New York), Republican. A bed of fine steel ore has recently been discovered by James Duane, Franklin county. It is said to be of a quality superior to that of the best English blister steel, and competent judges have pronounced it capable of being manufactured into the finest edge tools.

The above article from the Keesville Herald would, it appeared to us, irresistibly lead to the conclusion that the discovery alluded to is wholly fabulous. The very limited knowledge we possessed of mineralogy inclined us not to believe in the existence of steel ore. In a recent conversation with Mr. Duane he informed us that the ore is of a species denominated carbonated iron ore. The knowledge of its valuable properties were in some degree accidentally discovered. When first found it was supposed to be of little or no value, having an unusually dark appearance, and failing in other respects to give the usual indications of good iron ore. He was induced, however, to give it a trial in the ordinary manner of working iron ore in forges, and found it easily wrought into a handsome smooth bar, which had the appearance of fine steel. This led him to try its qualities and it has been proved to possess all the qualities of the best steel. Chisels have been manufactured from it which prove equal to the best cast steel, and a cutter or shear for a nailing machine was also made of it which answered an excellent purpose. Should this ore, upon further examination, prove as valuable as present appearances indicate, it must undoubtedly be a source of immense wealth to the owner.

MARIA LOUISA, arch duchess of Parma, has filled up the post of private favorite, vacant since the decease of Comte de Niepperg. The fortunate gentleman is M. le Baron Mareschal, who, by a recent motte-propre, is attached in the princess's person, appointed to the dignity of major domo of her household and court, with all the honors, all the attributions and prerogatives enjoyed by her late Chevalier d'Honneur, Comte de Niepperg. What a falling off for the widow of le grand Napoleon!

THE COMET. There has been no little speculation on the subject of a comet that it is supposed will appear in course of this year. In presenting the annexed extract on this subject, we would remark that it has been the topic in Europe, and the people of France having been somewhat alarmed, the French philosophical academy sometime ago, caused calculations to be made on the subject and published a report to allay the alarm which had seized the minds of the ignorant classes on the occasion. The result of their calculations went to show that no sort of danger was to be apprehended on the approach of this comet. The following we find in a paper before us:— [Baton Cent.]

The European papers speak of a comet that will appear within 60,000 miles of the earth's orbit, some time in the year 1832. If the earth should happen to be in that portion of its orbit, nearest the path of the comet, in its approach to the sun, they say its motion will be much disturbed, and serious consequences may reasonably be apprehended—M. Lalande has computed that comets may pass within 30,000 leagues without sensibly deranging the motion of the earth. The comet of 1470 approached so near the earth as to increase its periodical time upwards of two days; and had its mass been equal to that of the earth, it is computed by La Place, the earth's motion in her orbit would have been equally retarded, and consequently have increased the length of the year nearly forty-nine hours. As no such effect was produced, the disturbing force of the comet was considered insensible. The mass of the comet was 1-500th part less than that of the earth. In 1454 the moon was eclipsed by a comet which must have passed within 200,000 miles of the earth—and it is known that no effect was produced by its attractive force, either on the earth or moon. The immense velocity of comets may be a principal reason why they do not sensibly effect the motion of the planets. That of 1680 was calculated by Newton to move at the rate of 800,000 miles an hour, and Brabone observed one at Palermo in 1670, whose velocity he computed to be equal to 2,500,000 miles an hour. The comet of 1450 is best known by astronomers. Its period is computed to be about 76 years, though from its motion being disturbed by the planets it is sometimes longer. It appeared in 1632 very bright; and was looked after with very great anxiety in 1758;—but Clairault determined from calculation that it would not appear till April, 1759. The increased length of its period he attributed to the influence of Jupiter and Saturn, near which it would pass. It accordingly approached nearest the sun on the 12th of March, 1759. If this is the comet to which the European papers refer, it will not appear till 1834 or 5. The distance of this comet from the sun, when in the extreme end of its orbit, is about 82,000,000 miles; yet it returns regularly, and its period has been calculated by the mathematicians within 30 days!

[A paragraph in one of the French papers postpones the fatal visit of the comet of 1832 to the year 87,832! Whether it is the one above alluded to or not—we are uninformed.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at New York brings advices to the 23d November from France.

A courier arrived in Paris from London, the evening of the 18th of November, bringing the treaty, signed on the 15th of that month, between the five powers and king Leopold, incorporating the 24 articles of that between Belgium and Holland, with three additional clauses. Art. 25 places all the preceding articles under the guarantee of the five powers. Art. 26 declares that there shall be peace and amity between the king of the French, the emperor of Austria, the king of Great Britain, the king of Prussia, and the emperor of Russia, on the one part, and the king of the Belgians on the other. Art. 27 prescribes that the treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged within two months at latest. The king of Holland still refused his sanction to the treaty.

A riot took place at Rieupeyrroux on the 7th November, owing to the opposition of the people to pay the consolidated duties. The mayor, though supported by three regiments of gendarmerie, was unable to suppress it. On the arrival of the prefect, the president of the tribunal, the procureur du Roi and the general in command of the district, the mal-contents submitted, and promised to pay, forthwith, the demands against them.

The disarming of the garrisons of Piedmont were rapidly going on, and those of Savoy, Chambery and Aunecy are merely kept up in sufficient number to mount guard; the army of the north were quitting the frontier and returning to their garrisons and quarters—this dispersion of armies and disarming of garrisons, is hailed as a sure indication of continued peace.

Several journalists in France had been prosecuted and fined.

The widow of the late unfortunate lord Edward Fitzgerald died at Paris, about the middle of November.

A large number of new peers, for life,* had been created, and many officers, who had been deprived of their commissions under former dynasties, restored to command. Several of the newly created peers had taken their seats in the chamber of peers. The creation of these peers has given great offence, and some of the journals, which had before supported the ministry, had turned round and joined the opposition.

POLAND AND RUSSIA.

The accounts from Poland are filled with gloom—scarcely a family that has not lost some relative by the war; prosperity is destroyed, and trade is in a wretched state of depression.

The emperor of Russia, upon whom a demand was made by the Prussian government, has refused to pay the expenses of the Polish army in passing through Prussia: he has also forbidden the officers of the several corps who sought refuge in Prussia, from either returning to Russia or Poland.

The brave Schryznecki, Dembinski, and a number of other Polish generals, together with the countess Plater, had determined on seeking an asylum in Paris. The first named had reached Berlin on his way thither.

ENGLAND.

The cholera, in England was chiefly confined to Sunderland, though there had been new cases at Stockton and New Castle, and these caused but little havoc. The Paris Constitutionnel states that letters had been received from London, containing the intelligence of the cholera having made its appearance on board of vessels in the docks—the silence of the London papers on this head are considered as conclusive that this information is incorrect.

The reform question, and the meeting of parliament, were the engrossing subjects of interest. A further prorogation of parliament had been determined on. The plan of creating new peers was gaining additional strength.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

January 5. The bill to reduce the duty on Indian blankets and certain other Indian goods, was read the second time; when Mr. Benton moved to refer it to the committee on finance. He thought, in justice, the bill ought to go to the committee on Indian affairs, for consideration; but he yielded to the opinions of others, and consented to refer it to the committee on finance.

Mr. Dickerson moved to refer the bill to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Benton said, that he perceived that the gentleman was disposed to have the present bill to take the same course that the salt bill heretofore introduced had taken. He was of opinion that there was another committee besides that of finance, that should take precedence of the committee on manufactures. He alluded to the committee on Indian affairs. That committee had the concerns of the Indians, and the trade of the United States with them, under their supervision; and as the present bill proposed a measure calculated to affect that trade, it more properly belonged to that committee, than the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Dickerson said, that in the case of the bill to repeal the duty on salt, and also on the present occasion, he thought that gentlemen were disposed to have the subjects referred to that committee which had the least concern, and felt the least interest in them. The argument of the gentleman went to show that the reference should be to the committee on the affairs of the Indians, because it might have some connexion with them—while he was opposed to its reference to the committee on manufactures, although its adoption would evidently, as in the case of the salt bill, have a more decided and important bearing on the manufacturing interest than upon any other in the country. Both bills, Mr. D. contended, had it in view to remove the protection which the government had deliberately extended to the domestic industry of the country.

The question was then taken upon the reference to the committee on Indian affairs, and decided in the negative, yeas 17, nays 25.

The question then occurred on referring the bill to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Benton objected to this reference. He observed it was the apparent intention of certain gentlemen to give every thing to the hands of the committee on manufactures—implying that they alone were competent to examine and report on questions of great national interest or importance. The course proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey he considered a violation of the established course of all legislative proceedings, and contrary to all parliamentary rules, relative to the reference of bills.

Mr. Dickerson replied to Mr. Benton, and maintained that the committee on manufactures was the proper one to refer a bill of the character of the present one to, tending as it did to strike at an important branch of manufactures.

Mr. Brown, of North Carolina, protested against the practice of referring bills to a committee hostile to their provisions. He had always understood that it was incumbent upon them to refer bills which were introduced, to the friends of the proposed measure. He referred to the practice in the British parliament to sustain his position, and asked if the American senate would deny them a privilege granted in that body—a body not so favorable to liberty as it was. He wished the subject to undergo a proper examination and therefore opposed its reference to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Buckner, of Missouri, said, that his colleague, (Mr. Benton), had made the reference a question of order, and had appealed to the rules of the house to sustain his motion for a reference to the committee on finance.—He did not pretend that his experience in the rules of legislation was equal to that gentleman's—but he had always understood that the rule which the gentleman had just read in support of his argument, applied exclusively to select committees,—and could not be made to apply to the present proposed reference to a standing committee. But it was maintained that this measure should be referred to a committee not hostile to the measure. He would ask that gentleman how it could be ascertained whether a committee was hostile or otherwise, before it had expressed an opinion upon the subject.

Mr. B. wished to know how far this bill would clash with the manufacturing interest; and, to ascertain this, it would be necessary to refer it to that committee whose time and attention were devoted to the examination of measures relating to the interest of manufactures. He was of a different opinion from the gentleman from Missouri, and should be opposed to the destructive inroad which this bill was calculated to make upon domestic manufactures. He felt anxious to ascertain how far this measure would affect the manufacturing interests of the country, which could be done only by a full investigation by the committee charged with that object. He should therefore vote for its reference to that committee.

Mr. Smith and Mr. Tyler both opposed the reference.

Mr. Clay said, that he did not rise to enter into a discussion of the question of reference, but in consequence of information given by the chairman of the committee on finance, some ten days ago, in relation to a report which that gentleman had stated it was the intention of that committee to submit to the senate before this time. He rose to inquire whether that report might be expected? He had understood the gentleman to say, two weeks since, that they might expect, on the Monday following, a general scheme of imposts, adapted to the wants of the country, when the public debts should be discharged.

*To obtain a majority in the house of peers, to destroy the peerage. A good example to England, at the present crisis.

Mr. Smith replied that he did, at the time referred to, hope to be able to submit the report before this time; but that there were some of the committee who were not willing to submit it, until they had received further information on the subject; to obtain which, they had addressed a letter of inquiry to the secretary of the treasury; and they also expected a report from the convention of New York. He could not tell when the required information would be received, and consequently did not know when the report would be ready.

The question was then taken on the reference to the committee on manufactures, and agreed to, yeas 25, nays 18.

January 9. The vice president communicated a letter from the secretary of state, transmitting, in pursuance of a resolution, Greenleaf's large map of the state of Maine, of the year 1828.

A number of petitions and memorials were presented, and among the rest one from the inhabitants of the northern part of the state of New York, praying that a break water may be erected in Plattsburg bay, and a light house on Cumberland head—referred.

Mr. Dallas presented the following memorial from the president, directors and company, of the bank of the United States:

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States, in congress assembled:

The memorial of the president, directors and company of the bank of the United States, in the name and in behalf of the stockholders of the bank, respectfully represents—

That the charter of the bank being about to expire, on the 4th of March 1836, your memorialists deem it their duty to invite the attention of congress to its renewal.

The general considerations which caused the establishment of the bank, the manner in which it has executed the duties assigned to it, and the reasons which recommend its continuance, your memorialists forbear to discuss, since, of these subjects, your honorable bodies are more competent and appropriate judges. They will, therefore, merely state the views which induce their application at this time.

Unless the question is decided by the present congress, no definitive action upon it can be expected until within two years of the expiration of the charter—a period before which, in the opinion of your memorialists, it is highly expedient, not merely in reference to the institution itself, but to the more important interests of the nation, that the determination of congress should be known. Independently of the influence which the bank was designed to possess, and which it necessarily exercises over the state of the currency, by which all the pecuniary transactions of the community are regulated, its own immediate operations are connected intimately with the local business of almost every section of the United States, with the commercial interchanges between the several states, and the intercourse of them with all foreign nations.

Of the value to the community, of the system which, after long and anxious efforts, and at great pecuniary sacrifices, your memorialists have at length succeeded in establishing, it is not for them to speak; their more immediate purpose is to represent, as they do, most respectfully, that the continuance or destruction of that system, thus widely diffused through all the avenues of the productive industry of the country, affecting all the relations of public revenue and private income, and contributing to give stability to all the rewards of labor, is an object of general solicitude. If, satisfied with the practical operations of the institution, your honorable body shall deem it worthy of continuance, it seems expedient to relieve the country, as soon as may consist with mature deliberation, from the uncertainty in which all private transactions, and all public improvements, dependent on the future condition of the currency, and amount of capital disposable for those objects, must necessarily be involved until your decision is known. If, on the other hand, the wisdom of congress shall determine that the bank must cease to exist, it is still more important that the country should begin early to prepare for the expected change, and that the institution should have as much time as possible to execute the duty, always a very delicate and difficult one, of aiding the community to seek new channels of business, and, by gradual and gentle movements, to press with the least inconvenience on the great interests connected with it.

Under these impressions, they respectfully request that the charter of the bank may be renewed.

By order of the board of directors:

N. BIDDLE, president.

Mr. Dallas said, that being requested to present this document to the senate, praying for a renewal of the existing charter of the bank, he begged to be indulged in making a few explanatory remarks. With unhesitating frankness, he wished it to be understood by the senate, by the good commonwealth which it was alike his duty and his pride to represent with fidelity on that floor, and by the people generally, that this application, at this time, had been discouraged by him. Actuated mainly, if not exclusively, by a desire to preserve to the nation the practical benefits of the institution, the expediency of bringing it forward thus early in the term of its incorporation, during a popular sensation in congress which must cease to exist some years before that term expires, and on the eve of all the excitement incident to a great political movement, struck his mind as more than doubtful. He felt deep solicitude and apprehension, lest, in the progress of inquiry and in the development of views, under present circumstances, it might be drawn into real or imagined conflict with some higher, some more favorite, some more immediate wish or purpose of the American people.

And from such a conflict, what sincere friend of this useful establishment would not strive to save or rescue it, by at least a temporary forbearance and delay? Nevertheless, his conscious inexperience in the forms and contingencies of legislation, inspired a distrust of his own judgment on this merely preliminary point. The determination of the parties interested, may be, nay, must be, wiser and better; and he could not but feel strongly impressed by the recollection that the legislature of Pennsylvania, recently, and in effect, unanimously had recommended the renewal of the charter of this bank. He became, therefore, a willing, as he was virtually an instructed agent, in promoting, to the extent of his humble ability, an object which, however, dangerously timed its introduction might seem, was in itself, as he conceived, entitled to every consideration and favor.

Mr. D. concluded by moving that the memorial be read, and be referred to a select committee of five in number, and that the committee have power to send for papers and papers.

The memorial having been read, and the reference agreed to—

Mr. Dallas moved that the appointment of the committee be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. Bell said he was not aware of any reason for the postponement; and as none had been assigned for it, he could perceive no propriety in the postponement. It would, also, be a thing unprecedented in the senate; and unless some reasons were adduced in favor of the postponement, he should prefer that the senate should, according to its usage, proceed at once to the appointment of the committee.

The question being put on the postponement, it was negatived. Yeas 13, nays 24.

The senate then proceeded to ballot for the committee, and the following gentlemen were chosen to compose it, viz: Mr. Dallas, Mr. Webster, Mr. Ewing, Mr. Hayne and Mr. Johnston.

Mr. King reported a bill to grant a township of land to the French college of St. Louis; which was read.

The vice president communicated a report from the secretary of war of the expenditures of moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the military establishment, for the year 1831.

Various private bills were reported, read, and referred.

Mr. Clay laid on the table the following resolution: Resolved, That the existing duties upon articles imported from foreign countries, and not coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, ought to be forthwith abolished, except the duties upon wines and silks, and that they ought to be reduced; and that the committee on finance be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

The bill for the erection of barracks, quarters, and store houses, and the purchase of a site, in the vicinity of New Orleans, was considered as in committee of the whole; the blank in the bill was, on motion of Mr. Johnston, filled with the words "one hundred and twelve thousand dollars," to carry the provisions of the act into effect; it was then reported to the senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Considerable debate on this bill ensued, in which Messrs. Forsyth, Benton, Johnston, Clay and Waggaman participated; the three latter strenuously supporting it.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the bill regulating the duties and providing for the compensation of pursers in the navy—postponed to Thursday next.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the pay of navy agents. The bill makes a specific allowance to these officers, instead of a percentage as heretofore. After some conversation respecting the details of the bill, it was ordered to a third reading.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the distribution of the duties of the commissioners of the navy, and for other purposes.

After some discussion of the details of this bill (on the part of Messrs. Hayne, Chambers, Foot, and Webster, the bill was, by consent, postponed to Friday next, and The senate adjourned.

January 11. Mr. Smith presented the memorial of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, praying for such a subscription, on the part of the United States, to its stock, as will enable the company either to complete the road to its termination on the Ohio, or so far advance it as to make the completion easier to individual or corporate enterprise. Referred to the committee on roads and canals.

Mr. Tipton offered a resolution to inquire into the expediency of improving the navigation of the Wabash.

Mr. Evans moved a resolution requiring 50 lithographic copies of Mitchell's map of the British provinces in North America, as includes the territory northwest of the river Ohio, as designated by the ordinance of 1787, &c.—which was agreed to.

The following resolutions moved yesterday by Mr. Benton, were taken up and agreed to.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to furnish the senate with the names and titles of the foreign stockholders of the bank of the United States, and a statement of the stock held by citizens of the United States, with the number of shares held by each, and the state or territory of their residence; also, the amount of specie, according to the last return, in the vaults of the bank and its branches, distinguishing the part which belongs to the bank, the portion which belongs to individuals, and to the United States.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to lay before the senate a list of the directors of the bank of the United States, and of the several branches, and a statement of the stock held by citizens of the United States, with the number of shares held by each, and the state or territory of their residence; also, the amount of specie, according to the last return, in the vaults of the bank and its branches, distinguishing the part which belongs to the bank, the portion which belongs to individuals, and to the United States.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to lay before the senate information, first, of the amount of debt due from individuals, and bodies corporate, to the bank of the United States and its branches, distinguishing the amount secured by mortgage from that secured by personal security alone, and what portion of said debts are considered as standing accommodations to the customers of said bank and its branches.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to lay before the senate monthly statements of the affairs of the bank of the United States for the year 1831.

The resolution moved by Mr. Clay, on Wednesday relative to instructing the committee of finance, to report a bill repealing certain duties, was taken up, and on motion of Mr. Hayne, made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. Clay addressed the senate at considerable length, in support of the resolution.

"In consequence of the expectation that Mr. Clay would speak, the galleries of the senate chamber were crowded to excess, at an early hour—and, finally, the floor of the senate was invaded by a dense crowd of fair auditors—the very area being taken possession of by them! It is spoken of as one of the most brilliant gatherings ever witnessed on a like occasion.

Mr. Clay spoke about two hours. His remarks cannot be received in time for the present sheet. He was decisive in the maintenance of the protective policy, and that of internal improvement.

He was followed by Mr. Hayne, who in a few remarks, preface his motion for a postponement. The senate then adjourned.

January 12. The vice president communicated a report from the secretary of the treasury, containing a list of applicants for the U. S. insolvent act—the nature and amount of the debts due to the U. States from each, also the names of those who have obtained a release, together with the terms of compromise in each case.

Mr. Silsbee presented the petition of the merchants of Boston, praying in the event of a modification of the tariff, that certain regulations as to the granting of debentures may be adopted.

A number of private memorials were presented.

Mr. King reported a bill, concerning the price of certain public lands—also the bill to permit the state of Louisiana to enter the back lands.

The resolutions moved yesterday by Messrs. Foot, Moore and Dallas, were severally considered and agreed to, that of the first named gentleman so altered as to request the information of the president instead of the secretary of war.

Mr. Rugles moved a resolution relative to the map of the north western territory, ordered to be furnished on the 11th inst.

The bill authorising the making of a road, &c. from Line creek to Chatahochee, was read the third time and passed.

The bill for the organization of the ordnance department, was considered, amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate went into business of a confidential nature, and after spending some time therein, the doors were opened, and the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Jan. 6. Mr. Cuthbert T. Hawkins, from North Carolina, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. Wickliffe reported the bill from the senate, supplementary to an act granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, with an amendment, which was concurred in by the house, and it was ordered that the said amendment be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. Wickliffe also reported a bill authorising the sale of 20,000 acres of the saline lands in the state of Illinois.

Mr. Vance reported a bill for the relief of Nathan Towson, paymaster general of the army of the United States—twice read, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday.

Mr. Keer made a report, accompanied by a bill establishing a territorial government north of the states of Illinois and Missouri, and west of lake Michigan, to be called the territory of Wisconsin—twice read and committed.

Mr. Davis, from S. C. reported a bill to authorise the president to run and mark a line dividing the territory of Florida from the state of Georgia—twice read and committed.

Mr. Taylor reported a bill concerning the issuing of patents to aliens for useful discoveries and inventions—twice read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday next.

Mr. McDuffie reported a bill making appropriations for the naval service for 1832—twice read and committed.

Mr. Cooke, of Ohio, instituted an inquiry into the propriety of granting an appropriation for the examination and surveys of the mouth of Sandusky river, with a view to the improvement of the navigation thereof.

crowded to excess, at an early hour—and, finally, the floor of the senate was invaded by a dense crowd of fair auditors—the very area being taken possession of by them! It is spoken of as one of the most brilliant gatherings ever witnessed on a like occasion.

Mr. Clay spoke about two hours. His remarks cannot be received in time for the present sheet. He was decisive in the maintenance of the protective policy, and that of internal improvement.

Ed. Rzo.

Several resolutions concerning the claims of individuals were offered and adopted.

On motion of Mr. Barber, the committee on military affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of improving the construction and repairing Fort Griswold, on Gorton Heights, in the state of Connecticut.

On motion of Mr. Bates, the committee on manufactures were instructed to inquire and report to this house, as near as may be, what amount of hemp has been produced in each of the United States, in the years 1828, 1829, 1830 and 1831, with the average price at which it has been sold in the market.

On motion of Mr. Ashley, of Missouri, an inquiry was instituted as to the propriety of granting an appropriation for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Mississippi river, from the junction of the same with the river Missouri, to the town of Galena, in the state of Illinois.—Also, as to the expediency of making a sufficient appropriation for the purpose of locating and constructing the national road from St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, to the seat of government in that state.

Mr. McKeanan moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to report to this house an estimate of the sum which will be necessary to make a thorough repair of the national road from Cumberland to Wheeling.

Mr. Whitlsey moved a resolution calling upon the secretary of war to report a copy of the survey and estimate of cost made for a canal, by the corps of engineers of the United States, from Portage Summit, to intersect the line surveyed in Pennsylvania by col. Kearney.

Mr. Barber, moved a resolution requiring information of the secretary of war, relative to the claims of the state of Connecticut for disbursements made by that state, and for the services and expenses of her militia during the late war.

Mr. Sevier offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the commissioner of the general land office be requested to furnish this house, for the use of the committee on the public lands, with a copy of all the instructions given by said department to the registrars and receivers of public moneys in the territory of Arkansas, of a date subsequent to the 17th of October, 1828, respecting the proof to be received by said officers in support of donations to land granted to sundry citizens of Arkansas, by an act of congress of the 24th day of May, 1828.

In support of the resolution, Mr. Sevier observed that he hoped the house would sustain him in the call. He had been long endeavoring to get at this information by correspondence with the gentleman referred to in the resolution, but without success. He wished to bring that gentleman to his senses—he wished him to understand that in seeking the information he desired, he was supported by the votes of this house. If the gentleman was unable from sickness or any other cause to attend to the duties of his office, let him give it to some one who would attend to them. He wished to bring the gentleman to reflection, and if he found that when backed by this house, he was still unable to get any thing out of him, he should then know it was time to go elsewhere, and apply to the head man of the manger.

Mr. Hickiffe suggested the propriety of modifying the resolution so as to make the inquiry from the head of the department, and not a subordinate officer; and he therefore moved to substitute "the secretary of the treasury" for "the commissioner of the land office."

Mr. Sevier replied that he had no objection so to modify the resolution. He had great respect for the secretary of the treasury, and so he had for all the other officers of the department, except that one, and perhaps he was giving him too much consequence by naming him in the resolution.

The resolution as modified was then agreed to.

Mr. Bates Cooke, of New York, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision for extending, and the more effectually carrying into effect the provisions of the act of congress, entitled "an act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," passed 9th April, 1816, and the several amendments thereto, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was strenuously opposed by Mr. Whitlsey, of Ohio, as going to open again all the decisions in the war department, as well as all the reports of the committee of claims, respecting property destroyed in the last war. The whole subject had been fully discussed in 1824 and '25, and a law passed, allowing an investigation of cases, which had been before the commissioner of claims, and had been referred to the third auditor. He believed that law had gone as far as any law on the subject ought to go, and the $250,000 appropriated to satisfy claims arising under it, were nearly exhausted. He objected to the indefinite phraseology of the resolution, and warned the house against rashly adopting it.

Mr. Johnson, of Kentucky, spoke at considerable length in reply. The bill of 1816 providing for these claims, had been reported by the military committee, its provisions continued only for eighteen months or two years. Since then all individual cases had come up to the house by petition. The consideration of these cases in detail occasioned much delay, and he argued to show that it would be better to have a general provision covering the whole. He gave an amusing account of a correspondence between himself and his constituents, respecting horses lost, and though he admitted that all the decisions of war could not be paid for by government, yet where claims for losses could be distinctly ascertained and reduced to a general principle, they ought to receive a general provision by law.

The debate was further proceeding, when it was adjourned.

Mr. Hubbard, of New Hampshire, who moved that the house do now proceed to the orders of the day.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on sundry bills for the relief of thirteen individuals, which bills were severally twice read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday next.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the first comptroller of the treasury, transmitting a statement of the accounts which have remained unsettled more than three years on the books of the fourth auditor of the treasury—laid on the table.

The house then proceeded to consider the following resolution, moved by Mr. Heuter on the 22d December, ult. and laid on the table:

Resolved, That the post master general be directed to furnish this house a statement of the annual amount of postage received on newspapers and periodicals for the preceding five years, designating the amount received on each. Also, his views on the expediency or inexpediency of abolishing the postage on newspapers and periodicals, or either of them.

At the instance of Mr. McDuffie, the latter clause of the resolution was modified by substituting for it, "and also what will be the effect of abolishing such postage on the revenue and operations of the post office department," and also by inserting "three" instead of "five" years, as the period of inquiry.

Mr. McDuffie advocated the resolution in its modified form; he thought it important to have the judgment of the officer at its head, whether the department could sustain itself, should the postage on newspapers and periodicals be abolished.

Mr. Everett thought letter postage was one of the heaviest taxes paid by the people of the United States. It was more universal than any other, and in its practical operations exceedingly unequal. The requiring double postage, on double letters, was not regulated on equal principles. The postage was doubled for the smallest and slightest enclosure—a bank note or a receipt paid as much as the largest letter; and also in apportioning the postage to the distance, the law was very unequal and oppressive. He did not wish to embarrass the operations of the department so as to make it a charge upon the revenue, nor did he think that such would be the result of the measure proposed. He thought by decreasing the postage, the number of letters would be increased,—and, consequently, that the revenue would not be diminished. He, therefore, moved that the resolution be further modified, by adding these, or the like words—"also, his opinion as to the effect on the operations of the department from the reduction or abolition of postage on letters, newspapers and periodicals."

This was also accepted as a modification by the mover.

Mr. Ingersoll coincided with Mr. Everett—he thought that the poorer citizens were restrained, by a dread of the postage they must pay, from writing letters to their friends.

Mr. Arnold moved to extend the inquiry, so as to include the amount of costs which the department paid for publishing its advertisements throughout the United States, and also the total number of newspapers published in the union.

Mr. Carson said that the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. A.) had presented a memorial upon the subject which had been referred to the proper committee, and he inquired whether the report of that committee would not embrace the subject of the inquiry.

Mr. Russell, the chairman of that committee, nodding assent, and observing that he had asked the information required, of the post master general—

Mr. Carson then moved that the resolution lie on the table—which motion prevailed.

The house then adjourned.

Monday Jan. 9. Mr. McDuffie presented the memorial of the president and directors, on behalf of the stockholders, of the bank of the United States, asking for a renewal of their charter.

After the memorial had been read,—

Mr. McDuffie moved to refer it to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Davis, of South Carolina, moved to refer it to a committee of the whole house, on the state of the union.

A motion was also made to refer it to a select committee.

Mr. Wayne, of Georgia, said, that he had on a former occasion expressed his objection to the reference of this subject to the committee of ways and means; and he should not trouble the house by repeating now, what he had advanced at the commencement of the session in favor of the appointment of a select committee; but he called upon gentlemen to consider what was the attitude of the committee of ways and means in reference to the bank question, and to compare it with the attitude in which that question had been presented to the house by the president of the United States; and he would ask whether it was not manifestly proper to submit the memorial to a committee entirely unconnected upon the subject. But this was not the object for which he had risen—the present question had not come upon him unexpectedly—he had been aware before he entered the house that a memorial of this kind would this morning be presented, and when he looked back upon the occurrences of the last four weeks, and remembered what had taken place at a late convention in Baltimore, and the motives which had been avowed for bringing forward the subject at this time—he must say, that gentlemen ought not to permit a petition of this kind to receive the attention of the house. Who could doubt that the presentation of that memorial was in fact a party measure, intended to have an important operation on persons occupying the highest offices of the government? If, however, it should be considered necessary to enter upon the subject at the present time, Mr. Wayne said he was prepared to meet it. But when gentlemen saw distinctly before their eyes, the motive of such a proceeding, he hoped, that notwithstanding there might be a majority in the house in favor of the bank, gentlemen would not lend themselves to that kind of action. Could it be necessary to take up the question of re-chartering the bank at the present session? Gentlemen all knew, that four years must pass, before its charter would expire, and that congress had power to extend the period, if farther time was necessary to wind up its affairs. It was known that other subjects of an exciting character must come up during the present session, and could there be any necessity, or propriety, in throwing additional matter into the house calculated to raise that excitement yet higher? He trusted some individual would follow him who might be able to present the subject to the house in a stronger light than he could. He should be willing in the very outset, to meet it by a motion to lay this memorial upon the table; but he would not make that motion at present, inasmuch as it would preclude a discussion which he wished to see proceed. He would, therefore, reserve himself for such ultimate action in reference to it as he might consider proper.

Mr. McDuffie said that if he even could suppose that the Baltimore convention had had any thing to do with the presentation of the present memorial, he trusted that he, at least, would be free from the suspicion of acting in this house as the agent of that body, if any man in the United States could be free from such a suspicion. So far, however as regarded the president, directors, and company of the mother bank, he must say, that, so far as his situation had given him an opportunity of having any knowledge of them, (and he had had much to do with those gentlemen), he did not believe that there existed within the limits of this union, an organized body more perfectly exempt from any just liability to the charge of acting from political considerations; and so far from having had the remotest connexion with any political movements either at Baltimore or elsewhere, he should rather come to the conclusion that the present memorial had been presented after a consultation with the party to which the gentleman from Georgia, as well as himself, belonged, than with those of opposite party-opinions. He regretted exceedingly that this should have been regarded as a political question; but it was the misfortune of our country, that no subject of any kind could be started, which had reference to the general interests of the people, but it must instantly be converted into a political question, and connected with that absorbing topic, a topic which he feared would one day prostrate the liberty of the country—the election of a president. Could not the consideration of any question, referring to the interests of the country, be entered upon, but it must be to put this man into office and that man out? Could no question of any kind be disposed of with a calm impartial judgment? He should deeply regret if any gentleman, in acting on the present subject, should be influenced by the question, how its decision would touch the election of this man or that. He could not possibly see how it could have any thing to do with the matter. Why must this be made a political question at this time more than at any other? Did the gentleman from Georgia suppose that the progress of purification would be such that at any future time personal considerations would cease to operate? If, while the present incumbent occupied the presidential chair, the bank question must of necessity have a political aspect, was it to be supposed that two years hence, when there were two or more gentlemen, candidates for that situation, the discussion of it would be any more disinterested? No! cried Mr. McD., it is the imperfection of man that presents the difficulty; and until that shall cease, the gentleman from Georgia will never get out of it. The president and directors of the mother bank had been governed, not by political or party motives, in presenting this memorial, but by the obligation under which they lay, not only to the stockholders, but to the government of the United States. What would be the effect of refusing to renew the charter, or to act upon the subject, till two years, or till a single year, before its expiration. Could the gentleman from Georgia have reflected upon the consequences? That bank had given a credit of 50,000,000 to the people of the United States. What did he suppose must be the effect of suddenly withdrawing that credit? Its effect, not only to the individuals to whom the credit had been given, but to all others connected with them? It would be nothing short of utter desolation. Whether the charter were to be granted or refused, the house was bound in every view of the subject to act upon it now, and to act definitively. A period of four years was not more than was indispensably requisite to wind up the concerns of such an institution. If the consideration of the subject at this time was necessarily attended with any embarrassment, he should regret it; but still he must hold the great leading interests of the country to be paramount to all political and party considerations. If it was in the power of gentlemen to discard all such feelings in considering the great question to which this memorial referred, he earnestly hoped that it might be done.

Mr. Cambreleng, of New York, said that he heartily joined in the wish just expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDuffie), that the subject might be approached without any thing like political excitement; but that gentleman and himself must live far beyond the ordinary length of man's life, if they ever lived to see that question separated from party considderations. If his recollection did not very much deceive him, that gentleman, in the beginning of the session, had expressly said that the bank question should sleep in his committee throughout the residue of the session.

Here Mr. McDuffie interposed, and said that the gentleman had entirely misunderstood him—that he had never made any such assertion.

Mr. Cambreling said he stood corrected. He concurred with the gentleman that the subject ought to be met, but he hoped that in considering it, the house would deliberate long, and reflect maturely. They would thoroughly examine the great question, whether any bank in the country could have the power to issue a currency from all its branches in every part of the country—payable nowhere.

Here Mr. McDuffie was about to interpose, when Mr. Cambreling said he was not going to enter into the merits of the general question; but had risen for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Wayne), not to move to lay this memorial on the table. He was for himself willing and ready to meet the subject. He wished also to make an appeal to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDuffie), whether he would persist in his motion to refer the memorial to the committee of ways and means, seeing that if it should go to a select committee, that gentleman would occupy in such committee the same station he held in the standing committee to which he belonged, and whether he would not consent that the subject of re-chartering the bank should go to a select committee, as it had heretofore done. He had joined with that gentleman in referring so much of the message as related to this subject to the committee of ways and means. But, the consideration of a memorial which would require the whole subject to be sifted to the very bottom, was, of itself, sufficient to occupy a committee during the whole session of congress. The committee of ways and means was charged with the revenue and finances of the country, and could not give it that attention which it required. He therefore suggested to the gentleman from South Carolina, whether he ought not, in justice to others as well as to himself, to move the reference of the memorial to a select committee.

Mr. McDuffie replied, that to do so would not be to comply with the order of proceeding in the house, inasmuch as the subject appropriately belongs to the committee on finance.

Mr. Cambreling, thereupon moved that the memorial be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Coulter, of Pennsylvania, said that he had not been so fortunate as the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Wayne), inasmuch as he had not heard that such a memorial was this day to be presented to the house, and the only reason he felt any particular interest, as to the disposition of it, was, that many of the petitioners resided within the state from which he came. He had the same interest in the general subject as the other citizens of the country. What was the subject before the house? A petition had been presented from a number of highly respectable citizens on a subject really interesting to the nation. Had they not a right to address this house? Had they approached it with an address upon a light and frivolous subject? A subject improper to occupy the attention of the legislative body? No. It was a subject which claimed the attention not only of that house, but of the whole union. A subject which must undergo the action of the Legislature, at some period not far distant. And how was it proposed to treat these citizens? If he had not misunderstood the gentleman from Georgia, that gentleman had proposed that these citizens, together with the subject on which they petitioned, should be contemptuously thrown under the table, and that on the ground that it was a subject not fit at this time to occupy the attention of the representatives of the United States. What were the reasons advanced in support of this position? Why that the subject of the petition partook of a party character, or that the presentation of the petition was connected with certain other political movements in the country? This might be a good reason with the gentleman from Georgia, as he very possibly was in the secrets of the party that had met at Baltimore, but as for himself he was not. He stood on that floor as a representative of the people—prepared to act on the subjects which in that capacity might be brought before him. He was governed by no such considerations—he knew of no connexion of the memorial with any party or other proceedings at Baltimore. All he knew was that the petitioners resided in the state of Pennsylvania; that they had a right to present the memorial, and had acted properly in doing so, and a mere allegation that the paper was connected with political movements at Baltimore, formed no reason why he should not exercise the responsibility which had been committed to him. It had been said that the bank question always would be connected with the politics of the country. If that was true, it was an objection that would apply equally at all times. But such was not his view of the subject. He hoped that the great experiment of a representative government had not so completely failed that a legislative assembly could not pronounce upon a great subject connected with the interests of the country, without being governed by predilections for men and by feelings of mere party politics. The moment he should be compelled to believe that, he should conclude that the great republican experiment had failed; for it was the same to him whether a despot on the throne domineered over the country, or some demagogue who issued his proclamations, from a committee room, or elsewhere, controlled public opinion, and ruled the country. If great questions of national policy were to be settled on the paltry politics of the day, or by a mere preference for individuals, the people ought to know it. It was because he believed that that house was capable of deciding such a question as this of the bank on purely national principles that he believed that the present memorial ought to receive the action of that house. He should not enter upon any considerations which touched the merits of the question: he would only say, in general, that the paper before the house was a respectful petition on a subject every way fit for the action of the house, and ought to receive its action. Were gentlemen to be deterred from the consideration of the memorial by such reasons as had been offered by the gentleman from Georgia? He hoped that every man who felt in his own bosom higher and nobler principles of action than that gentlemen had alluded to, would not be deterred from the discharge of his duty; that the man who stood there as a representative of the people, and felt that he was worthy so to stand, would act in such a manner as to show that he was above the reach of such motives. Let him suppose that this house was to be wrested from the course of duty and patriotism and perverted and debased into a mere party machine, what, he asked, would be the most direct mode of accomplishing such an end? He knew of none more directly calculated to effect it than that which had been now pursued by the gentleman from Georgia. If any gentleman on that floor chose to become the trumpet to blow the rally of party, he might perhaps succeed in carrying a portion of the house with him; yet he must still believe that house capable, in spite of all such efforts, of deciding national questions on national principles. He had no idea that the gentleman from Georgia intended to rally a party; but whatever were the gentleman's intentions, such alone would be the effect of his remarks; nor could he have devised a sifter mode to effect such an object. He had no doubt the gentleman really felt all the boding fears he had expressed, but he could not but consider them as entirely premature. As to the committee to which the memorial might be sent, it was to him a matter of no very great consequence. The only difference between sending it to a select committee, and sending it to the committee of ways and means, is this: that in the committee of ways and means, he had the utmost confidence, but he might not feel quite as much in a select committee. He saw no reason why the subject should not take the same course which it had hitherto done. The committee of ways and means was raised expressly to consider questions connected with the revenue; and he asked whether this subject did not naturally connect itself with the duties of such a committee? None could doubt it. From the days of Alexander Hamilton until that day, they had been closely connected—so closely that, to use the eloquent expression of the gentleman from South Carolina, the one might be called the body and the other the soul. Why should not the memorial go to the committee of ways and means? It belonged to that committee by the rules of the house, and it had always been referred to them as a preparatory step. Why should it not be now? He could see no valid reason. It had, to be sure, been objected that that committee had already expressed an opinion on the general subject. Very true; and that was the very reason why he wished to send it there. It was parliamentary to refer subjects to committees whose views were favorable; and should not a great question, on which the wisest statesmen of the country had bestowed their thoughts, and expressed their opinions, go to a committee whose views were in its favor, when matters of the most trivial moment were subject to that rule? The object in that very proper parliamentary rule was that a measure proposed might be presented in the most favorable manner—that it might, so to speak, have a fair chance; and, in the language of the books on parliamentary law, that it might not be committed to a nurse who would be sure to strangle it. He did not wish to see this memorial strangled. He wished it to go to a committee where it would receive the consideration which it merited, in order that it might afterwards receive the judgment of the house, unprejudiced and fairly expressed.

Mr. Appleton said that the subject-matter of the petition was one of the deepest interest to the community. It was most intimately connected with the commercial interest, but not exclusively so. Every class and every section of the country were interested in the question whether the charter of the bank of the United States should be renewed. He thought that the importance of the interests involved made it proper that the petition should be referred to a select committee, who would give to the subject their undivided attention. The appropriate duties of the committee of ways and means had reference to the finances of the country, which were certainly connected to a certain degree with this institution—but, in his opinion, its bearing on the general prosperity was a matter of greater and paramount interest. Its relation to a sound currency involved, perhaps, the most important question in our whole internal policy. He supposed there was no doubt that, whether referred to the committee of ways and means or to a select committee, according to the principles usually adopted in the appointment of committees, a report would be made in favor of renewing the charter. But it was of the utmost importance that a careful and thorough examination should be had, whether some modifications of the existing charter should not be made on its renewal; and what should be the terms and conditions. He believed it to be susceptible of improvement, and hoped a committee would be appointed who would examine the subject thoroughly, uninfluenced, if possible, by party considerations, which certainly ought not to be connected with this subject.

Mr. Archer, of Virginia, said he did not rise to extend, but to make an effort to repress the discussion. If he had doubted the propriety of avoiding discussion, the portion we had just heard, would be sufficiently instructive on that point. It had shewn, that in the event of its protraction, we should have prematurely, not only the controversy on the main subject, but the party altercation supposed to be mixed up with it, which, if displayed here, could bring no credit to the house. His (Mr. A.'s) object in rising was principally to make a suggestion to his friend from Georgia (Mr. Wayne) in relation to his own suggestion, that he might be induced to make a motion to lay the memorial on the table. He (Mr. A.) should regret to see this course pursued. Like the gentleman from Georgia, he was the determined adversary of re-incorporation, in every form in which the proposition for the purpose could be presented. He could not consent, nevertheless, to meet the memorial by a motion to lay on the table, as that would not be the mode of encounter to which he was disposed, and which was alone correspondent with the character of his friend from Georgia; that is to say, a direct mode. If such a motion were made, adversary as he (Mr. A.) was, to the object of the memorial, he should vote against the motion. As regarded the disposal of the memorial, it appeared clear to him, that a select committee would be the proper one. This had been the disposal adopted with all former memorials. Why vary the mode now? The subject was of a magnitude to entitle it to a special committee. As regarded the committee of ways and means, with its important functions, were not its hands to be regarded as too full, for the great attention which this matter must demand? It was to be remarked, too, that this committee, at a former session, with little variety in its composition, had, in the most formal manner, expressed its opinion on the great question involved. We ought not, as had been said, to put the memorial to a nurse which would strangle it. Neither would it be proper to send it to an inquest in which its late had been prejudged. Let it go to either the committee of ways and means, or a select committee; the chairman of that committee would stand as he ought, in the same relation to it. If the last disposal were adopted, too, the majority of the committee would consist under the usage in that respect, of friends of the measure. The recommendation of this mode was, that it would present the nearest approach to equality in the contest, of which the case admitted.

Mr. Mercer, of Virginia, said, it had been considered by all who had spoken that it was necessary a majority of the committee should be in favor of the measure referred to it. All that was contended for was, a minority adverse to it. He thought the object as likely to be gained in the committee of ways and means, as by the appointment of a select committee. The fact that, two or three sessions ago, a report favorable to the measure had been made by that committee, he looked upon as no argument against referring the subject to it now. He wished it to go to the committee of ways and means; and he had looked pretty deeply into the subject. He thought it should go to that committee, because the terms on which the charter should be renewed, if it were renewed, should accord with those matters and measures of revenue which that committee had under consideration. Whatever might be his opinion, generally, as to the present administration, he could safely say, he had as little to do with party politics as any member in that house; but when he saw an opinion upon this question prematurely obtained upon them, as it had been by the chief magistrate, he must condemn him, as he had done his predecessor, when he in silence declared his opposition to measures of internal improvement. The chief magistrate never ought to make public his opinion as unfavorable to a subject, till brought before him as a matter of legislation. He regarded the bank as a public institution, and not in reference to its stockholders. The subject of a national bank had been three decades of men of ability—in time of peril, and in time of peace; after which it could hardly be said that the house now required additional illumination on the subject from the researches of a select committee. He hoped therefore that the memorial would be referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Davis, of S. C. moved to refer it to a committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Ingersoll urged the propriety of referring it to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Carson hoped his friend from Georgia, Mr. Wayne, would not move to lay the memorial on the table; he was for meeting the question, and preferred a select committee. He deprecated mingling party feelings in the question.

Mr. Wilde was favorable to its reference to the committee of ways and means; he thought the question of vital importance to the country, and a decision on the application required by the general interests. He believed the charter of the bank of England would expire before that of the bank of the United States; and he conjured the house to reflect on the effect which its expiration might have upon the capital and currency of this country.

Mr. Mitchell considered the application for a renewal of the charter premature; that there was another and more important question, the tariff, to come before the house.

Mr. Root preferred a reference to the committee of ways and means—in his opinion the committee which managed the fiscal affairs of the nation was the proper one to take charge of the memorial.

Mr. Dearborn thought the presentation of the memorial not at all premature—the president had, for the last three successive years brought the question to the attention of the house—and if blame was to be attached any where for the agitation of the question, it was to the president, not to the bank.

Mr. Johnson, of Va. and Mr. Howard, of Maryland preferred referring the memorial to a select committee.

Mr. Jenifer said the committee of ways and means was the appropriate one to take charge of it.

Mr. Wayne again alluded to the interference of the convention at Baltimore, acknowledged he was actuated by party spirit. He insisted that there was no gentleman who would tell them that a circumstance which had occurred within these five weeks, had not had an influence in bringing this measure before them at the present time. He avowed that the bank had brought the subject before the house now, with a view of bringing odium on those who should oppose it.

Mr. Sutherland thought the memorial before them should be referred to the committee of ways and means. He wished it to be confided to friends, to united, not divided councils. Parliamentary usage required its reference to a committee which was favorable to it. He asked if the gentleman from Georgia meant to say that the president and directors of the bank had been influenced by a political party, in bringing this measure forward?

Mr. Wayne said, he must first understand if the assurances to which the honorable gentleman had alluded authorised him to ask that question.

Mr. Sutherland said, he would put the question then in another form, and ask him as a gentleman, his meaning in what he had said.

Mr. Wayne said, that he could easily answer this, but it was not his purpose to let the ingenuity of the honorable gentleman bring him into collision with persons for whom he had a high esteem.

Mr. Sutherland said, he was satisfied; the gentleman had given a reason why he did not answer the question.

Mr. Ellenworth denied that the presentation of the memorial was either political or premature.

Mr. Davis withdrew his motion to refer the memorial to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. Hoffman advocated a reference to a select committee.

Mr. L. Condict said, that with a view to prevent the introduction of more speeches, he should move the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded by a vote of ayes 95—noes 84.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. Foster asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered. The main question was on referring the memorial to the committee of ways and means. Upon this the vote were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton, Allan, Allison, Armstrong, Arnold, Ashley, Babcock, Banks, Noyes Barber, John S. Barbour, Barringer, Barstow, Isaac C. Bates, Bell, Briggs, Bucher, Burd, Burgess, Cahoon, Choate, Collier, Lewis Condict, Silas Condict, Cleverhous Cooke, Bates Cooke, Cooper, Corwin, Coulter, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Craghton, John Davis, Dearborn, Deans, Dickson, Dodridge, Drayton, Duncan, Edw. Everett, George Evans, J. Evans, Edw. Everett, Horace Everett, Gilmore, Grinnell, Hunter, Hughes, Hunt, Huntington, Ingersoll, Irvin, Isaacks, Jemier, Rd. M. Johnson, Kendall, Kemmon, Henry King, Leitch, Lyon, Marshall, Maxwell, Robert McCoy, McDuffie, McKenman, Mercer, Milligan, Mulhengen, Newton, Farrer, Pendleton, Pitcher, Potts, Remondph, John Root, Root, Russell, Wm. B. Shepard, Southard, Speight, Stanbery, Stewart, Sutherland, Taylor, Philmont Thomas, Tompkins, Tracy, Vance, Verplank, Vinton, Washington, Watson, Wickham, Wilkin, Elihu Whittlesey, Frederick Whitely, White, Wickham, Wilde, Young—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Adair, Alexander, Anderson, Angel, Appleton, Archer, Barnwell, James Bates, Beardsley, Bergen, James Blair, John Blair, Boon, Boone, Boutin, John Brodhead, John C. Reed, Renscher, Romer, Aug. H. Shepherd, Soule, Standifer, Stephens, Francis Thomas, Wiley Thompson, John Thompson, Ward, Wardwell, Wayne, Weeks, Whier—50.

So the memorial was referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Ilrie requested to be excused from voting on account of being interested in the result of the question. The house agreed to the request.

Adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 11. Mr. Fance, from the committee on military affairs, reported the following joint resolution, which lies one day on the table.

Resolved, That from and after the 1st day of May next, the joint resolution approved 29th April, 1816, authorizing the president of the United States to employ a skilled assistant in the corps of engineers, be and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. Cambreleng reported a bill to extend the provisions of the act, entitled an act regulating commercial intercourse with the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe, and to refund the tonnage duty on the French ship Victoire—twice read, &c.

Mr. Binger reported the following resolution which was adopted.

Resolved, That the committee on invalid pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, that all invalid persons shall commence at the time of the disability received, or at the time of discharge from the service.

On motion of Mr. Hergen, the committee on naval affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a dry dock for the use of the United States navy, at the navy yard at Brooklyn, New York.

On motion of Mr. Ward, the committee on revolutionary pensions were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill allowing all persons to be placed on the pension list, under the acts of 1818 and 1820 whose property does not exceed a thousand dollars, or such other sum as the committee may deem expedient.

Mr. Branch reported a bill re-organising the navy of the U. States—twice read and committed to a committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Mr. Cooke, of New York, submitted a resolution to inquire into the expediency of making further provision for extending, and the more effectually carrying into effect, the provisions of the act of congress, entitled an act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured or destroyed by the enemy while in the service of the United States, during the last war. The committee of claims were charged with the inquiry.

The bill granting compensation to N. Towson, paymaster general of the army of the United States, was read a third time, and passed.

Several bills for the adjustment of private claims were read a third time and passed. Also a bill to amend the several acts establishing a territorial government—a bill granting pre-emption rights to certain settlers on the public lands—and also a bill authorising the state of Illinois to sell 20,000 acres of saline lands within that state. The house then adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 12. Mr. Archer, from the committee on foreign affairs, which was instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the number of our ministers resident abroad above the grade of charge des affaires, to three, viz: to England, France and Russia, made a report, which was read and laid on the table.

Several reports on private claims were made, read, and disposed of.

Mr. Millegan moved a resolution to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the clerk of the circuit and district court of the United States for the district of Delaware, and the marshal thereof, additional compensation.

Mr. Jenifer moved the following resolution, viz: Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the purpose of removing from the United States and her territories, the free people of color, and colonizing them on the coast of Africa, or elsewhere.

In supporting the resolution, Mr. Jenifer observed that the state of Maryland was deeply interested in the subject of the resolution, inasmuch as she possessed a greater actual amount of the population referred to than any other state in the union. Virginia, he believed, stood next, in this respect, and Delaware, in proportion to her whole population, had possibly still more than either. Maryland had severely the evils resulting from the presence of a population of this description, and if there existed within the power of the government a con-attitudinal remedy, she believed it ought to be applied for her relief. If there was any subject in which that state might be said to feel a more lively interest than in almost any other, it was this. It was expedient, and very desirable, that if any legislation took place on this subject, it should be laid at as early a period as possible. The legislatures of several of the states were now in session, and some of them would be looking to the general government for its co-operation. If, on deliberation, it should be concluded that there was no provision in the constitution, and no means in the hands of the government, then the states would have to look to their own resources; and they ought to know this as early as practicable. He had proposed a select committee on this subject, only because there was no standing committee to whom it seemed to belong.

Mr. Speight said that the subject embraced in the resolution was one of great importance, and he wished the gentleman would consent to defer the reference for a few days. It was one on which he had himself received many communications from his constituents, and he was desirous that some farther time might be allowed him before any action of the house was insisted upon. Mr. S. said he was in favor of the policy which dictated the resolution, and could he be satisfied that the general government possessed the power referred to, he should be very glad to see such a measure adopted. He would suggest to the gentleman from Maryland the expediency of postponing the measure until Monday next. He wished the gentleman distinctly to understand, that he was not against the resolution, but was in favor of the principle contained in it.

Mr. Jenifer said, that he should have no objection to the proposed postponement, did the resolution contain any principle at all, but it contained none. It was a mere proposal for enquiry, and as some of the legislatures of the states were now in session, he was very desirous that the house should go into the consideration of the subject in time to act upon it before those legislatures should rise.

Mr. Archer said, that the objection of the gentleman from North Carolina involved the question whether the house could constitutionally inquire at all into such a subject. If the gentleman from Maryland should refuse to acquiesce in the proposed postponement, Mr. A. though reluctant to do so, should be compelled by duty to move to lay the resolution on the table, in which case, the gentleman would find it a more difficult thing to get his resolution up again for consideration than if it had been postponed.

Mr. Jenifer thereupon agreed to the postponement of his resolution until Monday next.

On motion of Mr. Thomas, of Mil. it was Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what further allowance ought to be made to the state of Maryland, on account of the expenditures of said state for the public defence during the late war.

The house then, by a vote of 113 to 70 agreed to consider Mr. Bouhlin's resolutions relative to all valorem duties. Mr. Stewart moved to refer the resolutions to the committee on manufactures, instead of that of commerce, whereupon a debate ensued, but before the question was taken, Mr. Polk moved that the house proceed to the consideration of the apportionment bill, which motion prevailed. The committee after spending some time in the consideration of the bill, and after considerable debate thereon, rose, &c.

The bill relative to the erection of barracks at New Orleans was twice read and referred.

The speaker laid before the house sundry communications from the several departments, which were severally read—and then the house adjourned.

THE "FREE TRADE" MEMORIAL.

The "Richmond Enquirer" of the 30th ult. contained the article which follows. It is probable that the editor was advised of the points that "it is probable" will be made. The concluding paragraph of Mr. Ritchie's own remarks will strike mine as being peculiar. YOUNG "now expects every man to do his duty." Well—we hope that every man may—thats all.

Free trade memorial to congress. We understand that the committee appointed by the convention of Philadelphia, are prompted by the report of the secretary of the treasury, to prepare and transmit their memorial as soon as possible. Mr. Gallatin has summoned the committee to meet at New York on the 4th January. The memorial will therefore, probably be laid before congress by the middle of the month. It is impossible at this time to state specifically the contents of the paper—but it is probable that the committee will ask,—

1st. "That after the payment of the debt, the revenue be bona fide reduced to the sum actually wanted to defray the expenses of government, according to their present scale, and without providing a surplus income for other objects not yet authorised by law. 2dly. That, allowing a reasonable time for the gradual reduction of the present exaggerated duties on some articles, all the duties shall be ultimately equalized; so that the duty on no article shall, as compared with the value of that article, vary materially from the general average, or in other words, from the ratio of the whole amount of duties on importation, to the aggregate value of the imported articles subject to the payment of duties. 3dly. That, as a consequence of this principle, wines, teas, coffee, and other similar articles, shall not be added to the list of articles imported duty-free, but shall, on the contrary, be subject to duties nearly equal, in proportion to their respective value, to those laid on other articles."

It has been ascertained, "that the true value of the average annual amount of the imports paying duties, deducting exports, and making several necessary corrections in the official returns, is for the years 1824 to 1829, $58,300,000; and the average annual gross revenue on merchandise, deducting the debentures and drawbacks, amounts, for the same years, to $23,124,000. Deducting from this last sum, the appropriation of $10,000,000 for the public debt, leaves $13,124,000 for the revenue wanted after the extinguishment of the public debt; or a sum equal to an average duty of 22½ per cent. on the abovementioned value of the imports paying duty, actually consumed in the U. States. If the articles now duty-free were added to the list of those now liable to duty, the average duty would be reduced to 21½. It would be raised to 25½, if wines, teas, coffee, cocoa, fruits and spices, were made duty-free. Allowing largely for errors of calculation or mistaken views of the subject, it may be asserted with confidence, that under any modification of the tariff which may take place, the average duty will be from 20 to 25."

It is said that "the propriety of adopting, as a fundamental principle, the reduction of duties on all the imports to an equal rate according to the respective value of the several articles, independent of its great simplicity, is recommended by the following considerations:

"It will be a rallying point for all our friends, requiring no departure from principle on the part of those who believe the present tariff unconstitutional, and according with the views of those who object to it as unequal and oppressive.

"It is, after all, and considering the difference of habits and localities, the plan most equal on all consumers, and one of which no one can complain.

"It affords the most equal protection to every branch of industry, sufficient to encourage those for which the country is nearly ripe, and gradually every other in proportion to the increase of our capital and population.

"It embraces at once all the mechanics, and every manufacture or other domestic produce, in favor of which, no extravagant duty has been laid, leaving for our opponents those only who are interested in the iron, wool and woollen goods, hemp, cotton goods, below the minimum, and sugar.

"In short, it reduces the question to that of equal and not less efficient, though accidental protection to every branch of industry, in opposition to the present system of selecting for that purpose some favorite families in the vast system and money of all those which it is not necessary to embrace in order to obtain an actual majority."

We respectfully think, that more than $10,000,000 may be struck off from the amount of the public revenues—judging at least from the late expose of the secretary of the treasury—and of course, that the prospective rate of reduction of duties may be brought down lower than an average duty of 22 1-2 per cent.

It is said, that the constitutional question, as such, will not be presented in full—but that such a view will be taken of the tariff, as will show its iniquitous and oppressive effects upon the minority, and therefore its deplorable departure from the equal spirit of our political institutions.

Mr. Gallatin will be unable to attend the presentation of the memorial, on account of the serious indisposition he has lately experienced. Judge Harper, from South Carolina will attend—probably Mr. Dew of Virginia—or, if his engagements forbid, then some other citizen of the state will attend in his place. We hope that some of the northern members of the committee will also appear in behalf of the rights of free trade.

The devoted friends of the true principles of the government entertain the hope, that on this question and at this moment Virginia will be true to herself. A correspondent reminds us that she is the frontier state in the anti-slavery system—that she has yet made no important movement—that she has done nothing to disgust the one party or to lose the confidence of the other—that she has manfully and uniformly supported her principles in a calm but firm, in a constitutional but unshrinking manner—that now is the time for her to come forward with all the moral force of her character, and to appeal once more to the congress of the U. States for justice—for an equal participation of the burthens and the blessings of the constitution—to preserve the concord, and perhaps the union of the states, by a wise, just, and magnificent modification. Virginia "now expects every man to do his duty."

MR. GIRARD'S WILL.

We shall take the first suitable opportunity to publish entire the long and important will of the late Stephen Girard—for it will often be needed for reference. Its details are very minute and extensive. As to the college which he has ordered to be built, and endowed with a probable fund of much more than the two millions of dollars directly applied—all the chief parts of its structure are established—the sizes of the rooms laid down, and the thickness of the walls prescribed, &c. The following is that part of his will which has excited most attention, and is inserted to gratify the curiosity of such of our readers as may not before have seen it:

"In relation to the organization of the college and its appendages, I leave, necessarily, many details to the mayor, aldermen and citizens of Philadelphia, and their successors; and I do so, with the more confidence, as from the nature of my bequests and the benefit to result from them, I trust that my fellow citizens of Philadelphia, will observe and evince especial care and anxiety in selecting members for their city councils and other agents.

"There are, however, some restrictions, which I consider it my duty to prescribe, and to be, amongst others, conditions on which my bequest for said college is made and to be enjoyed, namely: First, I enjoin and require, that, if at the close of any year, the income of the fund devoted to the purposes of the said college shall be more than sufficient for the maintenance of the institution during that year, then the balance of the said income, after defraying such maintenance, shall be forthwith invested in good securities, thereafter to be and remain a part of the capital; but, in no event, shall any part of the said capital be sold, disposed of, or pledged, to meet the current expenses of the said institution, to which I devote the interest, income, and dividends thereof, exclusively: Secondly, I enjoin and require that no ecclesiastical, missionary, or minister of any sect whatsoever, shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatever in the said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purposes of the said college:—In making this restriction, I do not mean to cast any reflection upon any sect or person whatsoever; but, as there is such a multitude of sects, and such a diversity of opinion amongst them, I desire to keep the tender minds of the orphans, who are to derive advantage from this bequest, free from the excitement which clashing doctrines and sectarian controversies are so apt to produce; my desire is, that all the instructors and teachers in the college shall take pains to instill into the minds of the scholars, the purest principles of morality, so that, on their entrance into active life, they may, from inclination and habit, evince benevolence towards their fellow creatures and a love of truth, sobriety and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer. If the income, arising from that part of the said sum of two millions of dollars, remaining after the construction and furnishing of the college and out-buildings, shall, owing to the increase of the number of orphans applying for admission, or other cause, be inadequate to the construction of new buildings, or the maintenance and education of as many orphans as may apply for admission, then such further sum as may be necessary for the construction of new buildings and the maintenance and education of such further number of orphans as can be maintained and instructed within such buildings as the said square of ground shall be adequate to, shall be taken from the fiscal residuary fund hereinafter expressly referred to for the purpose, comprehending the income of my real estate in the city and county of Philadelphia, and the dividends of my stock in the Schuylkill Navigation company—my design and desire being, that the benefits of said institution shall be extended to as great a number of orphans as the limits of the said square and buildings therein can accommodate."

THE COLORED POPULATION OF THE SOUTH.

The following articles, and especially that which is copied from the "Richmond Enquirer," though their subject is always important, have a special interest at the present time. The grand discovery, it seems, has been made, that the "difference—nothing short of frightful—between all that exists on one side of the Potomac, and all on the other, is owing to THAT CAUSE ALONE—the excess of the colored population; and the writer would laugh, if he could laugh at such a subject, at the ignorance and folly of the politician, who ascribes that to an act of the government (the tariff law), which is the inevitable effect of the eternal laws of nature."

I sincerely rejoice that the people of the south have begun to look at a subject, about which a feverish sensibility, and rather rude spirit of domination, has generally prevailed amongst them. If these would have checked the progress of what every one, individually, pronounced an evil, but which all, collectively, adhered to with the grasp of a drowning man, and refused to consider, (as silly persons decline making their wills, because they would not think of that which must happen), it might have been well—but the elements of depopulation, poverty and weakness marched onward. Herein are the causes why "the whites are moving westwardly"—why enterprising and industrious laboring freemen, (the salt of every land), abandon the places of their nativity, in old Virginia especially, "in greater numbers than we [Virginians] like to hear of." But how could it be expected that these would remain to be placed only a little higher than the grade of the colored population—dishonored in peaceful times, yet compelled to fight the battles, or guard the property and persons of those who dishonored them,—when the slaves might "cry havoc," and let loose the foul demons which shewed themselves at Southampton? The power to resist the evil has, (as it ever will), diminished in just proportion to the increase of the evil itself; such "are the eternal laws of nature"—and they are just. The fury of party, and that foolish pride which rejects experience, and continually gathers to itself fresh absurdities to feed upon—with a spirit of boasting, and blindness to decay—would rather attribute the down-hill course of old Virginia to the opening of a road in Arkansas, or the protection of a button factory in Connecticut, than to the real cause which has converted tens of thousands of acres of once productive lands into covets for such wild animals as possessed them, when Powhatan held savage dominion.

over the regions now blackened with slaves. And men have not been wanting in Virginia—men high in authority and possessed of powerful influences, that would rather argue and settle the difference "betwixt the north and north-east side of a hair," than digest the plan and execute a public work, such as the Erie canal or Baltimore and Ohio rail road. And these will talk; but they cannot reason white working men, gilded with desires to attain independence, to remain in a state of degradation, nor will the severest "chopping of logic," repair the damages inevitably sustained from the migration of these. Quibblers about words, and sawyers of doctrinal points, must give way to practical minds and doers of things—men fresh from the people, not afraid of labor. If as much money had been expended to improve Virginia by roads, bridges and canals, as has been spent in wages paid to members of the legislature for talking about them, works equal to a junction of the eastern waters of Virginia with her waters of the west, might have been accomplished. I think that even Mr. Ritchie will agree with me in this!

I have always opposed that mistaken humanity, or wild enthusiasm, with which some individuals have been affected in regard to the slave population, though as devoutly hating slavery as any one of them. But on the other hand, slave-holders have treated even rightful and proper suggestions on the subject, with a most exceptionable rudeness. It is a matter in which, add on several accounts, the people of all the states in the union have an interest; and the rudeness just spoken of has influenced some to say, "we shall laugh at your calamity and mock when your tear cometh." But this disposition is entertained only by a few—nine-tenths of the citizens of the non-slave-holding states are willing to assist—to follow the leadings of those of the slave-holding states, in any reasonable plan that may be adopted to relieve the pressure of the colored population; they are willing to put their hands into the common purse of the nation, and will be really glad to find that Virginia shall again think that the general government has some constitutional power in relation to the subject. Nine-tenths of all the bad dispositions that prevail between inhabitants of different districts of the United States, have their origin—and nine-tenths of all the party stifes and bitterness that exist, because of the resolution of the free white laboring people to protect their own industry, and of the efforts of the slave-holders to reduce that industry to the grade of that of their slaves. THIS IS THE TRUTH. And but for the matters just stated, the idea that protecting laws—such as are established by every civilized nation under heaven, are non-constitutional or inexpedient, would no more be entertained—than any one suppose it immoral to kill a viper, that had coiled himself up and flattered his head, to destroy; and the thing which is called "free trade" would be entertained only by British agents and others deeply interested in British commerce, located in our principal cities—and these would soon retire by the force of public opinion, if not compelled to cease their operations by public justice.

From the Richmond Enquirer.

The two great subjects before the committees are those which relate to the colored population of the state, and to its internal improvements. Upon neither of these is the committee yet prepared to report.

It is probable, from what we hear, that the committee on the colored population will report some plan for getting rid of the free people of color—But is this all that can be done? Are we forever to suffer the greatest evil, which can scourge our land, not only to remain, but to increase in its dimensions? "We may shut our eyes and avert our faces, if we please," (writes an eloquent South Carolinian, on his return from the north a few weeks ago)—"but there it is, the dark and growing evil, at our doors; and meet the question we must, at no distant day. God only knows what it is the part of wise men to do on that momentous and appalling subject. Of this I am very sure, that the difference—nothing short of frightful—between all that exists on one side of the Potomac, and all on the other, is owing to that cause alone. The disease is deep-seated—it is at the heart's core—it is consuming, and has all along been consuming our veins, and I could laugh, if I could laugh on such a subject, at the ignorance and folly of the politician, who ascribes that to an act of the government, which is the inevitable effect of the eternal laws of nature. What is to be done? Oh! my God—I don't know, but something must be done."

Yes—something must be done—and it is the part of no honest man to deny it—of no free press to affect to conceal it. When this dark population is growing upon us when every new census is but gathering its appalling numbers upon us; when within a period equal to that in which this federal constitution has been in existence, those numbers will increase to more than 2,000,000 within Virginia; when our sister states are closing their doors upon our blacks for sale, and when our whites are moving westwardly in greater numbers than we like to hear of—When this, the fairest land on all this continent, for soil and climate and situation combined, might become a sort of garden spot, if it were worked by the hands of white men alone, can we, ought we, to sit quietly down, fold our arms, and say to each other, "well, well; this thing will not come to the worst in our day. We will leave it to our children and our grand-children, and great-grand-children, to take care of themselves—and to brave the storm?" Is this to set like wise men? Heaven knows! we are no fanatics—We detect the madness which actuated the Amis des Noirs. But something ought to be done—Means sure, but gradual, systematic, but discreet, ought to be adopted, for reducing the mass of evil, which is pressing upon the south, and will still more press upon her, the longer it is put off. We ought not to shut our eyes, nor avert our faces. And though we speak almost without a hope, that the committee or that the legislature will do any thing, at the present session, to meet this question, yet we say now, in the utmost sincerity of our hearts, that our wisest men cannot give too much of their attention to this subject—nor can they give it too soon.

From the Richmond Whig.

The following project was submitted yesterday to the committee on free negroes, &c. for consideration, by Mr. Faulkner:

Resolved, That it is expedient, as early as possible, with their assent, to remove the free negroes and mulattoes, from this commonwealth.

Resolved, That the colony now established at Liberia, on the coast of Africa, presents the most desirable territory to which the said free negroes and mulattoes shall be transported.

Resolved, That this state will annually appropriate the sum of $100,000 towards defraying the costs of the transportation of said free negroes and mulattoes to the coast of Africa; which sum shall be raised by a tax upon land, slaves, and other property now declared taxable by law.

Resolved, That it is expedient to constitute a board, which shall have authority to draw for such sums as may be necessary for the purposes aforesaid; whose duty it shall be to select from among such as may present themselves as candidates for emigration, under the limitations hereafter mentioned, and to do all other acts and things properly appertaining to such board.

Resolved, That for the purposes herein contemplated, the state of Virginia shall be laid off in sections, corresponding with the divisions established by the constitution of the commonwealth—that is to say —, and it shall be made the duty of the said board to make a fair and equal annual appropriation of the fund before mentioned, for the relief of the several divisions of the state, according to the number of free negroes and mulattoes in each.

Resolved, As an inducement to emigrate, each emigrant shall be provided, at the public expense, with agricultural and planting implements, clothing, and other necessary articles, not exceeding in value — dollars.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD.

In consequence of the decision of the court of appeals, the following proceedings took place:

January 5th, 1852.

At a special meeting of the board of directors, held this day, the president stated that he had received intelligence from the counsel of the company, that the court of appeals had reversed the decision of the chancellor, in the case of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, against the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company by which the rail road company might be effectually excluded from the route that had been selected, and obliged to seek another site for the continuation of the road westward, beyond the Point of Rocks. Whereupon, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That, although the company should be excluded from the route, which had been selected for the construction of the rail road, on the north bank of the Potomac, in compliance with the condition annexed to the subscription of Maryland to the stock of the company, in 1827, yet the directors have an undiminished confidence in the practicability of constructing the road to the west, within the time originally contemplated, and with results not less beneficial to the state of Maryland, the union, and the city of Baltimore, than profitable to the stockholders; which confidence is founded upon the well-known character of the country, admitting of the construction of the road in Virginia, with all the advantages of close connection with the rich valley of that state,—upon the now confessed superiority of the rail road over all other known modes as a means of inter-communication, both with regard to time, economy and commercial advantages,—and upon the strong conviction which is rapidly gaining ground in the public mind, that this claim of superiority is placed beyond doubt by the experience of this country and of England.

Resolved, That the president be directed to take the most efficient measures to ascertain the best route to the Ohio river that may be still left open to this company; by causing examinations to be made by the chief engineer, with a view to this object, and that he report thereon at the earliest practicable date.

Resolved, That this board cannot too highly estimate the support that it has hitherto received from the stockholders, and holds itself pledged to omit no measures that may in any way conduce to the accomplishment of the great object in view,—an object, national in its every aspect; and which, when completed, must be of incalculable advantage to our country, and place Baltimore, in wealth and reputation, upon the vantage ground which her admirable situation entitles her to hold.

P. E. THOMAS, president
Baltimore and Ohio rail road co.

In reference to the decision of the court—judges Buchanan, Earl and Stephen concurring, and judges Dorsey and Archer dissenting, and judge Martin having requested that the case might be deferred, because that indisposition prevented him from attending—the editor of the "Baltimore Gazette," whose opinion on such matters is entitled to the highest respect, tells us that this decision, which reverses that of the chancellor, is not, in itself, final; and that the legislature of the state may order a re-hearing of the argument and trial before a full court—in which, should the judges be divided, the decree of the chancellor would stand confirmed. He says that the rail road company has not yet received "all the benefit of the constitutional tribunal to which they were and are entitled;" and that the proceeding suggested has been ordered by former legislatures, in many instances, &c.

We are not advised of the course that will be pursued—but in a matter so interesting to Baltimore, and important to multitudes of persons in Maryland and other states, even the far west,—we hope that the last legal appeal will be made, before the "right of way" is submitted to, under a claim that was practically "dead as a door nail" for very many years—and which, we cannot believe, will now render any public service, though calculated to produce much public injury.

FOREIGN MISCELLANIES.

The famous O. P. Q. correspondent of the London Morning Chronicle, has addressed one of his letters to King William IV—from which we extract the following paragraphs:

"Your majesty has mixed quite enough with the world, during the last thirty years, to know what the millions think of kings, and feel about kings; and how difficult it has been for kings, with all their power, and influence, and wealth, and courtiers, and creatures about them, to keep their heads above water, during the last quarter of a century; and I am much disposed to believe that your majesty, as an honest British sailor, has very often been as disgusted with the absolute or dissolute conduct of kings, as any of your majesty's present subjects, or as your majesty's most humble correspondent, O. P. Q.

"And perhaps your majesty is also aware, that the example of the United States of America has been very dangerous to absolute monarchs and absolute governments; for those Atlantic republicans have shown us that men can eat, and drink, and sleep, and have children and homes, and firesides, and Christmas roast beef, and newspapers and trade, and commerce, and agriculture, and a navy, and an army, and great moral and intellectual, as well as political weight in the world, and can be religious and moral, and literary, and encourage the arts and sciences, and have pleasures and amusements, and the joys and delicacies of rational, and intellectual, and civilized society—and yet have no national debt, no king!! If any courtier from Canada, or any traveller from the back settlements of America, shall whisper in your majesty's ear, that in the United States the people are not so happy as I represent them, and that one day or another the Americans will have a king, or many kings, and that the republic will become a monarchy, treat such a man as your enemy, as one who would insult and deceive you, and do by him as your late accomplished brother did by a person named Hrumwell, ring the bell and order his carriage."

Because of apprehensions from the near approach of the cholera, the king of England issued his command to the archbishop of Canterbury to prepare forms of prayer suitable to the occasion—and the archbishop, assisted by the bench of bishops, adopted the following prayers, to be read in all the cathedrals, collegiate, and parochial churches and chapels throughout the kingdom.

"Most Gracious Father and God! who has promised forgiveness of sins to all that with hearty repentance and true faith turn to thee, look down, we beseech thee, from heaven, thy dwelling place, upon us, thy unworthy servants, who, under an awful apprehension of thy judgments, and a deep conviction of our sinfulness, prostrate ourselves before thee: We acknowledge it to be of thy goodness alone, that, whilst thou hast visited other nations with pestilences, thou hast so long spared us: Have pity, O Lord, have pity on the people, both here and abroad; withdraw thy heavy hand from those who are suffering under thy judgments, and turn away from us that grievous calamity, against which our only security is thy compassion. We confess, with shame and contrition, that in the pride and hardness of our hearts we have shown ourselves unthankful for thy mercies, and have followed our own inclinations instead of thy holy laws: Yet, O Merciful Father, suffer not thy destroying angel to lift up his hand against us, but keep us, as thou hast heretofore done, in health and safety; and grant, that being warned by the sufferings of others to repent of our sins, we may be preserved from all evil by thy mighty protection, and enjoy the continuance of thy mercy and grace, through the merits of our only Mediator and advocate, Jesus Christ. Amen."

"O, Almighty God! who by the many instances of mortality which encompass us on every side, dost call upon us seriously to consider the shortness of our time here upon earth, and remind us that in the midst of life we are in death, so teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Give us grace to turn unto thee with timely repentance, and thus to obtain, through the merits of our Savior, that pardon to-day which to-morrow it may be too late to seek for; that so being strengthened by thy good Spirit against the terrors of death, and daily advancing in godliness, we may at all times be ready to give up our souls into thy hands, O Gracious Father, in the hope of a blessed immortality, through the mediation and for the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

[The people would much more heartily join in a form of prayer, that the hearts of the bishops might be softened towards the flocks that they should protect.]

We have mentioned that there was a great fright in England, because of some cases at Sunderland, thought to be the eastern cholera—but the alarm pretty soon subsided, and the people of that town maintained their usual health. More recent accounts, however, shew fresh alarms.

This fearful disease had nearly ceased at Cairo—but was terrifically while it lasted. It visited 2,962 towns in Hungary, in which there were 335,734 cases and 151,734 deaths. It had not been very general in Vienna—2,084 cases and 1,297 deaths were reported up to the 21st Oct. and 56 new cases on the 22nd. At Berlin, in a certain very thickly peopled part of the city, about 1 person in 18 was struck with the disease. At Hamburg only from 10 to 15 had died daily, and these were chiefly of the lowest class of the people, especially hard-drinkers—the fear of the disease had nearly subsided in this city. It was raging dreadfully at Haueca, in the East Indies, and it is said that—"At Mecca and the Hadjee country, 45,000 souls were carried off by the cholera, in about one month. The violent rains have produced great damage in Arabia. Half of Suez is washed away. The locusts covered the water for miles and miles so that it was literally the red sea."

The faculty of Germany have come to the unanimous conclusion that the disease is not contagious, after very close examinations of its progress—so also the whole body of the Polish physicians. They state that there were about a hundred physicians, French, English, and German, employed about the sick in Warsaw, not one of whom caught the cholera. Ten of them even inoculated themselves with the blood of cholera patients, without success. The porters, the nurses of the hospital, and the undertakers, were equally exempted from disease.

To this, is added the testimony of Mr. Scarle, who went to Warsaw and enquired in the hospitals there, during the epidemic—a gentleman who actually suffered in person from the cholera in India, and who wrote a treatise on the disease, before it visited this part of Europe. His words are these, dated in Warsaw:—"After all I have heard, either in India or Poland—after all I have read, seen, or thought upon the subject—I arrive at this conclusion,—that the disease is not contagious."

The following is a copy of a handbill published in England by sir Henry Hallford, president of the board of health, and extensively circulated—

Cholera morbus.—Advice to families for the prevention and cure of this dreadful malady, as extracted from the London Gazette, the 20th October, 1831.

"It is important to point out the instant measures which may safely and beneficially be employed where medical aid cannot immediately be procured. All means tending to restore the circulation and maintain the warmth of the body, should be had recourse to without delay. The patients should always immediately be put to bed wrapped up in hot blankets, and warmth should be sustained by other external applications, such as repeated frictions with flannels and camphorated spirits; poultices of mustard and linseed (equal parts) to the stomach particularly where pain and vomiting exists; similar poultices to the feet and legs, to restore their warmth. The returning heat of the body may be promoted by bags containing hot salt or bran applied to different parts of it. For the same purpose of restoring and sustaining the circulation, white wine with spice, hot brandy and water, sal volatile in a dose of a tea-spoonful in hot water, frequently repeated, or from five to twenty drops of some of the essential oils, as peppermint, cloves or eucalypt, in a wine glass of water, may be administered; with the same view, where the stomach will bear it, warm broth with spice may be employed. In very severe cases, or where medical aid is difficult to be obtained, from twenty to forty drops of laudanum may be given in any of the warm drinks previously recommended.

Signed,

HENRY HALFORD,
President of the board.

This treatment is within the means of every family; all that is required being that they should provide themselves with the following simple medicines.

Pint spirits of wine and camphor.

1 or 2 lbs. mustard and linseed powder.

2 oz. sal volatile.

1 oz. essential oil of peppermint, cloves or eucalypt.

All which may be procured for a few shillings.

It is seriously recommended, that every person should be prepared with the prescribed remedies, so that nobody shall have to attribute to his want of caution the spread of a malady so terrible and overwhelming.

It appears from a census lately taken, that the number of the inhabitants of Warsaw is now 115,943, not including the persons who arrive daily. The population has therefore been diminished in the course of this year by 25,000—namely, 15,000 males and 10,000 females. Among the present population are 23,214 Jews; in the third quarter of the city they are most numerous, and exceed the Christians. The number of females now exceeds the males by 7,423.

The Polish refugees who have been able to reach Paris have found an asylum, chiefly through the efforts of general Lafayette. They exhibit letters which reach them every post from the Prussian frontier, describing the cruel treatment of their unfortunate brethren by the Russian authorities. Those who, after the fall of Modlin, returned to seek their former homes and families, and who relied upon the amnesty of the Russian generalissimo, have been, according to these letters, treated with the utmost harshness when they sought the restoration of any portion of the spoliation perpetrated upon their property while in the occupation of the Russian soldiery. Indeed, generally, all who have not proscribed themselves before the conqueror, have been treated with disdain and contumely.

Address to the Poles by their countrymen in England and France.

Poles!—Confident in the enlightened spirit of the age, and in the sanctity of your cause, you rose to throw off the yoke of the oppressor. The world, in astonishment, has witnessed your achievements; but nations whom honor, duty, and even interest, commanded to assist you, have pusillanimously betrayed the common cause. Future ages will show how base was their conduct, how short sighted their policy. The contest is at an end: the sword of the Autocrat has triumphed. Europe, by her callous indifference to your misfortunes, participates in the unhallowed act. Poland is no more: erased from the list of nations, she is doomed anew to a long slavery.

Countrymen!—What can we expect from the conqueror? His rage and fury we have already defied, and if an unexpected effort of humanity should attempt to spare our sufferings, feelings of patriotism would be more deeply wounded than they have ever been by every cruelty and torture formerly devised to suppress them; for what, short of the independence of Poland, can satisfy men who have sworn to die for her freedom?

Poles!—You have hitherto done all that became a great and noble nation. You have spared no sacrifice to attain your great object; thousands of your brave brethren have already sealed with their blood their greatest compact with heaven to die for their country. But if the sword of the enemy has spared our lives, let us remember that we are bound to devote every hour that remains to us to emulate the heroes that have fallen, and whose honor and glory are our most sacred trust. No inducement of fortune, rank, or interest shall betray us into any act unworthy of our most solemn vows; these must be guarded as spotless as the name of Pole, which will henceforward be left to Europe as that of patriotism and devotion.

Poles! let us leave that wretched country, now no more our own, though soaked with the best blood of her defenders—let us leave Europe, a heartless spectator of our struggle and our despair. America is the only country worthy of affording an asylum to men who have sacrificed every thing for freedom; there Poland will be enshrined in our hearts, and heaven will perhaps bless our devotion.

Duke Constantine.—We have seen some attempt to retape the character of the late duke Constantine from the charge of barbarity towards the Poles. A recent work of authority, however, states that his temper was truly ferocious. He was known to have ordered a soldier 500 lashes for having the seams of his gloves sewn inside instead of outside. A lady and gentleman having passed him one day in their carriage without recognizing him, were forced to labor on the public works, trundling a barrow along with convicts and dzertera. An officer of lancers was commanded to perform some manoeuvres of great difficulty, which his horse's want of training prevented him from executing. Constantine cursed both man and beast. He called for muskets, and had a pile of them with bayonets fixed, set upon the ground, of the width of twelve feet, and then ordered the lancer to leap over them. He succeeded in accomplishing the frightful task, only to be compelled to do it a second and a third time, to the astonishment of all present.

One of the generals then interfered, representing the exhaustion of the officer and animal. Constantine, in a rage, again commanded the leap to be made.—The noble animal cleared the bayonets with the fracture of two of his legs; the lancer escaped unhurt. He advanced to the duke, and thanking him for the honor he had hitherto enjoyed as an officer in the emperor's army, tendered his resignation. He was ordered to the guard house, and was never seen again, doubtless assassinated, as others had been before, by order of the grand duke. This was the rule, this the government which the heroic Poles attempted to overthrow; and which they would have succeeded in overthrowing, if the treachery of their late commander had not rendered their valor unavailing. To such oppression they are again doomed, since, in the memorable language of the French minister, "ordonne" again regna "in Warsaw."

[Albany Daily Advertiser.]

There are in France 58,888 Catholic clergymen, of various grades.

There were before the restoration, 1,533 religious asylums for females—or maisons religieuses de femmes; and, from that epoch to 1820, $611 more were authorized—making a total of 2,144 capable of receiving legacies, donations, &c. Besides these more than 880 exist without any direct authority—making 3,024, containing 24,257 females. These have 5,500 pensioners or dependents, not forming a part of the communities.

Religious communities of men are not authorized, although many exist in different parts of France containing about 20,000—making the whole personnel de clerge Catholique in France, of 121,125.

[U. S. Gazette.]

Canton, May 13th, 1831.—The foreign society of Canton has been recently enlivened by the residence of a lady, who remained about a week, without interruption or annoyance of any kind; the authorities, who were well aware of the fact, remained satisfied with the assurance that she had only come upon a visit, and would remain but a few days.

It is with regret we announce that Woo-Yay, managing partner of Gow-quays, hong, expired on the 1st inst. in the prison to which he had been consigned, about five months before, on the pretext of traitorous intercourse with foreigners. When a man dies, either in prison, or in the house of an officer in whose charge he may have been placed, the custom of the Chinese forbids the corpse being taken out by the door, and a hole must for that purpose, be made in some part of the dwelling, unless a sufficient sum of money is paid, in which case, the body may be carried to the top of the house, and lowered down into the street. In the present instance, the exorbitant sum of seven thousand dollars was demanded for this honorable distinction; this the relatives declined paying, wisely maintaining that, since the body is dead, it can import but little in what direction it may be conveyed to the place of interment. It was in consequence, we are told, passed, after the ignominious fashion, through a hole made in the wall, highly mortifying, no doubt, to the disappointed expectations and cupidity of the merciless juror.

UNPROFITABLE EXERTIONS.

An Englishman named Osbaldestone, beited large sums of money that he would ride two hundred miles in ten successive hours—but without limitation as to the number of horses that he might use. The match took place late in November last, and, though the day was stormy and wet, he made new bets that he would perform the distance in less than nine hours—and accomplished it in eight hours and forty two minutes, without much seeming fatigue, and in high spirits, and it does not appear to have injured him at all. Mr. O. weighed 157 lbs. was 47 years old. He employed 29 horses, some of which he used several times. The distance performed on a horse was four miles, which, in some cases, he made in eight minutes—generally in about nine—the longest period was 10m. 15 sec. and allowing for the stoppages, it is estimated that he made on an average 25 miles an hour, when riding. He mounted and dismounted 100 times! He had trained himself for this undertaking—by traveling great distances daily at a rapid speed.

This exploit brings to the recollection of the London editors others of a like nature, as follows:

In Oct. 1741, at the Curragh meeting, in Ireland, Mr. Wilde rode 127 miles in six hours and 21 minutes, with 10 horses. The time stipulated was nine hours.

In 1745 Mr. C. Thornhill rode from Siltou to London and back again to Siltou, being 213 miles, in 11 hours and 34 minutes.

In 1762, Mr. Shaftoe rode 50 miles and a quarter in one hour and 49 minutes, with 10 horses, 5 of which were ridden twice.

In 1762, the same gentleman undertook to ride 100 miles a day for 29 days together, on any one horse each day, the number of horses not to exceed 29. He accomplished it on 14 horses, and on one day rode 160 miles, on account of the tripping of the first horse.

In 1758, Miss Pond rode 1,000 miles in 1,000 hours, at New Market.

In Dec. 1810, Mr. Milton, the horse dealer, who weighed 15 stone, rode from London to Stamford (starting from the corner of Dover-street) in four hours and 25 minutes, using 18 horses.

MR. BERRIEN.

A partial extract from a speech delivered by Mr. Berrien, at Milledgeville, had materially injured his character, in the opinion of a large portion of the American people—no matter of what political party they were—for it much reduced the high reputation which he had had for consistency and independence. Hence the following letter from him.

From the United States Telegraph.

Mr. Berrien—I will be seen, by a letter which we this day lay before our readers, that this gentleman repels, in a becoming spirit, the construction which has been given by the Globe, and the affiliated presses, to the speech which he delivered at Milledgeville. Knowing as we do that he considered the question between himself and General Jackson to involve the issue of truth or falsehood, we believe him to be incapable of the concession imputed to him. Upon this subject, the letter before us is explicit.

TO THE AMERICAN PUBLIC.

From the beginning of the present month, I have been confined to my room, and for the greater part of that time to my bed, by a bilious and inflammatory fever. I am still so, though my fever has intermitted. My physician had deemed it necessary to deny to me intercourse with my friends, and to keep from me visitors or might produce excitement. This system is at length relaxed, and letters from Washington, which were received to-day and yesterday, have announced to me the fact, that I have been, during my confinement, the object of a foul and biting calumny.

A certain degree of credence has been obtained for this calumny, by resorting to the despicable practice of giving extensive and early circulation to a mere extract from the speech delivered by me at Milledgeville—and by the suppression of that part of it, which would entirely have changed the character of the published extract. I have not the physical ability for a labored disputation, even if the occasion called for it; which I think it does not. I shall be brief; for my case is simply stated. I may have erred in my estimate of what is just, liberal and magnanimous in relation to a political adversary—but I am incapable of trucking to any man.

I pretended the illusion to the dissolution of the cabinet, by the declaration, certainly not complimentary to the president, that my retirement from the public service, was the result of a course dictated by my own sense of duty. In reference to this event, I used this language—"a just sense of self respect—of what is due to the cause of public morals—in your most sacred rights—to the sanctity of domestic life—and to those household affections, which constitute at once, the charm and safeguard of society, will forbid me to retract a step which I have taken—to alter a sentiment which I have avowed." I stood before that company by this declaration in the very act of renouncing every statement com-tained in my two addresses to the public—re-establishing their positions—re-affirming their sentiments—and renewing the declaration of my determination to yield nothing in relation to either. Now, let any man ask himself, what are the statements made, the sentiments expressed, the views exhibited by these addresses concerning the president of the United States. Let him remember that I had just reassured them in their whole extent; and then let him make one further reflection. If it had been my object to conciliate the president, what could have tempted me thus deliberately to throw in his face these offensive addresses which so far from propitiating, must necessarily have exasperated him.

Having thus announced to my assembled fellow-citizens, that the relations which the event of the summer had created between the president and myself, were to remain unchanged; having established, as I supposed, an insuperable barrier between us, I thought I had placed myself in a position to disclaim for myself, any private complaints, or personal resentments, and to announce my determination to give continued support to those measures of his administration, in which I had heretofore concurred. I thought I could do this without the possibility of being liable to the imputation of having been influenced by any unworthy motive. In this I was deceived. I was right, however, and I fearlessly appeal to the public to review its decision. I am free to confess that the conviction is deeply humiliating—that any portion of the American people, even though originally misled by the garbled publication of my address, should have fallen into such an error. I do not speak to the mere partisan; but to those who have been free to read the original, and I say, that I was bound to Millidgeville, not seeking but declining office, that I resisted the repeated urgencies of much respected friends on this subject while there, and have continued, and shall continue to do so, under a sense of my duty to myself, and with a proper regard to what I owe to the state. I had, therefore, no motive for this meanness. I will add that, since my return to Georgia, and especially at Millidgeville, my chief regret has been, that I have been freely expressed, and that I have neither yielded, nor been required to yield, any thing on this subject. My political associates, who were assembled at Millidgeville, will sustain this statement of facts when it shall meet their eye.

I think I have wrested from this clumsy its power to deceive. It ascribes to me the consummate folly of seeking to conciliate, by mingling with faint praise, reiteration and serious condemnation. It imputes to me this folly, and any more, for I was not an adherer in quest of office, but a private individual, declining the proffered confidence of my fellow citizens. It imputes this to me at a time when I was in the free and unstrained expression of my views and feelings towards the president, in relation to whom I repeatedly declared I had nothing to conceal, and nothing to yield. There is moreover something in the force of truth itself, which will sustain the relation I now about to make; that if there be a humiliation, from which more than any other, my judgment and my feelings would revolt, it would be my attempt, by any act of mine, to deprecate the resentment or conciliate the favor of the president of the United States to me as an individual. I will add, that I should equally despise myself if my standing with the people of Georgia, whatever it may be, had been preserved by any concealment of my views, or suppression of my feelings, in relation to that personage.

JOHN McPHERSON BERRIEN.

Savannah, December 24, 1851.

MR. McLEAN.

Extract from judge McLean's charge on the late Mr. Monroe. When the circumstances which caused the judge to retire from the charge of the post-office department are recollected—the force of this extract will fully appear.

"In the use of patronage, that most delicate and important branch of executive power, Mr. Monroe was governed by those enlarged and elevated views, required by the interests of his country.—The utmost deference, in making appointments, was paid to public sentiment; whilst at the same time, irrefragable character and high qualification were indispensable requisites. Personal motives, either as they regarded the president himself, or the person appointed, were lost in higher considerations of public duty.

"From the official relation which I bore to the president, towards the close of his administration, it became my duty to consult him in making certain appointments. But in no instance did he intimate a preference for any one of the candidates whose names I laid before him. His answer was, uniformly, 'The law has given you the right to make the appointment; I shall be satisfied with your decision; do what the public interest requires.'

"In one case, I had every reason to believe, if personal consideration had been permitted to influence him, there were strong grounds for his exercise. One of the applicants was a particular friend, with whom, in early life, he had been long associated in the public service; and for whom he entertained a strong personal regard. A direct appeal to personal friendship was made, and this was enforced by the necessities of the applicant. But even in this case, this more than Roman patriot gave not the slightest intimation of a preference; and another individual was appointed, because I believed him to be better qualified to discharge the duties of the office.

"The relation of this incident will be pardoned, on the ground that such cases often tend more to elucidate character than more important transactions. When those selfish feelings, to which we are all more or less liable, come directly in contact with public duty, and they are disregarded, no higher evidence can be given of elevated and patriotic principles. I deem it of some importance to record such instances, as they may not be without their use in other days of the republic."

SAXON SHEEP.

From the Poughkeepsie Telegraph.

The following communication, with the accompanying ear, was handed us by the gentleman to whom it is addressed.—Whether it sufficiently explains the difficulties which our farmers have experienced with the Saxon sheep, we feel ourselves incompetent to judge. It is, however, a matter of curious speculation on that subject, and cannot but be interesting to those who are engaged in that business. That the Saxon sheep are less hardy than the merino, or, from some cause, do not stand the severity of our winters as well, seems to be conceded by our most intelligent farmers. Whether the cause suggested below sufficiently accounts for it, we leave to them to decide.

New York, December 1, 1851.

My dear sir—In performance of my promise, I send you enclosed a copy of a late trial contained in the Reports of Ryan & Moody, vol. 1, page 136, which contains matter, at least curious, in relation to sheep; and I think fully sustains the opinion I expressed, that the apparent inferiority of the Saxony to the merino or other kinds of sheep, might be attributable to accidental causes, rather than to any inferiority of that particular species.

It should be remembered, that when the merino sheep were first introduced into this country, an opinion prevailed some time afterwards, that they were not as hardy and as well calculated to endure our winters as our former sheep. The same opinion I believe prevails, and is generally entertained in regard to the Saxon sheep. It is said the lambs are tender, and more difficult to rear; and especially during the first winter. It is not my purpose to admit any of these objections against the Saxon sheep, but to express a doubt, whether a better cause will not be found for any alleged weakness or inferiority of Saxon lambs, in the known usage in most cases of "breeding in and in, or from relations," as expressed in the annexed case.

The supposed superiority for fine wool of the imported Saxon sheep, and the great cost of purchase, has in most cases induced farmers to continue to rear their flocks from the same stock, without regard to the degree of relationship. This is said to produce constitutional infirmities and weakness, which are sometimes indicated by the eyes and head—the English farmers call it "the goggles." An easy remedy is at hand. Those who have no other flocks with which they can exchange, may exchange with their neighboring farmers, and thus obviate this cause of any alleged degeneracy in the offspring. I am, dear sir, yours, &c.

JAMES TALLMADGE.

Nathaniel P. Tallmudge, esq.

1. Ryan & Moody's Reports, 136—summer cases—8 Geo. IV.—Western circuit, Winchester.

Coram Abbott, lord chief justice, (August 3, 1824.)

Jollif vs. Beudell.—Assumpsit on a warranty of a certain sheep sold by the defendant to the plaintiff. The first count stated the sheep to be warranted sound. The second "free from goggles."

The sheep, one hundred in number, were sold on the 14th of August, 1823. At the time of the sale they were in appearance perfectly sound and thriving, and continued so until the middle of October following, when one or two of them exhibited symptoms of a disease called by farmers the "goggles." The sheep affected, showed signs of giddiness, swelling of the eyes and hanging of the head. From the time they were first seized, they grew weaker and weaker, and for the most part died in about a week or ten days, and on dissection, there were signs of water in the head or brain. On the whole, about fifty of the sheep had died under the same appearances, the rest continued apparently well up to the time of the trial. There was no contagion; other sheep with which they were fed and kept having continued healthy. Several farmers and others conversant with sheep were called for the plaintiff, who stated the goggles to be, in their opinion, an hereditary disease, arising from breeding "in and in, or from relations;" and that sheep so diseased would thrive, and seem to be in sound health generally until two or three years old. That there were no means of discovering by the appearance or otherwise that sheep were so affected. That it was generally fatal, and no cure or prevention known for it, and reputed amongst farmers an unsoundness.

The evidence for the defendant went to show, that the sheep were of a pedigree free from "breeding in and in," and that others of the same sort and older were perfectly sound. The warranty was proved without dispute, and the sheep were all of the issue bred.

For the defendant it was contended, that the sheep having been healthy and thriving at the time of, and for two months after the sale, must be considered as sound at that time; that inasmuch as there were previous symptoms to connect the disease of which they died with their former state of health, there was nothing to show that the disease existed at the time of the sale; and that an hereditary liability to a particular disorder was of too uncertain a nature to be capable of proof, and could not be legally considered as an unsoundness existing at the time stipulated for in the warranty.

Abbott, lord chief justice, left it to the jury to say "whether, at the time of the sale, the sheep had existing in their blood or constitution the disease of which they afterwards died; or whether it had arisen from any subsequent cause."

Verdict for the plaintiff 130*l.* the value of the sheep which had died, the defendant agreeing to take back the remainder.

DECREASE OF DUTIES.

From the New York Courier and Enquirer.

We publish the following rates, which go into operation from the 1st inst. together with a statement of the probable effect that the same will have upon the revenue of the past and present years:

Decrease of duties on tea, coffee and salt, from and after the 1st January, 1832.

Tea—From China, in vessels of the United States—
	Rate duty.	Present duty.
Bohea	per lb. 12 cts.	4 cts.
Souchong and other black	75	10
Campouy or Congou, (considered as Souchong),	25	10
Gumee, gunpowder or imperial	50	25
Hyson and young hyson	40	18
Hyson skin and other green	28	12

Tea—From any other place than China, or in vessels of or in any other than vessels of the United States—
Bohea	14	6
Souchong and other black	36	18
Campouy or Congou, (considered as Souchong),	34	18
Gumee, gunpowder or imperial	68	37
Hyson and young hyson	46	27
Hyson skin and other green	38	20
Coffee	per lb. 2	1
Salt—per bushel, weighing	86 lb. 15	10

Exhibit of the decrease of revenue growing out of the lesser duties on coffee, cocoa, salt, and molasses, for the year 1831, and also on tea, coffee and salt, for 1832—the calculation predicated upon the net quantity imported in the fiscal year, commencing 1st October, 1829, and ending 30th September 1830, as per the official document of the secretary of the treasury.

Coffee—Amount of net duties, deducting exports entitled to drawback in the above year, (1830),

Decrease of revenue arising on the lesser duties on tea, coffee and salt, for the year 1832—predicated also upon the imports and exports of the above fiscal year, (1830),

Tea—Amount of net duty the above fiscal year,

At the reduced duty

Decrease of duty

Coffee—Duties as above, at the rate of 2 cts.

Duties in 1832

Decrease of duty

Salt—Duties as above, at the rate of 15 cts.

Duties in 1832, at 10 cts.

Decrease of duty

Total decrease in 1831

Total decrease in 1832

Total decrease 1831 and 1832

The preceding statement is made up from the official documents of the fiscal year, commencing 1st October, 1829, and ending 30th September, 1830. As the reduction of duties on all the articles embraced, for 1831, with the exception of molasses, did not commence until 1st January, 1831, it may be argued that the duties of the 1st quarter of the year, commencing 1st October, 1830, and ending 30th September, 1831, should have been calculated at the rates of duty then existing. This has not been done; because an ample effort to that amount of additional duty, and even equivalent to all the additional revenue that will grow out of a possible, yet doubtful, excess of importations, of the articles embraced in this statement, will be the return duty on tea, coffee and cocoa, put into the custom house stores under the bond of the importer, for the purpose of bringing the same under the lesser rates of duty, and which it is well known, (particularly of coffee), amounts to an enormous quantity. Indeed, although it does not appear upon the face of the official document for 1831, yet the revenue of that year will suffer a diminution from the above cause, which applies more immediately to, and which will seriously affect the revenue of, the present year. As we expected to reduce the revenue of the past year, is the fact that the exports of foreign products have increased, even in a greater ratio than the increase of imports; this circumstance, coupled with the opinion existing with many experienced and reflecting merchants, that there was a redundancy of imports the past, which will call for a more limited operation the present year, and consequently defeat the very sanguine calculations that have been made as to the great increase of revenue.

FACTS FOR THE FIRE SIDE.

We commend the following article to the attentive perusal of all who believe that import duties operate as a tax upon the consumer.

From the New York Commercial.

We have been favored by Mr. Edwin Williams, with the following table, prepared for the next volume of his Annual Register. It is particularly interesting at this period.

Prices of coal, salt, coffee and molasses.

The following table exhibits the prices in the New York market on the 1st December in each year, except in 1810 and 1822, from which returns have not been obtained, since the last war, of Liverpool coal, Turks Island salt, West India coffee and molasses, (average price), with the duties payable on the same articles—

	Coal per chaldron.	Salt per bushel.	Coffee per lb.	Molasses per gallon.
Dec. 1.	price.	price.	price.	price.
1815	d.13	d.3	d.0	d.0
1816	14	1 30	60	21
1817	11	do	60	24
1818	11	do	60	24
1819	14	do	60	24
1820	—	do	60	29
1821	14	do	60	28
1822	—	do	60	23
1823	12 75	do	60	20
1824	15	2 16	60	17
1825	14	do	60	16
1826	10	do	60	15
1827	12	do	60	14 1-8
1828	13	do	58	13
1829	11	do	45	12 1-2
1830	8	do	55	12
1831	2	do	62 15	12 1-2

It will be seen, from this statement, that the prices of these important articles have not varied in proportion to the alteration of the tariff. In most cases, the effect produced has been in direct contradiction to the common theory that the prices are regulated by the duties payable on importation.

This coal in 1821, was 14 dollars, duty 1 dollar 80 cents—in 1820, 8 dollars, duty 2 dollars 10 cents. Salt, in 1829, was 45 cts. duty 20 cents in 1831, 62 cents, duty 15 cents. Coffee, in 1830, was 12 cents duty 9 cents—in 1831, 12 1-2 cents, duty 2 cents. Molasses, in 1829, was 25 cents, duty 10 cents—in 1831, 30 cents, duty 5 cents.

THE COAL TRADE.

Memorial to congress for a reduction of the duty on coal.

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States, in congress assembled.

The memorial of the undersigned, citizens of N. York, respectfully represents; That

A large portion of the population of this metropolis is composed of persons in indigent circumstances. The class of individuals referred to comprises very many industrious and meritorious citizens. They derive their support principally from the produce of their daily labor and their necessities can only be supplied simultaneously with the receipt of their earnings. One of the great items in the domestic expenses of every class of citizens, in a climate often and severely inclement, is fuel. The wealthy, and those who enjoy the advantages of credit, are enabled to provide this indispensable comfort at seasons, and under circumstances, propitious for consulting their pecuniary interests. The unfortunate and destitute poor—the hard-working laborer, with his shivering family group, and the indigent female, whose industry can but little more than furnish food for her helpless children, are almost the exclusive customers of the fuel mart in winter. Weekly, but more often daily, purchases of this necessary article at exorbitant prices, go far to exhaust the scanty means which sustaining labor has produced.

The existence of above evils has been brought home, more directly, to the knowledge of the inquiring part of this community, during the last and present winter. The price of every kind of fuel is at this time enormously high. The aggregate quantity in market, and accessible to purchasers, is it is believed to be inadequate to meet the demand. The poor are wholly unsupplied. Year-memorialists believe that the population of nearly all the sea-board cities are similarly situated, in these respects with that of their own.

Until a few years, the principal sources of fuel for this community were wood, brought by water communication from forests and reserved wood lands, in the interior, and bituminous coal, imported from England and Scotland, and more recently from Nova Scotia. Within the last six or eight years, various descriptions of an artificial coal, the produce of native mines, have been introduced into general use; to such an extent, indeed, as greatly to diminish the quantity of other fuel consumed, notwithstanding the increase of population.

Depending upon a sufficient supply of domestic coal, at the rates corresponding with the experience of previous seasons, and believing confidently that the sources were inexhaustible, no exertions have been made to provide a substitute. Coal from the Schuylkill mines is nominally sold at sixteen dollars the ton; but all orders are refused even at that price. This coal was recently sold during the early part of the last winter at eight dollars the ton, and at which rate it was understood to yield a large profit to the miners. All the other anthracite coals are held at prices believed to be equally high in proportion to their relative value. The high rate of duty on foreign coals has almost entirely excluded them from the chances of liberal competition. Liverpool coal, which has been usually sold at from nine to twelve dollars the chaldron, can now with difficulty be procured at sixteen to seventeen dollars.

In the present state of the fuel markets in this and the neighboring cities, much inconvenience is already experienced, and great and extreme distress anticipated. It is the belief of those competent to form opinions, undisturbedly, on this subject, that if the duty on foreign coals were repealed without delay, a supply sufficient for the present emergency would immediately be introduced from Nova Scotia; and that the importations of British coals would hereafter be proportioned to the wants of the inhabitants, without interfering with a successful development of native resources.

Your memorialists believe that it is not the policy of the government, at a period of unexampled national prosperity, to continue such restrictions on commerce as are essentially onerous to the people, and peculiarly oppressive to the poor.

The attention of your honorable bodies is most respectfully solicited to the subject of this memorial. If, in the opinion of congress such a measure would not prove injurious to other and more important public interests, your memorialists respectfully submit for consideration the policy of a total abolition of the duties on foreign bituminous coals or such a modification of that measure as may, in the opinion of congress, be deemed to be required by the exigencies of the case. And your memorialists, &c.

New York, December 3rd, 1831.

From the Pottsville, Pa. paper.

Statement of the quantity of foreign coal imported into and exported from the United States for each year, ending on the 31st of September, from the year 1820 to 1831 inclusive, both taken from the annual returns of the secretary of the treasury to congress; also the balance in bushels remaining for consumption reduced into tons of 28 bushels each—with the aggregate amount of Lehigh, Schuylkill and Lackawanna, (anthracite), coal mined and brought to market at tide water from the commencement of that business in the year 1820, taken from the statement compiled and presented to the friends of the friends of domestic industry, held in New York, in October last:

Years.	Bushels imported.	Bushels exported.	Bushels remaining for consumption.	Equal to tons of 28 bu. each	Anthracite tons of 28 bush. each	Total.

1830	1,640,993	12,480	1,628,513	58,136	174,925	233,061

For 1831, up to the 23d October, 140,948 tons of anthracite had been brought to tide water. In consequence of the stoppage of canal navigation by ice a month earlier than usual, it will probably not exceed 160,000 tons.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

Fuel.—I observe in your paper of Saturday last some observations on the subject of the present scarcity of fuel. Some communications on the same subject have also appeared in "the Enquirer," in which was suggested the propriety of taking off the present duty on coal. More importance has been given to this than from the fact of a resolution having been brought before the board of aldermen to take into consideration the propriety of applying to congress for a repeal of the duty. To those acquainted with the domestic coal trade the present scarcity is no difficult problem. It has not arisen from any new competition in the market, but from the fact of an over competition in an irregular market! In 1830, the three great sources, Schuylkill, Lehigh and Lackawanna poured a quantity into the market nearly double of that of 1829, while the increased consumption demanded an addition of not more than 50 per cent. The consequence of which was that nearly 80,000 tons remained over and unsold. The natural consequence of this was a glut of the market, and the early spring sale commenced in Philadelphia at 4 dollars and 50 cents per ton, but even this price could not be maintained, and contracts were offered for any quantity to be supplied at 4 dolls. But there were no purchasers even at this price, and it is a melancholy fact that the trade became so much depressed that at a forced sale of a few hundred tons of the best quality of Schuylkill in Philadelphia, it was standing at a man's price at the ruinous price of 3 dollars and 50 cents per ton. With these facts staring them in the face, what were the persons engaged in mining to do? It was madness to mine coal in Schuylkill county when no purchasers were near them for contracts. To send it to Philadelphia, cost in toll freight at the lowest calculation 3 dollars and 80 cents per ton, and when arrived, an additional daily expense accrued of wharfage, for there were found no purchasers. The natural consequence of this was the entire cessation of mining for nearly three of the best months adapted to getting down the coal. A sudden panic seemed to have taken the centre of the coal region and utter ruin stared the miner in the face. The population was scattered, and capital withdrawn as fast as possible, every one anticipating the most unfortunate results. If we could see a little into futurity, we would have discovered, that, instead of withdrawing capital and labor in the spring months, that time would have been the most fortunate one to have added at least 50 per cent. of both to it. Towards the last of the summer orders came in from most of the eastern cities for large quantities. These could not be executed in full, three months of the season had passed without any trade, and the utmost exertion could not bring down of the Schuylkill more than 80,000 tons, (10,000 less than in 1830) while the demand had in reality nearly doubled. The same quality of coal which then sold for 17 dollars per ton in New York, was offered in May last, on a contract, at Philadelphia, for any amount not exceeding 50,000 tons, at 4 dollars! Under all these circumstances, then, are we in want of a competition from England? Certainly not. Coal can be delivered, of the best quality, from Schuylkill county, at the wharves of Philadelphia, for a cost of 3 dollars. Some years may, however, elapse before the price will nearly reach that, but it will not take at least two years before the supply can overtake the demand, such is the increased rate of consumption, far surpassing the calculations of the most sanguine. It has been asked why examinations have not been made in our own state for this useful fuel? It is in view to anticipate so favorable a result as we could wish, even by an extensive exploration. The eastern termination of that formation of anthracite, to which so great a supply of coal can be obtained, has not been ascertained, and is not far from the course of that stream, above Mauch Chunk. The veins opened by the Beaver Meadow company are, in extent and quality, superior to any other known.

In the neighborhood of this company's land, there lies a considerable body of equally good land, which it is said may be bought yet at a comparatively low price. This is the nearest point to New York from which coal can be obtained, and the only one, and the only one, that is a navigation the whole distance except 6 or 8 miles—thus by the Morris canal to Easton from Newark, is 90 miles; from Mauch Chunk, 47 miles—this would leave a rail-way to be made of, say not more than 10 miles, and we shall then be in perhaps the finest coal basin in the world. Let a few enterprising capitalists, or one or two companies of 100 or 200,000 dollars capital, engage in the business, buy the land which the coal lies at, and at a comparatively small cost, we have the best of fuel at the lowest price. There is no point to which the citizens of New York can look with as much certainty for an inexhaustible supply of anthracite, as to the northern and eastern declivity of the Blue mountain—that from the southern and western declivity must go to Philadelphia only, and in that market it commands the highest price, and cannot fail from its superior quality, to maintain that preference. There is no reason why coal brought from this point, should not be placed at the wharves of New York, at a cost not exceeding that of Philadelphia, by more than 25 cents per ton. It ought to be delivered in New York with a fair profit, at 3 dollars and 50 cents per ton. A SUBSCRIBER.

The Miners' Journal discusses all consumers of coal to be admonished by the present difficulty of procuring fuel, and to try in their stocks for winter consumption in due season. A very excellent piece of advice—for all who have the means. It informs us also that contracts are now in progress by the coal dealers in this city, for next season's supplies. It is stated in the same print that the corporation of New York were offered 1,000 tons of coal for the use of the poor, at 4 dollars and 50 cents per ton. We believe, by means of a steam row boat, and the corporation, by their act of refusal, deserve the censure of every friend of suffering humanity. Every man who voted against the measure should forthwith contribute out of his own pocket, his share of the 5,000 dollars thus lost to the city. [N. Y. paper.]

BALTIMORE CITY COUNCILS.

The annual address of the mayor, William Stewart, esq., presents a very interesting account of the condition of the city—the details, however, are not important, except to its inhabitants. The total of the city debt, December, 31, 1831, was $51,937 88. This includes the subscriptions to the rail road stocks which amount to 285,000 dollars.

The following paragraphs have some general interest—

"The experience that we have obtained in laying the stone rails through our streets, must satisfy every mind, that a comparatively small appropriation, would have enabled the city commissioners to reset the curb stones, and repair those parts of the streets which were left by the rail road company untouched, but requiring repair. I would therefore recommend an appropriation for such cases, sufficient to enable the city commissioners to make a thorough repair of such streets, as the rail roads may be carried through hereafter."

"The enterprise in which many of our citizens are engaged, in regard to keeping our navigation open during the severest winter, by means of a steam row boat, merits, and I am sure it will receive every encouragement from your hands. There would in such an event seem to be nothing wanting to give us even in the severest weather of winter, all the advantages contemplated by our rail roads, and in this particular, even more than was originally contemplated in behalf of the city. If required, you surely will patronize the undertaking, as it will be a public benefit to our city, to keep the navigation open to the sea throughout the year."

"The vigilance of our fire companies continues unabated, and their usefulness must be acknowledged by all, yet there are some irregularities among them, which should be corrected. I allude particularly to the practice of running part of their apparatus

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

SP We had intended, this week, to continue the debate in the house of representatives on a reference of the memorial of the bank of the United States—that the views of the several gentlemen might be the better presented to their constituents, and preserved—but, perhaps, the general scope of the discussion has already been sufficiently shown; and the great length to which any thing like a full view of the remainder of the debate would extend, utterly forbids its present insertion in our pages. We must, in some degree, keep pace with the current of events. The speech of Mr. Clay, because of the absorbing interest of its subject, demanded a place—and Mr. Hayne's reply shall be also inserted, though its greater length will subject us to considerable inconvenience, just now.

In the other house, Mr. Cambreleng threatens the infliction of another series of high pressure statements. There are some who learn nothing from experience—who disregard the most complete refutations of their propositions, and are insensible even to unpleasant exposures of flagrant mistakes. And, whatever Mr. Cambreleng, or Mr. Any-body-else, may assert, in the way of speculation, we stand prepared to prove—that the practical duty imposed on wroollen goods, and actually paid—does not average 45 per centum on the real cost of such goods, in foreign countries: and are well informed, that our one dollar minimum is the standing toast in Yorkshire, where cloths and OATHS are chiefly manufactured and prepared for the American market.

SUPREME COURT. We omitted to mention in our last, that the supreme court of the United States is now in session—the venerable chief justice Marshall, with judges Duval, Thompson, Story, McLean and Baldwin, attending.

THE PRESIDENT. The "Globe" of the 14th inst. informs that the president had a ball extracted from his arm, which has oftentimes caused him much pain, and threatened a mortification. The operation was performed by Dr. Harris, of Philadelphia. He received this ball in the rencounter with the Bentons, at Nashville.

"THE CABINET." It is announced that all the new nominations to the "cabinet proper," have been confirmed by the senate. That of Mr. Van Buren, as minister to Great Britain, is suspended; and, as it appears, accidentally by the casting vote of the vice president. The debates in the secret sessions concerning him, are understood to have been able and pointed, and the idea that his instructions to Mr. McLane will become a subject of public discussion—as they ought to be, gathers strength. If they shall be—it would repay the labor of travelling five hundred miles to hear some of the speeches that may be expected on a subject so well fitted for severest reprehension. Our local differences must never be pined, to obtain favours of foreigners.

PENNSYLVANIA. The 8th of January happening on Sunday, a convention was held at Harrisburg on the 9th. George D. Foulke, of Cumberland, president, George Weiser, of Northumberland, and John S. Yeocum, of Delaware, vice presidents, and John Morgan, of Chester, and Thomas W. Lloyd, of Lycoming, secretaries.

Among other proceedings, they nominated John Andrew Shulze for the office of governor,—a "Jackson electoral ticket" for the state, and appointed delegates to attend the national convention which is to be held at Baltimore to nominate a vice president of the United States. They also appointed a committee of correspondence, &c.

The convention also supped together to celebrate the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans. The following, XLI.—No. 27.

ing toasts may shew the bearing and the spirit of the members—

The governor of Pennsylvania:—Elected, not elevated, by fraud and corruption; he may read his fate in the unequivocal expression of public opinion.

The late and the present national cabinet: The one, distracted by the intrigues of faction; the other, united by a harmonious and patriotic desire to promote the public weal: The discrimination of president Jackson was never more worthily exercised,—6 cheers.

By the president, Dr. George D. Foulke. President Jackson: His true friends will support the convention of the eighth; his professed friends will denounce its members and advocates.

By George Washington Barton. Martin Van Buren: Threatened with the proscription of the senate, but shielded by the affection of the people, he may well

"Smile on the drawn dagger,

And defy its point!!

By R. R. Hottel. The governor of Pennsylvania: A Wolf by name and in principle.

By John Johnson. John H. Estlin, an honest and patriotic man, his persecutors have failed in their efforts to injure him in the estimation of the American people.

By Samuel Wyant. Samuel D. Ingham, late secretary of the treasury: wonder how he relishes a hickory briem.

The "Jackson and Wolf" papers,—(who are anti-Jackson-Van-Buren—"democrats") make out this convention to have been a very small affair—one account says that only 34 persons were present as delegates, though some were made on the spot, and ten were attending from Philadelphia county, only. Several of the persons nominated have already retired from the honor conferred, &c. The "Jackson and Wolf" men are to hold a convention on the 4th of March, and it is plainly intimated that all which the Jackson-Van-Buren-democrats have done, will be resisted.

THE SUSQUEHANNAH. As there is a prospect that a bill to incorporate a company to make a rail road from a certain point on this river to the Maryland line, may pass the legislature of Pennsylvania—a meeting has been held at Philadelphia to remonstrate against it, and it is said that "Baltimore desires to make a rail road that will intersect the canals and rail roads of Pennsylvania, and divert the trade from Philadelphia, who pay the taxes."

But the southern enemies of Pennsylvania are as much interested in this matter as Baltimore, and the citizens thereof quite as zealous for the passage of the bill. If it shall not pass—we propose that a meeting be held in Baltimore to take into consideration the propriety of closing the navigation of Buck Creek—by which, and the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, the trade of our river, the Susquehanna, is diverted from Baltimoreans "who pay the taxes" of the state in greater proportion than the Philadelphians do those of Pennsylvania!!! I call the Susquehanna "our river"—because that we have undoubted jurisdiction over it, (as a sovereign state!) where it reaches the tide, and Buck Creek surely as much belongs to us as any part of York county, through which we wish to pass, belongs to Pennsylvania. "The rule must work both ways."

THE RAIL ROAD. The Gazette of the 13th inst. had the following pleasing paragraph:

It will be gratifying to the friends of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, and more especially to the stockholders of the company, to learn, that the receipts for travelling and transportation have been continually and rapidly increasing, since the opening of the communication with Frederick—the average of the daily receipts now exceeds three hundred and fifty dollars, although only about twenty-two burthen cars pass daily in each direction—additions to the number are making every week, and we are assured that, by Monday week, forty cars for the transportation of produce, merchandise and other articles, will be regularly passing every day in each direction between Baltimore and Frederick.

The Frederick Herald of the 14th says, that within eleven days, 5,297 bbls. of flour, with a large amount of miscellaneous articles, which it mentions, had left the depot in that city, on the rail road. The saving on the cost of every barrel of flour sent to Baltimore is 50 cents—so that, in three 11 days, there was a clear gain of 2,000 dollars to the farmers, on flour alone. The editor suggests that 2,000 barrels of flour, in addition, would have been forwarded, if cars could have been procured; but of these there will be no deficiency hereafter, many new ones having just been put upon the road, for the transportation of passengers and goods.

BALTIMORE. A passage being cut through the ice, for upwards of six miles, more than one hundred sail of inward and outward bound vessels passed each other on Sunday evening and Monday morning, and there is now a pretty easy access to most of our wharves. Great activity in business has followed, and we have had several days that would be seasonable in April.

THE SLAVE QUESTION. The tongue and the press in Virginia, which had been as it were scaled against a discussion of the slave-question, have been relieved, and the whole matter concerning slavery is now fully before the people and the legislature of this state. This is one of the wonders of the times—and we hope that good will result from it. That which cannot be avoided, should be resolutely met.

"A STONE!" At the citizens' celebration of the 8th January, at Harrisburg, the following toast was given by gov. Wolf—in allusion, doubtless, to the tariff and bank questions:

"Our delegation in congress—A crisis is approaching when Pennsylvania will expect every man to do his duty."

TRENDENOUS! Mr. John S. Ingram has lately become one of the editors of the "Union Times," published at New Berlin, Pennsylvania, at the head of which is placed the name of "Andrew Jackson," the "democratic republican candidate for presidential election in 1832." Mr. Ingram lately published the "Anti Masonic Star," at Gettysburg, and assigns the following, among other reasons, why he has hoisted down the anti-masonic flag—with which we have no part, except in shewing another "sign of the times." We give the italics and capitals, just as he himself presented them.

"Consistency is a jewel!"—a precious ornament to any man or any party. A derogation from it, evinces a want of merit, and fully identifies a depravity and rottenness either in the cause or its advocates. If Anti-masonry needed no aid but her honest arguments and the uprightness of her cause, to gain the support of a Republican people: If Anti-masonry was supported by men whose primary object was the extermination of Freemasonry; If they were determined to make Masons seek shelter under the banner of "the Holy cause of Anti-masonry"—why did they not adhere to their original and all-god determination to "oppose every out-bound member of the Fraternity?" Why did the Baltimore Convention nominate as their candidate for President the FREE MASON, WILLIAM WIRT? "Oh! shame—where is thy blush?" A United States ANTI-MASONIC Convention nominating an OPEN and AVOWED MASON to the highest and most important office in the gift of the people! Yes, this same WM. WIRT, who is now before the public as the Anti-masonic candidate for President, is a rak and ulthering MASON! Shall we take this as a sample of the honesty and consistency of Anti-masonry? These are the acts of her cunning and "uncompromising" leaders. Do such men merit applause for honesty of intention or stability of purpose? Or do not such scandalous proceedings merit the anathemas of every upright man in the community! This "royal arch" trickery—this "passed degree" of m-trigue and corruption, has no equal on the records of our political history; and makes the stain upon the reputation of Henry Clay appear but as a "fee-bite" to their enormous "wonder-working."

Sinister motives produced the nomination of Amos Ellmaker; and with the misquotation of his reputation, it may be as well to let him rejoice in his well known character of a broken down politician.

WEST INDIA TRADE. By statements recently published, it appears, that among the arrivals at New York and Boston, during the year ending 31st ult.—there were of

British vessels	366
And during the preceding year	110
Increase	256

It is presumed that there has been an increase also, in a similar proportion, of British vessels, at Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston and Savannah.

There has been a decrease in the number of arrivals of American vessels, in the two ports above mentioned, for the same period, of 57.

The entries of the British vessels have been principally from the British colonies of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, (a few from Newfoundland), and the British West India islands.

The conclusion we draw from these facts is, that whatever other advantages the country may derive from what is usually termed the "West India arrangement," the navigation interest has been seriously injured.

[N. Y. Price Current.

{Such was the result which every practical man expected, from the famous arrangement made by Mr. McLane; the facts belonging to which will soon be exhibited in such a manner that he who runs may understand them.]

"THE SUNDAY QUESTION" has been decided at New Orleans says the "Free Press" of that city, of Monday the 21st inst.—and proceeds to inform us that the American theatre was "thronged again last night"—Sunday evening. The French theatre has always been kept open on that evening. This question appears to have excited a great deal of interest in New Orleans.

THE CHOLERA is certainly in England, and appears to be extending itself from Southampton. There is every reason to believe that this scourge will visit us also. Being superadded to the other present ills of England, it has rendered the state of things exceedingly distressing in that country.

ECONOMY. Give seven dollars to pay three; or, sell the stock in the bank of the United States to pay off the three per cent. stock.

COAL. We see an interesting synopsis of the several seams of coal in the New Castle district, England. The thickest of the seams does not exceed six feet six inches, and the average is not more than three feet. A few of the mines are at the depth of about 20 fathoms (120 feet), from the surface—but the majority will average 100 fathoms, and one mine is worked at the depth of 185 fathoms, or 1,110 feet—several at from 700 feet to 900.

The coal mines of Pennsylvania, as well anthracite in the eastern or bituminous in the western part of the state, very generally lie near the surface, and their thickness is from six to twenty-five feet above the water level. Only one mine, and that by way of experiment, has been worked below that level, and the result proved satisfactory. It is stated that, at the mouth of the pits in Schuylkill county, coal may be had for one dollar per ton. This seems cheap enough. The only thing then that appears necessary, is to reduce the cost of transportation; and that this will soon be accomplished in its full extent, cannot be doubted. If anthracite coal could be landed at 5 dollars per ton, it would be the cheapest fuel that can be used, even in Baltimore, or about the same as oak wood at 3 dollars a cord. That it will be permanently sold for less than that price at Philadelphia, must be expected. The bituminous coal, which abounds on the waters of the Potomac, Ohio, &c. is yet much cheaper at the mouth of the pits than the anthracite. The quantity of either may be called inexhaustible. Baltimore will be plentifully supplied with both—by the rail road proceeding to Cumberland, and the Susquehanna river, or rail road—if permitted to extend the latter into Pennsylvania.

COARSE WOOL. The New Hampshire Statesman contains an excellent article adverse to any reduction of the duty on coarse wool, and will, no doubt, receive the attention of those who may be soon called to act upon the subject. The system must be preserved. The duty on such wool was forced into the bill of 1828 to destroy it—but, if the practical operation of the law has rendered good out of an intended evil, it is well. And time enough, perhaps, has not yet elapsed to ascertain the practical effects of the duty on coarse wool.

VIRGINIA. We have had on our desk, for several weeks, an account of the proceedings of a convention of delegates from various counties of the western district of Virginia, which met at Lewisburg on the 31st October last, and of which Charles A. Stewart, esq. was president, and John A. North, secretary. Alleghany, Augusta, Cabell, Fayette, Greenbrier, Logan, Mason, and Monroe counties were represented at this meeting—the object of which was to consider what measures should be adopted “in relation to the opening of a line of commercial intercourse between the Ohio river and the Chesapeake bay, through the central sections of the state.”

The proceedings make a pamphlet of 36 pages—and chiefly consist of a memorial to the legislature, and an address to the people of the state, both which are able and spirited papers. The advance of other states in population and improvement, and the effects of the stand-still policy of Virginia, are well set forth; and the legislature, and the people earnestly exerted to action. Various important suggestions are presented for consideration, and the golden harvests which must follow their execution, clearly pointed out. We cannot go into details. They contrast the state of things between the north and south of Mason and Dixon's line, (which is the southern line of Pennsylvania extended westward)—with respect to population and wealth, commerce and navigation, &c. and do it with a strong hand—and describe the present and ultimate effects that have followed or must succeed the let-us-alone system. We most heartily wish that these things may excite a new spirit in Virginia to do something worthy of her resources and great national advantages; but fear that the herd of politicians is too strong to permit the wholesome, if not vital, operations of practical minds and working men.

GERARD'S BANK. The closing of this bank has caused the projection of several others, and brought out much management on the part of certain speculators in Philadelphia, always on the alert to make profits on their money or credit. To check such management, it is proposed, by another party, to incorporate a new bank, with the provision that the privilege of subscribing to certain numbers of shares of its stock, shall be sold at public auction, to the highest bidders, and that the premium shall pass, at once, into the treasury of the state.

RIVER NAVIGATION. In the house of delegates of the state of Maryland, on the 7th inst.—Mr. Tenckle, submitted the following preamble and resolutions.

Whereas, the entrances of the rivers Nanticoke, Mankin, Annapamas, Pocomoke and Wicomico, in the collection districts of Snowhill and Vienna, common to the navigation and commerce of more than one thousand registered and licensed vessels, and affording a nursery of warren of incalculable value, are difficult of access by reason of narrow or meandering channels through expanded flats or shallows, in consequence whereof the owners of vessels, properly belonging to those rivers, although few in comparison to the number who resort or trade therein, have long been, and now are subject to an annual tax for staking out and designating the said channels; and considering that the regulation of commerce has been wholly ceded to the general government, and that the individual states, in their sovereign character, are entirely divested of all its resulting revenues; and considering further, the numerous sailors and watermen employed in the navigation of the said rivers, are subject in a monthly imprisonment, under the denomination of the hospital money, without an equivalent benefit, as very few of those sailors and watermen are ever admitted into the marine hospital. Therefore,

Resolved, That the senators and representatives of this state, in the congress of the United States, be instructed to use their exertions to procure appropriations, and provide that the channels of the said rivers be marked out, and made easy of ingress and egress, by the establishment and support of proper buoys, at the charge and expense of the United States.

Further resolved, That his excellency, the governor, be requested to communicate a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of the senators and representatives of this state, in the congress of the United States.

BRITISH MONEY-MARKET. A letter from a respectable American gentleman dated London, Nov. 22, published in the New York Mercantile Advertiser, says—“Some few months since the bank of England, or its directors, perceived that specie was much wanted on the continent, to pay the armies, and the exportation at length became so great as to compel the board of directors to curtail their circulation £12,000,000. The rate of interest with the bill brokers rose from 2½ to 4½ per cent.; since which the tide has changed, the exchange has turned in favor of England. The war has ceased, and money for the armies is no longer wanted.

A general peace on the continent is now considered certain.—The exportation of specie has pretty much stopped, and Spanish dollars are in fact a drug, even 4s. 10d. cannot be realized; the importations by the last arrivals from New York, although landed, are unsold, and no offer is yet made for them. Rothschild, who has always been the most prominent man in the market, declines buying. From all these circumstances, many weeks before the winter expires with you, the money market will be perfectly easy, and confidence, as usual, with the moneyed institutions, be restored to a wholesome footing.

BRITISH AFFAIRS. A piece was recently performed at one of the London theatres, in which these lines occur:

“Take back the foul reproach, unmanner'd railer,
Nor urge my rage too far, lest thou shouldst find
I have as daring spirits in my blood
As thou or any of thy race e'er boasted;
And though no gaudy titles grace my birth,
Yet Heaven that made me honest, made me more Than ever king did, when he made a lord.”

According to the London Courier, when the three last lines were repeated, the shouts of the audience were almost deafening, nor were these demonstrations confined to the galleries. The acting was equally strong in the pit and boxes.

The lawyers of Kilkenny, Ireland, have refused to undertake the recovery of tithes for the clergy.

It is stated in the Cork Reporter, that in three parishes of that city there have been found no less than 26,000 paupers, and the whole city is supposed to present an aggregate of 60,000, without the means of providing for themselves.

In the present state of the representation in parliament—34 persons, chiefly peers, send 155 members, 48 persons send 96, and 89 persons 89 more—total 340 representatives of the commons of England appointed by 171 persons! This is “humbug No. 1.” One of the lords makes as many as eleven members; several of these fellows send six or more. They own the boroughs—and so own the rights of the people!

The house of lords is made up of 25 dukes (4 of them “royal”), 26 marquesses, 129 earls, 25 viscounts, 143 barons, 16 Scotch and 28 Irish peers, 30 archbishops and bishops.

The following extract from a vehement speech of lord Winchelsea against the reform bill, is ironically referred to by the London Times, “as a specimen of calm, rational, and sober reasoning, on this important question of national reform." The duchess of Kent is the lady referred to:—

"An illustrious lady had been held up to the country as using unconstitutional means to impede the progress of this measure. Would to God, he knew the foul slanderer of that illustrious female: would to God, he could discover the anonymous calumniator. If he could discover him, either that vile wretch or the humble individual who then addressed their lordships, should not survive another night, to utter, publish, or repeat another slander. Willingly as he should raise his arm to repel the invader of his country—willing as he should raise it in defence of his country's rights and liberties,—so willingly should he lift it against the cowardly calumniator, who could attack an innocent and illustrious lady, whose conduct in this country had been marked by the practice of every virtue, and who showed in her life an example well worthy of imitation, an example of those virtues on which a nation's happiness might so much depend."

The following is from a late English paper.

On Saturday night some urchins paraded the effigy of a bishop about the streets of Canterbury. Little interruption took place until the approach of the figure towards Burgate, when another effigy representing his satanic majesty, seized the bishop, and a terrible scuffle ensued, which ended in the former being declared the victor. The authorities caused the image to be seized, the parties resigning it without opposition.

B. CONSTANT. The following paragraphs extracted from the writings of M. Constant, are pointed and powerful:

"The Spartans complained of their helots: the Roman patricians of the plebeians: the feudal lords of their serfs: the colonists complain now of their slaves. I have seen in the General History of Voyages, compiled by La Harpe, the following passage:—'The sea-wolf is an animal of such ferocity, that it always defends itself when attacked.'

"There are in the world two principles, force and reason. They stand in an inverse proportion to each other. When reason advances, force must give way, for reason cannot recede. When force resists, disastrous struggles follow. This is not the fault of reason, but of force. It would be contrary to the nature of reason not to advance, or to return to that which it has discovered to be unreasonable; but it is not contrary to the nature of force to be convinced; it always will be so ultimately, however it may resist for the time. At first the partisans of reason are called seditious, but it is afterwards discovered that its enemies are the rebels."

THE POLES. At a meeting of the Americans in Paris on the 22nd October, J. F. Cooper, esq. in the chair, a letter was read from gen. Lafayette, asking advice and assistance in the disposition of the money which had been remitted to him from New York, &c. for the relief of the Poles and a committee of twenty, of which Dr. Howe was made the chairman, was appointed to act in this matter, under the revision and approval of gen. Lafayette. This committee has addressed a circular to the citizens of the United States, contributors in favor of the Poles, informing them that the funds will be distributed for the present relief of the "barefoot and hungry" Poles who have already arrived at Paris, or are begging their way thither. Their number is not stated—but they have formed a national re-union, and "Leonard Chodzko, member of the Polish committee," will give a list of their names, and of such as may hereafter arrive, to the American committee.

UPPER CANADA. Mr. Mackenzie, who, after being expelled from the house of assembly of Upper Canada, was re-elected, (only one vote in York being polled against him) has been again declared unworthy to hold a seat in that house, by a vote of 37 to 19, passed on the 7th inst. The new offence of Mr. M. was the publication of "articles of impeachment or public accusations against the lieutenant governor of the province, and the advisers of the crown," in which he charges the house of assembly with sycophancy; and also a publication in his paper, the Colonial Advocate, in which he stigmatised the thirty members who voted for his first expulsion, as "tyrants!"

LACE WORK. An establishment called the Rhode Island lace school has commenced at Newport. Notwithstanding its recent origin, no less than seven hundred females are actively employed by its proprietors. The style of lace work is said to be the most ingenious of its kind, and of that particular description with which the English dealers in lace have had to supply themselves in France, in consequence of the superior excellence of execution of their Gallic competitors. Several Englishmen are now settled in France, where they employ people to work upon lace for the American markets, and it is calculated that the people of the United States pay foreigners in this way not less than 6 or $700,000 annually, for what can as well be performed by themselves. A regular and habitual occupation in these delicate fabrics, must eventually lead to that beautiful state of perfection at which they have arrived in France, and some of the females engaged in the "lace school" have already attained a high degree of excellence.

[This elegant branch of business may be yet much extended, and there are yet various employments fitted for women who must, (on one account or another), make their livings at home, that would produce several millions a year, which are yet untouched. Some branches are much needed that will occupy the time which poor women can spare from indispensable attentions to their children, and ordinary domestic concerns. The wearing of stockings would be a capital employment, were not the cost of the frames so large.]

Frederick E. Bunker, of New York, to be consul of the United States, at Constantinople.

James C. Cole, to be collector of the customs for the district and inspector of the revenue, for the port of Newbern, in the state of North Carolina, vice Francis Hawks, deceased.

[We have another long list of approved nominations, among them those of the "cabinet ministers"—but have not time and room to give it this week.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at Boston, brings intelligence from London to the evening of 30th November, inclusive.

ENGLAND.

The Burking cases continued to excite much alarm in London: one of the offenders, by the name of Shields, had made a confession which led to the arrest of several persons. There had been an affair in the county of Kilkenny in Ireland between a body of soldiers and some peasantry.

The London Courier of the 30th November contained the daily report of the cases of cholera at Sunderland, Nov. 28. Remained at last report 32—new cases 14—total 46—recovered 6—died 8—remaining 52. There had been 294 cases there since Oct. 26, 1831; deaths 86. It is now admitted by the government physicians to be the Asiatic disease. Out of 10 new cases reported on the 27th Nov. 8 died before the ensuing morning: the disease was evidently on the increase and had extended its ravages to New Castle.

FRANCE

A letter from Lyons, of Nov. 21, states that dreadful riots had taken place between the manufacturers and the workmen. Several thousand workmen had assembled on one night, and burning and pillage had been carried on to a dreadful extent. The number of killed and wounded of the rioters was very large. The workmen collected in the night, and made themselves masters of all the bridges and cut off all communication with the Swiss side of the Rhone. A sharp cannonading was going on at the writing of the letter from the city, as also from the Croix Rouss, which had not been taken at the latest advices. About 300 of the troops had been killed and wounded, among the former was reported a colonel of the line and six officers. The Hotel de Ville had been taken by the rioters, as also the powder magazine, the whole city was at the power of the mob—who had commenced the firing of houses in all directions. In the streets large fires were built, into which they threw all the books, stock and furniture which they pillaged. The number of workmen engaged in these riots at Lyons, was estimated at 60,000, and it was supposed, if government attacked them, the city would be reduced to ashes. This cause of these disturbances was occasioned by the manufacturers refusing to yield to a demand for higher wages.

The duke of Orleans, the eldest son of the king, had proceeded from Paris to Lyons to adjust matters. The latest accounts, however, say that the shops and theatres had been opened, and that tranquility had been restored.

PORTUGAL.

An account had reached London that there had been an insurrection in Lisbon and Don Miguel had fled.

TURKEY.

The cholera was making the most frightful ravages in Smyrna, business had been entirely suspended.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

January 13. The vice president communicated a report from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with so much of the resolution of the senate of the 11th instant, as requires the monthly statements of the bank of the U. States for the year 1831, which was referred.

Various petitions were presented.

Mr. King reported a bill granting a lot of ground to the town of Columbus, for the abutment of a bridge over the Chatahochee river, which was read.

Mr. Hendricks submitted a resolution to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for the permanent preservation and repair of the Cumberland road east of the Ohio.

Thirteen bills were received from the house of representatives, severally twice read and referred to appropriate committees.

The senate then spent a considerable time in the consideration of executive business, and Adjourned to Monday.

January 16. Mr. Clayton, of Delaware, appeared to day, and took his seat.

The vice president communicated a report from the secretary of the navy, of the contingent expenses of that establishment for the year 1831.

He also communicated a report from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting copies of the instructions to the collectors of the customs and other officers, in respect to the British colonial trade, given or issued since the proclamation of the president of the U. S. of the 5th Oct. 1830.

Various petitions were presented, among them three by Mr. Dallas, of sundry merchants in Philadelphia, praying for an amendment (specified) to the 3d section of the act of May 28, 1830, relating to the average value upon which the duties on imported woollen and cotton goods are to be charged—which were referred.

Mr. Hendricks reported a bill providing for the continuation of the Cumberland road, through Ohio, Indiana and Illinois; which was read.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. Hendricks and Moore, were severally considered and agreed to. The bill providing for the organization of the ordinance department was read the third time, passed, and sent to the other house.

The senate then on motion of Mr. Ewing, took up the following resolution, submitted by Mr. Clay on the 10th instant:

Resolved, That the existing duties upon articles imported from foreign countries, and not coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, ought to be forthwith abolished, except the duties upon wines and silks, and that those ought to be reduced. And that the committee on finance be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

Mr. Hayne proposed the following modification of the resolution:

Strike out all after the word "countries," and insert as follows: "be so reduced that the amount of the public revenue shall be sufficient to defray the expenses of government according to their present scale, after the payment of the public debt; and that, allowing a reasonable time for the gradual reduction of the present high duties on the articles coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, the duties be ultimately equalized, so that the duty on no article shall, as compared with the value of that article, vary, materially, from the general average."

Mr. Hayne then addressed the senate nearly four hours in support of his proposition in opposition to the original resolution, and in reply to Mr. Clay. When he concluded,

Mr. Dickerson moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to Monday next.

Mr. Clay was opposed to so distant a postponement. He wished an early decision of the question, that if the resolution was sustained by the senate, it might go soon to the committee.

Mr. Forsyth, thinking the present debate on the merits premature, was in favor of deciding the question at once, as the merits of the proposition would come up again, if a bill was ordered, and the whole debate would probably be repeated if the resolution were now discussed.

Mr. Tyler concurred in this view and supported it at some length.

Mr. Dickerson thought as Mr. Hayne had gone so largely into the merits of the question, gentlemen on the other side should have an opportunity of replying to him before the resolution went to a committee; and another reason for the postponement was that he expected some important information on the subject from the New York convention.

Mr. Wilkins supported the postponement, and Mr. Smith opposed it, when

The question being taken, the motion for postponement prevailed, without a division.

And the senate adjourned.

January 17. A message was received from the president, transmitting the annual report of the director of the mint, exhibiting the operations of that institution for the year 1831.

[The report states that the coinage of the past year amounts to $3,923,473 60; comprising 714,270, in gold coins, $3,175,600, in silver coins, and $33,603 60, in copper—consisting, altogether, of 11,792,284 pieces, viz: half eagles, 140,594; quarter eagles, 4,520; half dollars, 5,875,660; quarter dollars, 398,000; dimes, 771,350; half dimes, 1,242,700; cents, 3,359,260; and half cents, 2,900. $26,000 worth of the gold coined was received from Virginia; $294,000 from North Carolina; and from Georgia, $176,000 worth. Alabama and Tennessee also furnished gold bullion to the amount of about $1,000 each, "indicating (as the report remarks) the progressive development of the gold region." The coinage of copper yielded a profit of about ten thousand dollars, the last year, and in consequence, reduced the expense of the mint establishment, for that time, to $38,000.]

A number of petitions were presented, and among the rest, one by Mr. Dallas from sundry inhabitants of Philadelphia, traders to the western country, and others, praying for the renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States—referred.

On motion of Mr. Dallas, all the memorials on the subject of the improvement of the navigation of Back Creek, and not acted upon, were referred to a committee.

On motion of Mr. Ellis, an inquiry was instituted into the expediency of providing by law, for the exemption from postage of all letters conveyed on board of steamboats, relating to the cargo and enclosing bills of lading or invoices addressed to the owners or consignees of said cargoes.

On motion of Mr. Dallas, the committee on military affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of organizing the topographical engineers.

Mr. Bibb submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of applying the Indians inhabiting the territory of East Florida, with corn for their subsistence, until the ensuing crop is fit for use.

Mr. Sprague submitted the following motions:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to the senate all the correspondence between the executive of the United States and Great Britain, relative to the selection of an arbiter, under the convention of 29th September, 1827; and, also, the correspondence between the executive of the United States and the king of the Netherlands, relative to the acceptance, by the latter, of the office of arbiter, under said convention.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to the senate, the arrangement which, in the letter of the secretary of state, to the governor of Maine, under date of the 21st of October, 1831, is said to have been made between the United States and Great Britain, "for precluding a final disposition could be made of the question," respecting our northeastern boundary; and all the correspondence in relation thereto. And to inform the senate when, and in what manner, said "arrangement between the two nations" was made, and when, and in what manner, it was communicated to the governor of Maine, as mentioned in the said letter of the secretary of state.

The senate after considering some local bills, went into executive business; spent two hours therein, and then adjourned.

January 18. Various petitions and memorials were presented.

Mr. Robinson introduced a bill granting a quantity of land to the state of Illinois to aid in making a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with lake Michigan—twice read and referred.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. Ellis, Tipton, Robinson, Dallas and Bibb, respectively, were considered and agreed to.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. Sprague, relative to the north eastern boundary correspondence, was, after debate, adopted.

Mr. Benton submitted two resolutions, the one concerning the topographical engineers, and the other for increasing the number of army surgeons and assistant surgeons.

The bill to establish the office of surgeon general of the navy, and the bill for fixing the compensation of purveyors was postponed till Wednesday next.

The senate adjourned.

January 19. The resolutions yesterday submitted by Messrs. Benton, Ruggles, Tipton and Foot were considered and agreed to.

Various petitions and resolutions relative to private claims were presented and acted upon.

At about half past 12 o'clock the senate went into secret session, and sat with closed doors until 4 o'clock—when,

The senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Jan. 13. Several bills and reports were severally reported.

Mr. Vance asked the unanimous consent of the house, to offer a resolution, granting the use of the hall to the Colonization society on Monday evening next. Objection being made,

He moved to suspend the rule which prevented the motion, and the question being put, it was carried. Ayes 104, noes 45.

Mr. Vance then moved a resolution to that effect, which was agreed to.

Mr. Clay reported a bill authorizing the inhabitants of Jackson county, in the territory of Florida, to dispose of the lands arising from the sale of a quarter section of land reserved for the use of schools in Florida.

Mr. Clay explained the circumstances referred to in the bill, and moved for its engrossment.

Mr. Vinton said the bill contained a new principle, which required examination, and moved that the bill be committed.

Mr. Clay replied, and denied the existence of any such new principle.

Mr. Vinton rejoined, affirming that the bill did contain a new principle, and set an alarming precedent, likely to be very injurious to the interests of common schools.

The question was thereupon put, and the bill was committed.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolutions offered by Mr. Bouldin, relative to ad valorem duties.

Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, proposed an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. Stewart of Pennsylvania, (who had moved to amend Mr. Bouldin's amendment, by striking out the preamble, and also striking out "commerce" and inserting "manufactures") expressed his willingness to adopt the amendment, as a modification of his own.

But the chair decided this not to be in order—as there was nothing in his amendment to which this could adhere; but if his were withdrawn, to which this could adhere.

Mr. Stewart consented to withdraw so much of his amendment, as went to strike out the preamble of Mr. Bouldin's resolution—but not the residue.

The question thereupon recurred on Mr. Stewart's amendment to strike out "commerce" and insert "manufactures."

Mr. Cambreleng observed, that he was very sure, to whichever of the committees the resolution should be referred, the committee would do its duty. But he begged to state, for the benefit of the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Stewart and Mr. Denny), and to allay their very lively sensibility, that a majority of the committee of commerce were, unfortunately, of the same views with themselves on the general subject to which this resolution referred. The nature of the inquiries in the resolution was strictly and properly commercial. But the gentlemen were very much afraid (and there lay the point of anxiety about the matter) lest the people of the United States should discover how far they had been deceived by the substitution of the system of minimum for ad valorem duties. Mr. C. said he was not at all surprised that gentlemen should be extremely anxious to hide from the people the fact that, instead of 45 per cent. ad valorem on certain descriptions of woollen goods, as laid by the law, they were, in fact, paying from 75 to 100, and 150 per cent. Nor was he surprised that they should be equally anxious to conceal another fact, viz: that persons purchasing articles whose original cost was $1 and 1 cent, were obliged to pay the same duties as upon those whose cost was $2 50. The effect of the system went to reverse every rule of taxation; it was adverse to every principle of republicanism, and every rule of justice. For himself, he was indifferent to which of the committees the resolution should go, he had all confidence in the justice, candor, and fidelity of the gentleman (Mr. Adams) at the head of the committee on manufactures, and he was sure the facts would be brought out. But he could tell the gentleman, that whatever disposition should be made of the resolution, the inquiries contained in it should be answered, in spite of all they could do to smother the information. He should, himself, lay on the table statements containing all the facts the gentleman wished to elicit, and then he should see, by taking the yeas and nays, who would vote to refuse the printing of them, and withhold the information from the American people.

The fact ought to be perpetuated by an official record, that duties varying from 25 to 150 per cent. ad valorem, were paid where the law intended 40 and 45; and none knew the fact better than the gentleman who wished to stifle the inquiry. All he asked, at this great and important crisis, when those who had had the benefit of this system of duties for forty years were not content, but sought to impose it for forty years more upon the people, was, that the American people should know how far they had been deceived.

Mr. Dearborn rose in reply, and said that the gentleman from New York, had made an avowment to the house which was variant from the fact. The gentleman had said, that those who opposed the reference of the resolution to the committee on commerce, did not desire the information it sought should be obtained. The gentleman was much mistaken if he supposed that those who were favorable to the protecting system, desired the continuance of the minimum duties. When that mode of laying duties was at first proposed, it had indeed been predicted that the practical effect would be such; as the gentleman from New York had asserted it now to be; but, in practice, so far from this proving to be the result, the very reverse took place; so that, instead of paying 100 or 150 per cent. as the gentleman said, the importer more frequently paid no more than 15 or 20 per cent. The importers, (Mr. D. observed), knew perfectly well how to quadruple their prices in the invoice, to the minimum duties; and he asserted that no goods, since the minimum system had been enacted, had been invoiced more than from one to two pence sterling below each of the points of minimum value fixed by law. They took very good care not to be caught importing goods charged midway between those points.

If the investigations which had been made were entitled to the least degree of credit, the duties actually paid, so far from being exorbitant, were far beneath what the law intended. All the friends of the protecting system were well acquainted with the fact, that by the intervention of fraudulent invoices, goods were brought down under minimums to which they did not belong, and thus made to pay a duty far less than that provided by the law. All who were concerned in manufactures were perfectly willing, nay, they expected, that the ridiculous system of minimums should be abolished. It gave little or no protection to the manufacturer; its operation was onerous and oppressive. He was surprised that the gentleman of New York should venture the declaration that on certain descriptions of woollen goods 100 and 150 per cent. duty was paid. This might in theory appear to be true; but in practice and in fact, it was far from being so. For himself, he was very indifferent to which committee the resolution was sent. The information might be obtained in various ways; from the committee on commerce, the committee on manufactures, or the secretary of the treasury. He had no doubt that the information was all, at that moment, within the city of Washington; and he cared not how it was reached. He thought, indeed, that the committee on manufactures was the most appropriate source from which to seek it; but he felt very indifferent as to the direction of the reference.

Mr. Davis, of Mass. observed, that no great benefit could accrue either to the house or to the country from the inquiry proposed by the resolution. The committee of commerce were to inquire and report to the house, as to what the rate per cent. actually paid on certain descriptions of goods designated in it, and, whether certain other goods were not, in effect, prohibited our shores. Now, if the information sought were in the department, if it was in the possession of the proper organs of the government, the proper course were to apply there. Had the committee of commerce any official statements to make to this house which were not in the department? Had that committee any mode of obtaining statements sanctioned by official authority, which was not in the department? No; they had none; none at all. The application to them was, therefore, of little utility. But it had been said by his worthy friend from New York, (Mr. Cambreleng), that it was very indifferent to him where the resolution was sent; the information was at hand, and it could and should be brought into this house. It was a proverbial remark, that it was the hot bird that fluttered; and when he saw that gentleman spring from his seat the moment it was proposed to transfer the reference of this resolution to another committee, he could not but think of that saying. Why was the gentleman so uneasy? What inspired him with such a heat of zeal? He would state the reason to the house. At this point of the debate,

Mr. Walters moved that the house proceed to the business on the speaker's table, and to the orders of the day.

The motion was carried, ayes 85, noes 54.

Mr. Yancey called up the second reading of a joint resolution, abolishing the office of an assistant in the corps of engineers.

The resolution, he stated, had received the unanimous assent of the committee who reported it; and further he would state what might appear very extraordinary, the resolution had the assent of the individual himself (Gen. Gadsden) who now filled the office which it was proposed to abolish.

The question being put, the resolution was unanimously ordered to its third reading to-morrow.

Mr. Park now moved to suspend the rule of the house, which appropriates this day to the consideration of private bills, in order to move to take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. Hickliffe said he wished to understand from the friends of the number 45,000 in the apportionment bill if they would allow a motion to be made for discharging the committee of the whole from that bill.

Mr. Adams said he hoped the gentleman from Kentucky would have permission to make the motion he desired. The house had spent two days in very unprofitable debate upon that bill, and he wished to see it brought to an end, and the bill reported in blank.

The question being taken, it was lost, less than two-thirds being in its favor. Ayes 94, Noes 56.

A bill for the relief of George Junius, of New York, was debated, and refused a third reading—or rejected.

A motion was made by Mr. Dearborn, that when the house shall adjourn this day, it will adjourn to meet again on Monday next.

Mr. Whitsey, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays on the question, which being taken, the motion prevailed, Yeas 105, Nays 73.

Two private bills being disposed of—the house adjourned to Monday.

Monday Jan. 16. Mr. McDuffie reported a bill making appropriations for certain improvements for the year 1832; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. McDuffie, from the committee of ways and means, reported the following resolution; which was read and laid on the table, viz:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be requested to collect such facts and information as may be in his power, of the extent and condition, generally, of the manufactures of wool, cotton, hemp, iron, sugar, salt, and such other articles as are manufactured to a considerable extent in the U. States, and report the same to this house as early as may be practicable during the present session, for the use of congress; and that he be also requested, in transmitting the aforesaid information, to accompany it with such a tariff of duties upon imports, as in his opinion may be best adapted to the advancement of the public interest.

Mr. Drayton reported a bill making an appropriation towards the expense of laying out and opening a military road from fort Howard at Green bay to fort Crawford, on the Mississippi—twice read and committed.

He also reported the bill, from the senate, for the erection of barracks, quarters and store houses, and for the purchase of a site at New Orleans, without amendment.

Mr. Evans reported a bill concerning invalid pensions—twice read and committed.

Mr. Irvin reported a bill authorizing the governor of Arkansas to lease the salt springs in said territory.

Mr. John S. Burdour made a report in part, accompanied by a bill to provide for liquidating and paying certain claims of the commonwealth of Virginia—twice read and committed.

The resolution offered by Mr. Bouldin, some days since, and on which a debate was had last week, was taken up.

The question before the house was the amendment proposed by Mr. Stewart, of Pennsylvania, to send the inquiry to the committee on manufactures, instead of the committee on commerce, as proposed by the mover.

(Messrs. Davis, of Massachusetts, Cambreleng and Bouldin spoke on the subject. Their remarks were racy and interesting—but must be deferred. We expect to give them in our next. The question was not decided.)

Tuesday, Jan. 17. Various memorials were presented; among them, two from Philadelphia, on the subject of the tariff, and one from the Chesapeake and Delaware canal company, praying an appropriation for improving the navigation of Back Creek.

Mr. Branch presented a memorial and remonstrance of the special agent, and the chiefs, headmen and warriors of the Creek nation of Indiana, now in the city of Washington, remonstrating against the passage of a bill reported on the 8th inst. and now pending before this house, to carry into effect the 4th section of the treaty of the 8th of January, 1821, between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, so far as relates to the claims of citizens of Georgia against said Indians, for injury done prior to the passage of the act of congress, regulating intercourse with Indian tribes, and praying that an act may be passed, directing the payment to the said nation of the sum of money proposed by said bill, to be paid to citizens of Georgia.

Mr. B. asked that the memorial might be read. The reading of the document having proceeded for some time,

Mr. Speight inquired whether his colleague intended to move for the printing of the document? Because, if it was to be printed, the time of the house need not be wasted in listening to the reading, since he expected, from its size, that it would occupy an hour, at least.

Mr. Branch replied, that it had been his wish to have it referred to a select committee, and if he could not succeed in such a motion, then to send it to the committee on claims. The ordinary course of reference would be, he knew, to the committee on Indian affairs, but such a reference of it he must protest against, inasmuch as that committee had prejudged the question.

Mr. Hell, chairman of the committee on Indian affairs, said that he did not know that it was any valid objection against referring the memorial to the committee on Indian affairs, that a majority of that committee differed in opinion from the Creeks on the subject to which this memorial referred, and preferred the claim of the people of Georgia to that of the Creek nation on the land in question. A bill had already been reported on the subject, and the fairest and most proper reference of this memorial would be to the same committee of the whole house, which had charge of that bill.

Mr. Branch expressing his assent to this arrangement, the memorial was referred accordingly.

On motion of Mr. Stewart, it was

Resolved, That the committee on internal improvements be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for the completion of the survey and location, and for opening the road connecting the Cumberland road with the northern lakes from Uniontown, with Cleveland, in the state of Ohio, by way of Pittsburgh.

On motion of Mr. Jarvis, it was

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act entitled "an act to provide for obtaining accurate statements of the foreign commerce of the United States" so as to procure a more prompt exhibition to this house of the information required by said act.

Mr. R. M. Johnson reported a bill abolishing imprisonment for debt—twice read and committed.

Mr. Irvin reported a bill, to amend the bill, for the relief of the purchasers of the public lands that have reverted for the non-payment of the purchase money—twice read and committed.

The report from the mint was received.

The bill authorizing the governor of Arkansas, to sell the salt springs in that territory, and for other purposes, and the resolution to repeal the resolution of April 1816, authorizing the president to employ a skilful assistant in the corps of engineers—were severally read the third time, passed, and sent to the senate.

The speaker had before the house sundry communications, viz:

I. A letter from the secretary of war, transmitting a copy of the papers in the case of Ephraim Shuler, called for by the house on the 11th inst.

II. A letter from the secretary of the navy, transmitting a statement of the contingent expenses of the navy for the year ending September 30, 1831.

III. A letter from the secretary of state, containing information in relation to the execution of the act for taking the 5th census, and accompanied by a corrected return of said census.

The two first of which were referred, and the last laid on the table.

The house, on motion of Mr. Polk, went again into committee of the whole, on the apportionment bill, Mr. Hoffman, of New York in the chair.

A debate ensued.

Mr. Polk advocated the number 48,000, though he expressed a hope that the question might be taken on striking out that number.

After Messrs. Craig, Burges and Burwinger had spoken, the question was taken on Mr. Stewart's amendment to insert the number 46,000, and decided in the negative.

After some remarks from Messrs. Stewart, Root and Polk, the question was at length taken on the motion of Mr. Craig to strike out the number 48,000 from the bill; which motion was decided in the negative—yeas 84, nays 93.

So the committee determined that the number 48,000 should be retained.

Mr. Clay thereupon moved that the committee rise, and report the bill without amendment; when the question was about to be taken,

Mr. Hubbard, of N. H. moved to amend by striking out the number 48 and inserting 44,000.

Messrs. Adams, Hubbard, Meier, Dearborn, Rais and Scriffer supported the proposition of Mr. Hubbard; Mr. Cowan and Mr. Polk were in favor of 48,000.

Mr. Wayne moved that the committee rise—Mr. Hayne's motion prevailing, the committee rose and reported progress, and the house adjourned.

Wednesday Jan. 18. The house resumed the consideration of Mr. Bouldin's resolutions.

Mr. Stewart resumed the course of his remarks, which had been suspended yesterday. Before he had concluded, the chair declared that the discussion was taking too wide a range.

Mr. Cambreleng protested against any remarks of his, in reply to Mr. Davis, being made the pretext for a long tariff debate.

Mr. Stewart concluded by offering an amendment to the amendment of Mr. Davis, which he supposed to be before the house.

The chair having declared this not to be the case.

Mr. Davis thereupon moved his amendment in the words following:

Strike out all before and all after the word "resolved," and insert the following: "That the committee on manufactures be instructed to inquire into and report to this house, (if they possess the information), the practical effect of the revenue laws upon the commerce, agriculture and manufactures of this country. Also, whether frauds are not perpetrated in the importation of goods, and the revenue thereby reduced, and how such frauds may be suppressed. Also, whether the statute value of the pound sterling ought not to be so modified as to conform to the actual value in the United States, and to accompany their report, if they shall make one, by the evidence upon which it shall be predicated."

The amendment being read—

Mr. Wickliffe, after expressing his gratification that his friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Stewart), had yielded to the indication of the will of the house, declared himself to be in favor of obtaining as much information, on both sides of the tariff question, as could be got; and his conviction that the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia had been honestly offered—and would elicit facts important as well to the opponents as to the advocates of the protecting system, with whom he had heretofore acted, and with whom he expected to act again, though not to the extent that they might desire, proceeded to move the previous question.

Mr. Davis requested that he would withdraw his motion, that he might offer some remarks in support of his amendment—but Mr. Wickliffe refusing to do so, the question was put, and the motion for the previous question was seconded—yays 96; nays 77.

Mr. Vance thereupon demanded that the previous question should be taken by yeas and nays, which was ordered.

The speaker then propounded the previous question in the words following: "Shall the main question now be put?" N. B. The main question was on agreeing to Mr. Bouldin's resolution without amendment, and it was decided by yeas and nays—Yeas 93, nays 96.

So the house decided that the main question should not be put, which decision, according to a rule of order, removes the subject to which it relates from the consideration of the house for one day.

The engrossed bill for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line and navy, and of the continental army, during the revolutionary war, was read the third time and passed.

The house then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, and on motion of Mr. Polk, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Hoffman in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the apportionment bill; the question being on the motion of Mr. Hubbard, of N. Hampshire, to amend the bill by striking out the number 48 and inserting the number 44.

Mr. Speight of N. Carolina addressed the house in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Grennell, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Lecompt, of Kentucky, were in favor of it.

Mr. Doubleday, and Mr. Clifton Allan, Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Clay were in favor of the larger number.

Mr. Tracy and Mr. Thomas and Mr. Burd of Pennsylvania, also spoke, the latter at length in favor of the amendment.

Mr. Briggs, of Massachusetts, next obtained the floor; but, it being now past 4 o'clock, after a few prefatory words, he moved that the committee rise.

It rose accordingly, and reported progress; when the house immediately adjourned.

Thursday Jan. 19. Mr. Burgess reported a bill for the benefit of certain invalid pensioners—also a bill regulating the commencement of invalid pensions—which bills were severally twice read and committed.

Mr. Adams, from the committee on manufactures, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to obtain information as to the quantities and kinds of the several articles manufactured in the United States during the year, particularly those of iron, cotton, wool, hemp and sugar, and the cost thereof; and also the quantities and cost of similar articles imported from abroad during the same year; and that he lay the same before this house as early as may be practicable during the present session of congress, together with such information as he may deem material, and such suggestions as he may think useful, with a view to the adjustment of the tariff, after the payment of the public debt.

Mr. Adams stated that he had been instructed by the committee to ask of the house, that the rule which requires that calls on the department should lie for one day on the table, should in this case be suspended, in order that the resolution might be acted upon without delay.

The question being put, the house agreed to suspend the rule, and to consider the resolution at this time.

After some debate, as to the identity of Mr. Adams' resolution with one moved some days since by Mr. McDuffie, calling for information of a similar character, the house agreed in Mr. A's resolution.

The house then took up the resolution of Mr. McDuffie, and agreed to it.

Mr. Jarvis moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the library be instructed to inquire into and report to this house the causes of the delay in the printing of the reports of war, navy and treasury departments, and of the journal of the house.

A debate ensued Mr. Carson and Mr. Davis, treated the resolution as an extraordinary one. Mr. Jarvis supported it.

The bill empowering the secretary of the treasury to compromise the claims of the United States on the commercial bank of Erie, came up as the unfinished business of yesterday morning, and the debate upon it was resumed.

After Messrs. Cambreleng, Ingersoll, Whittlesey, Hoffman and McDuffie had spoken, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till Tuesday next.

The apportionment bill was taken up in committee of the whole, and after debate, the committee rose, and reported progress—when the house adjourned.

MR. CLAY'S SPEECH.

In senate, Wednesday, January 11, 1832.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. Clay on Monday last, being the special order of the day, was taken up for consideration.

Resolved, That the existing duties upon articles imported from foreign countries, and not coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, ought to be forthwith abolished, except the duties upon wines and silks, and that those ought to be reduced. And that the committee on finance be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

The resolution having been read, Mr. Clay rose and addressed the senate, in substance, as follows:

I have a few observations, Mr. President, and only a few, to submit to the senate, on the measure now before you; in doing which I have to ask all your indulgence, I am getting old; I feel but too sensibly and unaffectedly the effects of approaching age; and I have been, for some years, very little in the habit of addressing deliberative assemblies. I am told that I have been the cause—the most unwilling cause, if I have been, of exciting expectations, the evidence of which is around us. I regret it; for however the subject on which I am to speak, in other hands might be treated to gratify or to reward the presence and attention now given, in mine, I have nothing but a plain, unvarnished and unambitious exposition to make.

It forms no part of my present purpose, said Mr. C. to enter into a consideration of the established policy of protection. Strong in the convictions, and deeply seated in the affections of a large majority of the people of the United States, it stands self-validated, in the general prosperity, in the rich trusts which it has scattered over the land, in the experience of all prosperous and powerful nations, present and past, and now, in that of our own. Nor do I think it necessary to discuss that policy on this resolution. Other gentlemen may think differently, and may choose to argue and assail it. If they do, I have no doubt that, in all parts of the senate, members more competent than I am, will be ready to defend and support it. My object now is to limit myself to a presentation of certain views and principles connected with the present financial condition of the country.

A consideration of the state of the public revenue has become necessary in consequence of the near approach of the entire extinction of the public debt, and I concur with you, sir, in believing that no season could be more appropriate than the present session of congress to endeavor to make a satisfactory adjustment of the tariff. The public debt chiefly arose out of the late war, justly denominated the second contest for national independence. An act, commonly called the sinking fund act, was passed by congress near fifteen years ago, providing for its reimbursement. That act was prepared and proposed by a friend of yours and mine, whose premature death was not a loss merely to his native state, of which he was one of its brightest ornaments, but to the whole nation. No man, with whom I ever had the honor to be associated in the legislative councils, combined more extensive and useful information, with more firmness of judgment and blandness of manner, than did the lamented Mr. Lowndes. And when, in the prime of life, by the dispensation of an all-wise Providence, he was taken from us, his country had reason to anticipate the greatest benefits from his wisdom and discretion. By that act, an annual appropriation of ten millions of dollars was made towards the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt; and also any excess which might yearly be in the treasury, beyond two millions of dollars, which it was thought prudent to reserve for unforeseen exigencies.

But this system of regular and periodical application of public revenue to the payment of the public debt, would have been unavailing, if congress had neglected to provide the necessary ways and means. Congress did not, however, neglect the performance of that duty. By various acts, and more especially by the tariff of 1824—the abused tariff of 1824—the public coffers were amply replenished, and we have been enabled to reach our present proud eminence of financial prosperity. Altho' congress had thus abundantly provided funds, and directed their systematic application, the duty remaining to be performed by the executive was one simply ministerial. And no executive and no administration can justly claim for itself any other merit in the discharge of the public debt, than that of a faithful execution of the laws. No other merit than that similar one to which it is entitled for directing a regular payment of what is due from time to time to the army and navy, or to the officers of the civil government for their salaries.

The operation of the sinking fund act commenced with the commencement of Mr. Monroe's administration. During its continuance of eight years, owing to the embarrassments of the treasury, the ten millions were not regularly applied to the payment of the debt; and, upon the termination of that administration, the treasury stood largely in arrear to the sinking fund. During the subsequent administration of four years, not only was the ten millions faithfully applied during each year, but those arrears were brought up and all previous deficiencies made good. So that, when the present administration began, a plain unincumbered and well defined path lay directly before it. Under the measures which have been devised, in the short term of fifteen years, the government has paid nearly one hundred millions of principal and about an equal sum of interest, leaving the small remnant behind of twenty-four mil-

Of that remnant, thirteen millions consist of the 3 per cent. stock, created by the act of 1790, which the government does not stand bound to redeem at any prescribed time, but which it may discharge whenever it suits its own convenience; and when it is discharged it must be done by the payment of dollar for dollar. I cannot think, and, I should suppose, congress can hardly believe, with the secretary of the treasury, that it would be wise to pay off a stock of thirteen millions, entitling its holders to but three per cent. with a capital of thirteen millions worth an interest of six per cent. In other words, to take from the pockets of the people two dollars to pay one, in the hands of the stockholder.

The moral value of the payment of a national debt, consists in the demonstration which it affords of the ability of a country to meet, and its integrity in fulfilling all its engagements. That the resources of this country, increasing as it constantly is in population and wealth, are abundantly sufficient to meet any debt which it may ever prudently contract cannot be doubted. And its punctuality and probity, from the period of the assumption, in 1790, of the debt of the revolution down to the present time, rest upon a solid and uncontestable foundation. The danger, perhaps, is not that it will not fairly meet its engagements, but that from an inordinate avidity, arising from temporary causes, it may bring discredit upon itself by imprudent arrangements, which no prudent man, in the management of his private affairs, would ever think of adopting.

Of the residue of that twenty-four millions of debt, after deducting the thirteen millions of three per cent., less than two millions are due, and of right payable within the present year. If to that sum be added the moiety which becomes due on the 31st of December next of the $4,454,727, created by the act of 26th May, 1824, we have but a sum of about four millions which the public creditor can lawfully demand, or which the government is bound to pay in the course of this year. If more is paid, it can only be done by anticipating the periods of its payment, and going into the public market to purchase the stock. Can it be doubted that if you do so, the vigilant holder of the stock, taking advantage of your anxiety, will demand a greater price than its value? Already we perceive that the three per cent. have risen to the extraordinary height of 96 per cent. The difference between a payment of the inconsiderable portion remaining of the public debt, in one, two, or three years, is certainly not so important as to justify a resort to highly disadvantageous terms.

Whoever may be entitled to the credit of the payment of the public debt, I congratulate you, sir, and the country, most cordially, that it is so near at hand. It is so near being totally extinguished, that we may now safely inquire whether without prejudice to any established policy, we may not relieve the consumption of the country, by the repeal or reduction of duties, and curtail considerably the public revenue. In making this inquiry, the first question which presents itself is, whether it is expedient to preserve the existing duties in order to accumulate a surplus in the treasury for the purpose of subsequent distribution among the several states? I think not. If the collection, for the purpose of such a surplus, is to be made from the pockets of one portion of the people, to be ultimately returned to the same pockets, the process would be attended with the certain loss arising from the charges of collection, and with the loss also of interest while the money is performing the unnecessary circuit; and it would therefore be unwise. If it is to be collected from one portion of the people and given to another, it would be unjust. If it is to be given to the states, in their corporate capacity, to be used by them in their public expenditure, I know of no principle in the constitution which authorizes the federal government to become such a collector for the states, nor of any principle of safety or propriety which admits of the states becoming such recipients of gratuity from the general government.

The public revenue, then, should be regulated and adapted to the proper service of the general government. It should be ample; for a deficit in the public income, always to be deplored, is sometimes attended, as we know well from history, and from what has happened in our own time, with fatal consequences. In a country so rapidly growing as this is, with such diversified interests, new wants and unexpected calls upon the public treasury must frequently occur. Take some examples from this session. The state of Virginia has presented a claim, for an amount but little short of a million, which she presses with an earnestness demonstrating her conviction of its justice. The state of South Carolina has also a claim for no inconsiderable sum, being upwards of $100,000, which she urges with equal earnestness. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Watkins) has brought forward a claim, arising out of French spoliation previous to the convention of 1800, which is perhaps not short of five millions, and to some extent I have no doubt it has a just foundation. In any provision of a public revenue, congress ought so to fix it as to admit of the payment of honest and proper demands, which its justice cannot reject or evade.

I hope too that either in the adjustment of the public revenue or, what would be preferable, in the appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands, a effectual and permanent provision will be made for such internal improvements as may be sanctioned by congress. This is due to the American people, and emphatically due to the western people. Sir, temporary causes may exact a reluctant acquiescence from the people of the west, in the suspension of appropriations to objects of internal improvement, but as certain as you preside in that chair, or as the sun performs its diurnal revolution, they will not be satisfied with an abandonment of the policy. They will come here and tell you, not in a tone of menace or supplication, but in the language of conscious right, that they must share with you in the benefits, as they divide with you the burthens and the perils of a common government. They will say that they have no direct interest in the expenditures for the navy, the fortifications, nor even the army, those greatest absorbents of the public treasure. That they are not indifferent, indeed, to the safety and prosperity of any part of our common country. On the contrary, that every portion of the republic is indirectly, at least, interested in the welfare of the whole; and that they ever sympathize in the distresses and rejoice in the happiness of the most distant quarter of the union. And to demonstrate that they are not careless or indifferent to interests not directly their own, they may triumphantly and proudly appeal to the gallant part which they bore in the late war, and point to the bloody fields on which some of their most patriotic sons nobly fell fighting in the common cause. But they will also say that these fraternal and just sentiments ought to be reciprocated by their Atlantic brethren. That these ought not to be indifferent to the welfare of the west, and that they have the same collateral or indirect interest in its success and advancement that the west has in theirs. That it does not ask internal improvements to be exclusively confined to itself, but that it may receive, in common with the rest of the union, a practical benefit in the only form compatible with its interior condition.

The appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands, or a considerable portion of them, to that object, would be a most natural and suitable disposition. And I do hope, sir, that that great resource will be cherished and dedicated to some national purpose worthy of the republic. Utterly opposed as, I trust, congress will shew itself to be to all the mad and wild schemes—and to that latest, but maddest and wildest of all, recommended by the secretary of the treasury—for squandering the public domain, I hope it will be preserved for the present generation and for posterity, as it has been received from our ancestors, a rich and bountiful inheritance. In these halcyon days of peace and plenty, and an overflowing treasury, we appear to embarrass ourselves in devising visionary schemes for casting away the bounties with which the goodness of Providence has blessed us. But, sir, the storm of war will come, when we know not the day of trial and difficulty will assuredly come, and now is the time, by a prudent foresight, to husband our resources, and this, the greatest of them all. Let them not be hoarded and hugged with a miser's embrace, but liberally used. Let the public lands be administered in a generous spirit, and especially towards the states within which they are situated. Let the proceeds of the sales of the public lands be applied in a senson of peace, to some great object; and when war does come, by suspending that application of them, during its continuance, you will be at once put in possession of means for its vigorous prosecution. More than twenty-five years ago, when first I took a seat in this body, I was told, by the fathers of the government, that, if we had any thing perfect in our institutions, it was the system for disposing of the public lands, and I was exultant against such innovations in it. Subsequent experience fully satisfied me of the wisdom of their counsels, and that all vital changes in it ought to be resisted.

Although it may be impracticable to say what the exact amount of the public revenue should be, for the future, and what would be the precise produce of any given system of imposts, we may safely assume, that the revenue may now be reduced, and considerably reduced. This reduction may be effected in various ways, and on different principles. Only three modes shall now be noticed.

1st. To reduce duties on all articles, in the same ratio, without regard to the principle of protection.

2d. To retain them on the unprotected articles, and augment them on the protected articles.

And, 3d. To abolish and reduce the duties on unprotected articles, retaining and enforcing the faithful collection of those on the protected articles.

To the first mode there are insuperable objections. It would lead inevitably to the destruction of our home manufactures. It would establish a sort of bisul of Protection, by which the duties on all articles should be blindly measured, without respect to their nature or the extent of their consumption. And it would be derogatory from every principle of theory or practice on which the government has hitherto proceeded.

The second would be still more objectionable to the foes of the tariff than either of the others. But it cannot be controverted that, by augmenting considerably the duties on the protected class, so as to carry them to the point, or near to the confines of absolute prohibition, the object in view, of effecting the necessary reduction of the public revenue, may be accomplished without touching the duties on the unprotected class. The consequence of such an augmentation would be a great diminution in the importation of the foregoing article, and of course in the duties upon it. But against entire prohibition, except perhaps in a few instances, I have been always, and still am, opposed. By leaving the door open to the foreign rival article, the benefit is secured of a salutary competition. If it be hermetically closed, the danger is incurred of monopoly.

The third mode is the most equitable and reasonable, and it presents an undebatable ground, on which I had hoped we could all safely tread, without difficulty. It exacts no sacrifice of principle from the opponent of the American system; it comprehends none on the part of its friends. The measure before you embraces this mode. It is simple, and free from all complexity. It divides the whole subject of imposts according to its nature. It settles at once what ought not to be disputed, and leaves to be settled hereafter, if necessary, what may be controverted.

A certain part of the south has hitherto complained that it pays a disproportionate amount of the imposts. If the complaint be well founded, by the adoption of this measure it will be relieved at once, as will be hereafter shewn, from at least a fourth of its burthens. The measure is in conformity with the uniform practice of the government, from its commencement, and with the professions of all the eminent politicians of the south, until of late. It assumes the right of the government, in the assessment of duties, to discriminate between those articles which sound policy requires it to foster, and those which it need not encourage. This has been the invariable principle, on which the government has proceeded, from the act of congress of the 4th of July, 1789, down to the present time. And has it not been admitted by almost every prominent southern politician? Has it not been even acknowledged by the fathers of the free trade church, in their late address promulgated, from Philadelphia, to the people of the United States? If we never had a system of foreign imposts, and were now called upon, for the first time, to originate one, should we not discriminate between the objects of our own industry, and those produced by foreigners? And is there any difference in its application, between the modification of an existing system and the origination of a new one? If the gentlemen of the south, opposed to the tariff, were to obtain complete possession of the powers of government, would they hazard their exercise upon any other principle? If it be said that some of the articles which would, by this measure, be liberated from duties, are luxuries, the remark is equally true of some of the articles remaining subject to duties. In the present advanced stage of comfort and civilization, it is not easy to draw the line between luxuries and necessities. It will be difficult to make the people believe that bohea tea is a luxury, and the article of fine broad cloths is a necessary of life.

In stating that the duties on the protected class ought to be retained, it has been far from my wish to preclude inquiry into their adequacy or propriety. If it can be shown that, in any instance, they are excessive or disproportionately burdensome on any section of the union, for one I am ready to vote for their reduction or modification. The system contemplates an adequate protection; beyond that it is not necessary to go. Short of that, its operation will be injurious to all parties.

The people of this country, or a large majority of them, expect that the system will be preserved. And its abandonment would produce general surprise, spread desolation over the land, and occasion as great a shock as a declaration of war forthwith against the most powerful nation of Europe.

But if the system be preserved, it ought to be honestly, fairly, and faithfully enforced. That there do exist the most scandalous violations of it, and the grossest frauds upon the public revenue, in regard to some of the most important articles, cannot be doubted. As to iron, objects really belonging to one denomination, to which a higher duty is attached, are imported under another name, to which a lower duty is assigned, and the law thus evaded. False invoices are made as to woollens, and the classification into minimums is constantly eluded. The success of the American manufacture of cotton bagging has been such as that, by furnishing a better and cheaper article, the bagging of Liverpool and Dundee has been almost excluded from the consumption of the states bordering on the Mississippi and its tributaries. There has not yet been sufficient time to lubricate and transport the article in necessary quantities from the western states to the southern Atlantic states, which therefore have been almost exclusively supplied from the Scottish manufacturers. The payment of the duty is evaded by the introduction of the foreign fabric, under the name of burlaps, or some other mercantile phrase, and instead of paying five cents the square yard, it is entered with a duty of only fifteen per cent. ad valorem. That this practice prevails, is demonstrated by the treasury report of the duties accruing on cotton bagging for the years 1828, 1829, and 1830. During the first year the amount was $137,506, the second $106,068, and the third it sunk down to $14,141!

The time has arrived when the inquiry ought to be seriously made, whether it be not practicable to arrest this illegitimate course of trade, and secure the faithful execution of the laws. No time could be more suitable than that at which it is contemplated to make a great reduction of the public revenue. Two radical changes have presented themselves to my mind, and which I will now suggest for consideration and investigation. On such a subject, I would, however, seek from the mercantile community and practical men, all the light which they are so capable of affording, and should be reluctant to act on my own convictions, however strong.

The first is to make a total change in the place of valuation. Now the valuation is made in foreign countries. We fix the duties, and we leave to foreigners to assess the value on articles paying ad valorem duties. That is, we prescribe the rule, and leave its execution to the foreigner. This is an anomaly, I believe, peculiar to this country. It is evident that the amount of duty payable on a given article subject to an ad valorem duty, may be effected as much by the fixation of the value, as by the specification of the duty. And, for all practical purposes, it would be just as safe to retain to ourselves the ascertainment of the value, and leave to the foreigner to prescribe the duty, as it is to reserve to ourselves the right to declare the duty and allow to him the privilege to assess the value.

The effect of this vicious condition of the law has been to throw almost the whole import trade of the country, as to some important articles, into the hands of the foreigner. I have been informed that seven-eighths of the importation of woollens into the port of New York, where more is received than in all the other ports of the United States together, are in his hands. This has not proceeded from any want of enterprise, intelligence, or capital, on the part of the American merchant; for, in these particulars, he is surpassed by the merchant of no country. It has resulted from his probity, his character, and his respect to the laws and institutions of his country—a respect which does not influence the foreigner. I am aware that it is made by law, the duty of the appraiser to ascertain the value of the goods in certain cases. But what is his chief guide? It is the foreign invoice, made by whom he knows not, certainly by no person responsible to our laws. And, if its fairness be contested, they will bring you a set-on of certificates and affidavits from unknown persons to verify its exactness, and the first cost of the article.

Now, sir, it seems to me that this is a state of things to which we should promptly apply an efficacious remedy, and no other appears to me, but that of taking into our own hands both parts of the operation, the ascertainment of the value as well as the duty to be paid on the goods. If it be said that we might have, in different ports, different rules, the answer is, that there could be no diversity greater than that to which we are liable from the fact of the valuation being now made in all the ports of foreign countries from which we make our importations. And that it is better to have the valuations made by persons, responsible to our own government, and regulated by one head, than by unknown foreigners, standing under no responsibility whatever to us.

The other change to which I allude, is to reduce the credits allowed for the payment of duties and to render them uniform. It would be better, if not injurious to commerce, to abolish them altogether. Now we have various periods of credit graduated according to the distance of the foreign port, and the nature of the trade. These credits operate as so much capital on which the foreign merchant can sometimes make several adventures before the arrival of the day of payment. There is no reciprocal advantage afforded to the American merchant, I believe, in any foreign port. As we shall probably abolish or reduce greatly the duties on all articles imported from beyond the cape of Good Hope, on which the longest credits are allowed, the moment would seem to be propitious for restricting the other credits in such manner, that whilst they afforded a reasonable facility to the merchant, they should not supply the foreigner at the instance of the public, with capital for his mercantile operations. If the laws can be strictly enforced, and some such alterations as have been suggested, can be carried into effect, it is quite probable that a satisfactory reduction may be made of the duties upon some of the articles falling within the system of protection. And, without impairing its principle, other modes of relief may possibly be devised to some of those interests upon which it is supposed to press most heavily.

There remains one view to present to the senate in respect to the amount of reduction of the revenue which will be produced by the proposed measure if adopted, and its influence upon the payment of the public debt within the time suggested by the secretary of the treasury. The estimate which I have made of that amount is founded upon treasury returns prior to the late reduction of duties on tea, coffee, and cocoa. Supposing the duties on wines and silks to be reduced as low as I think they may be, the total amount of revenue with which the proposed measure will dispense will be about $7,000,000. The secretary of the treasury estimates the receipts of the present year from all sources at $30,100,000, and he supposes those of the next year will be of an equal amount. He acknowledges that the past year has been one of extraordinary commercial activity; but on what principles does he anticipate that the present will also be? The history of our commerce demonstrates that it alternates, and that a year of intemperate speculation is usually followed by one of more guarded importation. That the importations of the past year have been excessive I believe is generally confessed, and is demonstrated by two unerring facts. The first is that the imports have exceeded the exports by about seventeen millions of dollars. Whatever may be the qualifications to which the theory of the balance of trade may be liable, it may be safely affirmed, that when the aggregate of the importations from all foreign countries exceeds the aggregate of the exportations to all foreign countries considerably, the unfavorable balance must be made up by a remittance of the precious metals to some extent. Accordingly we find the existence of the other fact to which I allude, the high price of bills of exchange on England. It is, therefore, fairly to be anticipated that the duties accruing this year will be less in amount than those of the past year. And I think it would be unwise to rely upon our present information as to the income of either of these two years as furnishing a safe guide for the future. The years 1829 and 1830 will supply a surer criterion. There is a remarkable coincidence in the amount of the receipts into the treasury during those two years, it having been the first from all sources $24,827,627 38, and the second $24,844,116 51, differing only about $17,000.

The mode recommended by the secretary, for the modification of the tariff is to reduce no part of the duties on the unprotected articles, prior to March 1833, and then to retain a considerable portion of them. And as to the protected class, he would make a gradual but prospective reduction of the duties. The effect of this would be to destroy the protecting system by a slow but certain poison. The object, being to reduce the revenue, every descending degree in the scale of his plan of gradual reduction, by letting in more of the foreign article to displace the domestic rival fabric, would increase the revenue and begot a necessity for further and further reduction of duties until they would be carried so low as to end in the entire subversion of the system of protection.

For the reasons which have been assigned it would, I think be unwise in congress at this time to assume, for the future, that there would be a greater amount of nett annual revenue, from all sources, including the public lands, than $25,000,000. Deducted from that sum the amount of seven millions which it has been supposed ought to be subtracted, if the resolution before you should be adopted there would remain $18,000,000 as the probable revenue for future years. This includes the sum of three millions estimated as the future annual receipt from the sale of the public lands—an estimate which I believe will be demonstrated by experience to be much too large.

If a reduction so large as seven millions be made at this session; and if the necessary measures be also adopted to detect and punish frauds, and ensure a faithful execution of the laws, we may safely make a temporary pause, and await the development of the effect upon the revenue of these arrangements. That the authority of the laws should be vindicated, all ought to agree. Now, the fraudulent importer, after an exposure of his fraud, by a most strange treasury construction of the law, (made I understand, however, not by the present secretary), eludes all punishment, and is only required to pay those very duties which he was originally bound for, but which he dishonestly sought to evade. Other measures, with a view to a further reduction of the revenue, may be adopted. In some instances, there might be an augmentation of duties for that purpose. I will mention the article of foreign distilled spirits. In no other country upon earth is there so much of the foreign article imported as in this. The duties ought to be doubled, and the revenue thereby further reduced from $600,000 to a million. The public morals, the grain growing country, the fruit-raising, and the cane-planting country, would be all benefited by rendering the duty prohibitory. I have not proposed the measure, because, it, perhaps, ought to originate in the other house.

That the measure which I have proposed may be adopted, without interfering with the plan of the secretary for the treasury for the payment of the public debt by the 4th of March next, I will now proceed to show.

The secretary estimates that the receipts of the present year, after meeting all other just engagements, will leave a surplus of 14 millions applicable to the payment of the principal of the debt. With this sum, 8 millions which he proposes to derive from the sale of the bank stock, and 2 millions which he would anticipate from the revenue of the next year, he suggests that the whole of the debt remaining may be discharged by the time indicated. The 14 millions, I understand, (although on this subject the report is not perfectly explicit), are receipts anticipated this year from duties which accrued last year. If this be the secretary's meaning, it is evident that he wants no part of the duties which may accrue during the current year to execute his plan. But if his meaning be, that the fourteen millions will be composed in part of duties accruing and payable within the present year, then the measure proposed might prevent the payment of the whole of the remnant of the debt by the exact day which has been stated. If, however, the entire seven millions, embraced by the resolution on your table, were subtracted from the fourteen, it would still leave him seven millions, besides the bank stock, to be applied to the debt, and that, of itself, would be three millions more than can be properly applied to the object, in the course of this year, as I have already endeavored to shew.

I came here, sir, most anxiously desiring that an arrangement of the public revenue should be made, which, without sacrificing any of the great interests of the country, would reconcile and satisfy all its parts. I thought I perceived in the class of objects not produced within the country, a field on which we could all enter, in a true and genuine spirit of compromise and harmony, and agree upon an amicable adjustment. Why should it not be done? Why should those who are opposed to the American System demand of its friends an unconditional surrender? Our common object should be so to reduce the public revenue as to relieve the burthens of the people, if indeed the people of this country can be truly said to be burthened. The government must have a certain amount of revenue, and that amount must be collected from the imports. Is it material to the consumer, wherever situated, whether the collection be made upon a few or many objects, provided whatever be the mode, the amount of his contribution to the public exchequer remains the same? If the assessment can be made on objects which will greatly benefit large portions of the union, without injury to him, why should he object to the selection of those objects? Yes, sir, I came here in a spirit of warm attachment to all parts of our beloved country, with a lively solicitude to restore and preserve its harmony, and with a firm determination to pour oil and balm into existing wounds, rather than further to lacerate them. For the truth and sincerity of these declarations, I appeal to HIM whom none can deceive. I expected to be met by corresponding dispositions, and hoped that our deliberations, guided by fraternal sentiments and feelings, would terminate in diffusing contentment and satisfaction throughout the land. And that such may be the spirit presiding over them, and such their issue, I yet most fervently hope.

When Mr. Clay took his seat—

Mr. Hayne rose. He did not rise, he said, to enter at this time into the discussion of the question. Perhaps he should not, at any time, be disposed to follow the gentleman through the wide field which he had occupied. He certainly had no such intention now: he rose merely to make a motion, and should, in the fewest words possible, state the reasons which had induced him to do so.

The question presented by the resolution, Mr. Hayne said was not only one of deep interest to the whole country, but he was persuaded it was, by far, the most important that could command the attention of congress during the present session. The period to long and so anxiously looked for and desired, had at length arrived. The public debt was paid, for so gentlemen on all sides had agreed to consider it, and the question necessarily arose, what adjustment of the tariff of duties was to be made in this new and most gratifying condition of our affairs. Upwards of 12,000,000 dollars per annum, nearly one half of the entire amount of the public debt, will, (when the debt is paid), cease to be a charge upon the country, and to this extent at least, the people have a right to expect an immediate reduction of their burdens. But what does the resolution now before us propose? That duties to the amount of only six or seven mill one should be taken off, and that the reduction shall be exclusively confined to articles which do not enter into competition with similar articles produced at home; in other words, articles of universal consumption, and, in relation to which, every class of the people, and every portion of the country, contribute equally, should be relieved entirely from all taxation, while the high duties on the protected articles were to remain untouched. In a word, that the bands of that mammoth system of injustice and oppression, (he meant no offence, but he spoke as he felt) were to remain unrelaxed—a system which was left and acknowledged in one quarter of the country as a boon and a bounty, and in another as an insupportable burden—a system which (it is in the language of the senator from Kentucky), it had "scattered its rich fruits" over any portion of the land, had visited others with its consuming curses.

It could not be denied that the true question here presented was, whether the protecting system was to be wholly untouched, and to be rivetted upon the country beyond all hope of relief? And, in this aspect of the question, he must solemnly declare that he considered it as one involving the prosperity, he could say, pregnant with the future destinies of this country; for, however this system may have operated elsewhere, it was the deep and settled conviction of those whom he represented, that it had acted upon them as a blight and a pestilence, blasting the fairest fields on which the eye of man had ever rested.

The gentleman from Kentucky had intimated that he had hoped that his proposition might have presented a common ground on which all parties might have met. But, how was it possible for gentlemen to suppose that we should meet on ground which involved no concession whatever to our views, but which proposed to maintain the protecting system in all its unmitigated rigor, thus aggravating instead of diminishing the inequality and injustice of which we so strongly and so justly complained. The gentleman had, indeed, said that the propriety of some reduction might, perhaps, hereafter be considered; not now, however, when the debt was about to be paid, and the tariff re-adjusted and fixed on a permanent basis, but at some future and "more convenient season." But what hope is it to be built on this declaration, when the gentleman, in the very same breath, tells us that no considerable or sudden reduction could ever take place. No, that would be destruction; and as to the gradual and moderate reduction recommended by the secretary of the treasury, that would be even worse than the other—it would, said the gentleman, be a slow and sure poison, leading to inevitable destruction. It follows, then, clearly, that we are to have no reduction of the protecting duties, whatever, either now, or at any future period. In this view of the question, he must repeat, he considered it the most awfully momentous subject that had ever been presented in the course of the history of this government; and believing that it required the greatest deliberation, he wished the attention of the senate to be seriously called to it, that it might be maturely considered, and wisely decided. In the presence of this august body, and before his God, he would repeat his deep conviction that the consequences to grow out of the adjustment of this great question involved the future destinies of this country; and in order that we should approach it with wary steps, and becoming caution, he would now move that the further consideration of the resolution should be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

GIRARD'S COLLEGE.

From the American Daily Advertiser.

The property absolutely settled by Mr. Girard upon the college, will produce an income of $150,000 a year.

This will not be diminished by the buildings, or by the purchase of a library, or philosophical apparatus for the interest of the capital will pay for all the buildings, &c. &c. while they are in progress.

Suppose there be 1,000 pupils. They will be sometimes employed in farming and other labor, toward their own subsistence—and it is probably a full estimate to set down, for all the expenses of feeding and clothing and stationery, $75 each per annum $75,000

Suppose there be appointed

1 Provost, with a salary of	$ 5,000
1 Vice provost, do	3,000
10 Professors, $3,000 each	$30,000
40 Tutors, $300 each	12,000
Balance unexpended	25,000
	$75,000

$150,000

My object is not to sketch a plan for the college, but by a few calculations to show what great room there is to make this college (so manifestly endowed) the best in the United States. It is capable of supporting 1,300 pupils, and liberally providing the best talent in the country for the professorship, &c. Let us take another view of the matter:

Supposing the college fairly in operation, with 1,200 pupils. They remain, on an average, 8 years. There will be every year 150 thoroughly educated young men, (except so far as regards Greek and Latin), sent into the population of Philadelphia, to become mechanics, or to earn their bread by their own industry some other way.

In 14 years there will then be 2,000 citizens of 30 years old and under, from this college. How great will their influence be at elections! This will not be a class of persons to be made use of by trading politicians, or designing men, of any other stamp. These will not be persons who will run themselves by aspiring after fashion. It is probable that there will be many Girards, and perhaps some Franklins among them.

How great will be the influence of their example upon the under-educated persons in their own rank of life! What improvements in the arts! What discoveries in science may we not hope for from them!

How much depends upon the manner in which the princely bequest is expended! Citizens of Philadelphia, it is a subject that should daily occupy your thoughts.

[The value of the estate left is variously stated. Some estimate it as high as fifteen millions of dollars—which, at 6 per cent. would be equal to 900,000 dollars a year! But the real amount is not ascertained. We have before us a "second schedule" of his real estate devised to the city of Philadelphia—it must be worth millions—we cannot give the details, at present. It contains considerably more than one hundred houses, and a large number of tracts of lands, adjacent to the city, making up an aggregate of 610 acres, besides a farm in the neighborhood of 900 acres! We must suppose that his donation to Philadelphia, will entirely relieve the people of taxes forever,—may, allow large sums to be expended in improvements, if the legacy be managed with ordinary prudence.]

FINANCES OF NEW YORK.

COMPTROLLER'S REP. RT.

The annual report of the comptroller was made to the assembly on Wednesday. The document is two volumes, to admit of its insertion entire, while our columns are necessarily so much occupied by the other legislative proceedings. We therefore make room at the following brief abstract, as presenting in a small compass the most interesting facts in relation to the finances of the state.

The nominal capital of the general fund, as exhibited in the report, is

Dolls. 1,131,026 05

By a law of the last session, the comptroller was directed to ascertain, from an actual examination of the securities in his office, the amount of the actual value of the capital of this fund, separate from those portions included within its nominal capital, which are supposed to be doubtful, or are known to be bad. The report exhibits the real value, thus ascertained, to be

803,201 63

Leaving a difference between the nominal and real value of the capital of the fund of $327,724 43. This difference is accounted for principally by a detailed statement annexed to the report.

The capital of the school fund is represented as being entirely sound and productive, with the exception of $60,000 Middle district bank stock, and is stated at $1,754,150 00

The capital of the literature fund, devoted to the aid of academies and the higher classes of schools, is represented to be also sound and productive, and is stated at Doll. 163,407 96

The capital of the bank fund is only the contribution of the first year after its establishment, and when but a very small portion of the capital now contributing to it was subjected to the provisions of the law establishing the fund, and is

THE NAVY BILL.

The following is the project of the naval committee of the house of representatives, submitted by Mr. Branch, on the 11th instant.

A bill to organize the navy of the United States.
Be it enacted &c. That the officers of the navy of the United States shall consist of not less than one admiral; two rear admiral;

rels; thirty captains; thirty masters commandant two hundred and thirty lieutenants; four hundred midshipmen, including those who have passed examination; thirty-five surgeons; fifty assistant surgeons; thirty-five purgers; twelve chaplains; twenty-five sailing masters; twenty schoolmasters; twenty-four boat-swains; twenty-four gunners; twenty-four carpenters; twenty sailmakers.

And the president of the United States is hereby authorized and required to appoint the admiral and vice admirals hereby created, by and with the advice and consent of the senate; and the other officers shall be reduced to the number above mentioned, so soon as vacancies shall occur from death, resignation, or removal; and until the number shall be so reduced, no promotions shall be made to supply such vacancies as may happen.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the president of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, whenever the public service may, in his judgment require it, to increase the number of each of the classes of officers below the rank of rear admiral. Provided, The number of the respective classes in no case exceed the following, that is to say:

Forty captains; fifty masters commandant; two hundred and fifty lieutenants; five hundred midshipmen, including those who have passed examination; forty five surgeons; sixty assistant surgeons; forty purgers; fifteen chaplains; thirty sailing masters; twenty-five schoolmasters; thirty-five boat-swains; thirty-five gunners; thirty-five carpenters; thirty sailmakers.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the following, without any other pay, allowance or emolument, shall be the share pay of officers when not employed on actual service at sea, that is to say:—

Each admiral,	Dolls, 4,000 per annum
Each rear admiral,	3,000
Each captain,	2,000
Each master commandant,	1,000
Each schoolmaster engaged at a yard 750 dollars, and not at a yard, 350 dollars per annum; and the pay of all other officers shall be as heretofore fixed by law.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the following, without any other pay, allowance, or emolument, shall be the sea pay, or the pay of officers when employed in actual service at sea, that is to say:

Each admiral, 5,000 dollars.
Each rear admiral, 4,500 dollars.
A captain commanding a squadron of 150 guns and upwards, 4,000 dollars.
A captain commanding a squadron mounting less than 150 guns, 3,500 dollars per annum.
A captain commanding a ship of the line, 3,200 dollars.
A captain commanding a frigate of the first class, 3,000 dollars.
A captain commanding a frigate of the second class, 2,800 dollars.
A master commandant, 2,200 dollars.
A lieutenant commanding a brig or schooner or acting as first lieutenant of a ship of the line, 1,600 dollars per annum.
A first lieutenant of a frigate, 1,400 dollars per annum.
A first lieutenant of a sloop of war, 1,200 dollars per annum.
A first lieutenant of a brig or schooner, 1,200 dollars per annum.
A sailing master of a ship of the line 950 dollars per annum.
A chaplain at sea 1,000 dollars per annum.
A boat-swain, gunner, sailmaker, or carpenter, of a ship of the line 700 dollars; of a frigate, 600 dollars; of a sloop, 500 dollars per annum.
A schoolmaster 850 dollars per annum.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the president of the United States shall be, and he is hereby authorized to cause such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with existing laws, as he may judge expedient for the government of the navy; for the promotion of discipline and economy; and for the observance of duty in all classes; and for securing the faithful application of the funds appropriated for the navy—to be prepared. And such rules and regulations, when approved by him, and sanctioned by congress, shall have the force of law.

The bill was read twice and committed.

LEGISLATURE OF GEORGIA.

On the 23d December the house of representatives took up certain resolutions reported by Mr. Howard, from the committee on the republic, as follows:

"The committee to whom was referred sundry resolutions from the state of Delaware, in relation to the tariff of 1828, have given to those resolutions their careful attention and beg leave to recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the state of Georgia in general assembly met, That the tariff of 1828, does not accord with the spirit of the constitution of the United States, but (when the object and effect of the act is considered) is a palpable violation of it.

That it is impudent, oppressive, unequal, and destructive to the great leading interests of the south—pernicious and political.

That each state of the confederacy is in the full exercise of all rights of sovereignty, except such rights as have been granted to the United States, in the federal constitution.

That the right to impose duties upon articles of trade, for the protection of domestic industry, has not been granted to the federal government, by the states, in the federal constitution; nor can such right be yielded, so far as the people of Georgia are concerned.

That in case of a palpable and dangerous violation of the constitution, each state, in its sovereign capacity, has a right to judge for itself, and pronounce upon the constitutionality of the acts of the congress of the United States; and each state in its sovereign capacity, has the right to judge of and act upon the mode as well as the nature of its redress.

That when in the course of federal legislation, it becomes necessary for a state to pronounce upon the constitutionality of an act of congress, and to prescribe to herself the mode, as well as the measure of her redress, it is a question not of right, that question being settled, but a question of expediency, having exclusive reference to the consequences which may grow out of the exertion of that right.

The first resolution was adopted, yeas 92, nays 11.

The second, third and fourth resolutions were adopted without a division.

When the 5th was read, a motion was made to lay that, and the 6th on the table for the remainder of the session, and after discussion between Messrs. Howard, Ryan, Hopkins, and Glascock, the question was taken and decided, yeas 87, nays 29.

[The fate of the 5th and 6th of these resolutions (says the Richmond Whig), is among the phenomena of the time. Undoubtedly, these two resolutions embrace the animating principle, the very heart's blood, of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions—to deny it, is to make the doctrines of the Jefferson school all vox et preterea nihil—a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. And who is it that rejects them? Georgia, of all others, the state, which besides that she has ever professed the superiority, is the only one that has actually enforced them. Under what influence has she thus acted? Fear of the name of nullification—not the thing, for that Georgia loves and practices—but fear of the name, and a wish not to injure Gen. Jackson. Never was there a more lucky hit, than christening the doctrines contended for by S. Carolina, nullification.]

This body adjourned on Saturday night, December 24, after passing a great number of acts, including the bill to abolish penitentiary imprisonment except in certain cases, and two bills for the survey and distribution of the Cherokee lands.

The report and resolutions against the rechartering of the bank of the United States, which passed the senate unanimously, were on the 23d, in the house, laid on the table for the remainder of the session. The bill for the call of a convention shared a similar fate in the senate, 37 to 31.

The first act in relation to the Cherokee lands, provides for their distribution, by lottery except the portions actually occupied by the Cherokees, and except the portions supposed to be the richest in gold mine. These last, about 1,500,000 acres in extent form the subject of the second act, which throws them into a separate lottery, to be drawn at the same time with the other. Says a correspondent of the Savannah Georgian, "it divides the reservation into lots of 40 acres, and gives to every citizen of Georgia over 18 years of age, who has resided here three years, one draw, whether he has drawn a lot previously or not, and to every married man an additional draw. The number of tickets will be about 60,000, and the price of the grants 10 dollars. All our citizens are, by the bill, permitted to have an interest and a chance for a share of this El Dorado, and the number of grants at 10 dollars will produce for the general benefit, after deducting the expenses, a fund estimated at above 300,000 dollars." This bill passed the senate by a majority of one vote only; and the house by a majority of 75 to 30.

With reference to the leading subject mentioned above, we copy the following from the "National Intelligencer" of Saturday last—

The legislature of the state of Georgia has adjourned after a tempestuous session. The most important act of the session is one providing for the survey and occupancy of the land belonging to and occupied by the Cherokees. The Recorder, a journal of high standing in the state, boldly arraigns this act as "unjust, if not impolitic," "injurious to the character of the state, and dangerous to the harmony of the union," and what seems to be considered an almost equally important objection, as "calculated to embarrass the president of the United States." The Recorder further states that "the more prudent and respectable portion of the citizens of Georgia, with but few exceptions, are decidedly opposed to a forcible survey and occupancy." Notwithstanding all which, instead of trusting to the sense of honor and to the humanity of the people of Georgia, to demand a revision of the legislature, and a revocation of this unjust, unwise and unkind—the president act, what does the recorder propose? The reader will see by the annexed extract. This act is unjust, impolitic, dangerous and dangerous to the union, it is to be what? Consumption in an act of congress! As if the higher wrong would cancel the lower!

"In this state of things, would it not be proper for the present congress to arrest the evil by saying to the Cherokees, you must and shall sell to the United States, for the use of Georgia—we will give you not merely a fair price, but a liberal one—we will remove all who choose to emigrate, at the public expense—such of you as prefer to remain may take moderate recompense with the privilege of selling to the whites, and the government will pay into the treasury of Georgia the fair value of all such reserves. This is, in our opinion, a most proper subject for the action of congress—for its speedy and effectual action. It is surely better that congress should compel the Indians to remove, treating them at the same time with equity and liberality, than that a fearful conflict should be permitted to ensue between this state and the general government—and of this we apprehend serious danger."

It is no more than due to the editor of the Recorder to state that, notwithstanding this suggestion, he follows it with a vigorous, manly and eloquent appeal to those principles on which, for ourselves, we are willing to rely for a remedy for whatever wrong the legislature has just done.

Davis, Combreng, Appleton and Huntington, of the house of representatives, on matters not less interesting than Mr. Hayne has presented. An effort, however, shall be made to bring up the lee-way as soon as possible.

It will be observed, that Mr. Hayne has made a "lame and hapotent" attack upon me; not because the distinguished gentleman, (like others who have introduced my humble name on the floor of congress), lacked ability to enforce against me the most ample pressure of any wrong committed by me,—but for the reason that, like others, he had misapprehended and misstated me in his speech in the senate, and had not the ability to make his speech, for the press, read as smoothly as it would have done, had not that misapprehension or mistake have happened. Every careful reader will observe a patch on what is said about me, or discover a rent in the argument; and for what I am charged as having uttered, I shall give Mr. Hayne the first rate anti-tariff authority for having said it rightlully. But room cannot now be obtained to render justice either to myself or Mr. Hayne. He has left it decorous to introduce me to the senate,—and must be supposed the best judge of what is due to the dignity of that body, which should be the most honored of any legislative assembly in the world,—and will not have reason to complain, if I shall do more than defend myself in the matters stated.

As by Mr. Hayne's own shewing, it is possible some may be led to believe, that, by the simple act of publishing his speech I adopt his opinions—it may be proper to warn my readers against an impression so erroneous!—for, however incomprensible it may be to Mr. Hayne, my object in publishing his speech is that the people may have both sides of the argument. If I feared his logic—that object would still be pursued. But I have no more fear that his argument will capsize the American System—than that his witness, John Sarchett, a British subject, will be accepted by the American people, as their dictator in questions of national policy.

☞ The nomination of Mr. Van Buren, as minister to Great Britain, has been rejected by the senate, (forty-six members being in their places), by the casting vote of the vice-president. After the ratification of certain other nominations of extraordinary ministers, there is no doubt that Mr. Van Buren's nomination to Mr. McLane led to this very uncommon act of the senate. The whole merits of the case will, however, soon be made known—as the injunction of secrecy has been removed from all the proceedings. Messrs. Prentiss and Bibb were the absent members—the former confined by indisposition. Had both been present, the result would have been the same.

BRIFE NOTICES—THINGS IN GENERAL.

On Tuesday last there arrived at Baltimore on the rail road, 51 wagons, laden with 982 bbls. flour, 46 bags wheat, 14 tons wool, 66 tons nails, 3 tons bark and 15 tons granite—and 60 passengers. Departed 46 wagons laden with coal, iron, brick, furniture and merchandise, and 55 passengers. During the week ending January 23, the flour received on this road, amounted to 4,462 barrels, on an average of 634 barrels a day.

Another revolution appears to have taken place in Central America—a col. Dominguez was at the head of the new party.

Several vessels lately passed through the Chesapeake and Delaware canal. It was expected that the steam boats between Baltimore and Philadelphia would resume business on Monday next—but the cold weather has nullified that expectation.

The slave question is yet in full debate before the Virginia house of delegates. It seems probable that "something will be done." The declining condition of the state is plainly seen, and the real cause of a freely acknowledged, by many. The tariff has nothing to do with it—on the contrary, in the eastern demand for the products of the agriculture of Virginia, impedes the progress of emigration from the state.

We have awful accounts of the ravages of the cholera at Smyrna. Persons are attacked in the streets, and sometimes dead in 15 minutes! The physicians had fled, and business was suspended. The lowest classes of society and especially the intemperate, had suffered most.

There has been a serious movement among the slaves of Jamaica, and martial law had been proclaimed. Many plantations were destroyed by fire; on other estates, the slaves had refused to work. A negro preacher is charged with being at the head of the plot.

A terrible fire has taken place at the island of St. Thomas. It was computed that 1,200 buildings had been destroyed, and that the loss of property amounted to two millions of dollars, much of which was American. It was thought to have been the work of an incendiary.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

January 20. Among the petitions presented this day was one from sundry merchants, &c. of Philadelphia, praying a repeal of the duty on indigo.

Mr. Clay submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate any correspondence which may have passed between the treasury department and the collectors of the customs, or either of them, shewing the construction which has been placed by that department upon the act entitled "an act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," approved the 24th May, 1824, or upon any other act of congress, imposing duties on imports, passed since that day, including the acts of the 19th day of May, 1820. (Agreed to next day.)

Mr. Benton rose to ask leave to introduce the following resolution, of which he had given notice some days ago, viz:

A joint resolution declaratory of the meaning of the charter of the bank of the United States, on the subject of the paper currency to be issued by the bank.

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the paper currency, in the form of orders, drawn by the presidents of the offices of discount and deposit, on the cashier of the bank of the United States, is not authorized by any thing contained in the charter, and that the said currency is, and is hereby declared to be, illegal; and that the same ought to be suppressed.

Mr. Benton earnestly supported his resolution—he attached the opinion of judge Baldwin, lately delivered on the subject. He was followed by Mr. Dallas and a general debate ensued, Messrs. Dallas, Buckner, Chambers, Webster, Wilkins, Clayton, Bibb and King opposing, and Messrs. Benton, Forsyth, Miller, Marcy and Kane supporting the resolution. Finally, between 4 and 5 o'clock, the question was taken on granting leave to introduce the resolution, and it was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Hill, Kane, Mangum, Marcy, Mislet, Moore, Tazewell, Troop, Tyler, White—16.

NAYS—Messrs. B-H, Bibb, Buckner, Chambers, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Dallas, Holmes, Johnston, K-g, Knight, Neudam, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Seymour, Sillbet, Smith, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wilkins—28.

So even the leave was refused, and then the senate adjourned to Monday.

January 25. A good deal of current business was attended to. Mr. Benton submitted a new set of resolutions about the bank of the United States. Certain resolutions were also offered by Mr. Foot and Mr. Moore.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration, as the special order of the day, of the resolution offered by Mr. Clay, on the subject of the tariff, the question being on the motion submitted by Mr. Hayne; when

Mr. Dickerson rose and addressed the senate in an argumentative speech of considerable length, in reply to Mr. Hayne, and in opposition to the amendment. When Mr. Dickerson had concluded,

Mr. Smith said, that he was perfectly ready to go on with the debate, should the senate so determine; but, as another subject had been set apart for to-morrow, and the general attendance of the senators requested for it, he thought it would be better to postpone further proceedings, with regard to the resolution under consideration, to Wednesday next. The resolution was then postponed to, and made the order of the day for Wednesday next. The senate then adjourned.

January 24. Petitions were presented by Messrs. Clayton, Sprague, Hill, Chambers, Robbins, Dallas and King.

Mr. Hayne presented the memorial from the members of the South Carolina legislature, opposed to nullification, against the tariff—read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the committee on finance.

Several reports were made on private claims.

Mr. Clayton submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of embanking the parcel of land ceded by the State of Delaware to the United States, for a light-house at the mouth of Mason's river and the western shore of the Delaware bay; and of appropriating the unexpended balance of the sum formerly appropriated for the erection of said house, for the construction of a road therefrom to the fort land.

Mr. Niles submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing some of the custom house charges to which vessels and merchandise upon their entry and clearance are now subjected.

The resolutions moved yesterday by Mr. Benton relative to the United States bank, were considered and agreed to—as also those moved by Mr. Moore.

Mr. Tipton submitted the following resolution, which was read and laid on the table:

Resolved, That the select committee to which was referred the memorial of the president and directors of the bank of the United States, praying for a renewal of their charter, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of restricting the bank, if re-chartered, from holding, or in any way acquiring, real estate, to a greater extent than is necessary for banking purposes.

On motion of Mr. Forsyth, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and, when the doors were opened, the senate adjourned.

January 25. Various petitions and memorials were presented and appropriately referred.

Mr. Benton laid on the table several resolutions calling for various information respecting the management and operations of the bank of the United States.

The resolution offered some days ago by Mr. Foot, to amend the rules of the senate to restrain debate in certain cases, was taken up, and after debate, at the instance of Mr. Benton, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The resolution submitted heretofore by Mr. Clay, proposing certain modifications of the tariff, coming up as the special order—

Mr. Forsyth moved its postponement to Monday next, in order to go into executive business—Some conversation ensued—when the motion to postpone was withdrawn, passing by the resolution; a motion to that effect prevailing.

The senate proceeded to executive business, and sat till near six o'clock with closed doors, and then adjourned.

January 26. Mr. Murcy, of N. York, presented the memorial of David Henshaw, and others, citizens of Massachusetts, praying that when the present charter of the bank of the U. States expires, that they may be permitted to establish a similar bank, with certain specified conditions, &c.—ordered to be printed.

Mr. Ewing laid the following resolutions on the table for consideration:

Resolved, That the practice of removing public officers by the president, for any other purpose than that of securing a faithful execution of the laws, is hostile to the spirit of the constitution—was never contemplated by its framers—is a daring extension of executive influence—is prejudicial to the public service—and dangerous to the liberties of the people.

Resolved, That it is expedient for the senate to advise and consent to the appointment of any person to fill a supposed vacancy in any office occasioned by the removal of a prior incumbent, unless such prior incumbent shall appear to have been removed for sufficient cause.

On motion of Mr. Benton, the resolutions were ordered to be printed.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Jan. 20. Mr. Drayton reported the bill from the senate, without amendment, entitled "an act for the organization of the ordinance department."

Mr. Wickliffe, from the committee on public lands, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president be requested to communicate to this house, if in his power to do so, the number and probable value of the Indian reservations made by the treaty concluded between the United States and the Choctaw nation of Indians on the 27th September, 1830; whether any, and what contracts for the purchase of said reservations have been made; by whom made, and the sum paid; whether any contracts made for the purchase of said reservations have been confirmed or rejected; and by whom such confirmed or rejected purchases have been made; and whether any leave or authority has been given by the executive to any person or persons to make purchases of said reservations, and the names of such authorized persons.

Mr. Root from the committee on agriculture, to whom was referred a letter from Peter S. Dupont, of Philadelphia, on the culture and manufacture of silk, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for promoting the growth and manufacture of silk; which bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. Archer, from the committee on foreign affairs, to which was referred the memorial of the board of health of the city of New York, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein recommended was concurred in by the house.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. Bouldin, on the 27th ult. the question being on the amendment moved by Mr. Davis, of Mass. on the 18th inst.

Mr. Mitchell, of S. C. rose to address the house in support of the resolution, and in opposition to the amendment. He had said but a few words, when

Mr. Davis stated that it was his purpose to modify the amendment he had offered, and he modified it accordingly.

So as to make the whole amendment when modified, read as follows:

Strike out all before and after the word "resolved," and insert the following, viz:—"That the committee on manufactures be instructed to inquire into and report to this house, (if they possess the information), the practical effect of the revenue laws upon the commerce, agriculture and manufactures of this country. Designating the manner in which the sum upon which the duties are assessed is made up; and, also, the per centage assessed upon goods subject to the square yard duty, and whether any goods are prohibited by the amount of duties; also, whether frauds are not perpetrated in the importation of goods, and the revenue thereby reduced; and how such frauds may be suppressed; also, whether the statute value of the pound sterling ought not to be so modified as to conform to the actual value in the United States; and to accompany their report, if they shall make one, by the evidence upon which it shall be predicated."

Mr. Mitchell then resumed, and continued to occupy the floor until the hour having expired, he was arrested by a motion from

Mr. Hittetree, that the house proceed to the business on the speaker's table.

The speaker presented a memorial from the bank of Pennsylvania, in favor of re-chartering the bank of the United States.

The memorial was read; when

A motion was made by Mr. Wickliffe, that the said memorial be referred to the committee of ways and means, with instructions to report a bill to incorporate a new banking company, to take effect and go into operation after the expiration of the charter of the bank of the United States, reserving one third of the capital in said bank for the United States, together with a sufficient bonus on the charter; one-third to be subscribed for by such of the stockholders in the present bank as may be citizens of the United States as may desire so to invest their surplus capital. That they also inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the bank from dealing in, or holding real estate, except for the mere purposes of banking houses and houses necessary for the transaction of the business of the company; of prohibiting the location of any branch in any state without the consent of the legislature of such state. And also, of so forming the charter that the legislatures of the several states shall and may exercise the power, when they deem it expedient to do so, of imposing a fair and reasonable tax upon the capital employed in any bank or branch of said bank within the jurisdiction of such state; and also to subject the said corporation to be sued in the district or circuit court in any state where they may have a branch located, and the cause of action accrued.

Some debate followed, in which Messrs. Carson, Wickliffe and McDuffie took part. The resolution was agreed to.

Saturday, Jan. 21. Mr. Clayton, member from Georgia, appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

Mr. Hubbard, reported the bill from the senate concerning revolutionary pensions, without amendment.

The house then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. Bouldin, on the 27th ult.

The debate was resumed and continued with much spirit until the hour at which the house usually adjourns, the house having, in the course of the debate, negatived a motion of Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, to proceed to the orders of the day.

[A pretty full report of this debate, (now excluded by the great length of Mr. Hayne's speech) is laid aside, and shall be registered. Mr. Davis's speech is very able and highly interesting.]

The question recurred on the amendment moved by Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, as modified yesterday; and, after debate, the question was put that the house do agree to the said amendment, and passed in the affirmative—Yeas 100, nays 81.

Adjourned to Monday.

Monday, Jan. 23. Mr. Drayton presented a memorial from the members of the legislature of South Carolina opposed to nullification, praying relief from the tariff—referred to the committee on manufactures.

After attending to much current business, the house again took up the resolution of Mr. Bouldin, in the course of which a spirited debate took place, Messrs. Cambreleng, Appleton and Huntington, &c. taking part. [We have laid this debate aside for insertion.] Finally, Mr. Bouldin's resolution, as amended by Mr. Davis, by striking out all before and all after the word "resolved," &c. was agreed to by yeas and nays: for it 127, against it 59.

Tuesday, Jan. 24. The following resolution, submitted on the 12th inst. by Mr. Jenifer, was considered:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the purpose of removing from the United States, and her territories, the free people of color, and colonizing them on the coast of Africa, or elsewhere.

Mr. Alexander moved to lay the resolution on the table.

On this question, the yeas and nays, were ordered.

The motion was then negatived; yeas 71, nays 104.

Mr. Jenifer explained the object of the resolution, but the crowded state of our columns only permits us to give a very brief synopsis of his remarks, and of those made in reply. He said, this population was considered both in the slaveholding, and the non-slaveholding states, as a great evil—that it endangered the public tranquility, and that the preamble to the constitution of the United States, containing the reasons for adopting it, seemed to contemplate such a case—that the action of congress was impatiently expected upon the subject, both by the citizens in public meetings, and by the legislature of the state of Maryland. The present time was favorable—the interest and happiness of the slave population required it—the cords of discipline were obliged to be drawn harder about the slaves, from the presence of this population among them. This population had now no privileges but that of mere existence. If nothing was done by congress, the states would be obliged to prohibit emancipation—and pass laws expelling them from the states having slaves. Would they be patiently received by the non-slaveholding states? He hoped measures would be adopted to place this section of our population in a situation to rise above their present debased and depraved condition.

Mr. Coke said, the gentleman might feel justified in his own mind for presenting this subject to the house, by the measures adopted in his own state—but he thought many considerations might have induced him to a different course. He was ready to go into a consideration of the constitutional right of the United States to remove this population; and made some remarks upon the extension of powers derived from that instrument. He did not profess to understand the gentleman's humanity when he proposed to exercise it by tearing these persons from their connexions and native soil, and bringing what they regarded as punishment and ruin upon them for no offence but being born in a civilized community. He thought there were already a sufficient stock of exciting questions before the house, without the addition of this, which could not fail of raising a strong feeling when it was proposed to appropriate money for the exclusive benefit and security of eight or nine states in the union. He pointed it out as an extraordinary fact that the members from those states had mostly voted against taking up the subject—while those who had no interest in the subject, had as generally voted in favor. He thought there must be some mistake as to the interests of the south. There was no fear entertained there on account of the slave population. No man who did his duty to his slaves had any real ground for fear. Virginia had been settled two centuries—there had been but one insurrection—that in Southampton, which was excited by a single individual—a religious fanatic—and there was no apprehension of the renewal of those scenes. He said the legislature of both the states from which the gentleman and himself came, had commenced their sessions since they had left home. For himself he was at this time uninformed of the wishes of his constituents—and was opposed to the taking up the subject except at the desire of those most interested in it. When Mr. Coke concluded his remarks,

Mr. Polk moved to proceed to the consideration of the business on the speaker's table, and the orders of the day; which was agreed to.

The bill authorizing the secretary of the treasury to compromise the claim of the U. S. on the commercial bank of lake Erie, was read the third time and passed.

The appropriation bill was taken up, and Mr. Wilde spoke in favor of a small ratio. The committee rose before he concluded, and the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 25. Mr. Whittlesey reported without amendment the bill from the senate providing for the final settlement of the claims of states for interests on advances to the U. States during the late war.

Mr. Ellsworth reported a bill for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States; twice read and referred.

Mr. McDuffie reported a bill to authorize the president of the United States to direct the transfers of certain appropriations in the naval service, under certain circumstances—twice read and committed.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. Jenifer, on the 12th inst. in relation to colonizing the free persons of color of the U. States—which, on motion, was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. E. Everett reported a bill making an appropriation to procure copies of historical documents from the public offices in Great Britain—

On motion of Mr. Wing, it was

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of property destroyed by the British troops and their savage allies, during the late war, in violation of the articles of capitulation, entered into between generals Hull and Brock at the surrender of Detroit; and that said committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, it was Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of chaplains for the army of the United States.

The following resolutions were offered, and lie over one day.

By Mr. Huntington, of Conn.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform this house whether any part, and, (if any), what amount of the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, appropriated by the act, approved May 28, 1830, entitled "an act to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the states or territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi," has been expended, and the particular objects to which such expenditures have been applied; the names of the agents who have been employed in the execution of the aforesaid act, the duties specifically required of and the instructions given to them, and the compensation paid, or to be paid to them respectively; also the terms of the contracts, (if any have been made), for the removal of any Indians in pursuance of said act; and the names of the persons with whom such contracts have been made, and the time when and the place where made.

By Mr. Everett, of Mass.—

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house a copy of the treaty negotiated with the Chickasaw tribe of Indians in the year 1830.

By Mr. Jarvis,

Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be directed to inquire whether the present navy ration may not be altered, without increase of expense, so as to increase the comforts of the seamen, and advance the good of the service, by reducing the quantity of whiskey and bread, and substituting tea, sugar and tobacco, and by giving an increased ration of butter, instead of the ration of cheese.

By Mr. C. P. White,

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to this house the invoice of prime cost in the countries from whence imported, of each and every article of goods, wares and merchandise, (and as far as is practicable the invoice cost of the various descriptions of the same article or articles), imported into the United States, paying ad valorem or specific duties; with the amount of duty paid on each article aforesaid, for the years ending 1802, 1803, 1804, 1817, 1818, 1819, 1820, 1825, 1827, 1829, 1830, 1831.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to this house the aggregate invoice or prime cost in the countries from whence imported, of all the goods, wares and merchandise, imported into the United States, paying ad valorem or specific duties, or free of duty, in each year, from the 30th September, 1820, to the 30th September, 1831.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to this house, in the "annual report of commerce and navigation of the United States," the invoice of prime cost of the goods, wares and merchandise, imported into the United States, as well as the official value upon which the duties are now estimated.

A motion was made by Mr. Pendleton, that the house do now proceed to the consideration of the resolutions submitted by him on the 31 January, instant, relative to the judiciary; and, pending the question on this motion, the house, on motion, proceeded to the orders of the day; and

An engrossed bill, entitled "an act authorizing a revision and extension of the rules and regulations of the naval service," was read the third time and passed.

The house on motion of Mr. Polk, again went into committee of the whole, Mr. Hoffman, of New York, in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the apportionment bill.

After several gentlemen had spoken on the amendment of Mr. Hubbard, to insert 44,000 instead of 48,000, as the ratio of representation, which motion was negatived by a vote of, ayes 81, noes 105.

Mr. Wickliffe now moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the house.

Mr. Howard, of Maryland, said he had an amendment which he felt constrained to offer, however reluctant to detain the committee. He then moved to strike out the 3d, and insert the 6th of March, in the bill: the effect of which amendment, if adopted, would be to give to the several states at the next presidential election, the weight they possess at present, and not that to which they will be entitled under the new census.

Mr. Howard commenced a course of remarks in support of his motion; but very shortly yielded to a motion that the committee rise. So the committee rose, &c.

Thursday, Jan. 25. Mr. Archer reported a bill for giving effect to a commercial arrangement between the U. States and the republic of Columbia—twice read and committed.

Mr. Jenifer's resolution relative to colonizing free persons of color, was taken up and postponed until tomorrow.

The resolutions of Mr. White, of N. Y. moved yesterday were considered, modified and passed.

A message was received from the president concerning the amount of expenditures for breakwaters, &c.

The house refused to consider Mr. Pendleton's resolutions relative to the powers of the supreme court.

The apportionment bill was again considered in committee of the whole—the committee finally rose and reported the bill to the house—the house then adjourned.

DEBATE ON THE TARIFF.

In senate, Monday, January 16, 1832.

The senate resumed the consideration of the special order of the day, being the following resolutions submitted by Mr. Clay.

Resolved, That the existing duties upon articles imported from foreign countries, and not coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, ought to be forthwith abolished, except the duties upon wines and silks, and that those ought to be reduced.

Resolved, That the committee on finance be instructed, to report a bill accordingly.

Mr. Hayne moved to amend the first resolution, by striking out all after the word "countries" in the second line, and insert the following:

"Be so reduced that the amount of the public revenue shall be sufficient to defray the expenses of government according to their present scale, after the payment of the public debt; and that, allowing a reasonable time for the gradual reduction of the present high duties on the articles coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, the duties be ultimately equalized, so that the duty on no article shall, as compared with the value of that article, vary, materially, from the general average."

Mr. Hayne addressed the senate in support of his proposition as follows:

The senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay), commenced his remarks a few days ago, by complaining of the advances of age, and mourned the decay of his eloquence, so eloquently as to prove that it was still in full vigor. He then went on, sir, to make a most able and ingenious argument, amply sustaining his high reputation as an accomplished orator.

With this example before me, Mr. President, (said Mr. H.) I am almost deterred from offering any apology, lest I should create expectations which it will certainly not be in my power to gratify. And yet, perhaps, it may be permitted to one so humble as myself to say, that it belongs not to me at any time, or under any circumstances, and, least of all, at this moment, and on this occasion, to satisfy the expectations of those, if any such there be, who may have come here to witness the graces of oratory, or to be delighted with the charms of eloquence, I would not sir, on this occasion, play the orator if I could. I came here to-day for higher and far nobler purposes. I stand on this floor as one of the representatives of a high-minded, generous and confiding people, whose dearest rights and interests I am now to vindicate and maintain. In such a situation, I would lose every thought of myself in the greatness of the cause. Confiding in the indulgence of the senate, and deeply sensible of my inability to do justice to the important subject embraced in these resolutions, I shall proceed at once in the plain, unadorned language of soberness and truth, to the examination of the question before us.

The gentleman from Kentucky set out with the declaration, that he did not deem it necessary to offer any arguments in favor of the American system, "that the protecting policy stands self-vindicated—that it has scattered its rich fruits over the whole land, and is sustained by the experience of all powerful and prosperous nations." Sir, we meet these positions at once by asserting, on our part, that the protecting system stands self-condemned; condemned in our own country; by the devolution which has followed in its train, and the discontents it has produced—condemned by the experience of all the world, and the almost unanimous opinion of enlightened men in modern times. And now, having fairly joined issue with the gentleman, we might put ourselves upon the country, and submit the case, without argument, nor should I have any fears for the result, if the issue was to be tried and decided by an impartial tribunal, free from the disturbing influence of popular prejudice and delusion, and the strong bias of interests, personal, pecuniary and political. But situated as we are, I feel and acknowledge the necessity of making out our case to the conviction of this assembly, and the satisfaction of the country. We are seeking relief from an abiding evil—redress from an existing wrong. We cannot stand where we are. We cannot, like the gentleman from Kentucky, rest on mere unsupported assertions. We must submit our proofs and maintain our positions if we can. It is greatly to be regretted, however, that the gentleman has not seen fit to present some of the strongest arguments in favor of his policy, as such a course might have directed our inquiries to a few leading points, instead of making it necessary for us to wander at large through the wide field of argument presented by the protecting system. The gentleman, however, has so far favored us as to specify two of the advantages which he asserts have been derived from it in this country, and in our day, and I am perfectly willing to try the merits of the system by those tests which he has himself proposed. They shall—if the gentleman pleases—constitute the standard by which its true character shall be determined. In the first place, then, the gentleman asserts, "that the much abused policy of 1824, (the protecting tariff of that year), has filled our coffers and enabled us to pay off the public debt," a debt of $100,000,000 of principal, and $100,000,000 of interest. Now, sir, if any thing is capable of demonstration it may be demonstrated, that the protecting system could not, by possibility, have contributed in the slightest degree to produce this result. One would suppose, indeed, that the very last merit which would be ascribed to this system, was its tendency to fill the "public coffers." It is unquestionably to a tariff, arranged and adjusted with a single eye to revenue, that we are to look for such a result. The object of a protecting tariff, as such, certainly is to diminish or exclude importations, and of course to lessen the amount of revenue derived from duties. The very end and aim of such a system is, to substitute for the imported article, paying taxes to government—the domestic article paying none—to transmute the duty into a bounty to the manufacturers; and, just so far as this end is attained—that is to say, just so far as the tariff is protective, must it cut off the public revenue. Do we not all remember, that the leading argument in favor of the protecting provisions of the tariff of 1824, was, that they were necessary, "to put down a ruinous foreign competition;" and did not one of the fathers of that bill publicly declare, "that the vital principle of the system was, that the nation should command its own consumption, and that when the national command its own consumption, importations and imposts would cease." Sir, there are two distinct features in the tariff of 1824—revenue and protection. It is the former that has filled your coffers and paid off the public debt; and so far as the latter has operated at all, it must have diminished the revenue, and delayed the extinction of that debt. Sir, I will put it to the candor of the gentleman, whether, if the protecting duties under the tariff of 1824, had been less, the revenue would not have been greater, and that, too, without adding to, but on the contrary, diminishing the burthens of the people, since they would have obtained the articles of their consumption, in increased quantities, and at a cheaper rate, and been relieved from the heavy tax which they have been compelled to pay to the American manufacturers? Why, sir, the policy of 1824 actually taxed to prohibition a large amount of goods formerly imported. From a report made by the secretary of the treasury, in January, 1830, it appears that these prohibited articles amounted to about $8,000,000 per annum, being near one sixth part of the whole of our imports. Has this part of the policy contributed to fill your coffers? Sir, the case is too plain for further argument, and tried by this test, the policy must be utterly condemned.

The next test by which the gentleman proposes to try this system, is "the rich fruits which it has scattered over the country." Sir, where are they to be found?

Is it in the west? I appeal to the gentlemen from that quarter. We have heard a great deal of the flourishing condition of the manufacturing establishments elsewhere; but where are the manufacturing villages, the joint stock companies, the splendid dividends, and other evidences of prosperity to be found in the west? I submit it to the candor of the gentlemen, whether the benefits of the protecting system, so far as the west is concerned, do not still rest in hope—whether the system would be sustained a day, if it were not for its supposed connection with INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS—whether it is not indebted for its popularity, in that quarter, to the unhappiness, the fatal marriage between the tariff and internal improvements—a union which I yet hope to see dissolved. It was a left handed—an unlawful marriage, and surely those whom God hath not joined, man may put asunder. Sir, there are doubtless some flourishing manufactories scattered here and there throughout the western country—chiefly confined, however, to situations beyond the reach of foreign competition, and owing nothing to the protecting system. But the west has not been rendered prosperous by these establishments. I appeal confidently to their actual condition at this time. With regard to the gentleman's own state, I will apply a test which cannot deceive us. When the policy of '24 was before congress, the senator from Kentucky stood forth as its champion, and it was my lot to attempt to answer his arguments. It is true, sir, that his speech was made in the other house, and mine on this floor; but his argument had been sent forth as the manifesto of the party—it was printed in pamphlet and laid on the tables of the senators, and, embodying the views of the tariff party, it was impossible for me to pass it over. I well remember, therefore, that, on that occasion, the gentleman argued, that Kentucky was to participate in the protecting system by raising large quantities of hemp, and supplying the southern states with cotton bagging,—and he strongly insisted that she was then only prevented from so doing, by the ruinous competition of the inconsiderable Scotch towns of Liverness and Dundee. And what is it, sir, that we hear now—after the lapse of eight years? The old story repeated. Kentucky, still deprived of the benefits of the protecting system by those formidable rivals, Liverness and Dundee. They still constitute "the lion in the path," and foreign manufacturers ever will be "a lion in the path" to those whose prosperity depends on the protecting system. We know that the manufacture of cotton bagging is a simple process, requiring hardly any skill or capital, and yet the great state of Kentucky cannot get along with it, in consequence of the formidable rivalry of two miserable Scotch towns, the inhabitants of which are said to be so poor and destitute, that they are obliged to import their fuel, and send to Dantzic, twelve hundred miles up the Baltic, for their hemp, paying a freight equal to the first cost. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that Kentucky has not realized the promised blessings of the protecting system; and, I am told, this is substantially true of the whole west. But, sir, if the west has gained nothing by the system, she has had her share of the taxes which it imposes—she has paid her proportion of duties to the government, and bounties to the manufacturers; and, in consequence of the three calamities which the system has inflicted on the south—blowing our commerce and withering our prosperity—the west has very nearly been deprived of her best customer. When the policy of '24 went into operation, the south was supplied from the west, through a single avenue, (the Saluda Mountain Gap), with live stock, horses, cattle and hogs, to the amount of considerably upwards of a million of dollars a year. Under the pressure of the system, this trade has regularly been diminishing. It has already fallen off more than one half, and from an auspicious return, now before me, it appears that it has been further diminished near one hundred and fifty thousand dollars during the last year. So much for the rich blessings bestowed upon the west by the protecting system.

We come now to the south. If any portion of the rich fruits of this system have been scattered there, they have not fallen under my observation. Sir, we know them not—we see them not—we feel them not. It may be supposed, however, that we are too full of prejudice, or too ungrateful, to acknowledge the blessings it has bestowed upon us. Sir, we have heard of men having honor thrust upon them, and perhaps there may be such a thing as having benefits thrust upon an unwilling people: yet I should think, that even in such a case, they would soon become reconciled to their lot, and submit to their fate with a good grace. But, I assure the gentlemen, that the condition of the south is not merely one of unexampled depression, but of great and all-pervading distress. In my own state, the unhappy change which has within a few years past taken place in the public prosperity, is of the most appalling character. If we look at the present condition of our cities, (and I will take Charleston by way of example), we find every where the mournful evidence of premature decay. Sir, the crumbling memorials of our former wealth and happiness, too eloquently teach us, that, without some change in your policy, the days of our prosperity "are numbered." Sir, it is within my own experience, that, in the devoted city in which my lot has been cast, a thriving foreign commerce was, within a few years past, carried on direct to Europe. We had native merchants, with large capitals, engaged in the foreign trade. We had thirty or forty ships, many of them built, and all owned in Charleston, and giving employment to a numerous and valuable body of mechanics and tradesmen. Look at the state of things now! Our merchants bankrupt or driven away—their capital sunk or transferred to other pursuits—our shipyards broken up—our ships all sold!—yes, sir, I am told the very last of them was, a few months ago, brought to the hammer—our mechanics in despair; the very grass growing in our streets, and houses falling into ruins; real estate reduced to one third part of its value, and rents almost to nothing. The commerce, which we are still suffered to enjoy, diverted from its proper channel, carried on with borrowed capital, and through agents sent among us, and maintained by the tariff policy, bearing off their profits to more favored lands, eating out our substance, and leaving to our own people the miserable crumbs which fall from the table of their prosperity. If we fly from the city to the country, what do we there behold? Fields abandoned; the hospitable mansions of our fathers deserted; agriculture drooping; our slaves, like their masters, working harder, and faring worse; the planter striving, with unavailing efforts, to avert the ruin which is before him. It has often been my lot, sir, to see the once thriving planter reduced to despair; cursing his hard fate, gathering up the small remnants of his broken fortune—and, with his wife and his little ones, tearing himself from the scenes of his childhood, and the bones of his ancestors, to seek, in the wilderness, that reward for his industry, of which your fatal policy has deprived him.

Sir, when we look at our fertile fields, and consider the genial climate with which God has blessed the south—when we contemplate the rare felicity of our position, as the producers of an article, which, under a system of free trade, would command the markets of the world—is it not enough to fill our hearts almost to bursting to find the richest blessings that an indulgent Providence ever showered down upon the heads of any people, torn from us by the cruel policy of our own government—to find the bounties of Heaven thus blasted by the hand of man. Sir, I will not deny that there are other causes besides the tariff, which have contributed to produce the evils which I have depicted. Trade can, to some extent, be carried on with greater facility at New York, and cotton may be raised more profitably in Alabama; but, these advantages would not have broken up the commerce or depressed the agriculture of South Carolina, while an unrestricted intercourse with foreign nations, enabled us to realize the most moderate profits! Men do not quit their accustomed employments, or the homes of their fathers, for any small addition to their profits. It is only when restriction has reached a point which leaves the door still open to one, while it closes it against the other, that this result is produced, and, therefore it is, that a rapid transfer of capital and population is now added to the other evils with which the old states are afflicted.

In this condition of the country, where is there to be found a fulfilment of the promises held out to the south in 1824? We were then told that we had mistaken the true character of this system. We were entreated only to try it for a short time. We were told that the taxes imposed on foreign articles would be but temporary; that the manufactures would want protection but for a short time—only to give them a start—and that they would soon be able to stand alone. We were to have had a double market for our cotton—high prices, reviving commerce, and renewed prosperity. Sir, after the experience of four years, the tariff of '28 came up for consideration, by which the protecting system was to be further extended and enlarged. And what was found to have been the result of four years' experience at the south? Not a hope fulfilled, not one promise performed—and our condition infinitely worse than it had been four years before. Sir, the whole south rose up as one man, and protested against any further experiment with this fatal system. The whole of the representatives of seven states, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee, (with, I believe, but three dissenting voices), recorded their votes, against that bill. Sir, do not gentlemen find in this fact, some evidence of the dangerous character of that legislation on which this system is based. Can it be wise—can it be just—can it be prudent—to adopt and enforce a policy so essentially sectional in its character? Can we hope for harmony, peace, and concord, while enforcing a system against which an entire section of your country so strongly revolts?—It is the essential principle of the representative system, that a mutual sympathy of feeling and of interest, should bind together the people and their rulers; and it may be worthy of profound reflection how far that principle is essentially preserved by a scheme of legislation, under which the feelings and interests of so large a portion of the country are outraged and trampled on. When taxes are imposed, not by the representatives of those who are to bear the burthens, but of those who are to receive the bounty.

Now, sir, let us turn our attention to the north. And here I cannot speak from my own knowledge, but I am free to confess, that if we are to credit the accounts we have heard, the rich fruits of the system have been scattered in this quarter with a profuse hand. We are told that manufacturing establishments have sprung up everywhere as if by enchantment. Thriving towns and beautiful villages cover the whole face of the land. Millions of capital have been withdrawn from other pursuits and invested in manufactures. Joint stock companies are receiving enormous dividends; and the people, (at least in the neighborhood of the establishments built up and sustained by the system) are rejoicing in a prosperity unexampled in the history of the world. But sir, in the midst of this universal joy, we hear occasionally the voice of lamentation and complaint.—There are those north of the Potomac, wise and experienced, and patriotic men, well acquainted too with the actual condition of things, who tell us that this apparent prosperity is in a great measure delusive; that the system has operated in building up a favored class at the expense of the rest of the community. That it has, in fact, made the "rich richer, and the poor poorer." I have before me several statements, all going to prove these assertions, as to several of the most flourishing manufacturing establishments of the north. I will trouble the senate with but one of them, and that merely by way of illustration. The article is from the pen of one of the ablest political economists in the union, one who has laid his country under a lasting debt of gratitude.

[Mr. Hayne here read a statement from the Banner of the Constitution, proving that a flourishing cotton manufactory at the Falls village, in New Hampshire, was, from their own showing, maintained by a tax on the community; exceeding the entire profits of the establishment, by $101,000 per annum; and that, if a purse was made up, and every operative man, woman, and child paid $100 per annum, for standing idle or turning griststones, the public would be gainers by $101,000 annually.]

It will be seen, therefore, that, with regard to some, at least, of our most flourishing manufacturing establishments, the profits derived are drawn from the pockets of the people. But, it will be said, "here is a case in which the south participates in the bounty; here is a home market found for three thousand bales of Carolina cotton." Sir, I seize the opportunity to dispel forever the delusion, that the south can derive any compensation in a home market for the injurious operations of the protecting system. The case before us affords a striking illustration of this truth. The value of the raw material is about one-fourth part of the manufactured article. Now if the cotton goods manufactured at the Falls village, were imported from England instead of being made in New Hampshire, we should find a market for twelve thousand bales of our cotton instead of three; so that instead of gaining a market for three thousand bales of cotton, we have lost a market of nine thousand. The home market for our cotton is not a new, or additional, but a substituted market. If the trade were free, the goods manufactured in this country would be imported from England, and paid for in our cotton; but in cutting off the imports, you, of course, to the same extent, diminish our exports. Now suppose, to make this matter too plain for cavil or dispute; that we exported to Great Britain one hundred thousand bales of cotton, worth, (at thirty dollars a bale) three millions of dollars, and that we received in exchange three millions of dollars worth of British cotton goods. How much of our cotton would it take to manufacture these goods? Why, just twenty-five thousand bales, while the remaining seventy-five thousand would be disposed of on the continent. But suppose the importation of these goods prohibited, in order that they should be made at home, what portion of this cotton would find a home market? Only twenty-five thousand bales, and the remaining seventy-five thousand must be left upon our hands. Thus, it will be seen, that the effect of our instituting a home market in the place of a foreign market for our cotton, would be to deprive us entirely of a market for three-fourths of our productions. This result is inevitable, unless the domestic manufacturer can enter into competition with the British in foreign markets, an idea altogether too extravagant to be worthy of serious notice; for surely, if any thing can be considered certain, we may safely assume that articles which cannot be manufactured at home without a protecting duty of from fifty to one hundred per cent., cannot enter into competition with foreign manufactures in the markets of the world, where they will, of course, have no protection whatever. But to return to the condition of the north under the protecting policy. If the rich fruits of the system in that quarter were greater even than they are alleged to be, I should still think that they have been purchased at too dear a rate. It has even there depressed our commerce, disturbed all the relations of society, and had a tendency to produce that inequality of fortunes, which may, one day or other, be fatal to the liberties of this country.

Surveying with the feelings of an American the actual condition of things, I should certainly be disposed to exchange all the blessings which the protecting system has produced, even in New England, for those which it has destroyed. In the place of the splendid villages, flourishing manufactories, joint-stock companies, and lordly proprietors, clothed in fine linen, and taring sumptuously every day, as a patriot, I should be disposed to say, give me back the ships which have been destroyed the merchants which have been reduced to bankruptcy, the sailors that have been forced into foreign service, the "plundered ploughmen and beggar yeomanry" who have been driven from the pursuits of their choice into the gloomy walls of a manufactory; give me back these; and above all, give me back content—restore the peace and harmony which this system has destroyed, and I will consent that every manufacturing establishment shall be razed to its foundation, which has been built up, and can only be sustained, by this secured system. Sir, if wealth were the highest good of a nation, and pecuniary profit the only standard by which a wise policy could be measured, it would even then be more than questionable, how far this system could be justified. But there are higher and more sacred principles involved in this question, which cannot be safely disregarded; there are considerations of justice, and political equality, which rise far above all calculations of mere profit and loss.

Sir, what will it profit you, if you gain the whole world, and lose the hearts of your people? This is a confederated government, founded on a spirit of mutual consideration, concession, and compromise, and it is neither a just, prudent, nor rightful exercise of the high trust with which you are invested for the common good, to resort to a system of legislation by which benefits and burthens are unequally distributed. Sir, can any gentleman look this subject fairly in the face, and not perceive that such a government as ours (instituted for a few definite purposes, in which every portion of the union must, from the very nature of things, have a common interest) cannot turn aside from their high duties, and undertake to control the domestic industry of individuals, without undermining the very foundations of our republican system. It is contrary to the whole genius and character of our institutions; the very form and structure of our government, that it should undertake to regulate the whole labor and capital of this extensive country. A perseverance in this course will sow the seeds of dissension broadcast throughout the land, and let it be remembered, that discord is not a plant of slow growth, but one that flourishes in every soil, and never fails to produce its fruit in due season. What a spectacle do you even now exhibit to the world? A large portion of your fellow citizens believing themselves to be grievously oppressed by an unwise and unconstitutional system, are clamoring at your doors for justice, while another portion, supposing that they are enjoying rich bounties under it, are treating their complaints with scorn and contempt. God only knows where all this is to end. But it "will not, and it cannot, come to good." We at the south will call you our brethren, and have ever cherished towards you the strongest feelings of affection; but were you the brothers of our blood, for whom we would coin our hearts, it is not in human nature that we should long continue to retain for you undiminished affection, when all hope of redress shall have passed away, and we shall continue to believe that you are visiting us with a hard and cruel oppression, and enforcing a cold, heartless, and selfish policy.

I shall now proceed, Mr. President, to examine the character of the protecting system. And here, I shall assume, that the protection it extends to the American manufactures is something substantial, and affords some advantage, be it more or less, to the protected interests. I shall take it for granted, that it is intended to enable the American manufacturers to enter into that successful competition with the foreign, which they could not do without such protection; that the effect of the system is to enable the American manufacturer to obtain more for his goods than he could otherwise command. In a word, that it affords substantial protection; and is not like that extended to cotton—a mere name. For, on this latter point, let it be remembered, that the first cotton produced in this country found a market abroad; and that, even now, nearly the whole of it is disposed of in Europe, where it maintains a successful competition against all the world. It is idle, therefore, to talk of the benefit of a protecting duty to cotton at home. It is beyond all dispute, sir, that, if any duty be necessary to protection, it can only be, because it enables the manufacturer to sell his goods for more than he could otherwise obtain for them. Now, in this view of the subject, let us see how the question will stand. How must such a system operate, FIRST, on the different interests, and SECONDLY, on the different sections of the country? We will assume, that a particular manufacture cannot be produced in the country, within fifty per cent. as cheaply at home, as the same article could be obtained from abroad, and that a duty which, with charges, should be equal to about fifty per cent. was absolutely necessary to introduce and to sustain it. Such a duty must operate as a tax on every other class in the community, for the benefit of the manufacturer; and supposing it to be imposed, not for revenue, but for protection, would be a double tax. Suppose the value of the imported article to be a million of dollars, the duty would be half a million; and if the protection amounted to an equal sum, here would be a tax of a million of dollars imposed upon the whole people, to secure a bounty of half a million to one portion of them. But it is said the bounty is not confined to the manufacers—that other classes participate. I admit that there is a circle embraced within the range of the manufacturing influence, that partake of the benefits of the system. Farmers, in the neighborhood, who supply the operatives with food—mechanics, who construct the buildings and machinery—clergy men, physicians, lawyers, and others, who make up a manufacturing village, all come in for a share of the gains, and constitute, in fact, the protected class, which enjoy the benefits of the system; but all other classes in the community must obviously be laid under contribution, to make that a profitable, which would otherwise be an unprofitable pursuit; and, in the case assumed, would be taxed to the amount of one million of dollars, to secure to the favored class a bounty of half a million. Now suppose, sir, such a system as this to be extended to all the cottons, woollens, iron and sugar, made in any country, and we will take that country, to be the United States. We will suppose, further, that cottons could not be profitably manufactured without a protecting duty of from twenty-five to an hundred per cent.—woollens from forty-five to two hundred per cent.—iron from one hundred to two hundred per cent.—sugar from one hundred to one hundred and fifty per cent.; and that these duties were accordingly imposed on these several articles, (amounting in the whole to the sum of nine millions of dollars annually); that, in consequence of these duties, the protection on all the cottons manufactured in the country was equal to three cents a yard, and amounted to six millions of dollars per annum—woollens to eight millions—iron to one million—and sugar a million and a half—producing, as the result of the whole system, a tax of nine millions on the foreign article to secure a bounty of sixteen millions and a half to the home manufacturers. I have supposed protection to be the exclusive object of this system, and it then clearly follows, that all other classes would be taxed twenty-five millions of dollars per annum, in order to secure to the favored class a protection of sixteen millions.—The government would, indeed, receive its nine millions; but it would be an aggravation of the evils of the system, that this amount should be levied when it was not wanted, in order to secure the protected classes in their monopoly. The rates of duties which I have here assumed, are those now actually imposed on the protected articles; (and which it is proposed to retain as essential to protection), and the amount of the protection enjoyed by the manufacturers is stated at the very lowest that has ever been estimated by any person who has undertaken to examine this subject. If you suppose half of the duty here stated to be necessary for revenue—this would not diminish the weight of the burden, though it would lessen to that extent the injustice of the tax,—and let gentlemen make what deductions they please, either from the duty imposed or the bounty received; and it will make no difference whatever in the principle. Whether it be one million or twenty, just as far as the system is protective in its character, and imposes any tax upon the foreign article, and affords any protection whatever in the domestic, is the system a tax imposed upon the other classes to render profitable the industry of the manufacturers. And when this tax amounts, as it unquestionably does in the case before us, at the very lowest estimate, to twenty or thirty millions a year, it becomes a scheme of monstrous injustice and oppression.—Now let us trace this system one step farther. Suppose such a system applied to a country of a homogeneous character, with the same capacity for manufacturing every where, and that manufacturing establishments should consequently be equally diffused through every section. The benefits and the burthens of the system would, in such a case, fall equally upon every portion of the country, though not upon the different interests of the state. It has been said that if the profits of manufactures were raised by such a system, above the average of the profits of the whole community, that the labor and capital absorbed in other pursuits would flow into the new employment; and that the whole would ultimately be equalized. Admit that in process of time, this might be the result, yet it could not take place at once, because men cannot transfer at pleasure their labor and capital from their customary pursuits to others.

But if the profits should be thus ultimately equalized in a particular community; yet if the favored pursuit was only rendered profitable by the protection extended to it—it is clear that the scheme would result in an aggregate loss to the whole community—equal to the full amount of the bounty. I have assumed the case of an unprofitable pursuit being rendered profitable by the protecting system—for to any other case the system is wholly inapplicable. If the domestic manufacturer can make his goods as cheaply and supply the domestic market on as favorable terms as they could be obtained from abroad, then it is clear that no protection whatever would be necessary. It may be that in the very infancy of a manufacture, on its first introduction into a country, a small protection for a short time might hasten its advancement, but at most, the withholding of such protection could have no other effect than to delay its introduction for a few years—for the existence in any country, of unemployed capital, and individual sagacity and enterprise, sufficient to direct it prudently, would soon lead to the introduction of every branch of manufactures, for which such country was really prepared.—But this stage of infancy once passed, it is preposterous to talk of the necessity of protecting any article that can really be made as cheaply at home as it can be obtained from abroad—and to assert, that to reduce such protection to twenty or thirty per cent., would be ruinous to any manufacture, is to admit at once, that such article cannot be profitably made at home, and consequently that it can only be sustained at the expense of the other interests in the community. Now sir, let us suppose another case, and it is unhappily the very case which now exists in the U. States. We will suppose an extensive country, of which one portion is exclusively agricultural, and incapable of changing its pursuits, and that the other portion embraces within its limits, all the manufactures and manufacturing capacities of the whole country. The bounty would then be exclusively enjoyed by one section, and the other would share only in the burthens of the system. To make the inequality still greater, it is only necessary to suppose that the agricultural section is not only incapable of manufacturing at home, but is prevented by insuperable obstacles, from migrating or removing their property to the manufacturing region—that their industry can only be profitably employed in exchanging their agricultural productions, for the very foreign articles which enter into competition with the domestic manufactures, and which are heavily taxed for the protection of the latter,—that the effect of such tax is not only to interrupt the intercourse and impair the profits of their industry, but that the agricultural section is thereby exposed to the imminent hazard of having the market for their productions entirely cut off, and finally, TO CAP THE CLIMAX OF THIS INJUSTICE AND OPPRESSION, that the taxes levied on the foreign articles, are expended almost exclusively in the favored region, and you then have, Mr. President, the whole case of the south spread open before you. Their pursuits are altogether agricultural—they cannot change them—they cannot transfer their labor and capital to the favored region—they cannot find a market for their productions, except by exchanging them for the very foreign manufactures which are taxed almost to prohibition, and the taxes thus raised are expended in other sections. Is there a man in this assembly who can lay his hand upon his heart, and say that it is a just and equal system? It may be said, however, that all this is merely the result of our peculiar condition, and the nature of our pursuits. It is not so, sir. All we ask, is to be LET ALONE. Leave us to the free enjoyment of the bounties of heaven, and the advantages of our situation, and we ask no more. But where is the justice and equity of a system of legislation which is to make profitable the industry of others by the destruction of our own? And by what right is it that we are to be made victims to the prosperity of others? I will here borrow an illustration, to make this matter plain. The southern states supply themselves with woollens, cotton, and iron, by raising cotton, rice, and tobacco. Now, suppose we should exchange a bale of cotton for a bale of coarse woollens, for the use of our slaves, containing, we will say, a hundred pieces. This bale of cloth is ours. It is the fruit of our own labor, of American capital, and home industry. We may be said to have manufactured it, not with the spindle and the loom, but with the plough and the hoe. Now, sir, we will suppose that a northern manufacturer has by the application of an equal amount of labor and capital, produced a similar bale of woollens, of precisely the same quality and value. In what respect is the manufacturer entitled to be regarded with more favor than the planter? Does the freight which we may have paid to the ship owner, and the employment given to navigation, entitle us to less favor in the eyes of the government. Are the plough and the hoe less favored instruments of production than the spindle and the loom? Perfect equality, sir, would seem to require that we should stand, at least, on the same footing, and that, whether these woollens were wanted for consumption, or for sale, they should be subjected to exactly the same tax.—But how are we treated by a just and paternal government, who careth, we are told, equally for all her children? Our bale of woollens is stopped at the custom-house, and forty pieces are taken out, as a tax to the government, whereby our stock is reduced to sixty pieces, while the bale of the manufacturer is free from all taxation. If these articles are wanted for our own consumption, we can consume but sixty pieces; while the manufacturer retains his hundred pieces. If the goods are wanted for sale, we have but sixty pieces to be converted into money, or to be exchanged for other commodities; while the manufacturer has his hundred pieces for the same purposes; and if we should happen to meet at the same market, as the two articles must sell at the same price, being of the same quality, the manufacturer will, of course, realize forty per cent. more than the planter. Now, sir, what are we to do in this dilemma? How are we to escape this unequal burden? The senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) on a former occasion taxed his ingenuity to provide us the means of escape; and I must presume, that if his ingenuity failed, the case is altogether without hope. There are four ways, said the senator, by which the south may avoid the tax. First, "by obtaining from the purchase of the foreign articles." But, sir, we cannot do without them; and this trade, moreover, furnishes the only market for our productions. To adopt this alternative, would be to seal our ruin. Secondly, said the gentleman, "employ the rival American fabric." But, sir, if the manufacturer would take our cotton in exchange for his productions, (which he cannot do, except to a very limited extent), we should pay as heavy a tax in the price of the domestic, as in the duty on the foreign fabric; for no one will pretend, that if the quality be the same, there would be any difference of price in the American market. Thirdly, "manufacture for ourselves." Sir, we cannot manufacture. Except as in a few coarse articles, slave labor is utterly incapable of being applied to such an object. Slaves are too imprudent, too incapable of that minute, constant, delicate attention, and that persevering industry, which is essential to the success of manufacturing establishments. It was but the other day that some of our New England brethren got it into their heads that they understood our institutions better than we did ourselves, and undertook to create a splendid manufacturing establishment in the district represented by my distinguished and valued friend, (Mr. McDuffie.) It was accordingly put into operation, but had gone on but a short time, when one of the slaves was tempted to make free with the goods, and, to prevent detection, burnt up the whole establishment. It might be supposed, sir, that the people of South Carolina would not have been inclined to punish such an offence with great severity; and if the culprit had escaped, I presume we should not soon have heard the end of it. Not so, sir, however. We have a law which punishes arson, whether committed by a black, or a white man, with death.—The offender was brought to trial, and being convicted on the clearest proof, suffered the penalty of the law. And, sir, to show how little justice is sometimes meted out to the south, I will state the fact, that since I arrived here, I have seen an account of this transaction in print, headed, with large capitals, "CRUELTY TO SLAVES," and representing that a poor innocent negro had recently been hanged in South Carolina, for burning down a building by accident. I think, sir, the gentleman will now himself admit, that, to embrace this proposition, would only be, to use an old adage, "jumping out of the frying pan into the fire." The last remedy suggested by the gentleman, is, that we should "supply ourselves with household manufactures." What, sir, give up our foreign trade! Abandon our agricultural pursuits, and involve the whole southern country in degradation and ruin? Are we to be driven from the pursuits of our choice, in order to promote the industry of the manufacturers?

The case which I have stated, of the bale of woollens, illustrates the unequal operation of this system upon the agricultural industry of the south, and the manufacturing industry of the north. What is true of a single bale, is true of the whole amount of foreign importations which are taxed for the protection of the domestic manufacture—true of the eight millions of imports received in exchange for the productions of South Carolina—and of the forty millions received in exchange for the productions of the plantation states, or at least of so much thereof as embrace the protected articles. Our northern friends say, however, that part of our cotton and rice belongs to them. Be it so. Whatever remains to us, and is rightfully ours, is subjected to the unequal system which I have above described. Sir, it is put beyond all dispute, that the agricultural industry of the south is taxed, unequally, unjustly, enormously taxed in its foreign exchanges, in order to render profitable the manufacturing industry of the north. Taxed, I will not say to what extent—but precisely to the amount of the duty imposed for protection, and the price added to the domestic article, whatever these may be. It is said, sir, that the consumer pays the tax, and that the tariff states pay their full portion of the tax on their consumption. Sir, I think this may be well doubted—our habits are different. A South Carolina farmer, whose crop is worth a thousand dollars, sends, perhaps, the whole of it to market, and exchanges it for foreign productions, paying, it may be, a duty of fifty per cent. His tax would be five hundred dollars, a northern or western farmer raising produce to the value of a thousand dollars, will consume nine hundred of it on his farm, and exchange but a hundred for foreign articles, and be subjected to a duty of only fifty dollars. This difference of habits between the different parts of the country, is greater than would be supposed possible. I have known a wealthy planter in the neighborhood of Charleston, that did not raise a single article that was not sent to foreign markets, and who purchased every thing that was consumed by himself or his slaves. His cloth from England, his wines from France, his horses, mules and hogs, from the west—his corn from Maryland—wooden ware, puttees, and other notions, from New England; and I assure our New England friends, that although we do not relish all of their notions, there are some that we prize very highly. But, sir, if the consumer did, in every case, pay the whole amount of the tax, and the consumption was in exact proportion to population, could gentlemen even then fail to see the wide difference in the operation of the protecting system on the two sections, when they consider that the tariff states are remunerated, and more than remunerated, for any tax which they may pay, in the bounties they receive, while we receive no remuneration whatever. If this be doubted, I will apply a test, which, I think, cannot possibly deceive us. Do our New England brethren not understand their own interest? Do you think, sir, that they would be very apt to fall in love with taxation and court the impositions of burthens? How comes it, then, that they have been taught to believe that "taxation is no tyranny," but on the contrary, the greatest of earthly blessings? Why is it, that they would regard as the heaviest of calamities, the reduction of the public burthens? Is it not clear, then, that they regard the duties as a bounty to their industry, and that they know that they have the power to indemnify themselves for all that they pay in duties.

But, sir, there is another view of this matter which demonstrates, I think still more plainly, the inequality of the system. I allude to its effect upon the people of the south, as producers of the articles which are exchanged for foreign commodities. There are very able men, sir, who have undertaken to prove that we suffer from this system chiefly in our character as producers. To my mind, it is morally certain that the people of the south either as producers or consumers, support a burthen nearly, if not entirely, equal to the whole amount of the tax levied on their importations. The precise manner in which this operates, is a problem not so easy of solution. I will endeavor to explain, however, very briefly, my conception of the process.

We will suppose a perfectly free trade to be carried on between the southern states and Great Britain—that is to say, that the articles on both sides are admitted, duty free. In this state of things, a progressive tax equal to five per cent. per annum, is imposed on British manufactures for the protection of our own. The first duty of five per cent. would, doubtless, be added to the price. Before this progressive duty had advanced many steps, however, the period would arrive when no additional charge could be sustained by the consumer without a reduction of his consumption. The next five per cent. then imposed, would have to be sustained by the merchant, or the foreign manufacturer, or the producer of the cotton, and would most probably be divided among them. In this manner, as the system progressed, the profits of the merchant would be reduced to the lowest scale; those of the manufacturer would also be brought down, and the southern producer would, in his turn, be compelled to submit to a reduction in the price of his productions. Each successive step in the further progress of the system would sink lower and lower the price of his cotton, until it was reduced to the very lowest sum that would pay the expense of its production. The very next step must, of course, annihilate the trade by rendering it unprofitable to all concerned. Sir, there may be a difference of opinion as to the point to which we have now arrived in the progress of this system; (for let it be remembered that the system is still progressing), but to my mind it is clear that we have long since passed the point at which any further reduction of profits could possibly be extorted from the merchant or the manufacturer; and that every successive increase of the tax, for years past, has fallen almost exclusively upon the producer.

The proof of this is to be found in the fact that cotton has, within a few years, been gradually falling, until it has lost more than two-thirds of its value, and now barely pays the expense of its production, bringing down with it the wages of our agricultural labor and capital to the very lowest point. Some gentlemen insist that the southern producer now bears nearly the whole of the tax; while the gentlemen on the other side contend that it is a maxim universally true that the "consumer pays the tax." I am inclined to think that the truth lies in the middle. I can certainly conceive a state of things in which the producer would, as such, pay nearly the whole of the tax; but, except the tax is a very moderate one, or is imposed upon the absolute necessities of life, it is impossible that the whole of the weight could be thrown upon the consumer. No one, surely, would contend that if any community were in the habit of consuming fifty millions of foreign goods, imported duty free, they could afford to consume any thing like the same amount under a duty of 50 per cent., if the whole duty were added to the price. But whether the tax be in general paid by the producer or the consumer, or be divided between them, to my mind it is clear, that in the actual condition of things, the burthen falls most unjustly and unequally on the southern states. I will illustrate this. We will assume that South Carolina annually exchanges eight millions of dollars' worth of cotton and rice for foreign goods, paying a duty of fifty per cent. equal to four millions of dollars. Now, suppose the consumer to pay the whole tax, how would the account stand? Assume that no more than one half of our importations are consumed at home, say

$4,000,000

The tax, at 50 per cent. would be 2,000,000
Suppose two millions exchanged with our northern brethren for protected articles, the increased price of which would be equal to the duty, this would be 1,000,000

Making $3,000,000

The remaining two millions being exchanged for unprotected articles, a tax of one million would be paid on the consumption by our southern and western brethren. From this state of the case it would follow, that, if the consumer pays the whole tax, we would pay as consumers three millions out of these four imposed upon the foreign articles received in exchange for our productions, though we should consume only half of them. But if we take it for granted that the tax cannot be added to the price, we would of course get back no part of the duties paid at the custom house; and in that case we should bear the whole burthen. It has been said that the duties on imported articles fall chiefly on the merchant and the foreign manufacturer, but I hold this to be impossible, for surely two or three per cent. is the utmost reduction that can be made from the profits of the merchant, and not much more could be taken off from those of the manufacturer. Indeed, how could it be expected that the American demand for British manufactures would materially affect their price, when not more, probably, than a twentieth part of the whole finds a market in this country? It is on the American producer, therefore, that this tax must chiefly fall. Sir, the duties upon imports are either paid by the consumer or they are not. If they are paid by him, I have shown that the greater portion of the duties on the goods received in exchange for our cotton falls upon the planter, and that for this he receives no remuneration whatever. If the duties are not paid by the consumer—that is to say, if they are not added to the price—then it is manifest, that the whole amount of duties falls upon us without the possibility of relieving ourselves from any part of the burden. As to the popular notion that all consumers must pay equally, I will ask any gentleman to tell me how it is with those who consume the tax? Here is a tax of sixteen millions imposed directly or indirectly upon southern production. Fourteen millions of this amount are transferred to the north, and there consumed. Are the consumers of these fourteen millions taxed on their consumption paid as highly as those who have the whole amount?

Sir, I have done with this branch of the subject. Great as are the present evils of the system to the south, there are greater still—in prospect. We are seriously threatened with the entire loss of the foreign markets for our productions. All trade is but an exchange of equivalents, and is founded on the maxim of "give and take." If you exclude British goods from our market, you, in effect, exclude our cotton from their market. It is in vain to tell us that England must have our cotton. You may force her to do without it. Even now she supplies herself, to a great extent, from other countries; from her East India possessions, Egypt, Brazil and elsewhere; and you will make it her interest, in the end, to give up the American trade entirely. Even now she is looking to this as a possible evil. You find her encouraging the production of cotton in the East Indies, by a discriminating duty to which you have forced her, and stimulating the production of the article in South America, where she is furnished with a market for her manufactures, almost duty free. Can we then, be blind to the fate that awaits us when the American System shall be consummated, and we shall be cut off from a market for seven hundred thousand bales of our cotton; an event that is hardly necessary for me to say would involve the whole south in irretrievable ruin. It is idle for gentlemen to pretend that the north can ever furnish a home market for all the cotton of the south. Two or three hundred thousand bales is the utmost extent to which we could find a market in that quarter. The catalogue of the evils of this system, however, is not yet completed. It is not merely the mischief it has done, and the still greater evils which it threatens, but it has arrested our march to greatness, and prevented us from fulfilling our high destinies. What would have been the condition of this country now, if we had never been deprived of the blessings of free trade? Why is it that our tonnage and our exports have not grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength? It is because our prosperity has been blasted by the restrictive system. Look, sir, at this picture. In 1810, with a population of seven millions, we had a tonnage of one million four hundred thousand. In 1831, with a population of thirteen millions, our tonnage is reduced to one million two hundred thousand; and, going still further back, in the year 1800, our exports amounted to eighty-one millions, while now, with a population of thirteen millions, our exports are reduced to seventy-two millions.

Thus, while our population has increased nearly three-fold, our foreign commerce has not advanced at all. Sir, if Washington's free trade system had continued unto this day, (for be it remembered that Alexander Hamilton's protecting system was essentially a system of free trade, imposing duties only of from five to seven and a half per cent.) can it be doubted that we should now have had a tonnage of two millions and a half, and that our exports would have amounted to one hundred and fifty millions. I am told that one of the ablest financiers in this country has recently declared that he should consider an average duty of twelve or fifteen per cent. ad valorem, as abundantly sufficient for all the purposes of revenue; and that, under such a system, our imports and exports would, in his opinion, exceed a hundred millions of dollars the very first year. I know, Mr. President, that it has sometimes been said that the evils under which the south is suffering arise from the over-production of cotton; but this is not so. Cotton is an article, the production of which cannot be overdone. It is the cheapest of all known raw materials. It is fast superseding silk, wool, hemp and flax, all over the world. As a proof of this, I will advert to the fact, that, during a period, in England, when her woollen manufactures advanced from five millions of pounds sterling to six, the cotton manufactures progressed from one million to more than thirty. If you would take off your duties, and throw open to us the markets of the world, American cottons would, to a great extent, supersede all others, and we should find a market, not for one, but two millions of bales. The whole south would then, indeed, become a "garden spot." But it is insisted by the supporters of the protecting system, that its only effect is to make our goods come cheaper. Sir, if this were true, I will venture to assert, that the manufacturers themselves would be the very first to abandon the system. Their object, certainly, is not to lessen, but to increase their prices. Even if this were the case, however, I am unable to discover how the cotton planter could be compensated for the loss of his market. How is this supposed reduction to be brought about? By competition, say the gentlemen, between the British and the American manufacturer. But if it is competition that is to produce this reduction of prices, the manufacturer, on both sides, must be put on an equal footing. What sort of competition is that which is founded on a discrimination of fifty per cent, in favor of one of the parties—and if, in spite of such a discrimination, the contest can be maintained at all, is it not, by that fact, put beyond dispute, that but for the tax, the prices would be still further reduced? Gentlemen take it for granted that the competition among the foreign manufacturers is not sufficiently great to reduce the price to the very lowest rate. They even tell us of combinations among them to keep up their prices. Sir, such combinations are utterly impossible. How are the manufacturers of iron, in Sweden, Russia and England, or the cotton and silk manufacturers of France, to enter into a combination? The thing is ridiculous. No, sir, if the duties were taken off, the prices of goods would be reduced to their minimum, and much lower than they are now in this country, and it is for this reason, and this only, that the manufacturers are protesting against it. But, sir, where is the evidence to be found that the tariff has produced any reduction whatever, in the price of the protected articles. Is there any other foundation for the assertion than this: that the prices of cottons, woollens and iron, have actually fallen since 1824? But all other articles have likewise fallen, protected and unprotected. Real and personal estate, cotton, flour and tobacco, all—all have gone down; and most of them have fallen in a much greater degree than woollens, cottons and iron. Has the tariff done all this? What say the gentlemen? I have here a price current containing the prices of 250 articles, in 1816 and 1831. From this it appears that there has been an universal reduction in the price of articles of every description, and that those admitted duty free have been reduced, at least, in an equal ratio with those paying duties. Indeed, sir,

I think that a careful examination of this table will shew that reduction in the protected articles has not been so great as in the others. But the reduction has not been confined to this country. It has taken place in England, and all over the world, in an equal, nay, in a greater degree. The very articles most highly protected in this country, cottons, woollens and iron, are now selling in England much lower than they can be obtained here. This is a fact perfectly notorious to every importing merchant, and I have abundant evidence of it now in my hands. Here are statements shewing that such goods have actually been imported within the last year, in Philadelphia, New York and elsewhere, and after paying duties of from 50 to an 100 per cent, have been sold as low as the domestic manufacture. Sir, I ascertained, before I left home, that the whole quantity of cotton goods imported into Charleston during the last year paid an average duty of fifty per cent, and then they were sold as low as American cottons of the same quality. But I am really ashamed to argue a question so self-evident. How can taxes possibly lessen prices? How can protection diminish the cost of production? What are the elements of price? Are they not the cost of the raw material—the wages of labor—and the interest of capital; and how can these be lessened by a tax on the article? To say so, is to reverse all the rules of proportion. Gentlemen might as well contend that two added to five make three, as that fifty per cent, added to the cost of an imported article, lessens its price. If gentlemen can believe this, they may believe any thing. But the truth is, Mr. President, this whole matter of the reduction in the price of goods is very easily explained. It depends on general causes, which have operated to a certain extent all over the world. From a thorough investigation of the subject, which has taken place in Great Britain, it is found to have resulted from the appreciation of the currency, improvements in machinery, and the general restoration of peace. The resumption of specie payments, and the diminished supply of the precious metals, is calculated to have lessened the circulating medium to the amount of upwards of £500,000,000. The effect of this single cause has been, within the last ten years, the reduction of prices in that country to the amount of thirty-five per cent, to which fifteen per cent, may be added for the other causes above mentioned—making in the whole a reduction of almost fifty per cent, in the money price of all articles. The same thing has taken place in this country, and, therefore, when gentlemen allege that the price of manufactures has fallen, the naked fact proves nothing, unless they can show that they have fallen in a greater degree than other articles in this country, and similar articles abroad. But this is so far from being the fact, that the truth is, that the protected articles have fallen less in proportion than those which receive no protection. Cotton is a striking example, which has, in a few years, fallen to one-third of its value, while no protected article has, in the same period, fallen one half.

I trust, sir, that we have now made out our case; that we have shown the unjust and unequal operation, in every point of view, of this system, and that, as far as the south is concerned, and the west also, though not in the same degree, it is an unmitigated system of burthen. And, even with regard to the favored section, I would submit, how far it is wise to insist upon a system which can only be maintained at the expense of other sections. Sir, I feel too much confidence in the justice and magnanimity of our northern brethren to suffer myself to doubt their willingness to abandon this system if they could see it in the light that we do. It may enrich them for the moment, but the prosperity it creates is artificial, and will assuredly be unsubstantial. No country can be permanently benefited by a system of bounties. This system may destroy the south, but it will not permanently advance the prosperity of the north. It may depress us, but cannot elevate them. Besides, sir, if persevered in, it must annihilate that portion of the country from which the resources are to be drawn, that are to enrich the northern manufacturers. And it may be well for gentlemen to reflect, whether adhering to this policy, would not be acting like the man who "killed the goose which laid the golden eggs." Let gentlemen be assured, that this is a system which cannot possibly last. It will, soon—er or later, be utterly overthrown. Would it not be well, therefore, for them to seize this favorable occasion to make some sacrifice of their peculiar interests to the general welfare?

In concluding, Mr. President, what I have to say on this branch of the subject, I must take the liberty of presenting a few general considerations. In a broad view of the question, it never can be expedient to introduce into a country the manufacture of any article that cannot be produced as cheaply at home as it can be obtained from abroad. There are some such now made in this country, and their ability to sustain themselves, without protection, is unquestionable. The only exception I would admit to the rule I have laid down, relates to articles strictly necessary to national defence. I do not allude to the habiliments of a soldier, or to articles necessary to his consumption, but to arms and munitions of war. It is the true policy of all nations to "buy where they can buy cheapest." This is the very instinct of our nature, and when we depart from it in national concerns, we violate the soundest principles of political economy, a science which is in fact but the lessons of wisdom and an enlightened experience applied to the affairs of nations. Sir, the restrictive policy is founded on the triumph of the selfish principle. It assumes that the natural position of nations towards each other is one of enmity and rivalry, founded on a supposed opposition of interests. The doctrine of the old school was, that, what was gained by one nation, was necessarily lost by another.

The plain and seemingly obvious truth, that in a fair and equal exchange of commodities, all parties gain, is a noble discovery of modern times. The contrary principle naturally led to commercial rivalries, wars, and abuses of all sorts. The benefits of commerce being regarded as a stake to be won, or an advantage to be wrested from others by fraud or by force, governments naturally strove to secure them to their own subjects; and when they once set out in this wrong direction, it was quite natural that they should not stop short till they ended in binding, in the bonds of restriction, not only the whole country, but all of its parts. Thus we are told that England first protected by her restrictive policy her whole empire against all the world, then Great Britain against the colonies, then the British Isles against each other, and ended by vainly attempting to protect all the great interests and employments of the state by balancing them against each other. Sir, such a system, carried fully out, is not confined to rival nations, but protects one town against another, considers villages, and even families as rivals; and cannot stop short of "Robinson Crusoe in his goat skins." It takes but one step further to make every man his own lawyer, doctor, farmer and shoemaker—and, if I may be allowed an Irishism, his own seamstress and washerwoman. The doctrine of free trade, on the contrary, is founded on the true social system. It looks on all mankind as children of a common parent—and the great family of nations as linked together by mutual interests. Sir, as there is a religion, so I believe there is a politics of nature. Cast your eyes over this various earth—see its surface diversified with hills and valleys, rocks, and fertile fields. Notice its different productions—its infinite varieties of soil and climate. See the mighty rivers winding their way to the very mountain's base, and thence guiding man to the vast ocean, dividing, yet connecting nations. Can any man who considers these things with the eye of a philosopher, not read the design of the great Creator (written legibly in his works) that his children should be drawn together in a free commercial intercourse, and mutual exchanges of the various gifts with which a bountiful Providence has blessed them. Commerce, sir, restricted even as she has been, has been the great source of civilization and refinement all over the world. Next to the Christian religion, I consider FREE TRADE in its largest sense as the greatest blessing that can be conferred upon any people. Hear, sir, what Patrick Henry, the great orator of Virginia, whose soul was the very temple of freedom, says on this subject—

"Why should we fetter commerce? If a man is in chains, he droops and bows to the earth, because his spirits are broken, but let him twist the fetters from his legs, and he will stand erect. Fetter not commerce! Let her be as free as the air. She will range the whole creation, and return on the loor winds of Heaven, to bless the land with plenty."

But, it has been said, that free trade would do very well, if all nations would adopt it; but as it is, every nation must protect itself from the effect of restrictions by countervailing measures. I am persuaded, sir, that it is a great, a most fatal error. If retaliation is resorted to for the honest purpose of producing a redress of the grievance, and while adhered to no longer than there is a hope of success, it may, like war itself, be sometimes just and necessary. But if it have no such object, "it is the unprofitable combat of seeing which can do the other the most harm." The case can hardly be conceived in which permanent restrictions, as a measure of retaliation, could be profitable. In every possible situation, a trade, whether more or less restricted, is profitable, or it is not. This can only be decided by experience, and if the trade be left to regulate itself, water would not more naturally seek its level, than the intercourse adjust itself to the true interests of the parties. Sir, as to this idea of the regulation by government of the pursuits of men, I consider it as a remnant of barbarism disagreeable to an enlightened age, and inconsistent with the first principles of rational liberty. I hold government to be utterly incapable, from its position, of exercising such a power wisely, prudently or justly. Are the rulers of the world the depositaries of its collected wisdom? Sir, can we forget the advice of a great statesman to his son—"Go, see the world, my son, that you may learn with how little wisdom mankind is governed." And is our own government an exception to this rule, or do we not find here, as every where else, that "Man, proud man,

Rebels in a little brief authority,
Plays some fantastic tricks before high Heaven,
As makes the angels weep."

The gentleman has appealed to the example of other nations. Sir, they are all against him. They have had restrictions enough, to be sure; but they are getting heartily sick of them, and in England, particularly, would willingly get rid of them, if they could. We have been assured, by the declaration of a minister of the crown, from his place in parliament, "that there is a growing conviction, among all men of sense and reflection in that country, that the true policy of all nations is to be found in unrestricted industry." Sir, in England they are now retracing their steps, and endeavoring to relieve themselves of the system as fast as they can. Within a few years past, upwards of three hundred statutes, imposing restrictions in that country, have been repealed; and a case has recently occurred there, which seems to leave no doubt that, if Great Britain has grown great, it is, as Mr. Huskisson has declared, "not in consequence of, but in spite of, her restrictions." The silk manufacture, protected by enormous bounties, was found to be in such a declining condition, that the government was obliged to do something to save it from total ruin. And what did they do? They considerably reduced the duty on foreign silks; both on the raw material and the manufactured article. The consequence was, the immediate revival of the silk manufacture, which has since been nearly doubled.

Sir, the experience of France is equally decisive. Bonaparte's effort to introduce cotton and sugar has cost that country millions; and, but the other day, a foolish attempt to protect the iron mines spread devastation through half of France, and nearly ruined the wine trade, on which one fifth of her citizens depend for subsistence. As to Spain, unhappy Spain, "fenced round with restrictions," her experience one would suppose, would convince us, if any thing could, that the protecting system in politics has bigotry in religion, was utterly at war with sound principles and a liberal and enlightened policy. Sir, I say, in the words of the philosophical statesman of England, "leave a generous nation free to seek their own road to perfection." Thank God, the night is passing away, and we have lived to see the dawn of a glorious day. The cause of free trade must and will prosper, and finally triumph. The political economist is abroad; light has come into the world; and, in this instance, at least, men will not "prefer darkness rather than light." Sir, let it not be said, in after times, that the statesmen of America were behind the age in which they lived—that they initiated this young and vigorous country into the enervating and corrupting practices of European nations—and that, at the moment when the whole world were looking to us for an example, we arrayed ourselves in the east-off follies and exploded errors of the old world, and, by the introduction of a vile system of artificial stimulants and political gambling, impaired the healthful vigor of the body politic, and brought on a decrepitude and premature dissolution.

I had intended, Mr. President, to have said something of the constitutional question, but have already taken up so much of your time, that I shall not now enter into it. I must be permitted, however to remark, that the gentleman is mistaken in supposing that this objection to the protecting system is of recent origin? Up to 1824, the question had not been much considered, simply because the protection which manufactures had derived was merely incidental to duties imposed for revenue. The act of 1790 was surely of that character; and even the act of 1816 provided for a diminution, and not an increase of duties. But when, in 1824, the true character of this system was developed, the constitutional objection was plainly and strongly insisted upon. Here is the language, sir, that I, myself held on that occasion, on this floor.

"Will gentlemen point out to me, if they can, the power which this government possesses to adopt a system for the avowed purpose of encouraging a particular branch of industry. It is my sober and deliberate opinion, that the congress of the United States have no more power to pass laws for the purpose of directly or indirectly inducing any portion of the people to engage in manufactures, than they have to abolish trial by jury, or establish the inquisition."

Since that period, the legislatures of every southern state have denounced this system as a violation of their constitutional rights. It was but the last year, that S. Carolina recorded on the journals of the senate, her solemn protest against it "as utterly unconstitutional, grossly unequal, and oppressive, and such an abuse of power as is incompatible with the principles of a free government and the great ends of civil society." I do not know, sir, where the constitutional objections to this system are better summed up, than in the very address of the free trade convention of Philadelphia, to which the gentleman has referred for another purpose. The gentleman certainly is mistaken, when he relies on that exposition as an authority in his favor. Sir, as I understand the argument, it is only admitted incidental protection may be afforded by duties imposed only for revenue, but that the right is expressly denied of "imposing any additional duty for the purpose of affording that protection." I dismiss this branch of the subject, with the remark, that whether we be right or wrong in our views on this question, the opinion is conscientiously and almost universally entertained throughout the whole south, that the protecting system involves a gross violation of the solemn compact which is the bond of our union.

I come now, sir, to the question of the policy which ought to be adopted at this important era in the history of our government. We have arrived at a most interesting crisis in our national affairs—one to which the people have been looking up with intense anxiety for several years past. They have contemplated the extinction of the public debt as the great day of jubilee, when they were to be relieved from the oppressions which they have so long patiently endured? The people of the south, sir, like the children of Israel of old, have passed through the wilderness, and are now in sight of the promised land. They stand on the top of Mount Pisgah, and look, with delight, at the goodly prospect before them—and it is for you this day to determine, whether they shall perish in the wilderness, or be permitted to possess and enjoy their rich inheritance. Sir, I have shewn that the whole system of duties is oppressive and unequal—that the very action of the government is so—yet I do not wish, gentlemen, to suppose that we are disposed to push our claims to an immeasurable extent. No, we will not ask that northern manufactures shall be taxed, because duties, to whatever extent imposed, operate as a tax upon our industry. We are willing to agree that the revenue necessary for the ordinary purposes of the government shall be levied by duties upon imports. The facility with which indirect taxes may be collected affords an argument in their favor to which we are willing to yield, though we well know that they must operate most injuriously on our interests. But, in yielding this much, we have surely a right to expect that no more money shall be levied in this way than shall be absolutely necessary. We think we have a right to insist, that on the extinction of the public debt, the twelve millions of dollars heretofore annually appropriated to that object, should no longer be levied; and, further, that no more money shall be raised than may be necessary to meet the ordinary expenditures of the government. Any other basis of reduction than this must be founded on the idea of a contemplated increase of the public expenditures. (And why should they be increased? We have rather a right to expect that they should be diminished. The principal objects of expenditure, for many years past, have been connected with preparations for war; but, with the progress of our works of defense, and the increase of our population, the necessity for this expenditure will, in a great measure, cease. Indeed it does appear to me that it will be hardly necessary, hereafter, to seek other security against invasion that will be found in the strong arms and stout hearts of our fellow-citizens. But the gentleman insists that our revenue shall not be reduced below eighteen millions of dollars, while we all know that twelve millions have heretofore furnished an abundant supply for every purpose, including a million a year for internal improvements. The gentleman admits that we ought not to provide for a surplus, and says, with great force and truth, that a division of it among the states would be a departure from all sound principles of government. For, said the gentleman, "to give it back to the states or the individuals from whom it was drawn, in the same proportion, would be a palpable absurdity; while, to distribute it in different proportions, would be an act of gross injustice." I submit whether this argument is not equally applicable to internal improvement. But, waving this point, I would ask, if we are to have no surplus, why raise eighteen millions of dollars—six millions more than the ordinary expenditures of the government? To provide, says the gentleman, for contingencies? But, sir, is it not morally certain that your receipts must exceed your estimates—the reduction of duties will increase importations—and, fix what standard you will, my life upon it, we shall have a surplus, and not a deficit, unless gentlemen mean to provide for some new grand scheme of national expenditure. Besides, against accidental deficiencies, a sufficient provision will be found in the uncalled for appropriations, always to be found in the treasury. Having shewn the extent to which the revenue ought to be reduced, I proceed to consider the mode in which that reduction ought to be effected. The first scheme suggested by the gentleman, is a continuance of existing duties on the unprotected articles, and carrying up the duties on protected articles to prohibition. The gentleman says, however, that he is not in favor of this scheme, because he would put the manufacturers on their good behaviour, by exposing them to foreign competition. But what sort of competition is that to which they are exposed, when entrenched behind a protecting tariff, ranging from fifty to two hundred per cent? I have shewn that the existing duties are, to a certain extent, prohibitory; and when the gentleman declares himself against prohibition, he seals the condemnation of his own resolution, which proposes to retain the existing system untouched, prohibitions and all.

I come now to the schemes advocated by the gentleman himself. To take off the duties entirely from all the unprotected articles, except wines and silks, and leave them as they are upon the protected articles.

The first objection to this scheme is, that it is proposed by it to take off only $6,000,000 of taxes, even after the treasury is to be relieved from a charge of $12,000,000 by the extinction of the public debt. That it proposes therefore, to create an annual surplus of $6,000,000 beyond the wants of the government, not only without the smallest necessity, but with the certain effect of changing the character of your government, and corrupting the people. Why is this surplus to be created? Has the gentleman given a single reason in its favor, or has he not himself sealed the condemnation of his own proposition, when he admitted that no surplus ought to be created for distribution for it is not to be in some shape distributed, for what purposes is it to be raised? The next objection to this scheme is, that it proposes to relieve luxuries from all taxation, while the taxes on the necessities of life are to remain just as they are; subject to duties of from 50 to 100 per cent. It is true that the gentleman, I presume, the enormity of the proposition in its original form, now consents that some very moderate duty may be levied on wines and silks. But, sir, I should be glad to know, in what wines and silks differ from the numerous other articles which, by the gentleman's scheme, are to come in duty free. Here is a list of some of them, and it will be for the senate and the country to say how far it is reasonable or just, that the consumers of these articles shall contribute nothing to the public revenue, while the honest laboring man is to be taxed from 50 to 100 dollars in every hundred dollars which he expends on the necessities, and the flannels, the arms and the sugar, which are indispensable to the health and comfort of himself and family.

"It is one of the grantees farces ever attempted to be played off upon a free people, to see an attempt made to reduce the taxes on olives and capers, anchovies and bramiy fruits, mace, cloves, nutmegs, precious stones, alabaster ornaments, corals, perumery, artificial flowers, billiard balls, battle-axes and shuttlecocks, coral beads and gold snuff-boxes, silver spectacles and ivory-headed canes, velvets and lace, mill muslins and goss de Naples, camel's hair shawls, morocco and prunella shoes, fine cambrics, plated chafing-dishes, porcelain and china dinner and tea sets, gold watches, Cologne water, Champagne and Burgundy wines, oranges and pine-apples, embroidery, ivory fans, fine Irish linens, parasols, centre tables, gilt books, pier looking glasses, vermelli, and macaroni, Italian marble, mantel ornaments, rouge, essences and court plaster, chessmen, sweet scented soap, silk stockings, gold and silver thimbles, mantel time-pieces, tooth-powder, wax dolls, and a hundred other things used by the rich. We say, it is one of the grandest farces ever played off upon a free people, that such articles as those we have enumerated, should be exempted."

I ask for the reason for this distinction which relieves luxuries from taxation, and throws them upon the necessities of life; which burdens the poor and exempts the rich, and I am told it is necessary to protection. Whose protection? Why, the wealthy proprietors of manufacturing stock; men who are realizing enormous dividends, drawn from the pockets of the people. Sir, no other reason for this distinction has been, or can be given; for it is acknowledged by all the world, that luxuries are the proper subjects for taxation, and ought rightfully to be taxed higher than the necessities of life. But here the manufacturers interpret their claims, and the scheme of justice are disregarded. Again, sir, these are articles of general consumption; at least among the wealthy; and consumed equally, too, all over the country; and yet they must come in duty free, and the whole revenue of the country be levied on articles, in relation to which, the duties operate most unjustly and unequally; being in truth a bounty to certain portions of the people, and a burden upon others; and yet the senator tells us he had hoped that such a proposition as this would not only have met the approbation of all parties, but would have been received as a concession to the complaints of the south. How it was possible for the gentleman to have indulged such an expectation, I am utterly unable to comprehend. Sir, what single concession, or the slightest approach towards it, is made by such a proposition? Does it consist in agreeing to take off six millions of taxes, when the demands of the treasury are to be reduced to double that amount? Has the south ever uttered one word of complaint against the duties which it is proposed to reduce? No. These were imposed for revenue; and against duties fairly levied for that purpose, they have never complained. It is against duties, imposed not for revenue, but protection, that they have been so long and so earnestly remonstrating; and, to quiet their contents, the proposition is gravely submitted, to take off all the revenue duties, and to leave the protecting duties untouched. Sir, it is not so much the amount of this tax, as its inequality and injustice, which has roused the whole south to determined opposition. And how is it proposed to relieve our complaints? By aggravating that inequality, and extending and perpetuating that injustice. We tell you that the protecting duties operate as a tax upon us, and a bounty upon the tariff states. We insist that it is a violation of the principles on which our government is founded, and reduces us to a state of colonial vassalage; and this it substantially does, if we are not mistaken in its operation, and Mr. Gribble's definition of a colony is the true one—"a country governed in reference to the interests of another."

Sir, if we are right, this scheme amounts to neither more nor less than a proposition to relieve the tariff states from all taxation, and to throw the whole burden of the government upon the other states. It is admitted, that the protection enjoyed by the former, even now exceeds the amount of the taxes which they pay, but still they do pay their equal portion of duties on the unprotected articles. But when these are taken off, they will be relieved from taxes altogether. Gentlemen who now hear me, well remember, that when the tariff of 1828 was under discussion here, a senator from a tariff state rose in his place, and supported the bill on the single ground that it operated as a bounty of a million of dollars per annum to the state he represented. Let us assume that calculation to have been correct; and that the state in question now pays half a million in taxes on the unprotected articles. When you take off the tax and leave the bounty, the bounty will obviously be increased by just half a million, and the state in question will be relieved entirely from taxation. Such is the compromise proposed to the south. The evils of which we complain are to be increased—the protecting system is to be rivetted upon the country beyond all hope of relief, and, we are told, we might to receive all this as a concession. Sir, we say to you, we are willing to submit to have the foreign manufactures for which we exchange our productions taxed for revenue, though we know that such tax must operate as a bounty to the domestic manufacturer; and so far diminish the value of our productions, but we invoke you not to aggravate the injustice and inequality of this system, by extending the tax beyond the just revenue standard, and by so arranging the duties as to throw the burden entirely upon the protected articles to relieve the tariff states from all taxation, and to throw the burden entirely on us. Above all, we call upon you to remember, that the British manufactures on which you propose to throw almost the whole burden of the government, are those which we receive in exchange for our productions—that to burden them is to burden us, and that the end of all this may, and probably will be, that we shall be deprived of our best customers, and be cut off from the only sure market for our cotton, rice and tobacco.

The policy proposed in the amendment which I have submitted, is founded on the just principles I have advocated. The arrangement of the details we are willing to leave to the committee. We do not propose to destroy, or even to injure, the manufacturers. We are willing they should have the incidental protection afforded by a fair revenue system, and on any plan of reduction, the duties and charges on the foreign manufacture will not fall much short of 33 1/3 per cent.; and surely, sir, if, with a protection equal to one-third of the cost of the article, our manufactures cannot be maintained, they ought to be abandoned at once, since nothing can be clearer than that they would then be sustained at a certain loss to the country. We do not insist on an immediate reduction, to the lowest revenue standard. As the public debt is not yet paid, we are willing that the reduction on the protected articles should be gradual—and spread, if gentlemen please, over two or three years; and, if they desire it, we will not object to making an immediate reduction on the unprotected articles, of 10 or 15 per cent. The immediate effect of this plan, so far from being injurious to the manufacturers, will, I am persuaded, serve rather to strengthen them, and even in its ultimate results, no manufacturer will be injured that does not depend on protection for its existence, and is not sustained at the public expense. Suppose the duties on the protected articles were now reduced ten per cent. below their present rates, and by subsequent steps carried down gradually to the true revenue standard, what would be the effect of this first reduction of ten per cent.? If a yard of English cloth cost a dollar, paid a duty of fifty per cent., and, with the addition of charges, could be retailed at two dollars, the effect of this reduction would only be to reduce the price to one dollar and ninety cents. So that the protection to the American manufacturer would be lessened only five per cent. Now if this provision were accompanied by an immediate reduction of the duties on the unprotected articles from fifty per cent. to fifteen, would not the manufacturers derive some compensation in the diminished cost of every article which enters into their consumption? and if, in addition to this, there should be a considerable reduction of duties on the raw material, I would submit to their serious consideration whether their condition then would be worse than it is now. The true policy of the manufacturers, it appears to me, consists in obtaining their raw materials cheap, and having their expenses diminished by taking off unnecessary taxes on their consumption. Sir, if this is to become a manufacturing country, we must look to the markets of the world. A feeble and sickly existence may be preserved at home by a system of protection and of bounties—but to be put on a sure foundation, and to acquire that vigor, strength and energy, which will enable them to enter into successful competition abroad, with the manufactures of other countries, it is necessary they should be prepared for the contest, by being left, in a great measure, to their own unaided efforts. In one respect, the U. States possess an advantage over all the world, of which it seems to me, it would be madness not to avail ourselves. We can reduce the cost of production in every department of industry, to the very lowest rates. Our people are not necessarily borne down by an almost insupportable weight of taxation. We have no debt which can never be paid—no burthenous establishment—no kings, lords and commons, to eat out the substance of the people. In this consists our great advantage, and it will be our own fault if we do not avail ourselves of it to the fullest extent. This, sir, is not only the favorable moment for adjusting this great question, but if it be suffered to pass away, it can never be recalled. The manufacturers now can be let down without a shock, from the position to which they have been so unjustly elevated. They will now be remunerated for any diminution of their protection; but if the plan proposed in the gentleman's resolution should prevail, the immediate effect will be an increase of their protection, an enlargement of their bounty, and, of course, if these are to be reduced hereafter, the shock will be much greater than to that to which they would now be subjected. Sir, I do consider that, in making my proposition, I am proving myself a true friend to the manufacturers—and that they are their worst enemies (whatever they may themselves believe) who would adopt the policy embraced in the gentleman's resolution. In this opinion, sir I find I am not singular. The manufacturers themselves, and some of their ablest and most zealous advocates, have avowed the same sentiments. In a work just put into my hands, containing an exposition of evidence, about to be submitted to congress, in support of the memorial of the free trade convention, lately convened at Philadelphia, (a work to which I earnestly invite the attention of every member of this body,) I find some extracts from the Register of Hazzekiah Niles—certainly one of the most uncompromising champions of the protecting system—which furnishes decisive authority in favor of my opinion. I there find a letter from a person who is represented to be an extensive manufacturer, in which he says:

"The only true friends of the manufacturers are those who now seek to repeal the ridiculous tariff of 1825. Put a duty of revenue alone on cloths, and remove the duty on wool. It would be much better for us, if we were placed in England; for we could there, with our present hands and advantages, make cloth, send it to New York, pay the duties, and take more money than we do now. The difference is in the stock; and this difference is attributable to the absurdities of the American System, as it stands. The duties on dye stuffs, oil, soap and wool, taken in connection with the derangement of trade, by making the manufacturer an exporter, amounts to a much higher protection to the foreigner, than all the tariff affords to us. Such are the facts, and such the fruits, of the 'system' which the American manufacturer has tolled to support."

Thus, sir, it will be seen that we who propose to repeal the tariff of '25, "are the only true friends of the manufacturers," and that they are their worst enemies who are striving to perpetuate the "absurdities of the American System." Next we have the opinions of Mr. Niles himself, "that the act of 1825 was the result of a political bargain, and passed on principles disreputable to a congress of the United States," in which the enlightened author of the exposition very justly adds, "that no thing can be more obvious than the folly of pretending to encourage manufacturing industry, and at the same time to tax the raw materials, rum, hemp, flax, wool, lead, indigo, and other component parts of manufactures, and constituting the principal value of them, from fifty to two hundred per cent.," And here I am willing to rest my case.

The act of 1828, Mr. Niles affirms, "was the result of a political bargain, and passed on principles disreputable to a congress of the United States."

The gentleman complains of funds upon the revenue—and fraudulently involves, and smuggling—but it is his system which has produced these evils. Smuggling, from the very nature of things, must exist, when the duties exceed the risk and expense of the illicit intercourse. For a reason, sir, the high moral sense of a young and uncorrupted people, may oppose some obstacle to these practices. No government on earth can prevent them. Napoleon, in the plenitude of his power, was unable to maintain his continental system. His prohibitions and restrictions were constantly violated with impunity.—Yes, sir, he who spouted with kingdoms, who constructed thrones on the ruins of empires, and appointed the officers of his household to bid them; whose armies were his custom house officers who drew his couriers around the nations which he conquered, was utterly unable to put down the great principles of free trade. It has been well said, sir, "that when all Europe was obedient to his nod—the smuggler disposed his commands, set at naught his edicts, laughed to scorn his power, and overthrew his policy." How is it with England, that a girl is surrounded with a thousand shops, and thirty thousand guardians of her revenue? Sir, do we not all know that smuggling is there a profitable trade, and that the revenue laws of England are constantly violated with impunity? And how is it in Spain? A modern traveler asserts that there are a hundred thousand persons in that unhappy country who live by smuggling, and that there are thirty thousand others, paid by the government, to detect their practice, but who are in league with the offenders; and as to the condition of things in our own country, the gentleman has told us a tale this day, which, if he be not himself deceived, shows what fearful progress these practices have already made. The time was when smuggling was absolutely unknown any where, in this country, as it still is in the southern states. It is now a protecting system which has introduced it. It is the natural consequence of high duties—the evil was foretold, and, as we predicted, it has come upon us. The protecting system has already, in the minds of many, removed the column which formerly rested on this practice. It was but the last year, that a distinguished senator rose up in his place here and held this language: "Your tariff policy compels respectable men to violate your law; you force them to disregard its injunctions, in order to elude its oppression. It was his perfect conviction, that there was not a virtuous man throughout the union, who would not think a criminimal to smuggle into the country every article consumed in it—and why? Because you force them to it in self defence." Sir, when these sentiments shall become prevalent, what think you will become of that system? How long will it last after the payment of duties shall come to be considered as a badge of servitude?

Mr. President, the proposition of the senator from Kentucky is, that the protecting system, as it now stands upon your statute-book, shall remain untouched—that all its contradictory provisions, its absurdities, injustice and inequality, shall be maintained inviolate. Let us look, then, at some of the existing provisions of this system. Some of them, in the exposition to which I have before referred, are detailed with a clearness to which nothing can be added by me. Here are tables of the duties on woollens, flannels, baizes, and carpeting, ranging from forty-five to upwards of two hundred per cent. I will read a few extracts in illustration of the effect of these duties.

[Here Mr. Hayne read several extracts from the work in question, showing that the duties on coarse woollens, such as are used by stage drivers, watermen, and other laborers, for great coats, pea-jackets, &c. are so exorbitantly taxed, as to raise the cost of the articles to about three times the price which the English laborer has to pay for the same kind of clothing;—that the western farmer, in consequence of the high duty, is compelled to pay four dollars a yard for cloth which costs the English farmer but one dollar seventy-five cents; that flannels, so indispensable to all the women and children in the country, are subjected to a duty of from ninety to a hundred and fifty per cent., whereby an article which cost in England from eight to nine cents, is sold here for twenty cents, and that which cost in England twenty-nine cents, our manufacturer can obtain fifty cents for; that cottons are charged with a duty of from twenty-five to two hundred per cent., whereby the cost to the American consumer is, in many instances, increased one half; and that the duty upon iron is from an hundred and fifty to two hundred and eighty per cent. On this point, Mr. Hayne read from the report on the blacksmith's petition, made to the senate during their last session, and quoted the testimony of John Sarchet, a witness examined on oath before the committee, from which it appeared, "that under the existing rate of duties, a ton of hammers and sledges can be imported, for the use of the American manufacturer of those very articles, at a less cost than the bar iron from which they are made; that wheel-tire has actually been imported, in a finished state, for about forty-seven dollars a ton, while bar iron, suitable for the purpose, is selling for about ninety dollars the ton; that tea-trays can be imported for half the price of the raw material out of which they are manufactured; knitting needles for a hundred and forty-three dollars a ton less than the raw materials out of which they are made; that a ton of chain cables can now be imported into this country at a less cost than the rods out of which they are made; and that the necessary consequence has been, that a number of workers in iron, and of mechanics, estimated at one hundred thousand, had their profits so diminished, that Mr. Sarchet had declared, that he had never seen any blacksmiths so poor, or carrying on a less prosperous business, than those of the United States, owing as he believed, to the high duties they are compelled to pay on the raw iron."]

Look, continued Mr. Hayne, through your whole protecting system; your duties every where are so arranged as to fall most heavily upon the poor. The poor man is taxed five dollars upon a coat, which cost him ten, and a rich man ten upon one which cost him forty—a tax of eight dollars upon coarse cottons for his wife and children, which cost no more than eight; and the rich man but eight dollars, for what costs him upwards of thirty. Can any thing be conceived more monstrous than the system of minimums, to impose a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem on cotton goods, but provide, that, if they should cost less than thirty-five cents per square yard, they shall be deemed and taken to have cost thirty-five cents and pay duty accordingly—to provide that a duty of forty-five per centum ad valorem shall be imposed upon woollens, but provide that goods which cost more than one dollar, shall be deemed and taken to have cost two dollars and a half. This is like imposing an income tax of fifty per cent. and then providing that every man's income shall be deemed and taken to be three thousand dollars; or a tax of fifty cents per gallon upon stills, and providing that every still shall be considered as containing fifty gallons. Now, are gentlemen prepared to say that such a system as this, with all its imperfections on its head, is to be held as sacred as the laws of the Medes and Persians? I trust not.

Let not gentlemen so far deceive themselves as to suppose, that the opposition of the south to the protecting system is not based on high and lofty principles. It has nothing to do with party politics, or the mere elevation of men. It rises far above all such considerations. Nor is it influenced chiefly by calculations of interest, but is founded in much nobler impulses. The instinct of self-interest might have taught us an easier way of relieving ourselves from this oppression. It wanted but the will, to have supported ourselves with every article embraced in the protective system, free of duty, without any other participation on our part than a single consent to receive them. But, sir, we have scorned in a contest for our rights to resort to any but open and fair means to maintain them. The spirit with which we have entered into this business, is akin to that which was kindled in the bosom of our fathers, when they were made the victims of oppression, and if it has not displayed itself in the same way, it is because we have ever cherished the strongest feelings of confraternity towards our brethren, and the warmest and most devoted attachment to the union. If we have been in any degree, divided among ourselves in this matter, the source of that division, let gentlemen be assured, has not arisen so much from any difference of opinion, as to the true character of the oppression, as from the different degrees of hope of redress. All parties have for years past been looking forward to this crisis for the fulfilment of their hopes, or the confirmation of their fears. And God grant that the result may be auspicious.

Sir, I call upon gentlemen on all sides of the house to meet us in the true spirit of conciliation and concession. Remove, I earnestly beseech you, from among us, this never failing source of contention. Dry up at its source this fountain of the waters of bitterness. Restore that harmony which has been disturbed, that mutual affection and confidence which has been impaired. And it is in your power to do it this day—but there is but one means under heaven, by which it can—by doing EQUAL JUSTICE TO ALL. And be assured, that he to whom the country shall be indebted for this blessing, will be considered as the second founder of the republic. He will be regarded, in all after times, as the ministering angel visiting the troubled waters of our political dissensions, and restoring to the elements its healing virtues.

I will conclude by invoking the authority of one whose name is deservedly dear to the American people; whose life was the practice of virtue; from whose lips there constantly flowed the lessons of political wisdom, and whose example will be to the remotest generations a light to our feet, and a lamp to our path. The restorer of that liberty which Washington achieved; the man "who saved the constitution even at its last gasp"—I mean THOMAS JEFFERSON.

In Mr. Jefferson's inaugural address, he bears the following strong testimony in favor of the true American System:

"Entertaining a true sense of our equal rights to the use of our own faculties, to the acquisitions of our own industry • • • enlightened by a benign religion • • • with all these blessings, what more is necessary to make us a happy and a prosperous people! "Still one thing more, fellow-citizens—a wise and frugal government, which, restraining men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free, to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement—and shall not take from the mouth of labor, the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government; and this is necessary to close the circle of our felicities."

That God may inspire us, gentlemen, and all who are entrusted with the administration of our public affairs, with such dispositions, is my constant prayer to Him who holds in his hands the destinies of nations.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

“We must do, as they do in Holland—as well as we can.” The “innopoly” of the last number, by Mr. Hayne’s “free trade” speech—for he is an “over-grown capitalist” in his ways—threw out of their regular, and perhaps, rightful place, many articles not less interesting than that which he supplied us with; and now we have the long and exciting speeches delivered in the senate, when the nomination of Mr. Van Buren was under consideration. We have dropped every thing that we could, to make room for some of these speeches; and so much do we suppose that our readers would wish speedily to have them all, that a supplement would have issued, had not the early winter, with the late new edition of intensely cold weather, nullified our usual supply of paper. These speeches are so arranged that there will be no break in the matter, when the volume is bound—provided, that we can get into the next number the balance of them. We publish those of Messrs. Chambers, Clayton, Foot, Webster, Clay and Holmes, and have on hand those of Messrs. Frelinghuysen, Pinckney, Miller, Webster (a second speech), Ewing, Moore and Marcy. We also have the nomination, if furnished. And there are many independent or dependent papers and circumstances, that should be noticed—for reference. We shall do what we can to present the facts to our readers; for they are, or will be, subjects of much and ardent popular discussion.

The current proceedings of congress are cut down to the lowest minimum, compatible with a record of the chief things happening. We shall have to go back to them, and especially to insert the sketches of certain speeches of Messrs. Benton and Buckner, and others.

A forcible entry however has been made into this sheet, for an exposition of the proceedings of the executive committee of the New York convention, and an exhortation to all who support the American System, that important facts may be collected. For several weeks we have desired to insert something of this kind—and hence the resolution to postpone it no longer; yet in truth, there is enough matter on hand almost to appal us, though long “accustomed to look” on blackened paper and grinning types “with composure!”

P. S. When the preceding article was just making-up for the press, the Washington papers of yesterday, (at a much later hour than usual), were received; and the manly and generous disavowal of Mr. Hayne, with respect to certain errors into which he had been inadvertently led concerning the editor of this paper, (see page 414), has caused the withdrawal of a paragraph of some length, excusing the delay that had unavoidably taken place, in noticing his speech as it then appeared to “merit”—from which we are quite willing to be excused, such things being always unpleasant; and our thanks are due both to Mr. Hayne and to Mr. Clay for the brief proceedings had on the occasion.

A short sketch of the opening of Mr. Clay’s speech is given in our account of the proceedings, and the National Intelligencer says—An immense crowd attended the senate yesterday, to hear Mr. Clay’s second speech on his resolution, in reply to Mr. Hayne. Not only were all the seats without the bar, but all the space within, not actually occupied by the senators, was filled with ladies; and every part of the lobbies and galleries was packed with eager auditors. It is our custom, not to describe speeches, or to speak of their merits; but to report them, and let our readers judge for themselves. We shall be pardoned, however, on this occasion, for departing from our usual reserve, so far as to express the general opinion of the speech of yesterday; and that is, that it was equal in all points—in power, in eloquence, and effect—to any of Mr. Clay’s best efforts of former days.

VOL. XLI.—No. 29.

[A call of the house of representatives was made because of the absence of the members to hear the speech of Mr. Clay.]

General Smith, of Maryland, in his speech in the senate last Monday, on Mr. Clay’s resolution, among other rather strange things, is reported to have said, “there was, at the commencement of the session, a disposition, on all hands, to lessen the excitement attending this subject [the tariff]; but since the arrival of the lobby members that disposition had now partly declined.” “He now saw very little reason to believe that any thing would be done, at this session, to relieve or conciliate the south.”

Gen. S. does not say what “lobby members” have brought about a state of things which he so much deplores; but it would seem that he had opened only one of his eyes to look at the “lobby;” for the free trade “lobby members” cannot have been charged, by him, with the want of a disposition to “RELIEVE” the south! These have been only three gentlemen attending on are not misinformed, was the exact amount of the “free trade” delegates last week—perhaps reinforced since then. And the delegates, on either side, have just about the same right to hold and express opinions, in the “lobby” or elsewhere, (except on the floor of the senate), as the venerable senator himself. At any rate, we think that such a right should belong to every American citizen!

We have not the pleasure of an acquaintance with the gentlemen composing the “free trade” delegation—yet dare say they are honorable men: but we know those who represent the interests of the free working people of the United States, and will do all that they can to oppose a placing of these in competition with the white slaves or pauper-laborers of England. They need not the certificate of gen. Smith for good conduct and steadfastness to principle; nor will his assaults affect them; but we leave it to the senator to pronounce on the magnanimity of attacking private gentlemen, who have no means of repelling his bitter effusions. Time was when a senator of the United States would not have thought of such a thing—but the new practice takes date from the entry of Mr. Ritchie’s “nuisance and curse” into that body—and the senate is no longer what it was. Such is a common remark of every one capable of making just comparisons of the present with the past. This is not written in soreness, because of any attacks that have been made upon myself, in either house of congress—I have a machine in my hands, and it is my own, as powerful as the tongue of the best of them, and care not “who cries aloud and spares not,” as the “honorable George Kremer” cried, and then—died.

As to the matter stated, perhaps I know a little more about it than gen. Smith. If the change that he speaks of has taken place, it is not the reason that the minority demands an absolute surrender of the principle of protection; and then, and not till then, will they render any good feelings into a consideration of the subject at large; and the moderation and modesty of this proceeding, may have had effect to call up the resolution of the majority to pursue its own purposes. Our friends, if we understand them, have no indisposition to inquire into the expediency of any of the duties assessed, at a proper time for it—but they cannot believe that there is not constitutional power to preserve the independence of the United States, and promote the “general welfare” of the American people.

When correcting the proof of the preceding remarks for the press, we first saw a full report of the speech of general Smith. It appears that his reference was special and direct, to "those interested men (who) hang upon the committee of manufactures like an incubus," as he says; and he exhorted the committee to "depend on their own good judgments!" &c. He also gives us to understand that the hatiers and workers in leather, &c., have "excluded foreign imports"—but does not tell the people why. It is for the reason that, at an early period, the country was blessed by an efficient protection of their businesses, which remains to this day—such protection as was asked for by "the tradesmen, mechanics, and others of the town of Baltimore," in April, 1789—being the first petition for protection ever presented to congress, and signed by the venerable senator, among others—though now he has, in a note, expressed a doubt of the "constitutionality" of the tariff of 1828.

¶ The undersigned, chairman of the permanent committee of the New York Convention, believing that a statement of the proceedings, prospects and designs of the executive branch of that committee (which is located at Baltimore), is due to the members of the convention, and their constituents, the friends of domestic industry in every part of the United States, has prepared the following exposition.

The address to the people, agreed upon at New York, and the following reports of special committees, have

On the manufacture of iron and steel;
On frauds on the revenue;
On the manufacture of salt;
On the manufacture of hats;
On the currency, as affecting or affected by the protecting system;

On the manufacture of cabinet wares;
On the manufacture of sugar and molasses;
On the tariffs of Great Britain, France and Russia;
On the coasting trade and interior commerce of the United States;*

On the subject of chemistry, as connected with manufactures and the mechanic arts;*

And a general report, or rather estimate, concerning the growth and manufacture of wool, from the committee on the latter.

They also published the journal of the proceedings of the convention, containing several reports on different subjects.

Two other reports have been received—one upon "the effects of the existing tariff upon agriculture and manufactures and the mechanic arts," &c.; and the other, concerning the product of silk, hemp and other agricultural materials; but these have been suspended by the executive committee, because of important additional information expected to be derived from the reports of other committees,—and without which, the first especially, they thought, could not be regarded as meeting the views of the convention. It will, however, be prepared as soon as the nature of things will permit, with much zeal to bring out the facts which belong to a subject so interesting.

Reports from the following committees are yet to come in, and we know that earnest efforts have been made, and are making to collect the facts appertaining to several of these important concerns:

On the growth of wool;
On the manufacture of wool;
On the manufacture of cotton;
On the manufacture of paper;
On the manufactures of glass, porcelain, &c.
On the manufactures of leather;
On the manufactures of lead;
On the preparation of madder wood, weld, &c.

The executive committee are also advised, that the memorial to congress will be forwarded by the committee appointed on that subject, very soon after the publication of the memorial of the Philadelphia "Free Trade

*It would, perhaps, be more correct to say that these are in type, and will be published in a few days.

Convention."† As our course was rather defensive than otherwise—this delay has been considered indispensably necessary, for we have not agitated a general revision of the tariff, so far as its protecting principle is involved, at the present time—though hoping that some improvements of existing laws may be made, to assure the payment of such duties as have been imposed for the encouragement and support of American industry.

The said committee have also the pleasure to say, that a vast amount of general statistical information is being collected, by industrious and intelligent friends in many parts of the United States—to shew the intimate connexion that exists between all the great branches of production, and how the population, wealth and power of our country is advanced, and its independence made sure, by happy combinations of the interests of agriculture with those of all the rest of the arts or employments of labor, skill and capital. All these things will be digested and prepared for publication—and, with the statistics already collected, or being collected, by the chairman and his colleagues, perhaps, present one of the most interesting views of our national affairs ever yet offered to the American public. The labor, truly, is great—but the purpose may well be called a noble one. It is—that we may know our own resources and our own strength: in the knowledge of both which we are miserably deficient. Without this knowledge, it is impossible that we can successfully meet the "regulations of trade" of other countries, or perfect a system for the permanent good of our

The delays that have occurred were, or are, inseparable from the exceeding difficulty that attended, or attends, the gathering of facts desired. Those concerning iron, so ably set forth in the report on that subject, were the fruits of several months previous application of those interested in that leading branch of manufactures; and a further supplementary report is expected, which will put the public in possession of all the information concerning it which can be hoped for at the present time. A variety of circumstances—chiefly originating, or dependent upon, the long and disastrous wars of the French revolution, had caused a general looking to things abroad, and disregard for things at home. Hence we have none of those official statistics which are so important in the legislation of other countries; and hence the advantages which they have constantly held over us—such as would have beggared a nation less favorably conditioned than we are. Except as to the geography, population and history of the United States—with an account of the financial and other concerns of the government, and the annual treasury tables, (meagre and imperfect as they are) relating to our foreign commerce and domestic tonnage, we have nothing wherewith to build a sound legislation. The products of our soil, factories, workshops—forests, mines and fisheries— inland and coasting trade, &c. &c. though having a general aggregate value of at least twelve, if not fifteen hundred millions of dollars a year, &c. are all left to speculation, or individual opinion, to be ascertained only by individual efforts in the cause of political science, and the collection of hundreds of thousands of individual items, requiring no small degree of zeal, talent and time. No other prosperous country is thus situated—no other so deficient in the knowledge of its means or greatness; and hence none have been so negligent to invigorate its natural or artificial resources, as our own. Had one hundred thousand dollars been applied, in a series of years, to collect authentic statistical information, it is very possible that one hundred millions would have been saved to the nation in the last war; and if the public expenditure and private loss by that war be estimated at 400 millions—that large sum would sink into insignificance, compared with the wide-spread ruin that followed the peace, and proceeded onward with terrific force, more than twice as long as the war had continued—when the products of our fields were without a market, and hundreds of thousands of worthy persons were violently cast from the productive into the consuming classes of the people, because of the want of a DEMAND FOR LABOR, the want of wealth and surety of abundance. The domestic industry was laid prostrate at the feet of foreign producers—an awful appreciation of the rate of the currency followed, and valuable estates were sold for "pepper corns." Who can look back to the state of things in 1820, 1821 and 1822 (long before which we ought to have recovered from the effects of the war, as well as the effects of the peace), without shuddering—without having every faculty within him aroused to prevent a recurrence of the withering and blasting desolation then felt? Freedom from slavery cannot be expected—but PROVIDENCE has granted the use of means to mitigate what cannot be altogether avoided—and we cannot hesitate to believe, that a chief part of the evils just and ~~which~~ their origin and existence in the want of the profound ignorance that prevailed as to the means and resources of our country—or a prudential disregard of its vital interests. And as to this willy looking abroad for prosperity! It is like to the abandonment of one's own wife and children, to find comfort in gambling-houses and drug-shops—a giving up of domestic enjoyments for ruinous excitements! The whole foreign consumption of our great staple cotton, has no more value than the home manufactures of that material; the aggregate value of the cotton, tobacco and rice exported, is less than that of leather manufactured; and the whole foreign demand for flour does but produce a sum equal to the straw hats and bonnets and laces used by our females, which are, however, chiefly supplied by the appropriate and profitable employment of others of our fair countrywomen. Thus we might proceed with many other like comparisons—but these are sufficient. And these statements are certainly, in general, correct; yet, while every pound of cotton, pound of tobacco, pound of rice, or barrel of flour—nay, every alligator skin or bunch of onions exported, has a record, and is rung in the public ear and made consequential by a thousand repetitions—not one line, as it were, is effluently written to show the mighty values created and used at home—of that incalculably important inter-national trade which, in its first exchanges only, is twenty times greater than all our foreign commerce. The government is as ignorant of all these as of the interior concerns of Kamtschatka. When the present writer first began to publish essays in favor of domestic industry—and when he afterwards first attempted to grapple with the gigantic values produced and consumed in the United States,—thousands thought that "depletion and a straight jacket" were necessary for him—but now believe that the words which he uttered were those of truth and soberness. But yet we are far distant from the whole truth. The subsistence, and clothing, and shelter—necessaries, comforts and luxuries—business and concerns, of the thirteen millions of persons who inhabit the United States, have an aggregate value far beyond the most sanguine calculations that have been made of them; and it is to be hoped, that, (though nothing more than an approximation to real values can ensue from the present labors of the friends of domestic industry), a sufficiency of facts will be ascertained, to fill the mind of every lover of his country, and his kind, with delightful astonishment.—What sacrifices of time and talent, and even of health, might not the patriotic rightfully encounter, in this great and glorious exertion?

† This memorial has just been presented.

§ This mighty sum will startle all persons who have not reflected upon the subject, and yet I stand prepared to contend that it is a moderate one. It takes in all the subsistence, clothing, and shelter of thirteen millions of persons—all the building and repair of houses, vessels, &c. all the labor expended in every sort of public or private improvement or accommodation—in brief, all the articles supplied for the use of man, involving the business of every individual who does any thing which gives value to lands and all other sorts of property. We must believe that their united values exceed 100 dollars for each individual per annum. The mere animal cost of a slave is about half this sum.

Our tariff is spoken of as excessive—but its general per centum on the necessities, comforts and luxuries of life, is very small, compared with the general rate of duties levied on importations of foreign commodities, by the leading nations of Europe.

But our present purpose is not to discuss the great principles and mighty operations of the American System; the preceding remarks, however, naturally occurred, when there was occasion to speak of the want of statistical knowledge. Hundreds of millions might have been saved, (as hundreds of millions would yet accrue,) were the people of the United States well acquainted with the resources and the wants of their own country. Then would a moral power be exerted that must restrain members of congress from adopting the wilful falsehoods or gross blunders of questionable persons—then would drivelling speculation and contemptible theory be forced into submission to practical truths—for it would be written as with a sun-beam on the minds of the people, that profitable employment, or high wages paid to the working classes, (if the phrase suits better), is the best possible evidence under heaven of a nation's prosperity—unless the nation be made up of MASTERS and SLAVES; senseless producers and prodigal consumers of values.

To proceed with the details of our business. Of the address to the people, and report on the manufacture of iron and steel, large editions were published, and have been widely distributed—though at much increased labor and trouble, because of the early and sudden close of the navigation; and it is contemplated to publish heavy editions of some of the reports yet expected, if, because probable ~~and very common~~ ^{and very common} through friendly newspapers. Of the reports, generally, from 4,000 to 6,000 copies have been printed, and of these 3,000 have been laid aside, that the members of the convention and others, may be furnished with complete sets, in book-form,—and the rest be placed in the hands of members of congress, and other persons, whose particular duty, or business it may be, "to promote the general welfare"—and to these reports, it is expected that the executive committee will add a large quantity of more general matter, or interesting facts. They are aware of the extent of the arduous and responsible duties that have been assigned them by the convention, but are entirely willing to execute them, as soon and as well as they can.

In consequence also of the excessive tax on the postage of pamphlets,* not periodical, as before observed, the labor of distributing the reports has been increased. Yet the desired result has been nearly brought about, through the aid of numerous friends. But more fully to accomplish this great object, an arrangement has been made by which the undernamed, as editor of the REGISTER will, (without profit to himself), publish all the reports as addenda to his work, and thus give them a great circulation, at a cheap rate, to all parties. A whole sheet of them, in small type, would have been forwarded this week, but on account of a deficient supply of paper in season for it. Hereafter, there will be less complaint, with reference to any of the matters now alluded to—whether because of postage, to which persons may be subjected, or for neglect, in not forwarding the reports; so that between the two, and the carelessness of some who ought to have taken a part in this business, certain districts have not been so well supplied as it was desired that they should be, yet the general distribution has been satisfactory, except that it has been accomplished with too much personal trouble.

The executive committee have not been unmindful of that important part of their duty which respected proceedings at Washington, during the session of congress—and delegates also have been appointed to attend, to make such explanations, or enforce such arguments, as the good of the common cause might seem to require; and they will be strengthened as need shall demand—arrangements having been made to keep a close and intelligent view of the proceedings had, or expected to take place—for our opponents are fairly in the field. It may be well, perhaps, to observe,—that present prospects justify a belief, that the protecting system will be preserved and extended, as the supply of materials and perfection in the manipulations of them shall render the latter necessary. For one example—the late crops of wool are estimated as having been worth 20,000,000 dollars each, and its various manufactures, (including other materials), at 20 millions more—together 40,000,000 dollars. The supply of domestic wool has now probably reached about seven-eighths of the whole quantity required for the woollen cloths consumed. This product of agriculture, directly employing a capital, in sheep and lands to feed them, to an estimated amount of 145 millions, is protected by an average duty of about 65 per cent. on its foreign value—and this duty, because of the specific nature of the commodity on which it acts, is paid, to secure the American market for wool to American farmers—unless the price of domestic wool be raised so high by speculation, or from other causes, as to compel the payment of the high duty just stated. In this state of the case, so interesting to agriculturalists, it would seem absolutely necessary that the domestic manufactures of wool should obtain all the protection designed for them, and frauds at the custom houses be prevented—for our wool cannot find a market abroad, except at prices which would prohibit the exportation of it—and the good of the American wool-grower can only be secured in the protection of the manufacturer. Mr. Cumbreleng, and others, (on the same high-pressure principle that induced him to put down the coasting tonnage of Great Britain, at one penny, and one cent, and one farthing, exaggerated, or extreme statements, as to the duty imposed on foreign woollens. It may be possible, that the high duties put down, can accrue—but that they do accrue, (unless in solitary cases, like atoms compared with elephants), no reflecting man will believe; and the beggarly case made by certain lawyers at Charleston, (recorded in page 68, of the current volume of the REGISTER), got up for the purpose, proved too much. It proved, that certain cloths imported, and sold at the "market price," yielded only a profit of six cents a yard, YAKS or BUTTS. And, while, the duty paid on wool is 65 per cent. ad valorem, we are entirely satisfied that the duty really paid on woollen goods does not amount to 45 per cent. the very minimum of protection which it was designed by the law to extend to the domestic manufacturer of cloths; and without this protection, it would seem impossible that the growth and manufacture of wool can be successfully followed. The deep interest that agriculture has in this matter, will cause it to be respected. One of the most successful and venerable farmers of Pennsylvania, says, in a letter to the present writer, that in every hundred dollars worth of woollen cloths manufactured in the United States, from domestic wool, the farmer has seventy-five dollars for materials and other supplies furnished to the manufacturers—and such is, doubtless, very near the truth. Indeed, the manufacture of woollen goods is rather an agricultural interest than any other, and as such and on every other account, has strong claims to the support of patriotic statesmen. Some like remarks might be made on fraudulent importations of iron, &c. but the one case is sufficient.

*Which has been much complained of by some, as unjust, as it is, and not a little embarrassed our operations.

Because of the near approach to a final redemption of the public debt, by the steady and powerful operation of the sinking fund established in 1816, a reduction of the revenue, derivable from goods imported, is imperiously called for, and should promptly be made. It is our opinion, that a law will be passed at the present session to abolish or reduce the duties on all imported commodities which do not interfere with the pursuits of American industry; and also, that no other general alteration in the tariff laws will just now be made. If so—time will be allowed to test the operations of a reduced revenue, and to estimate the force and necessity of the protecting system, as at present established—as well as to collect facts and interchange opinions, with reference to all such articles as may yet need the paternal care of an enlightened government, that plenty may abound, and prosperity bless the republic.

In conclusion, we would earnestly exhort every member of the late convention, as his especial duty and every friend of domestic industry whithersoever located in the United States, as a patriot—to vigilance in the collection and transmission of statistical facts, relating to the interests of agriculture, manufactures and the mechanic arts, and navigation and commerce, coasting, interior or foreign—with the number of persons variously employed, and subsisted, designating their ages and sexes in all possible cases, with the amounts earned by labor and capital, and such other particulars as may suggest themselves as being proper to guide the public judgment to correct conclusions, as to the real state of our domestic resources. The aggregates given in the note which is added, concerning Hampden county, Massachusetts, will serve as a general instruction on this subject. If we had such a report from every county of every state in this union, and the whole were patiently and faithfully summed up—opposition to the American system would have no resting place among us, unless in the bosoms of the envious and the lazy, misguided politicians, or unprincipled foreign adventurers. The force of the facts would be overwhelming—and "the boasted panegyrics on foreign trade, (as the great calculator, Dr. Cooper, said in his better days) divide into insignificance when set in competition with this!" We stand not opposed to foreign trade—it is a branch of the system, and claims equal protection—no more. But such reports can hardly be hoped for from every county—let us have them, so far as is practicable; and on those may be founded certain estimates that shall, and show what our country is—and what it may be. We repeat our call for help, that we may accomplish all the good that has been enjoyed in prospect from the meeting of the friends of domestic industry, in general convention assembled at New York.

N. B. A regard to economy should be observed—but the postage on all communications on the subjects mentioned, addressed to "Hezekiah Niles, Baltimore," will be paid by him, as chairman of the permanent committee, until otherwise stated.

A statement of the annual expenditures of the U. S. army at Springfield, Massachusetts, as furnished by the superintendent, colonel Lee.

Allotment of the appropriation for armories, viz:

Of which about two-thirds of the amount is paid for labor, and one-third for stock and materials. Of the latter the following comprise the most important items, viz:

105 tons of iron, at 160 dollars per ton is 23,160
49,500 lbs. of steel, of various kinds, averaging 36 cts. 7,830
86,500 files, at 30 cts. 3,360
160,000 bushels charcoal, at 12 cts 1,920
10,000 bushels pit coal, at 25 cts 3,500
100 tons Lehigh coal, at 10 dollars 1,000
47,820

There are employed in the estimate 375 men, whose monthly pay amounts to 10,000 dollars, and for the year 120,000
Leaving for stock and materials 60,000
Total 180,000

The number of arms manufactured per year, with all appendages, is 16,500. Amount of permanent improvements, miscellaneous expenses, &c. say 12,000

Leaving for the manufacture of arms, gun boxes, screw drivers, wipers, ball screws, spring vices, and all the appendages, say 168,000

(1) The value of the 5,394,542 yards of cloth is not given in the tabular statement—but is estimated by us, in doubling the value of the wool consumed and quadrupling that of the cotton—which pretty nearly approaches the real sum. Another cotton factory, with 9,000 spindles, was soon to go into operation, and would make a large increase of the aggregate—requiring about 500,000 lbs. more.

(2) This amount is, in part, estimated by us, and thought very nearly correct. In some cases, the pounds of cotton consumed, and in others the value, are given in the table.

GENERAL RECAPITULATION AND REMARKS.

The preceding abstract is made from a large table, covering a whole printed sheet, and giving particulars, as to the things mentioned, in every township of Hampden county. It is not, in all respects, exactly as we would that it should have been—but, as a whole, is an admirable specimen of what individual industry may accomplish, and is respectfully offered as a guide to other seekers after statistical knowledge. A few remarks may serve to shew the general purposes to which such statements would be devoted, for public instruction.

The value of the manufactures is $2,191,002
Deduct—value of wool 115,525 cotton 180,000 rags, &c. 90,720
iron, &c.* 47,820
miscellaneous 21,267
475,332

Leaving $1,715,670

Now, as 4,099 artisans, or working people, were employed in manufacturing the preceding amount of articles, (less the cost of the raw materials), it is shewn that the average production was 428 dollars for each person, including interest on capital, tear and wear of machinery and buildings, and the other heavy incidental expenses which belong to establishments of the kinds stated.

The 4,099 working people probably subsisted, (including themselves), 16,396 persons, or more than half the population of the county, some of them, perhaps, also held small farms—but this does not affect a general application of the facts.

These 16,396 persons cannot have cost less than 25 dollars each for articles of food, or 409,890 dollars—leaving, if we suppose all the flour imported (9,346 bbls. worth $56,076) to have been consumed by the manufactures and their families, say 350,000 dollars, but adding 42,500 dollars for the value of their wool, say 400,000 dollars, to be divided among the remaining 15,244 inhabitants of the county, being chiefly agriculturalists; or, at the rate of more than 26 dollars for each person, besides their own subsistence—to say nothing of the value of lumber, fuel, &c. &c. supplied by the landholders. What a market for the products of the land, exclusive of wool, cotton, iron, flour, coal and many other articles imported, is here exhibited! The entire aggregate cannot have fallen much short of a million of dollars, all put into requisition by the employment of the small amount of 4,099 persons in manufactures; who, if not so employed, must have been producers, instead of consumers, of the fruits of the earth.

In 1830 the whole value of our domestic exports were—

To Russia	$35,461
Prussia	16,501
Sweden and Norway	181,353
Denmark	76,292
Portugal	43,408
Spain	684,512

$1,037,527

All these powers—to which we send ministers plenipotentiary, and ministers resident, &c. at an average cost of from 50,000 to 60,000 dollars a year, accept of the products of the United States, say only 50,000 dollars more in value than 4,099 domestic manufactures located in Hampden county, Massachusetts, require!

We have only spoken of the value of food and other agricultural supplies, necessary for the 4,099 manufacturers. It appears from the table, that 643,308 dollars worth of merchandize, such as coffee, sugar, tea, cloths, calicoes, &c. were also imported for the use of the people of the county named.* But we cannot carry out all the operations just now. Referring to the products of the land, and of the land only, it appears probable that less than 33,000 manufacturers or mechanics, in annual value as the great state of South Carolina exports to foreign countries—cotton and all!

ANECDOTE. During the restrictive laws in Mr. Madison's administration, preceding the war, a then high-spirited and patriotic merchant of Baltimore, (now deceased, having lost his life in the Pacific)—at a public place in this city, warmly, if not violently, spoke of the president, to whose politics he was decidedly opposed. Whereupon a foreigner—a transient person, took up the subject, and reiterated, in other terms, the same things that had just been uttered by the gentleman alluded to. The latter gathered up himself in a moment, and, without any prelatory remarks, knocked the foreigner down—proclaiming that no other than an American citizen should, in his presence, abuse the government of his country!—giving a practical commentary, (in advance!) on DECATUR's famous toast, "our country, right or wrong"—as it regards the opinions of foreign nations; and "base is the slave" that will not say AMEN. We will right our own wrongs—not ask any boon of foreigners, nor allow their interference in our family affairs.

BRIEF NOTICES—THINGS IN GENERAL.

Preparations are making at Baltimore and other places for a grand celebration of the 22d February, the centennial anniversary of the birth of WASHINGTON.

The New York Journal of Commerce states "that the amount of duties accrued at the New York custom house during the year 1831, was upwards of twenty million dollars."

* It is an ascertained fact that 225 persons, employed in a certain cotton factory near Baltimore, purchased, last year, for the supply of themselves and their families, six thousand dollars worth of "taxed" articles—that is, articles of such kinds as are subject to what are called high duties, especially tea, sugar, calicoes, &c. &c. The proprietor, on one occasion visiting the city, was commissioned to purchase eight merino cloaks for eight young women employed by him. Agricultural pursuits present no parallel for these things—and the planting interest, especially, is far, very far, behind. But we shall bring out this case at length, on some future occasion and the mill referred to, because it has no looms, yields a much less proportionate amount of wages than others which have them.

It may be here stated, and it is said deliberately, that the general amount of value added by the cotton consumed in Baltimore county, is equal to the selling price of 170,000 barrels of flour a year. Look at it!

* Used at the armory.

The garrison of Vera Cruz has demanded the nullification of the present ministry of Mexico. Gen. Santa Anna is at the head of this proceeding.

Many valuable steam boats have been destroyed on the western waters, because of the violent and sudden breaking up of the ice. The New Jersey, Lady Washington, Chesapeake, Emigrant, Potomac, Whig, Western Virginia, Pittsburg, Gleason, and Reaper, are among them.

There are rumors in some parts of Virginia, of fresh movements among the slaves—perhaps, chiefly because of the fears of the people.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

January 27. Mr. Frelinghuysen presented certain resolutions of the bank of New Jersey, recommending the renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States.

Mr. Benton rose to ask the attention of the senate to a paper communicated to the senate yesterday, by the chairman of one of the standing committees—the letter of certain salt manufacturers on the Kenawha, on the subject of the alum salt bill.

After some remarks upon certain reflections contained in said letter, he moved that the committee on manufactures be empowered to send for persons, and to take their examinations, in writing under oath, and to report the minutes of the evidence so taken, to the senate.

Mr. Benton moved for the inquiry upon them.

Mr. Clay could not perceive the utility of the proposed measure, and wished to know whether the evidence of one state would satisfy the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. B.) or was he desirous of obtaining the information from all sources in the country. He moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. Benton rose to give notice that the subject could not be got rid of without there being something said upon it. The debate could not be cut off.

The vice president said the motion did not admit of debate.

Mr. Clay did not wish to restrict the gentleman, and withdrew his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. Benton said the information contained in the letter in question was inconsistent with that in his possession, and wished an opportunity to meet it by counterbalancing testimony.

Mr. Buckner replied to Mr. Benton in an animated speech, controverting the statements of his colleague in a clear and forcible manner. After he had concluded, Mr. Clay said the committee on manufactures were willing to take up the whole subject of the tariff, or confine themselves to the favorite articles of the gentleman from Missouri.

[We have laid the sketch of the debate aside, and may hereafter insert it.]

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after sometime spent therein, adjourned to Monday next.

January 30. After the disposition of the morning business, the senate proceeded to the special order of the day, being the resolution offered by Mr. Clay, for a modification of the tariff, and Mr. Hayne's amendment therein.

Mr. Smith, of Maryland, having the floor, addressed the senate an hour and a half on the subject of the resolution.

Mr. Holmes, of Me. followed, and spoke till past 3 o'clock, when he gave way for a motion to adjourn; and the senate adjourned.

January 31. The resolutions submitted by Mr. Benton, calling for a variety of information touching the administration of the bank of the United States, were taken up to day and agreed to.

Mr. Benton submitted resolutions to obtain various information respecting salt and its prices, &c.

The resolution of Mr. Ewing respecting the improper removal of public officers was taken up; and, at the instance of Mr. Grundey, made the order of the day for Monday week.

The resolution of Mr. Clay respecting the tariff was resumed, when Mr. Holmes spoke between two and three hours in conclusion of his speech which he commenced yesterday; after which the senate adjourned.

February 1. Mr. Frelinghuysen submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the government of the United States is bound by the terms and stipulations of several treaties made with the Cherokee nation of Indians, and also by the provisions of the intercourse act of 1802, and to protect said nation from all intrusions upon their territory.

2. That the president of the United States does not possess the constitutional power of dispensing with the execution of the intercourse act of 1802, and of said treaties, and that until the said act shall be repealed, and while the said treaties remain, it is the duty of the president to enforce the provisions and stipulations.

Some private bills were matured. The bill to grant a township of land to the French college at St. Louis, was, after some discussion, laid on the table for the present. Mr. Sprague's resolution, calling for the publication of the names of the owners of unclaimed dividends, was agreed to, then reconsidered on motion of Mr. Clay, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

The resolution, for the reduction of certain duties, and the abolition of others, with the amendment offered by Mr. Hayne was taken up.

Mr. Hill, of New Hampshire, took the floor, and spoke about three hours in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Holmes made some remarks in reply to some portions of the speech of the senator from N. Hampshire. On motion of Mr. Clay, who expressed his intention to make some remarks on the subject, the senate then adjourned.

February 2. After the transaction of the ordinary business, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Clay, for the modification of the tariff—together with the amendment of Mr. Hayne.

Mr. Hayne asked permission (Mr. Clay being entitled to the floor) to explain that certain extracts which he had quoted from Mr. Niles's Register and inserted in his speech, were not in fact Mr. N's own sentiments, but those of some commentator upon the opinions of Mr. Niles. Also that he did not intend to embrace in his amendment to the resolution, the precise views which might eventually be subscribed to by the members from the south. He wished to have that part of the resolution struck out, and afterwards it might be so modified as to meet the views of the majority of the senate. He thought it due to himself as well as to Mr. Niles, to explain that he had not read the paper alluded to—and which he had commented upon; but that his attention had been called to the subject, and he had made the extracts without a knowledge of the fact now communicated.

[Mr. Clay said he was glad the gentleman from S. C. had made the explanation, which was alike justly due to his worthy friend Mr. N. and manly, frank, and honorable on the part of the gentleman from S. C. himself.]

Mr. Clay then proceeded to address the senate in vindication of his resolution, and of the protecting system, and in reply to Mr. Hayne. The speech will be reported at large, as early a day as practicable; in the meantime, the following outline of his argument will convey to the reader an idea of its course and character.

After an impressive exordium, he alluded to the distress of the country after the war. The period of greatest distress was seven years previous to the year 1824—the period of greatest poverty seven years following that act. He then gave a picture of the present flourishing condition of the country. He maintained that all the predictions of the enemies of the tariff in 1824 had anticipated had been realized. He alluded to all the interests now protected—all mechanic arts—navigation—agriculture—and manufactures. He argued that the tariff began in 1793, which established the great principle of protection. It was the second act of the first congress—sanctioned by the father of his country, and met in its infancy, just let loose from colonial bondage; few skill, we began with moderate duties, intending, no doubt, to fill it up as the interests of the country required. But that act established the great principle, that congress had the power to protect domestic industry, and that such protection was the true policy of the country. The extent was a question of consideration, and it was accordingly extended or diminished from time to time, according to the views of practical men.

Mr. Clay then traced the history of the country down to 1815; commented on the tariff of that year, its object, extent, and policy. Then the tariff of 1824. He then alluded to the circum-tariffs under which the tariff of 1828 was adopted. He said that tariff was made as bad as possible by its enemies, in order to render it odious, and destroy the system. He declined to speak of the constitutional question.

He then alluded to the object of those who proposed to destroy all these great interests; and the ruin and destruction it would produce. He dwelt upon the general doctrine of free trade, which he contended could not exist in the present state of the world. Every country is in a state of restriction; all their ports closed to us. We could only open our ports and let in foreign ships and foreign merchandise, to take the place of our own.

He adverted to the fact of several foreigners in this country, Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Bachez, advocating free trade. He alluded to the fact of certain English statesmen advocating free trade, which they never acted on. In practice, English statesmen mean, free trade for themselves with all the world, but restrictive trade at home against the world. He meant security to the shipping interest of England, and the markets of all the world to English manufacturers. In fact, free trade, in this country, was another name for the British colonial system.

He read to the senate the system of England for regulating these states when colonies; which was to prevent the production of any articles, except some of the raw materials of their manufactures.

He gave a picture of the effect of manufactures upon the western states. He stated that the culture of cotton was the most profitable pursuit in this country; and gave several illustrations of the fact. He adverted to the ill humor of South Carolina and her refusing to take the protection of Kentucky, and the consequences and result of that act of non-intercourse. The loss of the shipping of South Carolina was to be attributed, he contended, to the effect of free trade. Half her shipping is English.

Having spoken two hours and upwards, with great animation, Mr. C. said he was about now to enter into the main argument; but, as he had been and he was somewhat exhausted, he asked the indulgence of the senate, and he would resume the position of what he wished to say; and the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Jan. 27. Among other resolutions offered—by Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, referring an act passed by the legislature of Maryland, relative to the preservation of that part of the Cumberland road within said state, to the committee of internal improvements.

By Mr. Thomas of Louisiana, providing for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into the expediency of celebrating the centennial birth day of WASHINGTON.

By Mr. Denny, inquiring into the expediency of erecting a marine hospital at Pittsburg, in the state of Pennsylvania.

By Mr. McKennan, an inquiry into the propriety of a declaratory act with regard to the postage on pamphlets.

Mr. Nuckolls moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on manufactures be instructed to inquire and report to this house the prices paid in the United States for cotton, woolen, iron and other manufactures, before the tariff acts of 1816, '24 and '26, and what the prices thereof have been since; and also, what the prices for articles not protected in this country have not fallen in an equal or greater ratio than those which are protected; whether the protected articles have not fallen in Europe in an equal or greater ratio than in this country within the same period, and what they might now be purchased for if those laws were repealed.

By Mr. Lecompte—

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the constitution of the United States, so that the judges of the supreme court, and of the inferior courts, shall hold their offices for a limited term of years.

Mr. Wayne moved a resolution requiring the secretary of the treasury to report such an arrangement as he may deem best calculated to compensate the officers of the customs, by substituting salaries for fees.

The resolution offered by Mr. Jenifer, on the subject of the removal and colonization of the free colored persons, was further considered—a motion being made by Mr. Boon, to refer it to the 2d of December, a debate ensued, but before it had concluded, the house proceeded to a consideration of the bill to give effect to the commercial regulations between the United States and the republic of Colombia, which, after debate, passed by a large majority.

The rest of the day was occupied in the consideration of a bill to pay for David Darden's horse.

The house adjourned.

Monday, Jan. 30. Mr. Johnston, of Ky. reported a bill to reduce the postage on periodicals and pamphlets, and for other purposes. Several other bills were also reported.

Among the numerous memorials presented yesterday, was one by the speaker from the free trade convention, recently assembled in Philadelphia, on the subject of the tariff. It was laid on the table, and 5,000 copies, in addition to the usual number, directed to be printed.

Mr. L. Conduct moved the consideration of a memorial presented by him yesterday, praying an appropriation for the removal of free persons of color. Its reading being objected to, the yeas and nays were ordered on the question of reading and determined in the affirmative, by a vote of yeas 100, nays 80.

Several motions were made with regard to its reference, the memorial was, however, after debate, referred to a select committee of seven.

Mr. Jenifer presented the resolutions of the general assembly of Maryland, in favor of the renewal of the charter of the United States bank.

The house then took up the consideration of the appropriation bill. The question being on the motion of Mr. Wickliffe to refer the bill to a committee of 24, consisting of one member from each state.

A debate ensued thereon, when the motion was negatived by a vote of yeas 76, nays 116.

After some conversation between Mr. Hubbard and Mr. Wickliffe, the latter moved to strike out the words "forty eight" wherever they occur in the bill. Before any action being had thereon, the house, on motion of Mr. Burges, adjourned.

Tuesday, Jan. 31. After various reports on the claims of individuals had been made, and disposed of,

The resolution of Mr. Jenifer, on the subject of the removal of free persons of color, &c. was taken up, to the select committee raised on the same subject, New Jersey, upon the same subject.

The speaker laid before the house sundry reports from the several departments, made in obedience to previous calls.

By consent of the house Mr. Archer submitted the following, which was read, and also referred to the committee on the memorial of the Railway colonization society, viz:

Resolved, That a select committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of recommending for adoption an amendment of the constitution of the United States, by which congress shall have power to appropriate the revenue accruing or derivable from the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, in aid of the construction of such works of internal improvements as may be authorized, commenced, or patronized by the states, respectively, within which the same are to be executed; and shall in like manner have power to appropriate the same fund of revenue in aid of the removal of such portions of the colored population of the states as they may respectively ask aid in removing, on such condition and to such place as may be mutually agreed on; for which purpose congress shall be authorized to acquire the territory it may consider in the manner in which the territories of the United States are now governed, for such time as the occasion for which it shall have been obtained may require, after which the said territory shall be established into a state, which shall be declared, or into several states, which shall be successively declared, independent of the United States, neither of which states shall, in any event, or at any time, be admitted into the union of the United States.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Edward Everett, on the 25th of January, when Mr. Everett modified the said resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house a copy of the treaty negotiated with the Chickasaw tribe of Indians in the year 1830, and of such portion of the journal of the commissioners as relates to the subject-matter of said articles together with the copy of the lease or deed, to which the assent of the commissioners of the U. States was given; and also, of the lease executed under the 4th article of a treaty negotiated with the Chickasaws, October 19, 1818.

Mr. Everett explained and advocated his resolution, at considerable length. Among other facts he stated—that on the very day on which the Chickasaw treaty was negotiated, in 1818, a lease of a reservation of a tract of land containing four miles square, which had been by the treaty reserved for the poor and warriors of the said nation, was leased by the Indian chiefs, Colbert and Brown, in whose names the grant was made for the benefit of those just enumerated, to the present second auditor of the treasury, who attended as a confidential agent to the negotiation, and as a witness of the treaty. This lease was for a term of 199 years, and on a rent of 750 bushels of salt annually, provided salt water should be found upon the reservation.

That in the summer of 1830, a negotiation was entered into by John H. Eaton and John Coffey, with the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, for the cession of their lands in Mississippi and Alabama; lands be it observed far distant and totally disconnected with the reservation in West Tennessee. The treaty is negotiated in the usual manner, and a conditional cession obtained. The following day certain supplementary articles were negotiated in addition to the main treaty and at the heel of all of them, an article agreed upon of a most extraordinary character; by which substantially the reservation of which I have been speaking, was sold for $2000, to the second auditor and a person associated with him. I say, sir, in substance, this reservation was sold to these gentlemen for $2000; although the form given to the transaction is that of a change of the lease. The change consists in reducing the rent from 750 bushels of salt to 4 bushels, or the value thereof, and a payment of $2,000 down."

Mr. Wickliffe, and Mr. Mitchell, of S. C. followed with some remarks, the latter gentleman in decided opposition to the resolution—when the debate was arrested by a successful motion made by Mr. Polk for the order of the day.

The apportionment bill next came up for consideration, and the question being on the motion of Mr. Wickliffe to amend the bill by striking out the words "forty eight"—and after debate, the question was taken on striking out, and determined in the negative—Ayes.

Mr. Hubbard then moved to strike out "forty-eight" with a view of inserting "forty-four," but before the question was taken, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 1. Mr. Drayton, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill authorizing the secretary of war to compromise and secure to the government the title of an island in the state of Delaware, upon which fort Delaware is situated. The resolution, heretofore proposed by Mr. E. Everett, calling on the president for a copy of a part of a treaty with the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, was further debated by Messrs. Huntingdon and Polk. The debate was arrested by a call for the order of the day. The apportionment bill was again taken up, and discussed at great length. The motion of Mr. Hubbard, to strike out 48,000 and insert 43,000, as the ratio, was finally agreed to—yays 98, nays 96. The house then adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 2. The resolution of Mr. E. Everett calling for a copy of an article of the treaty of 1830 with the Chickasaw Indians again coming up for consideration.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, addressed the house in opposition to the call, considering it as a violation of the constitutional powers of the house and an insult on the executive. He argued to fix inconsistency on the mover and supporter of the resolution, and warmly vindicated the character of general Coffee, one of the commissioners who had negotiated the treaty, and whose integrity he considered to have been assailed.

Mr. Clay had just closed, when

The house then proceeded to the consideration of the apportionment bill.

The house reconsidered the vote by which it yesterday agreed to strike out 48,000 and insert 43,000, as the ratio of representation—and before the blank in the bill was filled up, the house adjourned.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE,

ON THE NOMINATION OF MARTIN VAN BUREN.

December 7, 1831. A message was received from the president of the United States, nominating MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York, to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

The message was read.

Tuesday Dec. 27. Ordered, That the nomination of Martin Van Buren be referred to the committee on foreign relations.

Tuesday, January 10, 1832. Mr. Tazewell, from the committee on foreign relations, to whom was referred the nomination of Martin Van Buren, reported.

Tuesday, Jan. 17. The following motion, submitted by Mr. Holmes, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the nomination of Martin Van Buren be recommended to the committee on foreign relations; and that said committee be instructed to investigate the causes which produced the removal of the late secretaries of the treasury and the navy departments, and of the attorney general of the United States, and also the resignations of the secretaries of the state and war departments; and report to the senate whether the only causes of that novel and important political movement are given in the letters of the president of the United States, addressed on that occasion to the several officers above enumerated; and, if not, what were the causes to which these removals and resignations ought to be ascribed. And also, whether the said Martin Van Buren, then secretary of state, participated in any practices disreputable to the national character, which were designed to operate on the mind of the president of the U. States, and calculated to smooth the way to his appointment to the high office to which he has been nominated.

Resolved, That for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects of the preceding resolution, the said committee be further authorized to send for persons and papers, and to compel the attendance before them of such witness or witnesses as they may desire to examine on oath, touching the matter submitted to their investigation; and to report the same to the senate, with their opinion thereon, together with the reasons thereon.

A debate ensued, and, on motion by Mr. Holmes, Ordered, That it lie on the table.

The senate then proceeded to consider the nomination of Martin Van Buren.

On motion that it lie on the table,

It was determined in the affirmative yays 21, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. B. H. Bibb, Chambers, Clay, Ewing, Foot, Frickghuyssen, Hayne, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Tomlinson, Tyler.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buckner, Dallas, Dickinson, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, H. H. Kane, King, Mangum, Marcy, Robinson, Smith, Tazewell, Tipton, Troup, White, Wilkins.

The senate being equally divided, the vice president determined the question in the affirmative.

Tuesday, Jan. 24. On motion by Mr. Marcy,

The senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Martin Van Buren; and after debate,

The senate adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 25. The senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Martin Van Buren, and after debate,

The question was taken—will the senate advise and consent to the appointment of Martin Van Buren?—and was determined in the negative, yays 23, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, H. H. Kane, King, Mangum, Marcy, Robinson, Smith, Tazewell, Tipton, Troup, Tyler, White, Wilkins.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Frickghuyssen, Hayne, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindeexter, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Waggoner, Webster.

The senate being equally divided, the vice president determined the question in the negative. So it was Resolved, That the senate do not advise and consent to the appointment of Martin Van Buren.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE

On Martin Van Buren's nomination.

Remarks of Mr. Chambers.

Mr. Chambers said there were few occasions which could occasion with him a more painful struggle between personal inclination and official obligations, than the one on which he was now called to act. With the nominee, said Mr. C. I have for years enjoyed personal and social relations that have left impressions which it would gratify me to indulge by an expression of their kindest recollection, and this consideration, with the fact of his frequent elevation to offices of high honor and dignity, and his distinguished position in relation to the political parties in the country, will connect with the subject an interest rarely occasioned by the nomination of an individual to office. The office itself to which he is nominated is one so intimately affecting the peculiar duties and responsibilities of the executive magistrate by whom we are invited to confirm the appointment, as to require on the part of the senate a peculiar degree of indulgence. Regarding a diplomatic functionary as the confidential organ of the president, as selected with a previous knowledge of the particular duties to be performed by him, and with reference to his especial fitness for those duties, it is undoubtedly proper that the executive will, in regard to the agent, should not be controlled but from the most unyielding obstacles: to oppose it for light causes would lessen the weight of his responsibility and greatly increase our own. To reject the nomination of a minister at home or abroad, can, in my view, be defensible only upon the strong grounds of principle, having direct and immediate reference to considerations of a public nature.

In the deliberate counsel and advice which the constitution requires to give to the president, there is no proper place for the exercise of personal favor or ill will, for party prejudice or partiality. Sir, as one of the humblest members of this body, I can fearlessly appeal to my course here on all former occasions, and to the course of those with whom I usually act, with the most entire confidence that it will evince a liberal charity toward the officers nominated, and a magnanimous surrender of personal and political prejudices on the altar of the public good, and a just regard to the prerogatives of the president.

With these opinions, Mr. President, it is scarcely necessary to affirm, that in the vote which I shall give on this occasion, I have obeyed no other impulse than that of my judgment; but it will be permitted me to assert, as I do with the most unaffected sincerity, that my personal inclinations have reluctantly witnessed, and would gladly reverse the sentence which a high sense of official duty will compel me to record, with a sleep and abiding conviction of its justness. I am altogether aware of the danger to which my vote may expose me from the malignant virulence of those who, themselves insensible to the honest and honorable feeling which subdues the petty passions of a contracted and factious partisan, are on all occasions inclined to attribute the conduct of others to the narrow minded policy which governs themselves. Sir, I should be an unfit and servile servant of my state, treacherous to the high trust which I am charged to execute, and destitute of the courage necessary to protect the interests confided to my guardianship, if apprehensions like these could for a moment divert me from the path to which duty points. It would have afforded me great gratification to have listened to some able advocate of the nation's honor, and to have been able to repose my vote on the causes more satisfactorily assigned by another. But the question is about to be taken, and I will not consent to allow an occasion to pass, without raising my feeble voice to redeem the tarnished reputation of my country. If other senators accord with my opinion, it is essential, sir, that the vote of rejection shall go forth, associated with the reasons which influence it. Yes, sir, the honor and the dignity of this nation has—and I think it demonstrable)—the heretofore unassailed diplomatic character of the American republic has been stained, its lofty pride has been humiliated—unnecessarily, wantonly humbled—by the man who is proposed as its guardian, and protector, and advocate; and as an American senator, I am not content barely to put upon him the seal of reprobation in a secret session of this body. No, sir, let the American government—let the American people, proud of their national honor, know that no ruthless hand shall desecrate it with impunity; and let foreign nations, and all the world know, that even an American secretary of state dare not pollute its shrine.

Mr. President, I mean to resist the confirmation of Mr. Van Buren's appointment exclusively on the ground that in his instructions to Mr. McLane, on the subject of the colonial trade, he has violated the honor of the nation, has wounded its high and elevated character, has evinced a disregard to the interests of the American people—nay, has insulted that people in the person of their government, has attempted to promote the objects of a party amongst us, and has disclosed a total ignorance of the proper principles and feelings which should adorn the diplomatist. For proof of these assertions I mean to rely exclusively on his own words, deliberately embodied in a state paper, and on those to which he has himself alluded, and found amongst the archives of the department of which he was then the head.

In directing the attention of the senate to a particular part of the letter of instructions from Mr. Van Buren to the American minister then at the British court, I disclaim the inference, that the residue of that letter, or that other letters of instruction contain no exceptionable matter. There are many positions which, on another occasion, it would be proper to dispute, and the whole temper and tone of the despatches breathe an air of humility and concession, and conviction of error, and a suppliant entreaty of favor and notice, which no American citizen, who thinks and feels as I think an American freeman should do, can regard as the appropriate language of his government, pledged as it is "to ask nothing but what is right, and to submit to nothing that is wrong."

The portion of Mr. Van Buren's work, however, to which I will more particularly allude, is a part of his letter of instruction to Mr. McLane, dated 20th July, 1829. He uses this language:

"The opportunities which you have derived from a participation in our public councils, as well as other sources of information, will enable you to speak with confidence (as far as you may deem it proper and useful so to do) of the respective parts taken by those to whom the administration of this government is now committed, in relation to the course heretofore pursued upon the subject of the colonial trade. Their views upon that point have been submitted to the people of the United States; and the counsels by which your conduct is now directed are the result of the judgment expressed by the only earthly tribunal to which the late administration was amenable for its acts. It should be sufficient that the claims set up by them, and which caused the interruption of the trade in question, have been explicitly abandoned by those who first asserted them, and are not revived by their successors. If Great Britain deems it adverse to her interests to allow us to participate in the trade with her colonies, and finds nothing in the extension of it to others to induce her to apply the same rule to us, she will, we hope, be sensible of the propriety of placing her refusal on those grounds. To set up the acts of the late administration as the cause of forfeiture of privileges which would otherwise be extended to the people of the United States, would, under existing circumstances, be unjust in itself, and could not fail to excite their deepest sensibility. The tone of feeling which a course so unwise and untenable is calculated to produce, would doubtless be greatly aggravated by the consciousness, that Great Britain has, by order in council, opened her colonial ports to Russia and France, notwithstanding a similar omission on their part to accept the terms offered by the act of July, 1825.

"You cannot press this view of the subject too earnestly upon the consideration of the British ministry. It has hearings and relations that reach beyond the immediate question under discussion."

Now, sir, when stripped of its verbiage and reduced to its plain import, what does the secretary of state here press so earnestly? That Mr. McLane, the minister, who had been a member of the political party of which the then president was the nominal head (and the secretary of state a most conspicuous supporter, with impotent anxiety to claim a reversionary interest in the chieftainship), that the minister, who had been a member of this senate, and in that character informed of the conflicting views of the different political branches or subdivisions into which the great American family had been arranged, should stoop to avail himself of this personal intimacy with our family dissensions, to press earnestly upon a foreign government the misconduct of one part of this family in the relations of our government with that foreign power, and the more amiable and kind feelings of another division of it. But is this all? No, sir; it is earnestly pressed that the American government—the concentrated will of the whole American family, the only legitimate source of access to foreigners; the only authorized organ of communion with other nations—that this government, in the person of its 'late administration,' should be bowed down in dishonor and in degradation at the feet of lord Aberdeen, the delegated but humble personation of the British monarch. Yes, sir, the unheard of, unparalleled, and most revolting experiment was to be made, (other suppositions having failed to move the royal sympathy,) how far an unsparing condemnation of ourselves would disarm a British throne of its haughty, supercilious disdain of a just and an honest demand. I say, sir, it was novel and unheard of. I repeat it. Let the past history of this proud republic be minutely interrogated—Ay, in the many political changes of its agents, which by the terms of its organization, it must witness, let it be sought; let the days of Adams, of Jefferson, of Madison, Monroe, and the last Adams, be diligently inquired of. Sir, no voice responds to countenance this degrading, this disgraceful operation by which the government is humbled into a penitential confession of its transgressions to appease a foreign king or to moderate the wrath or conciliate the favor of a foreign power.

Not only, Mr. President, do the fair and unsullied pages of American diplomacy refuse countenance to such miserable self-abasement, but, sir, the history of all the civilized nations of the earth stamp upon it the indelible character of gratuitous prostitution, unaided by precedent, unwarranted by any parallel. Sir, it adds to the deep condemnation which belongs to this subject, that it was as useless and unproductive of gain as it was disgraceful in itself. Can the imagination conceive how benefit could possibly arise, or be supposed to arise, from an abject confession of "wrong," by repudiating the claims of the government as "American pretensions," "explicitly abandoned by those who first asserted them," "not revived by their successors," who are directed by counsels that "are the result of the judgment expressed by the only earthly tribunal to which the late administration was amenable for its acts?" what possible advantage, I ask, could be anticipated by the position of a prostrate suppliant, who, from the depths of degradation and abasement, should thus beseech a foreign diplomatist, that would not be accorded to a civil and high-minded application, based upon the suggestion, that however the American government was convinced of its claims to higher and other terms, it was yet willing, in a spirit of frankness, and in an anxious desire to terminate old and agitated questions of disagreement, to waive the further prosecution of those claims, and thereby to evince the sincerity of its desire for an amicable adjustment? But, sir, I come now to that consideration which stamps upon this subject its peculiar character, which sets it off in colors of a still darker shade, and which must leave us to infer, that no mere want of manly, stern republican feeling of self-respect, not the unobserved prostration or careless disregard of national dignity and character, not alone a cold and callous insensibility to those feelings of cherished pride, of nice and delicate honor which kindles into active resistance at even the appearance of rebuke, but that some more latent motive of proposed effect, has caused this deep-dyed stain upon the nation's history and as fame. Sir, as if it were not enough to bow down the knee and supplicate forgiveness in terms of doleful regrets for wrongs, and anxious solicitude to repair them, as if it were not enough to open to a foreign power the history of our internal disputes and political divisions, and to ask them to consider one party here as more kind in their feelings, more reasonable in their demands, more conciliating in their tone, and, therefore, more entitled to hope for the favorable notice of England,—as if the measure of our degradation was not to be accomplished by a gratuitous concession of acknowledged injustice of "American pretensions," "abandoned," the secretary has resorted, in the absence of other provocations, to misstatements of fact to create a condition of things, for the purpose of giving color to the fierceness and unbecoming wrath which he aims at his political adversaries.

Sir, I say, and the diplomatic history of the nation will prove, that the statement made in this particular charge of the secretary is false in fact,—yes, sir, doubly false. What is it? "The claims set up by them, and which caused the interruption of the trade in question, have been explicitly abandoned by those who first asserted them." Now, the first branch of the position is utterly without foundation we all know. The last administration explicitly abandoned no claims which it set up, nor did any claims set up by it cause the interruption of the trade. The last administration was willing to negotiate on the subject of the trade, but the British government refused to meet their proposal, although made in the most extended and liberal feeling of compromise. Let the correspondence of our secretary of state, and the message of the president prove this. But unfounded as is that branch of the assertion, how manifestly and obviously more so, how profoundly destitute of even the shadow of correctness is the other, which declares that the mis-called "American pretensions" were first asserted by the last administration. Why, sir, does not every one know that in this respect the last administration did but pursue the settled and fixed purpose of the administration that preceded it, and that these "pretensions" did not even commence then? sir, all administrations had indulged these pretensions. The last administration, the first to assert them! Truly, this must have amused the intelligent diplomatist to whom the envoy was directed to make the communication.

No, I am wrong in this conjecture, for I believe from my reading of Mr. McLane's letters to his lordship, that the experiment was not made upon his ignorance of what every page in the diplomacy of his own country would have taught him. No, sir, this notion of their being first asserted by the late administration did not, I believe, find place in those letters. What "bearings" and relations that reach beyond the immediate question were in the view of the secretary, it is not for me to divine. He speaks in another part of these instructions of "the impropriety of suffering any feelings that find their origin in the past pretensions of this government, to have an adverse influence upon the present conduct of Great Britain." Sir, I do not mean to follow the secretary in his dark and mysterious language. The plain and undoubted import of that which unfortunately for the nation's character, can admit of but one reading, is enough for me. No man in my poor judgment can ask us to confide to his care the dignity of the nation and its honor, who has arrayed one political division of our people against the government. Sir, what is to be the result? How may this very doctrine recoil on himself? In the same terms may a British secretary for foreign affairs now say to him, "I do not respect your opinions as those of the American people; your president is about to witness the termination of his period of office; a new election is to be made; the people, the proper tribunal to pass upon his measures, may not sustain him. I appeal from your judgment, and submit the matter to their's, and until their sentence is recorded, I can only regard your administration as you have regarded the late administration." Yes, sir, these are legitimate consequences of such doctrine, involving a perfect and entire surrender of all consideration abroad, and all national pride at home. To an individual who has thus outraged the character properly belonging to a great and high-minded nation of freemen, who has prostrated its dignity, and brought disgrace and dishonor upon its diplomatic reputation, I never can advise the president to confide the preservation of its respect abroad; and this first assertion of a course pregnant with every thing that threatens the pride, and dignity, and honor of the American republic, will, I trust, be marked by the most decisive reprobation of an American senate.

Remarks of Mr. Clayton.

Mr. Clayton, of Delaware, rose to reply to some remarks of Mr. Smith. He said he rose under a deep sense of the responsibility which he owed to the senate and to the country on this question. He owed it to himself, to the people whose representative he was, and to the body of which he was a member, to state briefly the grounds upon which he should render a vote, withholding his advice to the president to make this appointment.

I agree, said Mr. C. with my friend from Maryland. (Mr. Chambers), in the view which he has taken of the instructions given by the late secretary of state to our minister at the court of St. James. I consider the late negotiation respecting the West India trade with the English nation, as the most humiliating to our national pride, that has occurred in the annals of our diplomacy. The minister was sent with instructions to fawn and beg as a boon, at the footstool of a foreign power, what we were entitled to as a right, and to abandon and denounce, as untenable "pretensions" what had been always before insisted upon as a matter of justice to our country. He was positively directed to consider his own government as justly assailable for "too long and too tenaciously resisting the rights of Great Britain," and particularly for omitting to accept the terms offered by the act of parliament of July, 1825. He was directed to speak with confidence "of the respective parts taken by those to whom the administration of this government is now committed," to lay before Europe the state of parties in this country, and to degrade and disgrace all the former administrations of our government, during which this right had been insisted upon, by entirely and unconditionally withdrawing all our claims for justice on that country. He was told, in substance, to press upon England the state of our domestic and party differences at home, and he was admonished that this subject had bearings and relations which reached beyond the immediate question under discussion. Sir, this minister did as he was ordered to do. He "entreated," and "appealed," and "begged," and "prayed," "regretted," and "solicited," and "hoped to be excused," and confessed we had been in the wrong, instead of repelling with dignity the insolence and sarcasm of the British ministry, until the contemptible boon was "granted," and the national character effectually degraded. Let him take his place in the treasury for this; but let not him who gave these instructions, succeed him at the court of St. James, again to "beg," and "solicit," and degrade us in the eyes of Europe, by laying before the world the state of our domestic differences at home. Let us say to the British government this day by our vote, that we never consented to the disgrace which has befallen us, and that we prefer to recall the minister who has dishonored us, to all the pretended benefits of this miserable negotiation. On this ground alone I will this day condemn this appointment, so far as my vote will go to effect it; and in so doing, as an American senator I say to England, that we will never consent to crouch for favors; and to all our ministers now and forever, that we will condemn every attempt to carry our family divisions beyond our own household.

Sir, the gentleman from Maryland, who last addressed us, (Mr. Smith), replied to similar objections made by his colleague, that the president was alone responsible for these instructions, and not the secretary whose name was signed to them. Such has been the pretence for exonerating from all responsibility other persons charged with mal-administration of the government. Either by preventing the disclosure here of impeachable matter, or by presenting the president as a shield to the party charged with it, the responsibility of every inferior public agent is melted away to nothing. The gentleman, without defending the secretary or the minister in this negotiation about the West India trade, feels safe if he can interpose the president as the party chargeable with the whole matter. But I will do the president the justice to say, that I cannot believe that he had read these instructions when they were given; and I hold the secretary answerable to his country for every public act performed by him while he remained in office.

There is another topic, closely connected with the honor and interest of this nation, upon which the nominee before us has been strongly charged, and in relation to which I confess the wish that an investigation, instituted before I took my seat this session, had been prosecuted to its termination before this day. I refer to the causes which produced the disruption of the late cabinet. I view that event as highly disreputable to our country; and I find that, according to the declarations of a gentleman who formerly edited a paper in the state of New York, advocating the president's administration, Mr. Van Buren privately informed him "that it, (the dissolution of the late cabinet), was caused more by the conduct of the vice president and Mr. Ingham, who desired the retirement of gen. Jackson from office at the expiration of the first four years of his term of service," thus in effect charging a conspiracy between these gentlemen to traduce the character of a chaste and virtuous woman, in order to produce the destruction of the cabinet; and, (stating), that he Mr. V. B. had thought it better to retire in time, knowing that if he led the way, "the rest must follow." This information is, I believe, now in the hands of a senator from Mississippi near me, (Mr. Poindexter), and it is said that the author of it is present in the city, ready to bear testimony to the truth of it. However this may be, I must be permitted to say, as one whose course here has been plain—having had nothing to do with either of the contending branches of the party in power—that I consider such a charge against the vice president as unjust, and utterly without foundation; while I hold that the declaration containing the charge contains also an unequivocal admission as to the true agent, and the motive of that agent, in the transaction to which I have alluded. But, without reference to this, and many other matters which might be fairly pressed into this discussion as reasons for the vote which I am about to render, I content myself by resting that vote on the ground of the instructions given by Mr. Van Buren to our late minister to England, and the consequent dishonor to our diplomatic intercourse with that country.

Mr. C. concluded by observing that on some more suitable occasion he might give his views on the subject of that negotiation; but he would prefer doing so in the face of the country to a secret discussion in the executive session of the senate.

Remarks of Mr. Foot.

Mr. Foot said, since the ayes and noes are ordered, and our votes are to be recorded on this question, and especially after the friends of the nominee have opposed a resolution of inquiry into the conduct of the late secretary of state in the discharge of his official duties, and have desired the members to examine for themselves, I feel it a duty and esteem it a privilege that I may state in a few words, and in plain terms, the grounds on which my vote will be given against this nomination.

Sir, the evidence of my own senses, of sight and hearing, since the commencement of this administration have produced a thorough conviction in my mind, that, upon the true Jeffersonian principle, viz:—"Is he honest? Is he capable? Is he faithful to the constitution?"—an imperative sense of duty on the question which will be proposed, viz "Will the senate advise and consent to the nomination?" will compel me to answer in the negative.

A resolution has been offered, to instruct a standing committee of the senate to inquire into the conduct of the nominee in relation to certain very singular and extraordinary occurrences. This has been opposed by his friends. It has been stated on this floor, that there are papers in possession of senators ready to be presented to the senate, or to a committee, sufficient to convince any committee or any member of the senate, that the nominee has stated to some of his friends and partisans certain facts in relation to the causes of the explosion of the late cabinet, which, if proved, it is admitted, ought to prevent the confirmation of this nomination.

The senator from New York, (Mr. Marcy), states that "he does not believe these statements entitled to credit; he does not believe that Mr. Van Buren has ever made such remarks or admissions to any person." The senator from Delaware, (Mr. Clayton), proposes to introduce the witness on this floor if desired. I shall not look for any admissions or confessions of this nominee to his friends or elsewhere which would erminate himself. Since all these offers have been rejected, I ask no further evidence. In fact, for myself, no evidence of what my duty would require on an occasion like the present has been wanting since the letters of instruction to our minister to England were read in this body nearly two years since, and which I then pronounced disgraceful to the country.

The senator from Maryland, (Mr. Smith), has said "that for the instructions given by the secretary of state to a foreign minister, the secretary is not to be held responsible, the president alone is responsible." Sir, whatever may be the views of that senator, it is no rule for me. I hold a very different doctrine. In my opinion, there is not a senator on this floor, or any other careful observer, who has noticed the proceedings of this administration from its commencement, who is not fully convinced that there had been "behind the throne a power greater than the throne itself," which has directed most of its movements. I will not say there is legal evidence sufficient to convict a man before a court of justice; but there is enough to produce conviction in my mind, and I sincerely believe that general Jackson came to this place fully determined to remove no man from office, but for good cause of removal. I am fully convinced that the whole "system of proscription," owes its existence to Martin Van Buren! That the dissolution of the cabinet was effected by his management and for his benefit! and that the hand of the late secretary of state may be traced distinctly in another affair, which has produced an alienation between the first and second officers of the government; and also in relation to the present "improved condition of the public press," and for the great abuse of the patronage of the government! And, sir, I hold him responsible for many acts which I can never approve. But, sir, this is not the first time that I have pronounced the instructions given by the late secretary of state, to Mr. McLane, then minister to London, and the negotiation with the court of Great Britain, on the subject of the colonial trade, to be degrading and disgraceful to the nation. Sir, it has ever been our pride and our glory, that in all our diplomatic intercourse with foreign nations, we have never admitted our country to be in the wrong; nor has she ever been proved to be in the wrong, before the late humiliating and disgraceful correspondence with the British government. This is the first time in her whole history, in which she has ever begged favors of royal bounty. And holding, as I do, the author of those instructions responsible for this disgrace, I can never advise the president to send the author of such instructions, as a minister to represent the interests of this nation at the same court where she has been so disgraced—and I must record my vote against the nomination.

Remarks of Mr. Webster.

Mr. President: as it is highly probable that our proceedings on this nomination will be published, I deem it proper to state shortly the considerations which influenced my opinion, and will decide my vote.

I regard this as a very important and delicate question. It is full of responsibility; and I feel the whole force of all that responsibility. While I have been in the senate, I have opposed no nomination of the president except for cause; and I have at all times thought that such cause should be plain, and sufficient; that it should be real and substantial, not unfounded or fanciful.

I have never desired, and do not now desire, to encroach, in the slightest degree, on the constitutional powers of the chief magistrate of the nation. I have heretofore gone far, very far, in assenting to nominations which have been submitted to us. I voted for the appointment of all the gentlemen who composed the first cabinet. I have opposed no nomination of a foreign minister, and I have not opposed the nominations recently before us, for the re-organization of the administration. I have always been especially anxious, that in all matters relating to our intercourse with other nations, the utmost harmony, the greatest unity of purpose, should exist between the president and the senate. I know how much of usefulness such harmony and union are calculated to produce.

I am now fully aware, sir, that it is a serious, a very serious matter, to vote against the confirmation of a minister to a foreign court, who has already gone abroad; and has been received, and accredited, by the government to which he is sent. I am aware, that the rejection of this nomination, and the necessary recall of the minister, will be regarded by foreign states, at the first blush, as not in the highest degree favorable to the character of our government. I know, moreover, to what injurious reflections one may subject himself, especially in times of party excitement, by giving a negative vote, on such a nomination. But after all, I am placed here to discharge a duty. I am not to go through a formality; I am to perform a substantial and responsible duty. I am to advise the president in matters of appointment. This is my constitutional obligation; and I shall perform it conscientiously and fearlessly. I am bound to say, then, sir, that for one, I do not advise nor consent to this nomination. I do not think it a fit and proper nomination; and my reasons are found in the letter of instructions, written by Mr. Van Buren, on the 20th of July, 1829, to Mr. McLane, then going to the court of England, as American minister. I think those instructions derogatory, in a high degree, to the character and honor of the country. I think they show a manifest disposition, in the writer of them, to establish a distinction between his country and his party; to place that party above the country; to make interest, at a foreign court, for that party, rather than for the country; to persuade the English ministry and the English monarch, that they had an interest in maintaining, in the United States, the ascendancy of the party to which the writer belonged. Thinking thus of the purpose and object of these instructions, I cannot be of opinion that their author is a proper representative of the United States at that court. Therefore it is, that I propose to vote against his nomination. It is the first time, I believe, in modern diplomacy, it is certainly the first time in our history, in which a minister to a foreign court has sought to make favor for one party at home, against another; or has stooped, from being the representative of the whole country, to be the representative of a party. And as this is the first instance in our history of any such transaction, so I intend to do all in my power to make it the last. For one, I set my mark of disapprobation upon it; I contribute my voice and my vote, to make it a negative example, to be shunned and avoided by all future ministers of the U. States. If, in a deliberate and formal letter of instructions, admonitions and directions are given to a minister, and repeated, once and again, to urge these mere party considerations on the foreign government, to what extent, is it probable, the writer himself will be disposed to urge them, in his one thousand opportunities of informal intercourse with the agents of that government?

I propose, sir, to refer to some particular parts of these instructions; but before I do that, allow me to state, very generally, the posture of that subject, to which those particulars relate. That subject was the state of our trade with the British West India colonies. I do not deem it necessary now to go minutely into all the history of that trade. The occasion does not call for it. All know, that by the convention of 1815, a reciprocity of intercourse was established between us and Great Britain. The ships of both countries were allowed to pass, to and from each other respectively, with the same cargoes, and subject to the same duties. But this arrangement did not extend to the British West Indies. There, our intercourse was cut off. Various discriminating and retaliatory acts were passed, by England and by the United States. Eventually, in the summer of 1825, the English parliament passed an act, offering reciprocity, so far as the carrying trade was concerned, to all nations, who might choose, within one year, to accept that offer.

Mr. Adams's administration did not accept that offer; first, because it was never officially communicated to it; secondly, because, only a few months before, a negotiation on the very same subject had been suspended, with an understanding that it might be resumed; and thirdly, because it was very desirable to arrange the whole matter, if possible, by treaty, in order to secure, if we could, the admission of our products into the British islands for consumption, as well as the admission of our vessels. This object had been earnestly pursued ever since the peace of 1815. It was insisted on, as every body knows, through the whole of Mr. Monroe's administration. He would not treat at all, without treating of this object. He thought the existing state of things better than any arrangement, which, while it admitted our vessels into West India ports, still left our productions subject to such duties there, that they could not be carried.

Now, sir, Mr. Adams's administration was not the first to take this ground. It only occupied the same position which its predecessor had taken. It saw no important objects to be gained by changing the state of things, unless that change was to admit our products into the British West Indies, directly from our ports, and not burdened with excessive duties. The direct trade, by English enactments and American enactments, had become closed. No British ship came here from the British West Indies. No American ship went from us to those places. A circuitous trade took place, through the islands of third powers; and that circuitous trade was, in many respects, not disadvantageous to us.

In this state of things, sir, Mr. McLane was sent to England; and he received his instructions from the secretary of state: In these instructions, and in relation to this subject of the colonial trade, are found the sentiments of which I complain. What are they? Let us examine, and see.

Mr. Van Buren tells Mr. McLane "the opportunities which you have derived from a participation in our public councils, as well as other sources of information, will enable you to speak with confidence (as far as you may deem it proper and useful so to do), of the respective parts taken by those to whom the administration of this government is now committed, in relation to the course heretofore pursued upon the subject of the colonial trade."

Now, this is neither more nor less than saying, "you will be able to tell the British minister, whenever you think proper, that you, and I, and the leading persons in this administration, have opposed the course heretofore pursued by the government and the country, on the subject of the colonial trade. Be sure to let him know, that, on that subject, we have held with England, and not with our own government." Now I ask you, sir, is this be dignified diplomacy? Is this statesmanship? Is it patriotism, or is it mere party? Is it a proof of a high regard to the honor and renown of the whole country, or is it evidence of a disposition to make a merit of belonging to one of its political divisions?

The secretary proceeds: "Their views (that is, the views of the present administration) upon that point have been submitted to the people of the United States; and the counsels by which your conduct is now directed, are the result of the judgment expressed by the only earthly tribunal to which the late administration was amenable for its acts."

Now, sir, in the first place, there is very little reason to suppose that the first part of this paragraph is true, in point of fact. I mean that part which intimates that the change of administration was brought about by public disapprobation of Mr. Adams's conduct, respecting the subject of the colonial trade. Possibly, so much was then said, on a subject which so few understood, some degree of impression may have been produced by it. But be assured, sir, another cause will be found, by future historians, for this change; and that cause will be the popularity of a successful soldier, united with a feeling, made to be considerably extensive, that the preferences of the people in his behalf had not been justly regarded, on a previous occasion. There is, sir, very little ground to say that "the only tribunal to which the late administration was amenable" has pronounced any judgment against it for its conduct on the whole subject of the colonial trade.

But, however this may be, the other assertion in the paragraph is manifestly quite wide of the facts. Mr. Adams's administration did not bring forward this claim. I have stated, already, that it had been a subject, both of negotiation and legislation, through the whole eight years of Mr. Monroe's administration. This the secretary knew, or was bound to know. Why then does he speak of it as set up by the late administration, and afterwards abandoned by them, and not now revived?

But the most humiliating part of the whole follows:—"To set up the acts of the late administration, as the cause of forfeiture of privileges, which would otherwise be extended to the people of the United States, would, under existing circumstances, be unjust in itself, and could not fail to excite their deepest sensibility."

So, then, Mr. President, we are reduced, are we, to the poor condition, that we see a minister of this great republic instructed to argue, or to intercede, with the British minister, lest he should find us to have forfeited our privileges; and lest these privileges should no longer be extended to us! And we have forfeited those privileges, by our misbehaviour, in eluding rulers, who thought better of our own claim, than of the British! Why, sir, this is patently submitting to the domineering tone of the British minister, I believe, Mr. Huskisson—[Mr. Clay said, "no, Mr. Canning."]—Mr. Canning, then, sir, who told us that all our trade with the West Indies was a boon, granted to us by the indulgence of England. The British minister calls it a boon, and our minister admits it is a privilege, and hopes that his royal majesty will be too gracious to decide that we have forfeited this privilege, by our misbehaviour, in the choice of our rulers! Sir, for one, I reject all idea of holding any right of trade, or any other rights, as a privilege or a boon, from the British government, or any other government.

At the conclusion of the paragraph, the secretary says, "you cannot press this view of the subject too earnestly upon the consideration of the British ministry. It has bearings and relations that reach beyond the immediate question, under discussion."

And adverting, again, to the same subject towards the close of the despatch, he says, "I will add nothing as to the impropriety of suffering any feelings that find their origin in the past pretensions of this government, to have an adverse influence upon the present conduct of Great Britain."

I ask again, Mr. President, if this be statesmanship? if this be dignity? if this be elevated regard for country? Can any man read this whole despatch, with candor, and not admit, that it is plainly and manifestly the writer's object to gain credit with the British ministry for the present administration, at the expense of the past? Certainly, this object appears to me as plain and visible as the sun at noon.

Least I should do the secretary injustice, I will read all that I find, in this letter, upon this obnoxious point. These are the paragraphs:

"Such is the present state of our commercial relations with the British colonies; and such the steps by which we have arrived at it. In reviewing the events which have preceded, and more or less contributed to, a result so much to be regretted, there will be found three grounds upon which we are most assailable; 1st, in our too long and too tenaciously resisting the right of Great Britain to impose protecting duties in her colonies;" 2nd, &c.

"The opportunities which you have derived from a participation in our public councils, as well as other sources of information, will enable you to speak with confidence, (as far as you may deem it proper and useful so to do), of the respective parts taken by those to whom the administration of this government is now committed, in relation to the course heretofore pursued upon the subject of the colonial trade. Their views upon that point have been submitted to the people of the United States; and the counsels by which your conduct is now directed are the result of the judgment expressed by the only earthly tribunal to which the late administration was amenable for its acts. It should be sufficient that the claims set up by them, and which caused the interruption of the trade in question, have been explicitly abandoned by those who first asserted them, and are not revived by their successors. If Great Britain deems it adverse to her interests to allow us to participate in the trade with her colonies, and finds nothing in the extension of it to others to induce her to apply the same rule to us, she will, we hope, be sensible of the propriety of placing her refusal on those grounds. To set up the acts of the late administration as the cause of forfeiture of privileges which would otherwise be extended to the people of the U. States, would, under existing circumstances, be unjust in itself, and could not fail to excite their deepest sensibility. The tone of feeling which a course so unwise and untenable is calculated to produce, would doubtless be greatly aggravated by the consciousness that G. Britain has, by order in council, opened her colonial ports to Russia and France, notwithstanding a similar omission on their part to accept the terms offered by the act of July, 1825. You cannot press this view of the subject too earnestly upon the consideration of the British ministry. It has bearings and relations that reach beyond the immediate question under discussion."

"I will add nothing as to the impropriety of suffering any feelings that find their origin in the past pretensions of this government to have an adverse influence upon the present conduct of Great Britain."

Sir, I submit to you, and to the candor of all just men, if I am not right in saying, that the pervading topic, through the whole, is, not American rights, not American interests, not American defence, but denunciation of past pretensions of our own country, reflections on the past administration, and exultation, and a loud claim of merit, for the administration now in power. Sir, I would forgive mistakes; I would pardon the want of information; I would pardon almost any thing, where I saw true patriotism and sound American feelings; but I cannot forgive the sacrifice of this feeling to mere party. I cannot concur in sending abroad a public agent who has not conceptions so large and liberal, as to feel, that in the presence of foreign courts, amidst the monarchies of Europe, he is to stand up for his country, and his whole country; that no jot nor tittle of her honor is to come to harm in his hands; that he is not to suffer others to reproach either his government or his country, and far less is he himself to reproach either; that he is to have no objects in his eye but American objects, and no heart in his bosom but an American heart; and that he is to forget self, to forget party, to forget every sinister and narrow feeling, in his proud and lofty attachment to the republic, whose commission he bears.

Mr. President, I have discharged an exceedingly unpleasant duty, the most unpleasant of my public life. But I have looked upon it as a duty, and it was not to be shunned. And, sir, however unimportant may be the opinion of so humble an individual as myself, I now only wish that I might be heard by every independent freeman in the United States, by the British minister, and the British king, and by every minister and every crowned head in Europe, while standing here in my place, I pronounce my rebuke, as solemnly and as decisively as I can, upon this first instance, in which an American minister has been sent abroad, as the representative of his party, and not as the representative of his country.

Remarks of Mr. Holmes.

Mr. President: In offering these resolutions, [proposing an inquiry, &c.] I am governed by the expectation that the inquiry proposed by them will lead to disclosures in regard to transactions which are still involved in considerable mystery. Public opinion is not yet settled down as to the true causes of the late explosion in the cabinet. That a cabinet of the president's own selection, and whose official duties hail, by his own admission, been performed to his entire satisfaction, should so soon be dispersed, is an event so extraordinary in the history of this country, that the public, and especially the senate, have a right to be informed of the causes which led to, or operated in, producing such a strange result. The people, whose money has been squandered to derange, and re-organize this cabinet, are interested in this inquiry. If the gentleman whose nomination is now the subject of consideration, has in any way contrived or contributed to bring about the event, it would go far to disqualify him for the office to which he has been nominated, and if not, it is due to him that the inquiry should be had. Suspicion rests heavy on him, and, when that is the case, it is always good ground for investigation. I did expect that his friends, instead of objecting, would have consented to, and insisted upon the investigation proposed by the resolution. Is it because they fear the result? They say not—but the inquiry proposed is not in terms what it should be. I, sir, have never insisted that the form of the resolution should be preserved. If I can obtain the object, I will put them in any shape which may be agreeable to a majority of the senate. That this must be an ex parte inquiry, and when Mr. Van Buren is absent at such a distance that he cannot be informed of the investigations which affect his character, I can only say, that if a man will consent to take an appointment in the recess, knowing that the senate must pass upon him in his absence, he takes the hazard of an ex parte investigation, or is willing to trust his case in the care of his friends. Sir, if it be otherwise, the senate is entirely precluded from any inquiry into his merits until he chooses to return, or the president is pleased to recall him.

For myself, sir, I am opposed to this nomination on other grounds, and I propose this inquiry rather to satisfy others, although on this point I should prefer to be satisfied. I am against him, because he has humbled us in the eyes of foreign nations. He has surrendered the rights of this country to Great Britain to sustain his party. It is the first time this country was ever thus disgraced; and I would it should be the last. And, if I had no other reason, his appointment in the recess, to fill a vacancy created in the recess, is enough for me. I have always disapproved sending off a minister in the recess of the senate, without the most imperative reasons. It is compelling the senate to approve the appointment, or subject us to the loss of the outfit. I would at that expense, break up the practice—it would be an essential saving. It is, moreover, evading that constitutional check which the senate were designed to have in the appointment of ambassadors, and in our foreign negotiations. I would protect the exercise of this power by the senate, and never surrender it.

It is objected to these resolutions that they are not sufficiently specific. Sir, it is not expected that a motion for inquiry will be drawn with the same precision as an indictment. If you can designate the acts precisely, there is no necessity for inquiry. It is for want of a full knowledge of the particular acts that inquiry has become necessary. We know full well that the political movement referred to in the resolution has been differently explained. Mr. Van Buren himself could not remain without a disfranchisement. What particular disfranchisement that was; the public has not yet learnt. We would like to know what privileges of a free citizen he was compelled to surrender, as the price of his office, and whether that surrender was any way connected with the removals and the other resignations. Will any one say, or pretend, that a participation in that extraordinary affair would not affect his qualifications as minister? Sir, who ever brought about that explosion, is unfit for any office. The whole nation was convulsed by it, and a stain is cast upon this administration which can never be effaced. The exchange of officers, too, by the late minister, and the appointment of Mr. Van Buren to succeed him, and so soon after this explosion, furnishes a sufficient ground of inquiry. The late minister had been out but a short time: he had scarcely become acquainted at the court where he was sent. There should be strong reasons for recalling a minister, and supplying his place with a new man, and the expense should never be incurred unless the public good manifestly demanded it. This looks much like making provision for a man who, from mysterious circumstances, had been compelled to quit the office which he had held; and I know no principle in this government, which will justify creating offices or vacancies to provide for favorites, or to reward a partisan.

Do the friends of Mr. Van Buren object to the inquiry? They say not; it is the resolutions to which they object. And yet their reasoning goes against any inquiry. But if the objection is to the manner or extent of the inquiry, why not propose to amend the resolutions, or offer one of their own? Indulging in objections which go to the form, and which seem to be captious withal, indicates strongly a wish to suppress all inquiry. It is objected, that the investigation proposed may disclose impeachable matter. This is always the bugbear to frighten us away from all investigation into the conduct of any man, and to place every officer of your government beyond the reach of responsibility. But really it seems to me to be exceedingly out of place here. We may find matter that would impeach Mr. Van Buren? How? In what office would he be impeachable? Not as secretary of state, for he is out of that office. Not as minister to Great Britain, for in that office he, as yet, has done nothing. How, then, I repeat, can we possibly be in any such danger? It does appear to me, that this is the weakest of all objections. But one word further, in answer to this hackneyed objection, as to impeachable matter. The senate have a present executive duty to perform: to ascertain whether Mr. Van Buren is a proper person for minister to Great Britain, in order to determine whether we can give the president our advice and consent to his appointment; and in this we are told that we are restrained from inquiry, lest this executive duty which we are now to perform, shall conflict with a future judicial duty which we, by possibility, may have to perform! Sir, it is enough to state the objection to show its manifest absurdity. And where does this argument of the gentleman lead us? It shuts the door of inquiry forever, and every man, now in office, nominated for another, must be "taken and deemed" worthy, lest the senate should stumble upon impeachable matter!

I find, therefore, that senators who profess to court inquiry, urge objections, which would defeat all investigation. It must be impossible, then, to frame any resolutions, which would meet their views; and why should I further modify these to please them, when they are determined to be satisfied with nothing?

Sir, as to the disgrace attached to these resolutions, I allow no man to judge for me, what is honorable or disgraceful. That they refer to a disgraceful transaction, I readily admit. But I have yet to learn, that if the administration descend to scandalous transactions, that it is beneath the dignity of this senate to call them to account.

Note.—It is, perhaps, due to the public, that I should, to prevent false impressions, explain the reasons why the resolutions which I offered, were laid on the table, and not afterwards taken up and acted on. The resolutions were objected to by some of Mr. Van Buren's friends, and the form of them by some of those who eventually voted against him. But several of his friends had in debate urged arguments which would go greatly against any resolutions of inquiry upon this nomination. Such as the absence of the person nominated, and the danger of finding impeachable matter, &c. To these senators I readily perceived that no inquiry would be acceptable. Of those who finally voted against the nomination, some wished the resolutions modified. To give time to frame them so as to suit all who wished inquiry, I moved to lay the resolutions on the table.—Whether any resolutions of inquiry could have been framed that would have met the approbation of the friends of Mr. Van Buren, is not for me to say. After this, I was asked by a member, if I intended to call up the resolutions, or "bill of indictment," and if I did, when? My answer was—"Not till the grand jury is in, if at all." Then, turning to a senator from New York, I informed him distinctly that I would let him know to-morrow whether I should call up the resolutions or not; and, if it should be my determination to call them up, he was to move to go into executive business, for the purpose of discussing and deciding them.

The next morning I drew a substitute for the first resolution, as follows:

"That the nomination of Martin Van Buren, as minister to Great Britain, be referred to a select committee; and that the committee be instructed to inquire what were the causes of the removal from office of the late secretaries of the treasury and navy, and the attorney general, and of the resignations of the late secretaries of state and war; and whether Mr. Van Buren had any, and, if any, what agency, in bringing about the change of the late cabinet.

"And, also, to inquire whether Mr. Van Buren did resign his office as secretary of state, under a promise, or understanding, that he was to be appointed minister to Great Britain; and with a further understanding with the late minister to Great Britain, that he was to be provided with the place which he now enjoys."

I showed this to several of my friends, who were satisfied with it. But others preferred the original resolutions; and, believing no form could be devised by me which would be acceptable; and that the facts sought to be disclosed by them, might be ascertained without the intervention of a committee, I informed the senator that I should not call them up, in these words, which I wrote down at the time: "I am satisfied that the facts to be inquired into by the resolutions which I offered on the nomination of Mr. Van Buren, can be ascertained without a committee; and, therefore, I shall not call them up." Thus leaving the friends of Mr. Van Buren to prosecute the inquiry by a committee, or to permit the facts to be ascertained by each senator for himself.

J. HOLMES.

Remarks of Mr. Clay.

Mr. Clay said, after the most deliberate consideration, I regret that I find myself utterly unable to reconcile with the duty I owe to my country, a vote in favor of this nomination. I regret it, because in all the past strife of party, the relations of ordinary civility and courtesy were never interrupted between the gentlemen whose name is before us, and myself. But I regard my obligations to the people of the United States, and to the honor and character of their government, as paramount to every private consideration. There was no necessity known to us for the nomination of this gentleman from the United States, prior to the departure of his name to the senate. Great Britain was represented here by a diplomatic agent, having no higher rank than that of a chargé des affaires. We were represented in England by one of equal rank; one who had shed lustre upon his country by his high literary character, and whom it may be justly said that, in no respect, was he inferior to the gentleman before us. Although I shall not controvert the right of the president, in an extraordinary case, to send abroad a public minister, without the advice and consent of the senate, I do not admit that it ever ought to be done without the existence of some special cause to be communicated to the senate. We have received no communication of the existence of any such special cause. This view of the matter might not have been sufficient alone to justify a rejection of this nomination; but it is sufficient to authorize us to examine the subject with as perfect freedom as we could have done if the minister had remained in the United States, and awaited the decision of the senate. I consider myself, therefore, not committed by the separate and unadvised act of the president in despatching Mr. Van Buren, in the vacation of the senate, and not a very long time before it was to assemble.

My main objection to the confirmation of his appointment, arises out of his instructions to the late minister of the United States at the court of Great Britain. The attention of the senate has been already called to parts of those instructions; but there are other parts of them, in my opinion, highly reprehensible. Speaking of the colonial question, he says: "In reviewing the events which have preceded, and more or less contributed to a result so much to be regretted, there will be found three grounds on which we are most assailable. First, in our too long and too tenaciously resisting the right of Great Britain to impose protecting duties in her colonies." "Secondly, in our failure, in omitting to accept the terms offered by the act of parliament of July 1846, after the subject had been brought before congress, and deliberately added upon by our government." "Thirdly, in our failure to see the propriety of possessing yourself fully of all the explanatory and mitigating circumstances connected with them that you may be enabled to obviate, as far as practicable, the unfavorable impression which they have produced." And after reproaching the late administration with setting up claims for the first time, which they explicitly abandoned, he says, in conclusion, "I will add nothing as to the impropriety of suffering any feelings that find their origin in the past pretensions of this government to have adverse influence upon the present conduct of Great Britain."

On our side, according to Mr. Van Buren, all was wrong; on the British side, all was right. We brought forward nothing but claims and pretensions; the British government asserted on the other hand a clear and incontestible right. We erred in too transgressively and too long insisting upon our pretensions and not yielding at once to the force of their just demands. And Mr. McLane was commanded to avail himself of all the circumstances in his power to mitigate our offence, and to dissuade the British government from allowing this feelings justly incurred by the past conduct of the party driven from power, to have an adverse influence towards the American party now in power. Sir, was this becoming language from one independent nation to another? Was it proper in the mouth of an American minister? Was it in conformity with the high, unsullied, and dignified character of our previous diplomacy? Was it not, on the contrary, the language of an humble vassal to a proud and haughty lord? Was it not prostrating and degrading the American eagle before the British lion?

Let us examine a little these pretensions which the American government so unjustly put forward and so pertinaciously maintained. The American government contended that the produce of the United States ought to be admitted into the British West Indies, on the same terms as similar produce of the British American continental possessions; that, without this equality, our produce could not maintain in the British West Indies a fair competition with the produce of Canada; and that British preference given to the Canadian produce in the West Indies would draw from the western part of New York and the northern part of Ohio American produce into Canada, aggrandizing Montreal and Quebec, and giving employment to British shipping, to the prejudice of the canals of New York, the port of New York, and American shipping.

This was the offence of the American government; and we are at this moment realizing the evils which it foresees. Our produce is passing into Canada, enriching her capitals, and nourishing British navigation. Our own wheat is transported from the western part of New York into Canada, there manufactured, and thence transported in British ships in the form of Canadian flour. We are thus deprived of the privilege even of manufacturing our own grain. And when the produce of the United States is shipped from the Atlantic ports, arrives at the British West Indies, it is unable in consequence of the heavy duties with which most of it is burthened, to sustain a competition with British or colonial produce, freely admitted.

The general rule may be admitted that every nation has a right to favor its own productions, by protecting duties or other regulations; but, like all general rules, it must have its exceptions. And the relation in which Great Britain stands to her continental and West India colonies, from which she is separated by a vast sea, and the relations in which the United States stand to these colonies, some of which are in juxtaposition with them, constitute a fit case for such an exception.

It is true that the late administration did authorize Mr. Gallatin to treat with Great Britain upon the basis of the rule which has been stated, but it was with the express understanding that some competent provision should be made in the treaty to guard against the British monopoly of the transportation of our own produce passing through Canada. Mr. Gallatin was informed "that the United States consent to receive the demand which they have heretofore made of the admission of their productions into British colonies at the same, and no higher rate of duty, as similar productions are chargeable with when imported from one another British colony, with the exception of our produce descending the St. Lawrence and the St. Lawrence." (1)

There was no abatement of our right, no condemnation of the previous conduct of our government, no humiliating admission that we had put forth, and too tenaciously clung to, unsustainable pretensions, and that Great Britain had all along been in the right. We only forbore, for the present, to assert a right, leaving ourselves at liberty, subsequently, to resume it. What Mr. Gallatin was authorized to do was to make a temporary concession, and it was proposed with this preliminary announcement: "But notwithstanding, on a full consideration of the whole subject, the president, anxious to give a strong proof to Great Britain of the desire of the government of the United States to arrange this long-unsatisfied matter of the colonial intercourse, in a manner mutually satisfactory, authorizes you." (2) And Mr. Gallatin was required "to endeavor to make a lively impression on the British government, of the conciliatory spirit of that of the United States, which has dictated the present liberal offer, and of their expectation to meet, in the progress of your negotiations, with a corresponding friendly disposition."

Now, sir, keeping sight of the object which the late secretary of state had in view, the opening of the trade with the British colonies, which was the best mode to accomplish it? To send our ministers to prostrate himself, as a suppliant, before the British throne, and to say to the late American administration brought forward pretensions which we cannot sustain, and they too long and too tenaciously adhered to them. Your majesty was always in the right. But we hope that your majesty will be graciously pleased to recollect, that it was not we, who are now in possession of the American power, but those who have been expelled from it, that wronged your majesty; and that we are now on the side of your majesty. And we do humbly pray that your majesty, taking all mitigating circumstances into consideration, will graciously condescend to extend to us the privileges of the British act of parliament of 1825, and to grant us the boon of a trade with your majesty's West India colonies!—Or, to have presented himself before the British monarch in the naïve and dignified attitude of a minister of this republic, and, abstaining from all condemnation or animadversion upon the past conduct of his own government, to have placed the withdrawal of our former demand upon the ground of concession, in a spirit of amity and compromise!

But the late secretary of state, the appointed organ of the American people to vindicate their rights with all foreign powers, and to expose the injustice of any unfounded demands which they might assert, was not content with exerting his ingenuity to put his own country in the wrong and the British government in the right. He endeavored to attach to the late administration the discredit of bringing forward unfounded pretensions, and, by disclaiming them, to propitiate the favor of the British king. He says that the views of the present administration, upon the subject of the colonial trade, "have been submitted to the people of the U. States; and the counsels by which your conduct is now directed, are the result of the judgment expressed by the only regularly triennial to which the late administration was amenable for its acts. It should be sufficient that the claims set up by them, and what caused the interruption of the trade in question, have been explicitly abandoned by those who first asserted them, and are not revived by their successors." The late secretary of state, the gentleman under consideration, here makes the statement that the late administration were the first to set up the claims to which he refers. Now, under all the high responsibility which belongs to the seat which I occupy, I deliberately pronounce that this statement is untrue; and that the late secretary either must have known it to be untrue, or he was culpably negligent of his duty in not ascertaining what had been done under prior administrations. I repeat the charge—the statement must have been known to be untrue, or there was culpable negligence. If it were material, I believe it could be shown that the claim in question was material to the admission into the British West Indies of the produce of the United States upon an equal footing with similar produce of the British continental colonies—is coeval with the existence of our present constitution; and that whenever the occasion arose for asserting the claim, it was asserted. But I shall go no further back than to Mr. Madison's administration. Mr. Monroe, the then secretary of state, instructed our then minister at London, upon this subject, he instructed Mr. Caldwel, in the following terms: "It is the very claim prevented an adjustment, at that time, of the colonial question. It was again brought forward under Mr. Monroe's administration, when Mr. Rush was our minister at London. He opened a long and protracted negotiation upon this and other topics, which was suspended in the summer of 1824, principally because the parties could not agree on any satisfactory arrangement of this very colonial question."

Thus, at least, two administrations, prior to that of Mr. Adams, had brought forward this identical claim or pretension which his was the first to assert, according to the late secretary of state. The next charge, which the late secretary of state, the official defender of the rights of the American people, preferred against his own government, was that of "omitting to accept the terms offered by the act of parliament of July, 1825, after the subject had been brought before congress, and deliberately acted upon by our government." Never was there a more unfounded charge brought forward by any native against his own government; and never was there a more unwarranted apology set up for a foreign government; and a plain historical narrative will demonstrate the truth of both these propositions.

It has been already stated that the negotiation of Mr. Rush embracing the precise colonial claim under consideration, was suspended in 1824, with an understanding between the two governments that it was to be resumed on all points at some future convenient period. Early in July, 1825, our government having then proposed a resumption of the negotiation, the British parliament passed an act to regulate the colonial trade with foreign powers. This act was never, during the late administration, either at London or Washington, officially communicated by the British to the American government; and we only obtained it through other channels. Now, if it had been the purpose of the British government, by the passage of that act, to withdraw the colonial question from the negotiation, it ought to have communicated that purpose to this government, and, at the same time, the act of parliament, as supplanting and substituting the negotiation. But it never did communicate such purpose. The act itself did not sever did communicate such purpose. The act itself did not sever, specifically embracing the United States, and offered terms which, upon the face of the act, it was impossible for the U. States to accede to. It required, for example, that, to entitle powers, not possessing colonies, to the benefit of the act, they must place the navigation and commerce of G. Britain upon the footing of the most favored nation. To have done this, would have admitted British shipping to import into the U. States, on the same conditions with native shipping, the American productions of any quarter of the globe, without a reciprocal liberty on the part of the shipping of the U. States in British ports. The act itself was differently construed in different colonial ports of G. Britain; and an order of the local government of Halifax, closing that port against our vessels from the 5th of January, was subsequently revoked; thereby confirming the impression that the act of parliament was not intended to dispense with the previous reciprocity. And, to conclude the part of the act, as late as the 20th of October, 1826, Mr. Vaughan, the British minister, upon being interrogated by the then secretary of state, was totally misinformed to afford any information as to the meaning or intent of the act of July, 1825.

Mean time, in March, 1825, more than six months after the passage of the act of parliament, Mr. Vaughan notified the department of state, that he had "received instructions from his majesty's government to acquaint you that it is preparing to proceed to the important negotiations between that country and the United States now placed in the hands of the American minister in London."

"The negotiations will therefore be forthwith resumed." * * * Here the negotiations were spoken of, without exception of the colonial question, the most important of them. If it had been intended to withdraw that, no time could have been more suitable to announce that intention; but no such announcement was made. Mr. Vaughan was informed that we also would prepare for the negotiation, (including, of course, the colonial question), and Mr. Gallatin was accordingly shortly after sent out with full powers and instructions annually to settle that question. On his arrival in England, in the summer of 1826, he was told by the British government that they would not negotiate on the colonial question; that they had made up their mind from the passage of the act of July, 1825, not to negotiate about it; and he was informed by the sarcastic Mr. Canning, that as we had failed to accept the BOON, which the British government had then offered, we were then too late!

Such is the state of the case on which the late secretary of state so authoritatively pronounces judgment against his own government for "omitting to accept the terms offered by the act of parliament of July, 1825!" He adds, indeed, "after the subject had been brought before congress, and deliberately acted upon by our own government." It was brought before congress in the autumn of 1825-6, not at the instance of the American executive, but upon the spontaneous and ill-judged motion of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Smith), and Mr. Gallatin was informed that if the bill proposed by that gentleman had been passed, it would have been unsatisfactory to the British government.

I have another objection to this nomination. I believe, upon circumstances which satisfy my mind, that to this gentleman is principally to be ascribed the introduction of the odious system of proscription for the exercise of the elective franchise, in the government of the people were to be put up to a semblance, by the action which the party in his own state, of which he is the reputed head, constantly acts. He was among the first of the secretaries to apply that system to the dismission of clerks in his department, known to me to be highly meritorious, and among them one who is now a representative in the other house. It is a detestable system, drawn from the worst periods of the Roman republic; and if it were to be perpetuated; if the officers, honors, and emoluments of the people were to be put up to a semblance, by the result of every presidential election, our government and institutions, becoming intolerable, would finally end in a despotism as inexorable as that at Constantinople.

Sir, the necessity under which we are placed is painful. But it is no fault of the senate, whose consent and advice are required by the constitution to consummate this appointment, that the minister has been sent out of the United States without their concurrence. I hope that the public will not be prejudiced by his rejection, if he should be rejected. And I feel perfectly assured that, if the government to which he has been deputed shall learn that he has been rejected because he has there, by his instructions to Mr. McLane, stained the character of our country, the moral effect of our decision will greatly outweigh any advantages to be derived from his negotiations, whatever they may have been intended to be.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

 The report made to the N. York convention by the committee on the manufactures of iron and steel, was published as an ADDENDUM to the present volume of the REGISTER, and we now forward a whole sheet of other reports to be added to that—and next week expect to issue another sheet that will conclude the report on sugar, and get-in all the rest of the reports which have passed through the hands of the executive committee.

A very curious fact is stated by Mr. Poindexter—that Mr. Van Buren was fixed upon as the successor of Mr. McLane, before the dissolution of the old cabinet.

Remarks of Mr. Smith.

the constitution is not to be violated. I have been nearly nine years in congress, and this is the first time I have ever heard any other constructions seriously urged, than, "that the instructions given to ministers abroad are the act of the president." All the instructions, I remember, commence thus—"I am instructed by the president to give you the following views, &c. &c." or words to that effect. I well remember a case in point, which I happened to be called on to discuss more than thirty years ago. I was asked by what authority the navy: he asked me what the house of representatives were doing. I replied, that they were discussing the report of Mr. Pickens. Do the house consider it as the report of the president, or the secretary of state? It is considered as the act of the president, who sent it, and how could it otherwise be considered? I come, said the secretary, from Mr. Adams, to request you to say, that he disavows it. I then states that Mr. Adams had said to Mr. Pickens, and not as his (Mr. Adams) act. I returned into the house of representatives, and in the debate, took occasion to comment upon the re-origin relations. Maine (Mr. Holmes) has said that "Mr. McLane was sent to bow and cringe at the feet of the British minister." That senator knows little of Mr. McLane! What a native American, the son of a distinguished officer of the revolution, bow and cringe at the feet of any man! I can assure that senator that Mr. McLane is not made of such pliant materials. No, sir; Mr. McLane came to the point at once. He asked for what was right. He set up no silly pretensions. He refused to negotiate on any terms but the terms of justice. He asked for a negotiation as they did with Mr. Gallatin. But, sir, his firmness and frankness conquered the reluctance of the ministry to enter into a negotiation. He convinced them, that they had departed from a rigid construction of the act of parliament of July, 1823, in the claims of France, Russia, and Spain; they could not, therefore, in justice, he asserted, refuse a similar departure, in the demand of equal justice to the United States. He frankly told them that the purpose of the act of July, 1823, was to protect colonial trade, and that if he indulged in a negotiation, he would return home. Call you this, bowing and cringing at the feet of the British ministry? Is there any cringing in the despatches of Mr. McLane? No one will say there is. The truth is, Mr. President, and it ought to be known to the people, that the front of the offence is, the negotiation has completely succeeded under the instructions given by Mr. Van Buren. The British have failed. The only if any crime that never can be forgiven by the opponents of General Jackson. They will never pardon him for succeeding in all the negotiations, in which the preceding administration had completely failed. For instance, the late administration had attempted and failed, in all the following important objects, namely in the claims on France; in the opening of the Black Sea to our commerce, in making a treaty with Mexico; in obtaining from Colombia a cession of territory, in the claims on England, and in quashing the duties charged on our trade, with those charged to England. In all these matters, there was a complete failure by the one, and complete success by the other administration. The successful negotiations were under the instructions of Mr. Van Buren. How, then, can Mr. Van Buren be pardoned by those who had failed? It is true, that the convention with Denmark and Brazil for reimbursement, had been closed, or nearly so, when Mr. Van Buren was called to the office. But Mr. Van Buren was effected by Mr. Connell, the agent of the claimants, without any instructions having been received by the charge des affaires. The

5 Since the above speech was delivered, I have seen and 6 conversed with the president, and have been authorized to say,
7 that the objectionable paragraphs alluded to in the debate, were 8 dictated by him to Mr. Van Buren—that they were his act, and 9 not the act of Mr. Van Buren;—and I have been subsequently 10 informed, by a senator from Tennessee, that prior to his leaving 11 home, to assume his station in the senate, the president had told 12 him, that he (gen. Jackson) would, on all occasions of conse-
13 quence, require the opinion of his cabinet;—that he had, there-
14 fore, the senator understood, been in consultation with his cabinet
15 before the senator undertook his dispute with the cabinet meetings
16 of the president, and not calling on his cabinet together, was the president's 17 own act, and not in consequence of the advice of 18 Mr. Van Buren, as has been so repeatedly affirmed.

* We have also a second speech of Mr. Clay, in reply to Messrs. Forsyth and Smith. It would have been preferred as a reply, had it been received in time.

charge acted, he told me, as a private friend of the agent, and succeeded.

[The senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay), in a subsequent speech on this subject, remarked, that he had himself instructed Mr. Hughes, the charge des affaires to Sweden, to attend to the claims of our merchants against Sweden, and that the senator from Maryland, (Mr. Smith), was either mistaken or misinformed. Mr. Smith made no reply; but addressed a note to the secretary of state for information, whether Mr. Clay, when secretary of state, had ever given the instructions, which he asserted had been given by him to Mr. Hughes. The reply of the secretary of state, contradicting the averment of Mr. Clay on this point.—See note.]

The senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay), has charged Mr. McLane with having done injury to the navigating interest, by the opening of the St. Lawrence, and the northern ports, to our free intercourse—thus transcribing, as he said, the carrying of the produce of Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, New York, Vermont, and Maine, to British ships, which would otherwise have been carried by our own ships. I believe the farmers of those states do not complain. They know that their produce sold in Montreal, is received there free of duty, and is carried to England, Ireland, and the West Indies, as if it were the produce of Canada. It is of little importance to them who is the carrier, provided they get an additional market, and a better price for their produce. I regret, Mr. President, that I cannot give the credit of that important act to Mr. McLane. He, however, had nothing to do with it. It formed no part of his arrangement. The opening of that intercourse, for certain articles of our produce, had been done gratuitously by the British government in 1820, prior even to the attempt at negotiation by Mr. Gallatin. Now that act must have been known. It could not fail to have been known to the senator, (Mr. Clay), then the secretary of state. Why, then, does he now charge it as a fault committed by Mr. McLane, who had no more to do with it than the man in the moon? Nor had Mr. McLane any thing to do with the act of Great Britain, passed subsequently to the arrangement made by him; by which act, other articles of our produce are admitted free of duty into the British colonies, and from thence are received in England and the West Indies, as if they were the produce of the Canadas. The senator (Mr. Clay), complains that the produce of our farmers, bordering on Canada, is received in England on equal terms with those of Canada, thus giving a new market to a part of their articles, without which other markets might be overstocked. The senator (Mr. Clay) has truly said, that the wheat of the states bordering on the Canadas, pass into Canada, is there ground, and the flour shipped to British ports, as if it were the produce of the wheat of Canada. This has been the spontaneous act of Great Britain, adopted for her own interest, and is most certainly highly beneficial to our farmers. An immense number of sheep, hogs, horses, and cattle are driven annually from Maine to Quebec, and New Brunswick. The farmers and grainers of Maine differ in opinion with the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay), and are really so simple, as to believe, that their free trade to the British colonies, and New Brunswick, is highly beneficial to them. Whether the intercourse with the British North American colonies is beneficial, or whether it is injurious, the present administration, nor Mr. McLane had little part in it. It had been effected, in part, before the arrangement was concluded, and soon after for another part. It formed, as I have previously said, no part of the arrangement with Great Britain, and this fact must have been known to the senator, (Mr. Clay), for he then acted as secretary of state. We have for nearly half a century been claiming the free navigation of the St. Lawrence as a natural right. It has at length been gratuitously conceded to us by Great Britain, and now the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay), complains of it as a grievance.

The senator, (Mr. Clay), also complains that the instructions state, "that the late administration had abandoned certain pretensions." The senator admits that these pretensions had been waived. The senator from Georgia (Mr. Forsyth), has contended that there is no difference in substance between these words. I leave this grave question to be settled by those learned senators, and will proceed to show what those pretensions were, and which, I can hardly restrain myself from pronouncing, were puerile in the extreme.

During the session of 1822, congress was informed, that an act was pending in parliament, for the opening of the colonial ports to the commerce of the United States. The conqueror, an act passed, authorizing the president, in case the act of parliament was satisfactory to him, to open the ports of the United States to British vessels, by his proclamation. The act of parliament was deemed satisfactory, and a proclamation was accordingly issued, and the trade commenced. Unfortunately for our commerce, and I think, contrary to justice, a treasury circular issued, directing the charge British minister to suspend our ports, with the alien tonnage and discriminating duty. This order was remonstrated against, (I think), by Mr. Vaughan. The trade, however, went on uninterrupted. Congress met, and a bill was drafted in 1823, by Mr. Adams, then secretary of state, and passed both houses, with little, if any debate—I voted for it, believing that it met, in a spirit of reciprocity, the act of parliament. This bill contained, however, one little word, "as where," which completely frustrated all our expectations. It was introduced by no one. The senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster), may have understood its effect. If he did so understand it, he was silent. The effect of that word "elsewhere" was to assume the pretensions alluded to in the instructions. What were they? "That the produce of the United States should be received in the West Indies, on payment of the same duties, as were payable on the produce of the North American colonies." The British minister said, "as well might we ask that our sugar should be received free of duty, as is the sugar of Louisiana."

The result was, that the British government shut their colonial ports immediately, and thenceforward. The act of 1822, gave us a monopoly of the West India trade. It admitted free duty, a variety of articles, such as—Indian corn, oats, Indian meal, peas, beans, &c. &c. &c.

The British government thought, that we entertained a belief, that they could not do without our produce, and by their acts of 27th June, and 5th July 1823, they opened their ports to all the world, on terms far less advantageous to the United States, than those of the act of 1822; and these are the pretensions which the instructions say, had been abandoned by the late administration. They were abandoned, Mr. President, by the following words in the instructions to Mr. Gallatin:—"That the United States consent to waive the demand which they have heretofore made of the admission of their productions into British colonies, at the same and no higher rate of duty, as similar articles are chargeable with, when imported from one into another British colony, with the exception of our produce descending the St. Lawrence and the St. Lawrence." Now, sir, what difference there may be between the words "waiver," and "abandonment" in common parlance, it is in this case, a complete abandonment in diplomatic language. What a simple truth, is after all, the great ground of objection! It is this—Mr. McLane has made an arrangement conformably to the preceding instructions from Mr. Adams to Mr. Gallatin. His rule is crying.

The dissolution of the late cabinet, Mr. President has been charged upon Mr. Van Buren; and what is there at home or abroad that we have not heard charged to him? The elder Adams charged all his cabinet except the secretary of the navy. The charge was approved by the democratic party, and disapproved by the aristocratic of the day. A change of the cabinet is, therefore, nothing new. We now grope and lament over the late change, and yet never was a cabinet more traduced than the late one, by the whole body of the opposition throughout the union. The cabinet certainly was such an one, as did not meet the views or approbation of the friends of the administration. They regretted in silence the selections which the president had made. The cabinet members selected were honest and honorable men. They were my political friends, and, I may say, some of them were my personal intimates. Their dismissal has done no harm to the nation. The new cabinet is, (I believe), more acceptable to all parties. The members of it, are known to be competent to the special duties of their several departments, and equally so, as advisers in the great affairs of the nation. What is it to the people whether A, B, C, or D, be at the head of affairs! All the people ask is, that a man be honest, and able to perform his duty. I think that the present president has held no cabinet councils for two years, and Mr. Van Buren is charged as being the adviser of the president to that effect—Is this mode new? I think not. I think that, when Washington held no cabinet council, during the first two years of his administration, and I remember well, a discussion in strong terms, against the president's holding them, on the ground of their being unconstitutional. I think that general Jackson was at that time a member of congress, and again he has been imbued the opinion, that cabinet councils were not conformable with the constitution. Assuming this, I must believe, that the not assembling his cabinet was his own act, and not in consequence of the representations of Mr. Van Buren. The unpardonable crime of this gentleman has always been, that the president has great confidence in his talents and abilities, which all will admit, he possesses, in as eminent a degree.

From Mass. (Mr. Webster), says, that "instructions shewing a difference of opinion in the dominant party, with that of the defeated party, had never been given by any government." I ask, Mr. President, on what ground does the senator make that assertion? Few nations, if any, except our own, have ever published their instructions to their ministers—We, therefore, cannot know what has been done. But I hardly think it possible that such instructions never have been given. They are natural, and were for Mr. McLane alone, and never shown by him to any person. But, I link from Mr. Hartley's language to our commissioners at Paris, when treating for a peace, that he must have had some such instructions, as he would not otherwise have talked of change of ministry, as holding out a fairer prospect, of ultimately leading to a general peace.

Mr. Van Buren has also been charged, with being the father of what has been improperly called the "proscriptive system"—or in other words, "the removal system." "The removal from office." Where is the proof? None can be produced—all is surmise and conjecture. I act on no such ground. When an assertion such as this is made, I want proof of its being well founded. But I absolutely deny the charge, and will offer unquestionable proof of the correctness of the denial.—The charge cannot possibly be substantiated, unless the senator who made it, can satisfy the senate, that Mr. Van Buren could, at Albany and Washington, at one and the same time. I will simply state the facts. Mr. Van Buren was at Albany acting as governor of the state of New York when the extra session of the senate met on the 4th March, 1829. I think he, [Mr. V. B.] was nominated on the 5th of March. At this extra session of the senate, seventy five officers were appointed, principally to fill vacancies occasioned by removals from office. Of these officers Mr. Van Buren could know nothing. The advisers to this congress, if removed now, were the members of the cabinet then present. Mr. Van Buren could know but few of those removed, or of those appointed. I will remember that I saw Mr. Van Buren in Baltimore after my return home, and therefore conclude that it must have been at least a month between the time of his appointment, and his arrival at Washington. I think, Mr. President, that I have proved that Mr. Van Buren could not have been the father of what is improperly called the "proscriptive system;"—a system adopted by some of the states of this union both before, and after this administration came into office. For myself, I am opposed to removal from office for political reasons. But, sir, I would remove any officer, who made use of his office to force inferiors to act contrary to their wishes. I would remove every postmaster, who had been known to frank the "coffin handbills," or any other abusive papers of either of the candidates. Few removals of consequence have been made in Maryland. I think four in Baltimore, where the most important offices are.—One of these removals I regretted. It proceeded from the best feelings of the Senate.

Before I finish my remarks, Mr. President, I will notice what passed between the then secretary of state, (Mr. Clay), and myself, in relation to the act of parliament of July 1825. I first saw a copy of that act in Baltimore, and mentioned it to the secretary. He said that he had the act in his possession, and handed it to me. I asked him, whether the terms proposed were satisfactory. He said that he considered they were all we could ask. I then observed why not issue an proclamation, under our act, and thus open the trade? He replied, that he would prefer negotiation. I asked, why? for what will you negotiate? We have nothing to do, but to give our assent, and the trade is at once opened. I had the act printed, and handed a copy to Mr. Adams, who had never seen it before. He agreed that the terms were satisfactory. I then pressed him to issue his proclamation, and told him that if he did not, I should be compelled to issue one. He remarked, that he wished it to go, and that he would not only sign it, but sign it with pleasure. I did prepare a bill under the order of the senate, and, doubtful whether it might be correctly drawn, so as to effect my object, I sent it to the then secretary of state, (Mr. Clay), with a request that he would correct it if necessary. He replied in writing to this effect: "that the bill was drafted to meet my object, that it was so doubtful whether it would be correct, that he wished it to go, and that he would not only sign it, but sign it with pleasure." The bill was opposed by Mr. Lloyd, who, it was believed, had the confidence of the executive. It failed to become a law, I believe from want of time to act upon it. The senator, (Mr. Clay), has said, Mr. Canning had observed, that even if the bill had passed, it could not have been admitted as satisfactory. This observation may have arisen from its being imperfectly drawn, or from some other cause. Perhaps the British minister expected that the president would have opened our ports by proclamation, as he, (Mr. Canning), knew, that the president possessed full power to do so, under our acts of 1823 and 1824, both of which we know, had been drafted by Mr. Adams when secretary of state.

I have deemed it necessary, Mr. President, to make these remarks, in relation to the colonial trade as a reply to the observations on this subject which have fallen from the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay).

(NOTE.)

The following letter, and accompanying extract from another letter, on the same subject, have been received from the secretary of state:

Department of state, Washington, January 30th, 1832.
Samuel Smith, esq. secretary of the United States.

First, I have the honor to state, in answer to your inquiry of yesterday, that the returns containing the instructions of the department to Mr. Christopher Hughes, when formerly charged d'affaires of the United States in Sweden, have been carefully examined, and that all which is found in them, in relation to the then claims of our citizens upon the government of that country, is given in the subjoined extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to him, dated 17th June, 1819. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, (Signed) EDWARD LIVINGSTON.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams, secretary of state, to Mr. Hughes, chargé d'affaires of the United States at Stockholm:—

Department of state, 17th June, 1819.
"The president has been absent from the seat of government, on a tour to the south and west, since the 30th March. His return to this place, in the course of two or three weeks is expected. Since his departure Mr. Russell's latest correspondence with the Swedish government, on the subject of the Stralund claims, has been received, as well as that which followed Mr. Russell's taking leave of the court. It is painful to perceive the perseverance of the Swedish government, in withholding the indemnity, so justly and indisputably due to our fellow citizens, who suffered by those seizures, for which not even a plausible pretext is alleged. It is still more painful to find this denial of justice, accompanied by insinuations, neither candid nor friendly, and by allegations, utterly destitute of foundation. Earnestly desirous of maintaining, with Sweden, the most friendly and harmonious relations, I shall reserve, until after the president's return all further remarks on the subject."

Remarks of Mr. Poindexter.

Mr. Poindexter* rose, and said, that as absence of several weeks from the senate, occasioned by indisposition, had, as he was informed, been the cause of some delay in the final action of the senate, on this nomination.

He regretted the circumstance, and even now that he was enabled to resume the discharge of his duties, he could but ill require the kind indulgence of the senate, in postponing the question on

*Mr. Poindexter desires us to state, that some of the remarks contained in his speech, which we this day publish, were noted by him before he delivered his sentiments on the nomination of Mr. Van Buren, in the senate, but that the difficulty of standing on his feet, for any great length of time, since his recent fall from his carriage, prevented his going minutely through all the notes he had taken; but that the additions do not materially vary the substance of his remarks, on that occasion. [Not. Int.]

his account, by any efforts of his, to investigate the claims of the nominee to public confidence, inasmuch as the delicate state of his health would not permit him to enter at large into the various interesting topics which had been adverted to in the remarks of the honorable senators who had preceded him in the debate.

Sir, said Mr. Poindexter, I have risen to perform an unpleasant but an imperative duty, from which I cannot withdraw without subjecting my motives to misconception, or misrepresentation, in relation to my vote on the question now before the senate.—Having nothing to gain by the rejection of this nomination, and nothing to lose, should it be confirmed, I can feel, Mr. President, no other solicitude on the subject, than that which arises from a sense of the solemn duty which I owe to my country, and an ardent desire to preserve the honor and dignity of the American people, free from the stain of that moral turpitude and vicious intrigues, which cover the corrupt governments of Europe with infamy and disgrace. For this purpose, and for no other purpose whatever, either of a personal or political character, I have endeavored to inform myself, by all the means within my knowledge of the facts and circumstances touching the merits of the individual whose nomination is now under consideration. I have adopted this course the more readily, because it was, I understand, on a previous day, recommended by honorable senators, in favor of the nominee, in preference to a full and formal investigation by a committee of the senate, which had been proposed by an honorable senator from Maine, (Mr. Holmes). Mr. Van Buren has been long in the public eye, his high and important political position, and the influence of his public conduct may be traced in every department of the government. Whether, therefore, his previous acts entitle him to the confidence of the whole and of the nation, is a question which each gentleman must determine for himself, and I claim for myself the humble privilege of presenting a concise summary of the grounds on which I hope to justify my vote. The evidence to which I allude, refers, and which has operated on my judgment in this case, is drawn from the history of the passing events of the day, and the statements of persons of high standing and respectability, whose integrity and veracity no one would presume to doubt, when their names shall be disclosed.

Sir, it is known to all who have looked into the political movements of the various parties, which have contended for power within the last year, that Mr. Van Buren, who has been long listed as the friend of general Jackson, long after the commencement of the administration of president Adams. Prior to that event, he had lent his influence to a candidate between whom and general Jackson there existed the most deadly hostility. The administration of Mr. Adams had no charms for Mr. Van Buren, and after due deliberation, and a "judicious" estimate of the probable results, he became the advocate of general Jackson for the presidency, in opposition to the incumbent whose prospects of re-election were overcast with doubt and uncertainty, and from whom he could expect no favors, either for himself or his friends. The capital which he brought into the stock of political influence then operating on the presidential election, was supposed to give him a claim to the highest distinction, in the event of the successful termination of the struggle. Accordingly, he was placed by general Jackson at the head of his constitutional advisers, preferring him to other distinguished gentlemen, whose support was of longer duration, and, to say the least, equally efficient, and whose talents would bear an advantageous comparison with the most enlightened statesman in the world. Thus promoted and flattered, wielding, as he did, the executive arm of the nation, permit me to ask what was the conduct of Mr. Van Buren, then secretary of the department of state? Was the honor and welfare of the country the purity of its character, whose prospects lay at his heart? Was his mind free from the bias of undisciplined ambition; or was he exclusively devoted to his own elevation, regardless of the means, or of the honor of his venerable chief, and of the integrity of the party which brought him into power? I cannot answer these grave questions by any thing which falls within the scope of my own personal knowledge; but if there be truth in facts which have been detailed me by men of the first rank in the nation, and which I am bound to believe, until contradicted by evidence still more imposing, his whole course was marked by a systematic tissue of dark and studied intrigue, which, in its consequences, swept into chaos the elements of that patriotic band who fought the battle, and gained the splendid victory in 1828, which placed on the brow of the hero of New Orleans the civic wreath of this grateful country. Discarding all personal considerations, for I have neither revenge nor political aspirations, graciously, and if I had, they would not enter these walls, to influence my deliberations in matters of national concern, I ask only the rights of truth, to guide me to a decision which shall accord with strict and impartial justice, and secure to me the approbation of an enlightened people and what is still more precious the smiles of an approving conscience.

If, then, the friends of the nominee deem the information which I have received, and on which, for the present, I must rely, inaccurate or unsuited to satisfactory explanation, I invite them, I urge them, in justice to their friend, to rescue him from every shade of suspicion which may be cast on him, by the appointment of a committee, to be chosen by this honorable body, who shall be charged with the duty of collecting all the testimony which can be adduced, either for or against the nominee, and making a faithful report of it to the Senate; and if the result should be such as to satisfy my mind that the nominee is innocent of the unworthy conduct which has been ascribed to him, my vote will be given in favor of his nomination, with more real pleasure than I can feel in giving to the dictators of the day, the support I am about to give. To such a committee I am authorized to furnish the names of several gentlemen, high in the confidence of the south.

try, who are ready to testify, on oath if required, to all the facts which they have authorized me to communicate to the senate on the present occasion, in a much more enlarged and satisfactory manner, than it is in my power to give to them. But I must be permitted to remark, that if this invitation is declined by the friends of Mr. Van Buren, my vote must be recorded against his nomination, confiding, as I do, in the honorable sources from which my information is derived. I forbear to dwell on the novel and extraordinary character of the instructions given by Mr. Van Buren to Mr. McLane, our late minister to London, on the subject of opening the West India trade. The views presented of the nature and character of these instructions, by other gentlemen, leave me nothing to add but the expression of my deep regret, that under any circumstances, the secretary of state acting, either under the influence of his own passions or prejudices, or by the instructions of the president, should deem it compatible with the dignity of his station, or the elevated character of his country, to approach the throne of a foreign monarch on the style of supplication, asking favors on the humiliating assurance, that the party to which he belonged, exercising the powers of government, were better entitled to his tender mercies, than their predecessors in office, who, it seems had been guilty of the crime of demanding, under color of right from his majesty, concessions in favor of American commerce, which a more enlightened administration recently brought into power by an overwhelming majority of the people were ready to abandon as unfounded "pretensions." Such an appeal was unnecessary, and unworthy of a statesman representing the interests and honor of a great and powerful nation in its intercourse with foreign powers, and merits the reproach of this honorable body as an integral part of the executive.

But, Mr. President, what is the history of the conduct of Mr. Van Buren in reference to his intercourse with the chief magistrate, and those associated with him in the administration at the seat of the national government? He entered the councils of president Jackson with sullen reserve on his brow, under which he concealed all his opinions on the great questions which agitated the nation. He seized on circumstances which pre-existed his induction into office, novel in their character in this country, but familiar at the court of Louis the Fifteenth, in France, and of Charles the seventh of England, by means of which he contrived to "ride upon the whirlwind, and direct the storm," and to render the credulous and confiding chief, whose weakness he flattered, and whose prejudices he nourished, subservient to all his purposes, personal and political. His plans of operation were shrouded in darkness and mystery, and executed by the arm of power; nerve by the recent development of public opinion, for the accomplishment of his ulterior views—which knew no limit short of controlling and directing the destinies of the nation. The established practice of every preceding administration, to hold cabinet councils, was abolished, and the secret machinery of political intrigue, was put into successful operation, worked by the skill of the master spirit behind the curtain. No board of consultation around the green cloth was held, where each member was required to unfold his sentiments freely and frankly, of men and measures connected with national policy.

No principles were promulgated as the standard by which the people might test the claims of the administration to their confidence and support. Every thing was involved in doubt and uncertainty, in order to catch the breeze of popular impulse in whatever direction it might set, and to conform to its overwhelming influence. The southern politician who complained of oppression, was soothed, flattered, or threatened according to the thermometer which regulated the political atmosphere around the walls of the palace. The disappointed and office hunters received assurances to satisfy their utmost wishes and expectations, and the doctrines of the "American System" were adopted and repudiated according to calculations founded on a well arranged scale of political profit and loss.

An effort to restore the ancient usage of cabinet councils, made by a few of the most devoted friends of gen. Jackson, was repelled with indignation, and the friendly intention falsely ascribed to personal hostility, to a particular member of his cabinet. These gentlemen have ever since been looked on with distrust and suspicion by the president.

Thus protected from all interference on the part of his associates in power, and from public animadversion, Mr. Van Buren shaped his course to suit the crisis, keeping steadily in view his ultimate elevation to the first office in the gift of a free people. Possessed, as he was, of the confidence and confidence of gen. Jackson, he very soon found free access to his ears, and by the abuse of his advances, led him into excesses and errors, fatal to the tranquillity of the country, without affording the slightest evidence that he in any manner, participated in producing the results which he anxiously desired to accomplish. The proscriptive policy, pushed as it was, to extremities which the public interest did not seem to require, and late in the practice of any other chief magistrate, has been universally attributed to his advice and influence of Mr. Van Buren. This system, combined with the whole patronage of government, was, as far as practicable, placed at his discretion, to smooth the way to the ulterior object of his ambition. He made himself almost the sole advice of the president, during the first two years of his administration, and every one who stood in his way was made to feel the power of executive denunciation. To this cause may be attributed this unprovoked rupture between the first and second officers of the government; the prostration of those noble and high-minded friends to whose unwavering exertions, and lofty eloquence, gen. Jackson must feel himself indebted for his success in the late contest for the presidency, and finally, the dissolution of the cabinet, and the consequent nomination of Mr. Van Buren as minister to the court of London.

I have, Mr. President, been put in possession of a communication tracing, with great minuteness, and I have no doubt, accurately, the means resorted to by Mr. Van Buren, to produce the rupture between gen. Jackson and those honorable men who had accepted his invitation to become members of his political family. I forbear to read this paper to the senate, because of the peculiar matters of which it treats, but I hold myself ready to deliver it, with the name of the author, to any committee of the senate, which may be appointed to embody the evidence on this subject. I have also received, from a gentleman now in this city, a statement of a conversation held with the late secretary of state, after he had surrendered the seals of office, which I beg leave to lay on the table, as the facts it details are intimately connected with those transactions which have occupied so large a share of the public attention, and which I regret to say have never been explained in a manner to satisfy the moral feelings of the country. Of the writer of this communication, I have very little personal knowledge; but he has the most respectable testimonials of his good character and conduct; and I am informed, has been favorably known as the editor of a Journal in New York, friendly to the present administration of the government. For myself, I do not doubt the verity of his statement, and I submit it, without comment to those who desire information on the matters to which it relates.

Mr. President, in addition to the unbroken current of testimony to which I have already adverted, showing most clearly the foul means employed by the late secretary of state, to appropriate the name and well earned fame of gen. Jackson to the advancement of his own ambitious projects, and to overthrow all who obstructed his path to political power, I feel it to be my duty to give to the senate the substance of a conversation which took place between the president and a member of his late cabinet simultaneously with its dissolution. Sir, the distinguished gentleman who made the statement of this interview is too far above suspicion to need from me the eulogy which his character, public and private, so justly merits. His ejection from a station which he did not seek, the duties of which he discharged with so much credit to himself, and advantage to his country, is a melancholy evidence of the frailty of political friendships, when assailed by the ruthless intrigues of an ambitious aspirant. But sir, the frowns of a delinquent friend, clothed with the paternity of power, are impatient and harmless, when the friends of justice are provoked by the malignant radiance of a villain, and the shield of the invulnerable.

The president invited this gentleman to a private audience, for the purpose of making known to him the new arrangements on which he had determined. He commenced with an air of diplomatic caution, and studied precision. "Sir, I submit to you two letters, which I have received from the secretary of state, and the secretary of war, resigning their respective offices, and ask for them your serious consideration." "Which?" replied the president, "I am a plain man, and you know I am." "Our intercourse has been of long duration, and you know that diplomacy is no part of my character or yours. Be so good, therefore, as to tell me frankly, what you intend, and what you desire of me." "Then, sir, I will inform you that I mean to reorganize my cabinet." "Very well, sir, I hope you will profit by the change. I have not been your friend for the sake of office, and I wish only to be furnished with your candid remarks on the conduct of your cabinet to you." "Sir," said the president, "I have no fault to find with you." "With this answer," said the secretary, "I am contented; but allow me to enquire who is to be your secretary of state." "Mr. Livingston," was the reply. "Who is to take the treasury department?" "Mr. McLane, now minister in England." "Who will occupy the navy department?" "Mr. Woodbury." And pray, sir, who is to replace Mr. McLane in England?" "Mr. Van Buren," was the answer.

The inference, which is inseparable from these disclosures, must be obvious to every man whose mind is in search of truth, and whose judgment is free from the "malign influence" of prejudice.

The finger of a disciplined intriguer is visible in all the various efforts made to dismiss particular members of the cabinet, from an early period after the inauguration of Gen. Jackson, until it was effected in 1831. The object cannot be mistaken; and at that day the managers scarcely attempt to conceal their fixed purpose of designating Mr. Van Buren as the successor of the present chief magistrate "volens volens," as they are pleased to express it. Sir, on what data can we reconcile the prompt and unhesitating answer given by the president to each inquiry relating to the individuals who were to compose the new cabinet, other than a pre-concerted and explicit arrangement, formed on mature deliberation, and full consultation with those whose political opinions he was accustomed to take on all subjects of great and absorbing interest to the country?

Is not the fact as distinctly known to every one acquainted with the political movements at the seat of the national government, as any on record, that for more than a year preceding the rupture of the late cabinet, no consultations were held, and but a formal intercourse kept up between the president and three of his constitutional advisers? It cannot with propriety be said, as it is often said, that the secretary of state had so managed as to occupy the first place in the confidence and affections of the chief magistrate. The only rational conclusion, therefore, to which I can bring my mind, after a careful and impartial examination of this whole subject, is, that the secretary of state, prior to his own voluntary resignation, had not only ascertained that a general sweep was to be made of all those whose influence he dreaded, and who could not be induced "to bend the knee to Baa!" but had organized a new cabinet, and "though last not least," had taken especial care to open an avenue, through which he might with safety retreat, and plant himself in a station still more commanding in the public eye, and better calculated to accelerate the consummation of his ulterior purposes. "Who is to replace Mr. Mc-

Lane in England?" "Mr. Van Buren." Sir, the time at which this declaration was made is very remarkable; it preceded the publication of the modest diplomatic letter of resignation, in which the secretary of state attempts to mystify the causes which had operated on his mind, in surrendering the high trust to which he had been called by the president. He artfully seeks in that anomalous communication, to excite the sympathies of the American people by pretended self-torture, at the shrine of false, disinterested patriotism. He retired to the shades of private life, to disengage the administration of president Jackson, and to restore harmony in his council. No sinister motives lingered in the mind of the unbought patriot—no mission to London in the vista—but the noble sacrifice he magnanimously offered up on the altar of public good, with the reservation of such future rewards as a grateful people might bestow, on one whose merits could only be excelled by the purity of his intentions! Sir, would it be credited by a virtuous and enlightened people, that at the very moment when these high-souled sentiments and patriotic professions were unobtrusively thrown before the world, an individual who appropriated them to himself, held the guarantee, that in lieu of the office which he resigned, he should forthwith be created envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. James! And yet the fact is established, by the conversation I have quoted, and strongly corroborated by the letter of the president, in which he reluctantly accepts the resignation.

Mr. President, I can view the conduct of this gentleman, and then the result of a systematic course of political gambling, tight, intrigue, originating in personal ambition, and prosecuted with unrelenting ostracism and proscription, on every high minded statesman in the nation who refused to subscribe to the articles of faith dictated by this nominee, and prescribed as a test by which the patronage of the government should be dispensed, as a man who has widely extended country. The succession to the presidential chair must be secured to this court-juggler, and the means to accomplish this end, were placed at his disposal. Under these impressions, I should be guilty of a gross dereliction of duty to the president, and my own conscience, by advising and consenting to this nomination. I beg to be informed of the necessity of so much haste in despatching a minister to London. No negotiations were pending which required the presence of a minister with full powers, the result of the European war, represented here by a charge d'affaires. We had a diplomatic agent there of equal grade; and surely the relations between the two nations might have been suffered to remain in this equitable condition until the annual meeting of congress, when the advice and consent of the senate could have been asked, before the public chest had been opened for the outfit and salary of a minister.

The circumstances connected with this unnecessary precipitancy renders it obnoxious to the strongest objections now warranted the conclusion that it was designed to operate on the action of the senate, in their deliberations on this nomination. I cannot subject my opinions to the control of a premature movement on the part of the executive. Sir, I am aware, that for this independent exercise of my best judgment, I shall be denounced by the press, as the partisan of a competitor for the presidential chair. I spurn the imputation. At my time of life, I have nothing to hope from the smiles, still less to fear, from the frowns of any man in power. I honor the man whose heart is pure; whose actions through life exhibit lucid proof that he is honest in the cause of human liberty; but when I am invoked to give my sanction to dark intrigue, political management and corruption, at the hazard of incurring the disphasure of "those who feel power and forget right," I will fearlessly and faithfully discharge the trust reposed in me by my country, by a firm vindication of the moral feeling of the people who compose the young and vigorous republic. I will reprove and correct the influence of vice, by inflicting merited chastisement on all who perpetrate it.

The following is the letter referred to by Mr. P.

Washington City, Jan. 24, 1852.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note, bearing date this morning. It was this morn'g handed me, and, although it is by no means desirable to stand in the attitude of a public accuser of any man holding a high and responsible station in the government, yet, inasmuch as I consider the subject matter of your inquiry as being one of no small degree of importance, I do not feel myself at liberty to shrink from the discharge of my duty, or withhold from an honorable senator, approaching me in his senatorial capacity, any information which I may be in possession of, touching the subject of his enquiry. Nevertheless, I regret that I am thus called upon to repeat any remarks which may have been inadvertently made to a friend.

Soon after the dissolution of general Jackson's first cabinet, while the ex-secretary of state, Mr. Van Buren, was in New York, waiting the arrival of Mr. Louis McLane from the court of St. James, I saw him. Being then the editor of a paper supporting the policy of the administration, I felt, as was natural, some interest in the events which he was about to leave, and which were yet to transpire. I asked Mr. Van Buren who was to take the place of Mr. McLane at the court of St. James? He replied that he had the offer of the mission, but that he was yet undecided as to the propriety of accepting it. He said his friends were of different opinions as to the policy of leaving the country at that time, there being some arrangements to make in the republican party for future operations. He observed that he was anxious to have an interview with Mr. McLane before leaving, if the subject could elude to go. On being interrogated by me as to the real causes of the dissolution of the cabinet, whether it was, as had been alleged by some of the editors, caused by Mrs. Eaton, or by a mutual dissension among the heads of departments? He answered, that Mrs. Eaton had no agency in the matter, but that it was caused more by the conduct of Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Ingham, who desired the retirement of gen. Jackson from office at the expiration of the first four years of his term of service, and who had endeavored ed to consummate their designs by traducing the character of a chaste and virtuous woman. On remarking to Mr. Van Buren that I thought he had managed well to pass unscathed through the fiery ordeal, he laughingly replied, "Yes, I had seen for some two or three months the approach of trouble, and that a dissolution of the cabinet must ensue—the materials of which it was composed were too discordant to continue together in harmony—and, to save myself I thought it better to retire in time, knowing that it lied the way, the rest must follow."

There, I believe, sir, if not the very expressions, are at least the substance of Mr. Van Buren's remarks to me. I must be permitted again to express my regret at being thus called on. Having been an original supporter of the pretensions of general Jackson to the presidency, and a faithful approver of those of his acts which I deemed correct, and being now in retirement, I most sincerely deplore the occurrence of any circumstance which could draw me before the public in an attitude that may appear so unfriendly to the administration. But, however unpleasant the task, when high and responsible men call on me, and duty demands a compliance with their call, mine is not the province to refuse.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
Hon. G. Poinsett.

SAMUEL E. CLEMENT.

Remarks of Mr. Forayth.

[Mr. Forayth makes no apology for the rough sketch he presents of the remarks made by him in the secret sessions of the senate, on the nomination of Mr. Van Buren. The speeches against a nomination having been, for the first time in the history of this government, thrown upon the people, it is due to the person assailed, that what was suggested on the other side should be known. Mr. Forayth is well aware that, in executing his part of this duty, he has done justice neither to the subject nor to himself.]

I regret Mr. President, that the senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Poinsett], has been so long absent from his seat, not only because he has been suffering pain, but because that he been here, he could have escaped the commission of numerous errors into which he has been led. The friends of Mr. Van Buren have not obstructed inquiry into his conduct; they have challenged investigation, offered it in every and any form consistent with the obligations of the senate to its own character. The senator from Maine, [Mr. Holmes], shrunk from his own resolution. It was laid aside by the votes of those opposed, contrary to the votes and wishes of the friends of those friendly to the nomination. That senator was distinctly invited by one of the senators of New York, [Mr. Marcy], to specify any act dishonorable to the character of Mr. Van Buren, and a pledge given that the inquiry into it should be made in the simplest manner by a committee having all the powers necessary to the establishment of truth. The senator from Maine was distinctly told by the senator from S. Carolina, [Mr. Hayne], on what terms he could command his vote. He was told to cover the ground indicated, by proof, and he would join in the condemnation of the choice of the president. The senator from Maine deliberated on this offer, and, after deliberation, abandoned his resolution, leaving all to grapple their way to a conclusion, as accident or prejudice might direct them. A promise was made, that he should have a committee if he would venture upon it, and the offer was deliberately and most unequivocally declined. Yet, after all this, at this eleventh hour, the senator from Mississippi says, if the friends of Mr. Van Buren will solicit a committee, he will give us what he has collected, while confined to his sick chamber, and on which his own opinion is formed, and if the committee is not raised, he will, with this matter in his pocket, vote against the nomination, in order to preserve the morality of the nation, endangered by the bestowal of a new office on a gambling politician.

As the friend, personal and political, of Mr. Van Buren, I reject the liberal offer of the senator, in defiance of his threatened outrage upon the nomination.—Let him unite with those who, like him, are so anxious to preserve the morality of the country by rejecting a man whose most odious crime is his rising popularity and transcendent ability. The friends of Mr. Van Buren will not degrade him by asking a committee, to free him from the suspicions engendered in the senator's mind, in his search after correct information, from sources within his reach. His character wants no such justification. Does the gentleman wish to justify his vote? Let him propose a committee; he shall have our concurrence. Does he desire to convince the senate? Let him produce the private source. Information which, I venture to say, like the only one he speaks of openly, is worthless in the eye of any man who is not embittered by prejudice that he can not see truth. This letter, by a former partizan, a paltry editor of a paltry newspaper, and to prove what? that Mr. Van Buren said that the late cabinet was dissolved by the conspiracy of the vice president, to drive him. Eaton from the cabinet, and that he withdrew to escape the consequences of the dissolution. Sir, Mr. Van Buren holds no such conversations with persons who were once his partizans, and now his enemies.

But supposing he had declared, or does entertain, the opinion imputed to him. Is it a crime which disqualifies him for a high office, that he believes the charge made and sought to be established by the late secretary of war? If such be the senator's opinion, can he tell us how far the exclusion extends? The senator's letter story is contradicted by his previously expressed opinion. What, sir, the most artful man in the world, proclaim to a paltry editor that he acted in the manner indicated, to escape the storm consequent on the dissolution of the cabinet? If it had been true—if such had been his motive, he would have sought to conceal it from himself. No degree of confidential intimacy could have tempted an artful intriguer to such a disclosure. The story if true, proves a man, whose extraordinary prudence, under all circumstances, through a long life in the stormy politics of a vexed and turbulent state, has gained him the confidence of his friends, and called down upon him the charge of consummate artifice from his enemies, to be a silly driveller—a simpleton, opening his hudget of petty motives to one whose trade was, to thrive by making himself important by confidential and oracular disclosures in his unknown journal.

Mr. Van Buren stands in a strange condition before us; from the beginning of this administration, before he came to the post assigned to him, until the present hour, he is held accountable by a certain description of political men in this country for all the evil that has been done and all the good that has been done.

Now, sir,—if he is accountable for every thing, if his hand is to be traced every where, let him have credit for the good that has, and the evil that has not, been done. Balance the account of the admitted good and evil reported, and the result will fill the hearts of his enemies with the bitterest disappointment. But, sir, this is not the justice intended for him. He is responsible for all that is complained of. Let us see the senator from Mississippi (Mr. Poindexter's) catalogue. There were no cabinet councils—Did the country suffer from this failure to follow the example of late administrations, from this adherence to the example of gen. Washington. But there was one cabinet council called to set on a lady's reputation. Indeed; and this Mr. Van Buren is also answerable for; and is it true, sir, that the honorable members of the late cabinet, who remained so tranquilly at their posts enjoying all their emoluments and honors with becoming gratification, suffered themselves to be deprived of their accustomed rights of a seat and voice at the council board of deliberations on great matters of vital interest to the public, and yet obeyed the beck and call of Mr. Van Buren, to set upon a lady's reputation? Of what stuff were they made, that they did not distinctly ascertain if this restriction of claimed right, and this insulting call upon them to step out of their appropriate spheres, was the work of Mr. Van Buren or the act of the president. If the first, why did they not demand his dismission, and, if refused, indignantly throw their commissions in the teeth of the chief magistrate. The omitted cabinet councils, and the single call, were no such dreadful offences until obliged to follow Mr. Van Buren's example and resign. The history of last year establishes the wisdom of the president in calling no cabinet council to deliberate, as there could have been no harmony in their consultations, and on the single question said to have been submitted the ex-cabinet have shown themselves incompetent to decide. He is not competent to decide on a lady's reputation, who throws out of view, on the question of how she should be treated, her guilt or innocence. I will not condescend further to refer to the trash with which the public press has been loaded and polluted for months, and unless the report from Mississippi has better evidence than the public has yet seen, the hope of impeaching Mr. Van Buren in the disturbances that preceded the dissolution of the cabinet, is forlorn. Let us see the next crime in the catalogue of the senator from Mississippi (Mr. Poindexter). Mr. Van Buren intrigued the dissolution of the late cabinet, taking care previously to secure a safe and prominent retreat in the mission to England. It is known to every well informed man in this district that Mr. Van Buren, by his admirable temper, his conciliating manners and unwearied exertions, kept the cabinet together long after its discordant materials were so well ascertained that its dissolution sooner or later was a matter of common speculation. Sir, nobody doubted that the parties could not get on together, and the only surprise was, that the president did not proceed to restore harmony by the removal of those whose disagreements produced the discord. But Mr. Van Buren had the unparalleled effrontery to resign on motives of delicacy and disinterestedness, and as this mode of conduct was so unusual it has excited a vast deal of surmise and wonder. The senator from Mississippi (Mr. P.) has however satisfactorily to himself solved the mystery. Mr. Van Buren arranged himself into a prominent place before he resigned, and a new cabinet to suit his ambitious views. Now, sir, as to the proof of this pre-concerted arrangement for his accommodation and elevation.—The president told somebody who was a late secretary, that Mr. Van Buren was to go to England, and named to him the secretaries, who were to come in; but this was after Mr. Van Buren had resigned. In the interview, it is acknowledged that Mr. Van Buren's letter of resignation was handed to this volunteer repeater of confidential conversation with the chief magistrate.* But

*Since the preceding was in type, the following has been received, and we cannot well do otherwise than publish it,—that a fair view of the case may be presented, without comment.

From the U. States' Telegraph of February 9.

The subjoined are copies of notes which have passed between governors Branch and Forsyth, through our hands, as the friends of those gentlemen.

SAMUEL P. CARSON,

WM. S. ARCHER.

Washington City, Feb. 8th, 1832.

Sir: I have read the printed report of your speech, prepared by you for the press, purporting to be the remarks which you made in the senate in secret session, on the nomination of Martin Van Buren as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. James. The notice which you take of a conversation referred to in the debate by Mr. Poindexter, senator from Mississippi, requires that I should ask of you to state to me, explicitly, whether you did or did not know, or had reason to believe, at the time you wrote out your speech for publication, that I was the "somebody, one of the late secretaries" to whom you refer as the volunteer repeater of confidential conversations with the chief magistrate? Your reply to this communication will regulate my future action on this subject. I am, respectfully, yours, &c.

JOHN BRANCH.

Hon. John Forsyth.

Washington Feb. 8th, 1832.

Dear Sir: Although perfectly satisfied with your verbal declaration, on reflection since we separated this morning, I think it indispensable that the concluding paragraph in the enclosed letter should be omitted, or that your remarks to me on the subject of it should be in writing before an answer to it is transmitted to you. I return it to you to adopt either course that may be most agreeable to you. I am, dear sir, very sincerely,

JOHN FORSYTH.

Hon. Mr. Carson.

House of Representatives, Feb. 6th, 1832.

Dear Sir: If the simple interrogatory contained in the letter of governor Branch, would be more acceptable to you without the paragraph with which it concludes, I am authorized as his friend, to state to you that that paragraph may be considered as stricken from his note, not deeming it essential to the substance of his inquiry.

Very respectfully,

SAML. P. CARSON.

Hon. John Forsyth.

P. S.—Your note was not handed me till this day, since the meeting of the House.

Washington, Feb. 6, 1832.

Sir: I have received your note by col. Carson. The remarks of mine, to which you point my attention, were made in answer to Mr. Poindexter, and intended to apply to the person referred to by him, without knowledge of that person, on my part, then, or at the time my remarks were prepared for the press. I am, very respectfully, yours, &c.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Hon. Mr. Branch.

Washington, Feb. 7, 1832.

Sir: In your answer to my note by col. Carson, you state that you did not know that I was the person referred to by governor Poindexter as having held a conversation with the president. It the senator says it was before the letter was published—thence he concludes Mr. Van Buren had made a cat's paw of the president, for the promotion of his own views: a most logical inference, truly. And this new edict arranged to further Mr. Van Buren's unholy ambition. Is there man, woman, or child in the country, who does not know and feel that the change has been beneficial to the public, that there is now more strength, more virtue, and more harmony than there was before? Is there any man who will hazard his reputation, by asserting that the present secretaries are capable of being made the instruments of any man's ambition, or so subject to the undue bias of individual influence, as the late? Partizans are not substituted for pure, disinterested patriots; and let me say, sir, that more partizans have gone out than have come in. But this mission to England was not sought by Mr. Van Buren: his friends know that it was pressed on him by the president, and that it was reluctantly accepted at the earnest solicitations of friends who were satisfied it would promote his own reputation, and redound to the honor and welfare of the nation. I will not follow, further, the senator's lead. Long known to me as a politician and as a man, acting together in the hour of political adversity, when we had lost all but our honor—a witness of his movements when elevated to power, and in the possession of the confidence of the chief magistrate, and of the great majority of the people, I have never witnessed aught in Mr. Van Buren which requires concealment, isolation or coloring—never any thing to lessen his character as a patriot and as a man—noting which he might not desire to see exposed to the scrutiny of every member of this body, with the calm confidence of unsullied integrity. He is called an artful man—a giant of artifice—a wily magician. From whom does he receive these opprobrious names? From open enemies and pretended friends. In the midst of all the charges that have been brought against him, in shapes more varying than those of Proteus, and thick as the autumnal leaves that strew the vale of Valambrosa, where is the false friend or malignant enemy that has fixed upon him one dishonorable or degrading act? If innocent of artifice, if governed by a high sense of honor, and regulating his conduct by elevated principles, this is not wonderful; but, if the result of skill, of the ars celare artem, he must be more cunning than the devil himself, to have thus avoided the snares of enemies and the treachery of pretended friends.

It is not possible, sir, that he should have escaped, had he been otherwise than pure. Those, ignorant of his unrivalled knowledge of human character, his power of penetrating into the designs, and defeating the purposes of his adversaries, seeing his rapid advance to public honors, and popular confidence, impute to art what is a natural result of those simple causes. Extraordinary talent, untiring industry, incessant vigilance, the happiest temper which success cannot corrupt nor disappointment sour; these are the sources of his unexampled success,—the magic arts—the artifices of intrigue, to which only he has resorted in his eventful life. Those who envy his success, may learn wisdom from his example.

Having disposed of the catalogue of the senator from Mississippi, let me advert to the grounds occupied by a being now made known to you that I was the person, I wish to inquire whether you feel yourself at liberty to disavow the application of those remarks to me. I am, respectfully, &c.

JOHN BRANCH.

Hon. John Forsyth

— Washington, Feb. 7th, 1832.

Sir: Your note of this morning informs me that you were the person referred to by Mr. Poinexter in the observations alluded to in our former notes, and inquires whether I feel at liberty to disclaim the application to you of my remarks in reply.

Having submitted the subject to some of my friends, who unite in thinking that the inference from the observations of Mr. Poinexter, under which my remarks were made, that the conversation referred to had been confidential, was not warranted, and satisfied that the view of the subject is correct, I have no hesitation in disclaiming the application to you of the charge imported by these remarks, of having repeated a confidential conversation. I am, respectfully, &c.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Hon. John Branch, house of representatives.

Mr. Carson respectfully requests those editors who have published the remarks of gov. Forsyth on Mr. Van Buren's nomination, to publish, also, this correspondence.

little army of objections on the other side of this chamber.—How many sacrifices of feeling to duty? are we not about to witness it all? The honorable senators, of Maryland, Connecticut, Delaware, Massachusetts, Ohio and Kentucky, are constrained by duty to vote against his nomination—and all, on public grounds—no private feelings; oh no! nothing like it: public duty against private feeling, is the order of the day. And what is the dreadful public crime he, Mr. Van Buren, has committed? Hear—sir, hear. He has degraded the country by giving instructions to the late minister to Great Britain, Mr. McLane, about the West India trade. What instructions? Can it be those on which the act of 1830 passed—those which have been among our printed documents for those twelve months, forming part of the president's communication to congress of Jan. 1831? Have those honorable gentlemen who are now so shocked at the public degradation, so eager to punish the author of this national disgrace, been sleeping at their posts?—no one to cry out to ring the alarm at the dangers to which the public honor was exposed?—no one to interfere to prevent the United States from being placed at the foot-stool of the British throne? Quietly witness the consummation of the crime, passing an act with the knowledge of these instructions, to secure the boon, which they now see was begged in the name of party from the British crown; we are now electrified by bursts of indignation at this first act of degradation in the history of American diplomacy. What a spectacle is here!—How long is it since he who was the instrument to bow us down before Great Britain, was unanimously confirmed to a post of honor and important trust? But the instrument by whom he was ordered to act, is to bear the punishment. The author of the instructions, he by whom they were given, is too high to be reached at present; the author of the crime, he who ordered it, escapes—he who commits it, by order, goes free; he who conveys the order, answers for both, and upon his head falls all the indignation of these incensed senators, acting upon public grounds, and reluctantly performing a PAINFUL—PAINFUL—duty!!!

Well, sir, to this degradation. It is found in the instructions of Mr. McLane; and to make out their case, the honorable senators from Massachusetts and Kentucky have given us a sketch of the history of the West India negotiation. Both brought down their narratives to the taunting reply of Mr. Canning to Mr. Gallatin, given during the late administration. From this point, both these honorable senators found it convenient to slide—no, sir, to leap over all intervening events to the instructions to Mr. McLane. With permission, I will fill up this little unimportant chasm. The terms of the British act of parliament not having been accepted by the United States, American vessels were excluded, by an order in council, from the British West India ports. Why this important interest was neglected, we have been just told by the senator from Kentucky, "the late administration were ignorant of the act of parliament until it was casually seen by them." "It was not officially communicated by the English government to our government." "Even when we were colonies, we were not bound by British acts of parliament, unless specially named in them." Indeed! is it possible that the late administration did not know an act of parliament affecting important interests? Where were all our accredited ministers and commercial agents in Great Britain, that this government was not informed of this measure, known to all Europe, and taken advantage of by most of the powers interested in it? But it was not officially communicated to us. Well, sir, was it officially communicated to any other government, interested in its contents as we were?

The British government, I apprehend, would have considered such a communication a gross reflection upon our accredited agents. It would have compelled them to say, in effect, we communicate to you an act, supposing your agents are too negligent of their duty to send it to you. What were our ministers and agents about; how were they employed, that they did not send to their government this important information?

But the last excuse is worse than all, even when colonies, we were not bound by acts of parliament in which we were not named specially.—What a discovery!

and it is concluded from this wise recollection, that we are not now bound to take notice of acts of parliament not specially and officially communicated to us. I imagine we are not bound by them, communicated to us or not, but we are bound to know all those touching our interests, and any administration is severely reprehensible for ignorance of them, and for failing to attend to those that bear injuriously upon the interests of the people. The act was, however, at last known, and when Mr. Gallatin presented himself to negotiate, with instructions to waive all claims that were formerly presented, and had prevented an arrangement, he was tauntingly told, you have lost your day in court—the privilege, the boon, offered, had not been secured by accepting the conditions; we have taken our course, negotiation is not our plan. Well, sir, what said the administration, of which the honorable senator, from Kentucky, formed a part. There was an act of congress, requiring, on the shutting of the British West India ports against us, an interdict by proclamation. Smarting under this taunting refusal to negotiate, what was done? the execution of an act of congress positively directing the proclamation, was suspended by executive authority for two months before the meeting of congress and during the whole succeeding session, to see if congress, who had been prevented the preceding session from legislating—the administration pretering the éclat of a negotiation—could not legislate the executive out of the difficulty into which he had placed the country by negligence, or, if the senator from Kentucky pleases, ignorance of the act of parliament. We all know how that effort terminated.—The two houses disagreed about the mode of effecting the purpose; both, however, willing to take the privilege on the conditions proposed by Great Britain. The senate passed a bill—the house, under the influence of the senator from Massachusetts, amended it, and the question was, whether one or the other oblique path should be trodden. The session terminated without legislative enactment, and then, and not till then, the proclamation of interdiction was issued. Thus, sir, smarting under the taunt of the British minister, our administration left the whole trade in the hands of Great Britain for six or eight months,—sought to cover itself from censure by invoking legislative interposition, and then, was compelled to act on the suspended statute. The interdict being proclaimed, the trade stood upon the very advantageous footing, according to the senator's judgment, which we have lost by the negotiation. Notwithstanding we were enjoying such eminent advantages, the late administration, in spite of the taunt, directed Mr. Gallatin to try again to procure what is now disparaged, by opening the door of the negotiation after it had been shut in his face. He was again repulsed. But this humiliation was not enough; Mr. Barbour was sent to London, and he too had his instructions, and went, cap in hand, knocking at the closed door for negotiation. Sir, he knocked at the door of the British ministry, under circumstances humiliating in the extreme. If a gentleman should go a second time to a house, the proprietor of which, speaking from his window, had directed his porter to deny him the visitor, his visit would have been somewhat like Mr. Barbour's second call.—Yes, sir; yet the humiliation was vain—the second as fruitless as the first.

Such was the condition of this question when general Jackson was placed at the head of the country. One of the first objects of his administration was the recovery of the British West India trade, an arrangement of it upon terms of just reciprocity, satisfactory to both parties, and, therefore, promising to be permanent. Mr. McLane was selected to go to England, and these much abused instructions prepared by the late secretary of state. Let it be remembered, sir, these are instructions from the president of the United States, to the American minister, never intended for the eye of the British government, and which in no other country but ours, would ever have seen the light.

The opening of this negotiation was the chief difficulty. To remove it, two grounds are taken. It will be remembered that our refusal to accede to the terms of the act of parliament, was made the ground of refusing to treat with Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Barbour, both of whom went prepared to offer an arrangement by reciprocal legislation; taking the act of parliament as the British legislation. To obviate the difficulty, after a fair and full history of the transaction, these suggestions are presented to Mr. McLane to be pressed so far as he might deem it useful and proper so to do. If the British persist in refusing to hear you, on this subject, remind them of the circumstances that have occurred of the difference of opinion among ourselves on it; of the abandonment by the administration of those pretences that had prevented an adjustment of it; that they are not to be again brought forward; that the present administration was not amenable to the British government, nor to any other, than the people of the United States, who had passed upon all their acts. Say to the British, if it makes pretensions formerly advanced the pretext for still declining to negotiate, the sensibility of the American people will be deeply awakened.—That the tone of public feeling, by a course so unwise and untenable, will be aggravated by the known fact that Great Britain had opened her colonial ports to Russia and France, notwithstanding a similar omission on their parts to accede in time, to the terms offered by the act of parliament. And this, sir, is represented as the language of entreaty, as the begging of a boon. This menace of the public indignation; this declaration that the late administration was neither to be censured or praised by foreign nations; was amenable for their conduct to no earthly tribunal but the people of the U. States, is tortured into a claim of privileges, on party grounds for party purposes, and as a disgraceful attempt to throw upon a previous administration unmerited disgrace, for the sake of currying favor with a foreign power, and that power of all others, Great Britain. Great Britain could not resist this frank and open and manly appeal. Committed by their concession in favor of France and Russia, and the ministry distinctly told by Mr. McLane, that he would not remain if they declined negotiation, or placed their refusal upon any other ground than an open declaration, that their interests could not permit them to enter into a reciprocal engagement with the United States, the English cabinet reluctantly yielded; and then came the most odious feature in this transaction, that which has sharpened the intellect of the opposition to discover dishonor, in truth, and a want of dignity, in a frank exposition of facts, its crowning success. Mr. McLane and Mr. Van Buren, under general Jackson, succeeded in effecting an object of public solicitude, that Mr. Adams, and Mr. Clay and Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Barbour could not obtain. The country was humiliated by the preceding administration without success; hence the charge against Mr. Van Buren; hence, the overwhelming anxiety to prove, that the success of the late negotiation has been purchased by humiliation. The British cabinet desired not to make the arrangement, it interfered with great local interests, and if they could, without a manifest and unjust distinction to our prejudice, they would have declined admitting the United States to the privileges granted to the other maritime powers. Not satisfied with his condemnation of Mr. Van Buren's instructions, the senator from Kentucky attempts to show us, by referring to another letter of instructions, how this affair should have been conducted consistently with his ideas of national honor and dignity. The letter from which he has read, to the senate, extracts, is, I think, signed H. Clay. Will the senator tell us, who is responsible for it? If he is, then he exhibits himself in the singular position of a man transparently contrasting the work of his own hand, with that of a rival author. I believe the senator knows that there were two other instructions, written by himself, of a subsequent date, one to Mr. Gallatin after congress failed to legislate, and another to governor Barbour, neither of which is before us, and therefore, not to be contrasted with Mr. Van Buren's work. I am content to shudder by the result of a contrast of the instructions he has condemned, with those he has quoted. Let us see how the gentleman's letter will stand the test of examination. Mr. Gallatin, he says, was not instructed to abandon a right; we were to be at liberty at a more convenient season to resume it. Mr. Gallatin was to give a strong proof of our desire to conciliate by a temporary concession of what we had previously claimed throughout the whole negotiation.

Was Mr. Gallatin instructed to say to the British government, this is a temporary concession? No, sir, he was authorized to waive the claim and make an arrangement on the British basis. Put this into plain language, and what was it? strip it of its diplomatic drapery and verbiage, and it is neither more nor less than an abandonment of a pretension which, though we had supported by argument, we were resolved not to enforce by power. Sir, this covering up of a plain truth is the common trick of diplomacy; it deceives no one, and had Mr. Gallatin presented these conciliatory concessions, they must have been received as a virtual and total abandonment of our pretension. The honeyed words of right, waived from a conciliatory spirit, and with the hope of corresponding friendly dispositions, would have been received with a sneer, lurking in the official—artificial smile of a—thoroughbred diplomatist. The senator insists, however, it was a right and not a pretension. If it was a right, why was it waived or surrendered?—For conciliation's sake. Why, sir, we were the offended party—England had taunted us. England had refused once, twice, thrice to negotiate, and yet to conciliate England, we were waiving a well grounded right. For what purpose were we thus conciliating? To place the trade on its present footing, to the great injury of the navigation and commerce of the United States.—Such is the view now taken by several honorable senators who have favored us with their opinions on this subject. The present administration waived no right for conciliation's sake, sacrificed no principle. It stood upon the truth, and the truth only; and whatever may be the custom of others, and the ordinary usages of diplomacy, the administration was right. Nations told themselves in the robes of falsehood, and swell and strut in vain—to preserve an air of dignity and decorum. No nation ever was just to its own character, or preserved its dignity, that did not stand at all times before the world, in the sober and simple garb of truth. Sir, the character of our diplomacy has undergone a marked change; we are no longer pretenders to skill and artifice; all our wiles are facts and reasons, all our artifice, truth and justice. The honorable senator tells us that this instruction is false, or else it proves Mr. V. B. to have been criminally ignorant of what it was his duty to know.

How does he make this appear? he alleges that Mr. V. B. charged the late administration with being the first to advance the pretension it subsequently abandoned—and this he declares is untrue, the pretension was set up before the late administration came into power. Now, sir, as I read this paragraph, Mr. V. B. does not charge the late administration with being the first to advance this pretension. The senator will recollect this is a letter to Mr. McLane, whose personal knowledge is appealed to, and who must have understood the writer as alluding to a fact of general notoriety, the words are "those who first advanced, &c." have subsequently abandoned. Can any man mistake the meaning—the meaning is perfectly in accordance with the fact? The pretension was advanced by the use of the famous elsewhere in our act of congress. An act known to have been penned by Mr. Adams, who had previously occupied the ground covered by it, in his instructions to Mr. Rush. It was Mr. Adams who first advanced and abandoned this ground. The credit or the odium, whichever term belongs in justice to the act, attaches to Mr. Adams, and so Mr. McL. could only have understood it, and so must the senator from Kentucky, if he examines with a desire to understand it on the spirit of the author. There are considerations connected with Mr. V. B. if I deemed it consistent with his honor, that I could present to those that hear me, that would not fail to make a deep impression upon their minds. But I ask no remembrance of his forbearance, no recollection of his magnanimity, I appeal to no one to imitate his mildness and courtesy and kindness in his deportment here, nor to judge him, as he judged his rivals for fame and power. I demand for him, nothing but justice—harsh—harsh justice.

Remarks of Mr. Frelinghuysen.

I beg the indulgence of the senate, barely to state the reasons of the vote, that I shall give on the nomination before us. In this, I regard Mr. Van Buren as a public man, and my reasons for withholding my advice and consent to his nomination are public reasons. They are purely national, in which neither party nor prejudice have place. I feel the weight of all that responsibility, to be increased by the important measure of recalling a foreign minister for causes that implicate him in public censure; but I also feel fully sustained by the considerations that shall influence my vote.

Sir, the true interests of the nation require a minister that will represent his country, and not merely advance his party. We want a minister of that lofty character, who will the moment his mission commences, drop the habiliments of party, and robe himself in the pure and loyal vestments of his country—his undivided country. I desire such a man to go forth, forgetting all the strifes at home, and remember only that he is an American minister, and to act upon American principles. But, when we perceive the gentleman, now before us, deliberately at his bureau, instructing our minister to a foreign court to call to his aid in conducting our negotiations the results of our political contests, I have good cause to fear that he does not possess those elevated principles, that will dispose him to reject the counsels which he so freely and so anxiously communicates to others.

In the instructions prepared and given by Mr. Van Buren to Mr. McLane, we have evidence not to be mistaken, of Mr. Van Buren's policy. And it is so purely selfish, as to absorb all considerations of country. It is so devoid of American spirit and character, that I am compelled, by a high and solemn sense of duty, to bear a decided protest against it.

What is the scope of these instructions? As I understand them, they distinctly direct our minister to employ the influence of party, and of his party too. They commission him to apprise the British court of the character of our political collisions, and especially to let him know who triumphed and who were defeated. Sir, it is humiliating to think of it. These instructions urged our minister to put his party in the right and the country in the wrong—to refer the British minister to the results of the ballot box here, and to press upon that cabinet the vicissitudes of our political controversies—our own domestic differences, as motives to persuade them—to what, sir? Why, plainly, to grant that favor, to extend that privilege, to his now dominant party, that was refused to those in whose keeping the arrangement of American interests had theretofore been confided. This is the first attempt, in our diplomacy with foreign states, to separate the administration of the country from the country. How wanting in all justice, as well as magnanimity, was it, to make this dangerous and unwarrantable assumption, a plea, with any foreign court? Sir, who is, by our constitution, who alone can be our public organ, but "the administration?" And yet hear a clause of these instructions. Mr. Van Buren really argues the point: "to set up," he proceeds, "the acts of the late administration, as the cause of the forfeiture of privileges, which would otherwise be extended to the people of the United States, would, under existing circumstances, be unjust in itself," &c. &c. Wherefore unjust under existing circumstances? Because, as before stated, we, that is we, the new men, now in power, did not participate in the acts of the late administration, and, therefore, we humbly hope, that we may be spared the forfeiture of these privileges. This, with other portions of this extraordinary document, is so humiliating to our national character, that I cannot consent to enunciate it by advising the president to appoint Mr. Van Buren to the very court at which he has humbled us. No, sir; let us rather meet the case at the threshold, with our unqualified disapprobation, and never suffer it to grow into the authority of precedent by our acquiescence.

Why, sir, the consequence of such a course of diplomacy would be most disastrous—it would perpetually distract our public counsels on every change of administration—nay, on every prospect of a change—on every commotion in the country that might indicate it, we should be driven by such measures, to entertain a stronger jealousy of our diplomatic functionaries abroad, than of the courts and nations to which they were sent.

Are we prepared to say, sir, and have it understood, that our political conflicts are to leave our own shores, and cast their influence abroad? That our ministers are to become the agents of a party, and drive its purposes in such manner and by such means as they deem fit? I trust not. Let us preserve the honorable and manly character of our foreign intercourse; and expect and require that our ministers shall, in their discussions and conduct, act for their country; and not make a foreign court the arena on which to play off the intrigues or push the interests of a party.

Remarks of Mr. Moore.

Mr. President: I do not now rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate. Under all the circumstances of the case, notwithstanding the able views which have been presented, and the impotence of the senate, I feel it a duty incumbent upon me, not only in justification of myself, and of the motives which govern me in the vote which I am about to give, but also in justice to the free and independent people whom I have the honor, in part, to represent, that I should set forth the reasons which have reluctantly compelled me to oppose the confirmation of the present nominee. Sir, it is proper I should declare that the evidences adduced against the character and conduct of the late secretary of state, and the sources from whence this evidence emanates, have made an impression upon my mind, that will require of me, in the conscientious, though painful discharge of my duty, to record my vote against his nomination. But, let it not be understood, that I am opposed to the executive, or his administration. On slight grounds I am incapable of assuming such an attitude; for, sir, I have the honor of having been associated with my fellow-citizens in elevating general Jackson to the presidency; and the broad principles which elevated him to office continue the beacon lights of my political course. And, sir, it must be remembered, that the proud people whose representative I am, are too patriotic to wink at the compromise of the nation's honor; too virtuous to encourage intrigue and corruption, and too honest to withhold their approbation from a faithful discharge of public duty. In the name of this people, then, whose servant I rejoice to call myself, as far as my vote may go, I shall protest against that highly reprehensible course of conduct which has been pursued by the nominee. I repeat, sir, that the vote I shall give does not proceed from hostility to the executive. I came here prepared, and am now disposed to give a liberal and generous support to the great leading measures of his administration. It is, therefore, with no small degree of satisfaction, that I can recur to my cordial support of most of those measures and nominations which have passed in review before the senate; and especially the nominations of his cabinet ministers; and I am now, sir, free to state, that my vote shall be given for Martin Van Buren, as minister to England, if the charges which shall have been preferred against him shall by any means be weakened, or done away. As the friend of Andrew Jackson, I have been, and am still, disposed to prosecute this inquiry into the truth of the charges, believing that it is due both to the president and to the nominee, that every gentleman present should be fully satisfied of the correctness of his vote. No man in the nation can boast sincerer friendship for the executive than I am; no man in the dark hour of trial was more fervent in his support, (for I was an original advocate of his claims.) But, sir, I cannot obey the slavish dictates of party discipline. I am constrained to yield to the deliberate convictions of my conscientious judgment. When my reason is convinced, I dare not disregard her mandates.

Sir, as has been remarked by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Chambers) I too, am aware of the danger to which my vote may subject me.—For, sir, it is my fate to have bitter enemies; but, sir, it is my peculiar fortune to be able to boast of the most sincere and warmest friends. I am also aware that the malignity of those who cannot appreciate the obligations of an honest motive, may cause them to hurl the shafts of calumny against me, and attempt to prejudice the minds of my constituents. I am aware, too, that there are those whose minds are narrowed to the confines of party predilections, on whom those assaults may prove successful. I am also aware of my misfortune in differing with my honorable colleague, and that the motives which have induced me to assume my stand, may be utterly misrepresented. However, after due deliberation and reflection, and under a strong impression of my high responsibilities, and with a perfect conviction of the approbation of my conscience, and my constituents, no satisfactory explanation of the weighty charges alleged against him having been given, I am compelled to record my vote against the nomination.

MISCELLANEOUS ARTICLES.

THE current volume of the REGISTER will close on the last Saturday of the present month, when a good opportunity will be afforded to those who may be willing to assist in giving it a new dress, as is intended, or in defraying the extra expenses that must be incurred to keep up the record of important things, as well as to discuss general subjects, as usual.

Mr. VAN BUREN. Some of the facts brought out, in consequence of the late rejection of this gentleman by the senate of the United States, have uncommon interest, because of the excitements of party; but we cannot attend to them until our columns are relieved of the debate; and then they may be registered.

Meetings have been held at Albany, New York and Philadelphia, disapproving the rejection of Mr. Van Buren. There was no meeting held in South Carolina or Ohio to disapprove of the record of Messrs. Middleton and Harrison, and the supply of their places by Mr. John Randolph and Mr. Thomas P. Moore. And a meeting has also been held at New York to support the "constitutional right of the senate," as to the rejection of Mr. Van Buren.

There were two meetings at New York against the senate, and both are called "failures." The "Sentinel" states that that at Philadelphia did not exceed four hundred persons, "at most"—and decidedly says that Mr. Dallas or Mr. Wilkins will receive the Pennsylvania nomination for vice president, by the convention that is to assemble on the 5th of next month.

MR. HAYNE, in his explanation about the editor of this paper, &c., took the opportunity to modify his proposed amendment to Mr. Clay's resolution. In a more full report of his remarks, he is made to have said—"That amendment had been originally intended to embrace what he understood would be the proposition of the Free Trade Convention. He had understood, however, since, that it varied somewhat from that proposition; and when he should be made acquainted with the precise character of the views presented in the memorial of that convention, he should probably modify his amendment so as to conform to them."

We only ask that Mr. Hayne will not object to the proposition of any gentleman who shall model his plan after the views of the New York Convention—because thinking it wrong that the opinions of that body should be plainly introduced to the consideration of the senate! We make this remark, because general Smith could see "lobby members" from the latter, but none from the former body of individuals. So wide is the difference between men and things.

What we said of the act of 1828, shall not be retired from. It was intended by many that no tariff bill should be passed at that session, though they quailed at the responsibility of the year and days, and made reward calculations that the eastern members would reject it, because they had rendered it offensive to them—and so it nearly happened. We refer Mr. Hayne to the opinions of his friends, Messrs. Gilmer, Cambreleng, and others, on this point. They are on record. We saw the wand of the "magician" at the time allotted to—and well knew the game that was playing to defeat the passage of any bill concerning the tariff, while pretending to an ardent zeal for the support of domestic industry; thus to tickle the people, but perfect the "combinations" which Gov. Floyd spoke of. Most of the puppets used on this occasion, are heard of no more. They served the purpose, and have been cast aside among the old rubbish—the discarded cups and balls of the wire-workers of that day.

The act of 1828 was not such as we wished it should have been; and we doubted whether there was not more evil than good in it, but it was thought best to take it, with a view to future amendments, and it was improved in the senate. But in certain respects, (such is the elasticity of the American people) that they have partially accommodated themselves so as to reduce the evil,—and make the most of the good; and after a while, perhaps, the law of 1828, with a few exceptions, and new enactments to prevent frauds, may do very well.

CHARLESTON. Mr. Hayne's remarks on the reduced tonnage owned at Charleston, and Mr. Clay's reply, give more than usual interest to the following facts derived from an official account of the foreign arrivals and departures of vessels, at that port, for the last three months of 1831.

Balance in favor of foreign vessels

The preceding is abstracted from the official report of "Samuel Alexander, harbor master," of Charleston, and presents a beautiful specimen of "free trade!" Yet Mr. Hayne complains of the decline of Charleston,—and that her last ship was sold, sometime ago.

JOURNEMEN TAILORS. Among the laughable movements of the times, is the petition of some journeymen tailors of Philadelphia to congress, for a reduction of the duty on woollen cloths! They are protected by an efficient duty of 50 per cent.—and the price paid for their labor is more than twice as high as in London. When we shall agree to reduce the duty on cloths, to the ruin or loss of the wool grower and manufacturer, and the sacrifice of scores of millions of dollars vested by them, we shall certainly take off the duty assessed on British ready-made cloths. It right to pay the taxes and tythes of British farmers, and manufacturers of cloths—it must needs be right also to employ British tailors.

MR. CLAY'S SPEECH. The "National Intelligencer" of Tuesday last says—

Nearly the whole of yesterday's sitting of the senate was occupied by Mr. Clay in the conclusion of his argument on the tariff. He spoke more than three hours, and was briefly replied to by Mr. Smith, of Maryland, between whom and Mr. C. some passages followed, of so warm a character as to call forth the interposition of the chair.

We should have supposed that the public appetite for the debate had been in some degree sated by the previous displays, but yesterday the crowd which pressed into the senate chamber was even greater than on any former day. Indeed, the jam exceeded any thing of the kind which we ever before witnessed. In the galleries, it seemed to us that men literally stood on others' shoulders. Below, the chamber was almost entirely filled with ladies—not seated, for the greater part of them it was impossible to furnish with seats—but standing in compact mass—and this for four or five hours. Truly, one knows not which most to admire in the fair auditory—their intellectual relish or their power of endurance.

[We shall insert this speech, of course, when received, and would gladly give place to Mr. Dickerson's very sensible and strong remarks on the same subject, and shall do it, as well as bring up the lee-way made as to other matters—if there shall be a brief cessation of exciting subjects in congress.]

WOOL. We mentioned in our last that the farmers were protected by an efficient duty of 65 per cent. on wool, and have before us an invoice of three hales of wool received at Baltimore, from Germany. The cost of this wool, as ascertained at the custom house, was $463 40, and the duty and other charges, exclusive of commissions, made an aggregate cost of $791 32, which sum was paid by the importer—or say seventy per cent. advance on the cost.

The natural effect of such protection will be—the abundant growth of wool in our own country, if its manufacture is also efficiently protected; otherwise wool cannot be grown as a "crop." England has nursed her woollen manufactures for more than a century, and they have become strong; but the "free trade" folks will not allow our's even to "cut their eye-teeth," before they would turn them defenceless on the world. As things stand now—it would be a suicidal act to disturb the duty on wool, and nobody thinks of it, except those opposed to the system; even the duty on coarse wool, imposed by the enemies of protection to sink the bill of 1828, has found friends, in the belief that its effect will be a full supply of better articles in lieu of those hitherto made exclusively from it.

COTTON. During a late week, the clearances of cotton at New Orleans amounted to 8,422 bales—of which 3,620 were for Liverpool, 1,106 Grenock, 328 N. York, 1,951 Boston, 396 Baltimore, 713 Portsmouth, N. H. and 303 Providence, R. I. Total to foreign ports 4796—to domestic ports, and chiefly for the factories, 3716. This is a pretty little item.

"SAXON SHEEP." The letter of general James Tallmage, and the case stated by him concerning the fine-wooled Saxon sheep, inserted in the REGISTER of the 14th ult. page 373, has caused the receipt of two communications from practical men, contesting the principles laid down in the article referred to. We desire to give them a speedy insertion, and shall make room for them as soon as we can. The subject is highly interesting, but will not suffer by a little delay.

IMPRESSMENT OF SEAMEN! It is gravely stated in the "Globe," that Mr. Van Buren was commissioned to negotiate concerning the impressment of seamen. We thought that question had been sunk in the ocean with the hulk of the Guerriere, or snugly buried in the swamps of Louisiana; and that the people had fully determined that, on the high seas, the stars and the stripes should protect all sailing under them—and that a search shall not, under any circumstances, be permitted, unless by civil process in British ports, or "fresh pursuit" of deserters. The proposition to negotiate about impressment would seem partially to admit the "right" as claimed by the British—which we regard as altogether inadmissible, and will not agree to consider.

THE CHICKASAW TREATY. The debate on this treaty has been exciting. We intend to publish some of it. The facts disclosed, if they had happened in other times, would have caused no small stir among the people.

THE CHOLERA. The mayor of New York has ordered that, in consequence of the spread of the cholera in Europe, all vessels arriving from ports in the Mediterranean, or the western coast of Europe, including those of Great Britain, shall anchor at quarantine until examined by the health officer.

A summary notice of the spread of the cholera in England, will be found under the head of foreign articles. It has appeared also in the neighborhood of Edinburgh, and fears are entertained that it will become general.

THE SEASON. A letter to the editor from Vermont, dated Jan. 17, says—there had been a severe thaw, which had almost spoiled the sleighing—that the green award was then being ploughed up for the spring crops; for it had not been frozen in the pastures and meadows under the snow, though the preceding month had been the coldest within the recollection of the oldest inhabitants.

THE MAJORITY SYSTEM. There are yet two vacant seats in the house of representatives—one for a member from Massachusetts, and the other for a member from Vermont—because that, as three candidates were voted for in each district, no one had a majority of the whole number of votes, as is required in these states, though some six or eight trials to elect have been made in each, at a great waste of time and money, and excessive harassing of the minds of the people; who are friendly to certain great interests, but cannot agree on the person who shall represent them. It is possible that such vacancies might be the ruin of those interests.

"A RASCAL!" A piece of paper was sent to us the other day from the "lar west," very prettily ornamented and marked as a five dollar bank note. It purported to have been manufactured at the Salem and PHILADELPHIA MANUFACTURING CO. New Jersey—the word "Salem" being printed in small letters, "Philadelphia" in large ones, and the "Manuf" so flourished that they might be taken, on a slight observation, for the letters BANK; and the whole for a note of the Philadelphia Bank.

This paper bears evidence on its own face of a design to deceive. We sent the rogue back from whence he came. Whether the vagabond is from an old swindling shop at Salem, or a new issue, we do not know.

THE SLAVE TRADE. Some of the British vessels on the coast of Africa, being in pursuit of a slave vessel, the villains on board of her threw 180 slaves into the sea, manneled together, four of whom were picked up and saved. We hope that all nations will soon agree to regard this trade out-lawed, so that the simple fact of being caught with slaves on board shall cause the death of every person engaged in the business. A few well-armed vessels would then soon end this inhuman business, and it must be seized with a strong hand.

TAXES—RUINOUS TAXES! Mr. senator Benton, in a report of the debate upon his salt bill in the United States says:—

"The agricultural interests were, however chiefly concerned in the salt duty. In the great region which is watered by the king of rivers, whose essential interest is agriculture, this duty chiefly operates. Through the port of New Orleans, we send thirteen millions of bushels of salt into this region. For the salted provisions put up by the western farmers, the salt which is made by solar heat can alone be used."

"Thirteen millions of bushels of salt! which, until very lately, paid a duty of 20, now 10 cents a bushel,—a tax, of two millions six hundred thousand dollars upon the people of the valley of the Mississippi!—who never use any Kenhawa, or Sandy, or Goose Creek salt, to cure their meats! The senator, of course, speaks of the consumption of a year, for if he talks of the possible consumption of ages, or of a century, he talks nonsense. The whole amount of salt, imported into all the ports of the union, during the year 1830, according to this year's treasury report, (pamphlet p. 84) was five millions, 374 thousand and 46 bushels. Less than one tenth of which, in all probability, was received at New Orleans. But what will the farmers of the west think of the senator's being told, by a western senator, that they use no salt for provisions, but the alum, or hard coarse salt of the West Indies—when they know that there is not one bushel in a thousand of what they use which is not made at some of the works in the western country?"

[Frankfort Com.]

☞ The preceding is not quite equal in "magnitude" to Mr. Cambreleng's creation of 8,648,868 tons for the coasting trade of Great Britain—being, perhaps, the amount of tonnage in all the world—from that of the largest ship thro' floats to the hirc canoe of the Indian—but runs a parallel with some of the famous and "honorable" gentleman's calculations as to the duties that are paid on foreign woollens; and is exactly fitted to some of the statements furnished to the senate of the U. States by an imported friend of American interests, (Mr. Sarchett), no other worker in iron being capable of getting-up the thing so handsomely.

PENNSYLVANIA. The "entire" Democratic convention, which assembled at Harrisburg on the eighth of January, to nominate a governor of the state, electors of president and vice president, &c. and consisting of about, or less, than forty persons, as heretofore mentioned, seems to have entirely failed, by the declination of most of the persons honored with a nomination on that occasion, though regarded as "whole-hog" men—to use the late elegant term of furious party. Among the resigned is the celebrated George Kremer! He "could not go it." The "official organ" for Pennsylvania, the "Inquirer" at Philadelphia, says—"It is only necessary for us here directly to state, that all the resignations that have taken place from either of the tickets nominated by the state convention, have been made by the friends of the governor—men who would rather sacrifice the president than perit the re-election of George Wolf."

The friends of gov. Wolf, however, give us to understand that their opposition is mainly against the succession of Mr. Van Buren to the presidency—which it appears was the real object of the abortive convention to promote.

On the 2d inst. Dr. Burden offered the following resolution in the senate of Pennsylvania:—

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives, &c. that the senators from this state in the congress of the United States be instructed, and the representatives requested to use their exertions to obtain a renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States during the present session of congress, with such alterations, (if any be necessary), as may secure the rights of the state.

When this resolution came up, the speaker of the senate offered the following substitute:—

Whereas, the charter of the United States bank will not expire till the year 1836, and, whereas in re-chartering an institution so important, the utmost circumspection should be used with regard to its provisions, and whereas those provisions would not, in the opinion of this legislature, be well adjusted during a period of high party excitement. Therefore,*

Resolved, That in the opinion of this legislature the present session is not a propitious period for setting on this question.

Resolved, That the attempt by the bank to connect this matter with party politics, is unwise and ought to be repudiated.

Debate followed, and the substitute was lost, only two or three voting for it—and then the resolution passed unanimously; and, being sent to the house of representatives, it was promptly agreed to—77 for, 7 against it. †

The following resolution, which had sometime previous passed the senate, if we recollect right, unanimously, was before the house of representatives on the 3d inst.

Whereas, protecting duties are in strict conformity to the spirit and letter of the constitution of the United States, tend eventually to lower the price of goods, encourage agriculture by creating a home market, give employment to our own citizens in our own country, instead of maintaining the subjects of foreign nations, increase commerce by extending internal trade, and, by affording articles of export, preserve public morals by substituting industry for idleness. And, whereas, under the operation of the tariff, the nation has enjoyed an unexampled degree of prosperity, which can only be perpetuated by a steadfast support of the system:

Therefore, resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in general assembly, met. That it is the opinion of this legislature, that any reduction of duty on articles which enter into competition with such as are produced or ma-

*It has been contended that is a censure on the president, for agitating the question more than two years ago.

†The senate of New York, 20 to 10, have passed a vote against rechartering the bank. It was yet pending in the other house. All the banks in the city of New York have united in a memorial praying that the charter of the bank may be renewed.

manufactured in the United States, would be inimical to the true policy and best interests of the nation.

Several amendments were proposed and put down. One was "that the protection of American manufactures should be fostered as far as is compatible with the peace and harmony of the union," but it was not supported by any other than the mover and seconder. The resolution was passed.

CANADA appears to be very considerably excited. The people are getting warm in several parts of the provinces, and the government is exerting a high hand over them. Mr. Mackenzie, twice elected to the legislature of Upper Canada, has been twice expelled, for alleged libels on the legislature and government; many exciting questions are before the people, contending for more liberal opinions and just practices; and Mr. Mackenzie was about to proceed to England to lay them before the government at home. In Lower Canada, the editors of the Montreal "Vindicator" and of the "Minerva," have been arrested, and, without a jury trial, condemned to imprisonment by the legislative council; and in the house of assembly of this province, it is stated that Mr. Auditor Young threw a candlestick at Mr. Solicitor-general Ogden's head!

Canada contains a large share of the elements of revolution, and they will assume a form and substance at an early day. The officers of the state and in the church, sent out to make money, are, as such persons generally must be exceedingly offensive to the settled population.

JAMAICA was in great alarm and confusion because of insurrectionary movements among the slaves. Martial law had been proclaimed, and the troops were ordered to shoot down all who did not immediately surrender at discretion. Arms had been found in some of the huts, and to a considerable amount. Many plantations had been destroyed. The following proclamation had been issued—Montego bay, head quarters, St. James' Jan. 2, 1832.

To the rebellious slaves,

Negroes—You have taken up arms against your masters, and have burnt and plundered their houses and buildings. Some wicked persons have told you that the king has made you free, and that your masters will hold your freedom from you. In the name of the king, I come among you to tell you you are misled. I bring with me numerous forces to punish the guilty, and all who are found with the rebels will be put to death without mercy. You cannot resist the king's troops. Surrender yourselves and beg that your crime may be pardoned. All who yield themselves up at any military post immediately, provided they are not principals and chiefs in the burnings that have been committed, will receive his majesty's gracious pardon. All who hold out will meet with certain death.

WILLOUGHBY CORROU maj. gen. commanding.

The period may be a little delayed—but nothing is more settled in our judgment, than that a black belt will extend from Cape Antonio, in the island of Cuba, to the southernmost point of Trinidad. "It is as fixed as fate"—and this result had better be calculated than the value of our union!

One account says that the negroes, 15,000 strong, had possession of the interior of Jamaica—if so, and they are resolute, it will be hard to dislodge or destroy them. The history of the Maroons is familiar to every body.

FOREIGN ARTICLES—BRIEF NOTICES.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The British kingdoms are much agitated—to an uncommon degree of privation and suffering and acts of violence, in some parts, are added terrible apprehensions of the cholera, and fearful considerations concerning reform. If the house of lords shall again reject the bill, serious disturbances are expected. The British people were never, perhaps, more excited than at the present time; and it seems very possible that many of their artificial institutions, such as the corn laws, tythes and other monopolies, must soon give way—and "great will be the fall thereof."

We have a long list of places in the vicinity of Sunderland, at which the cholera was raging, though declining in the town just named, seeming to have newly expended itself. These are the chief places mentioned—New Castle, North Shields, Gateshead, Tynemouth, South Shields, Houghton le Spring, Pensher and Haddington—and in Wales. The whole amount of cases, recoveries and death is not easily ascertained—but the reports would show the probable amount of cases up to the 31st Dec. at not less than 1,500, of which more than one-third ended in death. It was observed by a French physician, who had been sent to examine this disease at Sunderland, that "it begins where other diseases end—in death." At Gateshead the disease appeared all at once in the attack of 39 persons—59 new cases were reported on the next day, and about 90 more in two days—of the latter 42 died within these days and 13 recovered. It is insisted that, in one instance, the disease was communicated by rags, &c. Persons of all ages and conditions are attacked—but the chief victims of the cholera are the impecuniate, and its favorite places of resort in filthy streets and among filthy persons.

The British king's speech on the opening of parliament re-urges the reformation of the commons—speaks of the "distress that prevails in many parts of his dominions," and it is severe—acknowledges, with great concern, the existence of the cholera at Sunderland—notices afflictive results in Ireland, because of opposition to the payment of tythes, and suggests that, while the church is protected, something may be done to remove the cause of complaint—mentions the late scenes of violence at Bristol—and throws out a general idea that the peace of Europe will not be interrupted.

The reform bill again passed the British house of commons on the 16th Jan. For it 324, against 162.

There has been a dreadful explosion in a coal mine near Wigan. The depth of the coal from the surface, was 1,245 feet. Twenty-eight persons were killed.

Two ruffians named Bishop and Williams were lately executed at London of "Barking"—that is murdering three persons to sell their bodies to the surgeons; and execution swiftly followed their condemnation. Their practice was to stupefy their victims with rum and laudanum; and then put them head-foremost into a well—when the "business was soon over," and the rum and laudanum discharged, to prevent suspicion. Every thing belonging to these fellows is detailed with John Bull length and eagerness. Tens of thousands attended their trial, tens of thousands their execution; tens of thousands examined their bodies exposed after death, and tens of thousands have visited, with intense curiosity, the scenes of their atrocities. Five guineas were paid for good seats to see the hangings.

Ireland is in a terrible state, because of poverty, oppression and violence. The payment of tythes is resisted in many places. At Waterford, a mob of several thousand persons, many armed with pitchforks, after receiving the fire of the police, which killed three of them, rushed forward and slaughtered fourteen of their enemies, and so badly wounded several others, that they would die. The people seemed converted into savages, from their manglings of the bodies of the police-men.

There has been a great riot at Aberdeen, in which an anatomical theatre was destroyed as a "Barking shop."

O'Connell was attempting to get up a sort of a parliament for Ireland, to meet at Dublin on the 9th Jan. The following is given as an extract from one of his late harangues; he seems resolved to nullify England: "England, strong as she is, with Scotland and Wales pouring in on her—I will give them France too—paltry Spain, Portugal, the states of Italy, and they may add the Russian autocrat; and in opposition to these, let only all the Catholics, Protestants, Presbyterians and Dissenters of Ireland, put shoulder to shoulder in the field, and we will defy them—(Tremendous cheering.) Every mountain in Ireland is a fortification—every road is a defile—(Query, Knockloper?)—and, in fact, such military positions and advantages no country ever had; and it agreed amongst themselves, what country ever had such a garrison?"

The French chamber of peers, 103 against 70, have passed the law which abolishes hereditary peerage in France. This has added fresh fuel to "reform" in England.

There was tumult at Grenoble, but soon suppressed by the military, because of supposed over charges of a tax gatherer.

The French troops on the Belgic frontier are held ready to march at a moment's notice. It is thought that the king of Holland will again appeal to arms.

The proposals of gen. Latsyette to grant civil rights to the Polish refugees in France, had been rejected by an immense majority in the bureau, and will, therefore, not be read in the chamber. Algiers is to be a French colony.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The whole loss of the Russians in the late campaigns in Poland, is put down at 180,000 men—of which the capture of Warsaw cost 30,640. The Russian army in Poland is 150,000 strong. The Poles are governed with a high hand.

Gen. Torrijos, and his party of about 50 men, having left Gibraltar, and being followed by a Spanish armed vessel, were compelled to throw themselves on the coast of Malaga,—where they were captured and shot, amidst the shouts of the people, excited by the monks.

There is a report of a revolution at Rome, in which the pope lost his life, and great excesses were committed.

The cholera had entirely subsided in Egypt. An Egyptian fleet, of seven heavy frigates, seven corvettes, seven brigs and schooners and twelve gun-boats, with many transports, and 3,000 infantry and 1,200 artillery, had sailed for the reduction of St. Jean d'Acre, and expected to proceed to Damascus.

Gen. Bermudez has been assassinated in Cumana by general Carrera, and the people are called upon in a furious handbill to take a general oath to revenge him.

"Ferdinand 2nd, by the grace of God, king of the Two Sicilies, of Jerusalem, &c. &c." has condemned a number of his subjects to death, because of a riot that took place in Palermo. The charge against them was that they had conspired to overthrow the public peace to enrich themselves.

The bank of England had notes amounting to upwards of eighty millions of dollars in circulation, in the year 1830—This circulation was much contracted in 1831.

The loss by the fire at St. Thomas is estimated at between 2 and 3,000,000 dollars. The light was seen 72 miles.

The cholera has committed dreadful ravages in Arabia—its victims are said to have been 45,000, in one month.

The new volcanic island in the Mediterranean was rapidly diminishing, and it was thought would soon disappear.

The number of Poles at present in banishment amount to 62,000.

London was lately enveloped in a fog as dense as any with which it has been visited for years. The mails and other coaches were conducted out of town by men with torches.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

February 3. A report from the navy department concerning seamen on foreign service, was ordered to be printed.

The committee on public lands were discharged from further considering the memorial of the assembly of Indiana, praying that ten years actual settlement on, and cultivation of, lands, should entitle such settlers to the same.

Mr. Hayne reported the bill providing for a revision of the rules and regulations of the naval service, without amendment.

The bill authorising subscription to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company; and the bill to give effect to the commercial arrangement between the United States and the republic of Colombia, were severally read the second time and referred.

On motion of Mr. Foot, the senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Clay's resolution on the subject of the tariff—when

Mr. Clay resumed his argument, and continued speaking until 3 o'clock, when, being exhausted, he asked the further indulgence of the senate—and

The senate adjourned to Monday.

February 5. Mr. Smith presented the memorial of Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, and about two thousand others, praying for the renewal of the charter of the U. States bank.—referred.

Mr. Webster presented a similar memorial from sundry citizens of Massachusetts.

Mr. Chambers presented the resolutions of the legislature of Maryland, recommending the erection of light houses on certain points on the Chesapeake bay.

Mr. Wilkins presented the memorial of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, praying an enlargement of powers.

On motion of Mr. Chambers, the resolution relative to the celebration of Washington's centennial birth day, was taken up; and agreed to—and

On motion of Mr. King, the vice president was unanimously authorised to appoint on the part of the senate, a committee of five members.

The senate then resumed the consideration of Mr. Clay's resolution on the tariff—when Mr. Clay, addressed the senate for about three hours, in conclusion of his speech.

After some remarks from Messrs. Smith and Clay, (which caused the intervention of the chair), Mr. Hill gave notice of his intention to address the senate, and moved an adjournment. Adjourned.

February 7. The journal having been read,

Mr. Tazewell rose and asked to be excused from serving on the committee appointed in conjunction with the committee of the other house, for the purpose of making arrangements for the celebration of the centennial birth day of GEORGE WASHINGTON, the first president of the United States. He had opposed the resolution, though his own vote, and that of two others, who with himself had given dissenting voices, had, from the condition of the senate, not been observed by the presiding officer. He considered that the deputation should express an unanimous opinion in relation to the business on which they were to act, and, as he entertained different views, was compelled to ask the senate to excuse him from serving. Man-worship, how great soever the man, Mr. T. said, he would oppose.

Mr. Tazewell was excused.

Mr. Troup, for similar reasons, was also excused.

Mr. White, of Tennessee, said precisely the same reasons as influenced the gentleman from Virginia, also disqualified him from serving. He had opposed the resolution, and asked to be excused; and was accordingly excused from serving.

Mr. Smith, of Maryland, made a similar request, and was also excused.

The vice president communicated a report from the navy department, and one from the treasury department; the first transmitting a statement of the appropriations for the service of the navy for the year 1831; and the other a statement relative to the affairs of the Bank of the United States, in answer to Mr. Benton's resolution of the 24th ultimo.

Mr. Poindexter presented a memorial from the legislature of the state of Mississippi, praying for a grant of land for purposes of internal improvement.

Mr. Smith, of Maryland, presented the memorial of the Marine Bank of Baltimore, praying for a renewal of the charter of the United States Bank.

Mr. Dallas presented a similar memorial from the Commercial Bank of Pennsylvania. Also, a memorial from sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for legislative interference in behalf of the Cherokee Indians.

Mr. Bell, of New Hampshire, presented a memorial from the Exeter bank of New Hampshire praying for the renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States.

Mr. Hayne made a report recommending surveys to be made of the Narragansett bay, with a view of ascertaining the practicability of establishing a naval depot and expedition post thereon.

The vice president communicated from the war department abstracts of the militia returns for 1831. Also, a report of the commissioners of the sinking fund for the last year.

The bill from the house for the relief of David Darden, was ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Dickerson reported the bill for the reduction of the duties on Indian blankets, and recommended its indefinite postponement.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of Mr. Clay's resolution on the subject of the tariff, and Mr. Hill addressed the senate at length, in reply to Mr. Clay. He was followed by Mr. Mangum, in opposition to the resolution. At a late hour Mr. Mangum, who had not concluded his argument, gave way to a motion to adjourn; and the senate adjourned.

February 8. Mr. Dickerson who had been appointed in the place of Mr. White (excused) on the joint committee to take order for celebrating Washington's centennial birth day, asked to be excused, and was excused accordingly.

The said committee, on the part of the senate, now consists of Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, Mr. Pointexter, Mr. Chambers and Mr. Bibb.

Mr. Sprague submitted the following resolutions: Resolved, That the late "arrangement" made between the executive of the United States and Great Britain, relative to a trade between this country and her colonial possessions, gives to British vessels an advantage in transporting articles to their West India colonies greater than is secured to American vessels, and violates that principle of reciprocity in navigation, which our government has hitherto scrupulously and firmly endeavored to maintain.

Resolved, That said "arrangement," and the president's proclamation of the 5th of October, A. D. 1830, opening the ports of the United States to British vessels, was not authorized by the act of congress of 29th May, 1820.

Mr. Wilkie submitted a resolution relative to appeals to the supreme court of the U. States, in certain cases.

Mr. Dallas moved that the report received yesterday from the secretary of the treasury, in reply to Mr. Beaton's resolution relative to the currency of the U. S. bank, be printed and referred to the select committee on the bank.

Mr. Beaton had drawn a resolution which he submitted, for referring this report, with instructions to inquire into the legality of the orders, issued as currency by the bank to the committee on the judiciary.

A debate ensued, in which Mr. Beaton, Dallas, Smith and Johnson took part.

After despatching some morning business, the senate resumed the resolution of Mr. Clay, relative to the tariff—when

Mr. Mangum rose and addressed the senate about two hours in conclusion of his speech. When he had finished,

The senate spent some time in the consideration of executive business. And then adjourned.

February 9. After the despatch of some morning business,

The senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Clay's resolution respecting the tariff.

Mr. Tyler, of Va. rose and addressed the senate for two hours against the resolution—when being much exhausted from feebleness of health, he gave way to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business—and the senate, after spending some time therein, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Feb. 3. After various reports from committees,

Mr. Thomas, of Lou. moved a joint resolution proposing the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into the expediency of celebrating the centennial birth day of general George Washington.

Mr. Adams suggested the propriety of modifying the resolution by striking out the word "general."

Mr. Thomas accepted the modification.

Mr. Taylor suggested another verbal amendment; which was also accepted.

Mr. Adair, thought it would have been better to retain the word "general" and inserted before it the word "major," so as to read "major general"—as in his opinion the fame of general Washington rested chiefly on his military services.

Mr. Adams replied—he considered the services rendered to the country by general Washington in a civil capacity, quite as important and worthy of commemoration as his military achievements; and that the simple name "George Washington," expressed more than if it were accompanied with a whole volume of titles, civil or military.

The resolution was amended so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That a joint committee of the two houses be appointed, for the purpose of making arrangements for the celebration of the centennial birthday of George Washington.

On motion of Mr. Wickliffe, a committee of twenty-four members, one from each state, was appointed on the part of the house.

Mr. Davis, of Mass. moved a resolution relative to the claims of that state for military services rendered during the late war.

The house then resumed the consideration of Mr. Everett's resolution relative to the Chickasaw treaties—when

Mr. Evans, of Maine, addressed the house in reply to Mr. Clay, of Ala. and Mr. Polk, of Tennessee.

The debate was cut short by a motion to proceed to the orders of the day.

The engrossed bill to pay for David Darden's horse remains, was read the third time and passed.

Several private bills were then severally taken up and disposed of—and the house adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 4. The resolution relative to the Chickasaw treaty was again taken up.

Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, addressed the house in explanation of the circumstances of the transaction—condemned, in the most explicit terms, the conduct both of the commissioners who negotiated the treaty, and of the lessees to whom the reservation of the Chickasaws was leased—yet he declared himself opposed to the inquiry.

Mr. Pendleton, of N. Y. advocated the resolution.

Mr. Clayton, of Georgia, was opposed to the form of the resolution—and offered an amendment denying that treaties made with the Indians do come within the meaning and intention of the constitution conferring the treaty making power on the president and senate; but that they are mere compacts or bargains made by the authority aforesaid.

Mr. Whitless then moved the house to proceed to the orders of the day, which motion prevailing,

Fourteen private bills were considered and severally ordered to a third reading and then the house adjourned.

Monday, Feb. 6. Sundry memorials favorable to the renewal of the charter of the United States Bank, were presented and referred.

The speaker presented a memorial from the Creek Indians—referred.

The supplement to the act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States during the revolutionary war, was made the order of the day for Monday next.

The act relative to the cultivation of the vine and the olive was twice read and committed.

The bill making further provision for the West Point military academy, was committed to the committee on military affairs. The house adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 7. Mr. Sevier moved an inquiry as to the qualification of voters in the territory of Arkansas. On motion of Mr. Wardwell, the committee of internal improvements were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the survey of the entrance of Catfish creek, in the state of New York.

Mr. Anderson submitted a resolution to inquire into the propriety of amending the law relative to the return of destitute seamen.

A message was received from the president on the subject of the regulations of England, France and the Netherlands relative to their fisheries.

The house resumed the consideration of Mr. E. Everett's resolution relative to the Chickasaw treaty.

Mr. Fitzgerald, of Tenn. delivered a short speech against the resolution—and was replied to by Mr. Ellsworth—when

On motion of Mr. Polk, the house proceeded to the consideration of the apportionment bill. The question being to strike out 48,000 and insert 44,000, as the ratio of representation.

The yeas and nays being ordered, Mr. Watmough, of Pa. addressed the house in favor of the low ratio—when he had concluded, a call of the house was ordered—and on the yeas and nays being taken, there were, yeas 88 yeas 102. So the proposed amendment was rejected.

Mr. Clay, of Ala. moved to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "forty-seven"—determined in the negative by a vote of yeas, 65, nays, 127.

Mr. Kerr, of Mil. then moved so to amend the bill as to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "forty-five," but before the question was taken, the house adjourned.

Wednesday Feb. 8. Mr. Drayton made a report accompanied by a bill to prevent the separation of captains in the line of the army from their companies, for the better organization of the United States' military academy, and for other purposes; twice read and committed.

Mr. McDuffie, from the committee of ways and means, reported the following bill:

A bill to reduce and equalize the duties on imports.

Be it enacted, &c. That from and after the 30th day of June next, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, on all iron and steel, salt, sugar, cotton-bagging, hemp, flax, and manufactures of iron, cotton, and wool, imported into the United States, duties of 25 per centum ad valorem, and no more, until the 30th of June 1853; after which the said duties shall be 18½ per centum ad valorem, and no more, until the 30th of June, 1854; after which the said duties shall be 12½ per centum ad valorem, and no more.

And be it enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June next, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all other merchandise imported into the United States, 12½ per centum, ad valorem, and no more; except such articles as are and means not thus injured free of duty, or at a lower rate of ad valorem duty than 12½ per centum.

The above bill (which was twice read and committed) was accompanied by a report of considerable length. When it was announced,

Mr. Ingersoll said he would avail himself of the present moment to state, that he differed to calo from the majority of the committee by whom the report had been made. It was true, he stood in a small minority in the committee of ways and means on this question, only one gentleman (Mr. Gilmore) agreeing with him in committee, in regard to the protective policy of the country. He had heard the report read but once, and had no opportunity to examine it before its introduction, and further time would be necessary before the minority would be able to prepare a counter report. He considered the report and accompanying bill as aiming at the subversion of the manufacturing interests, the great mechanical interests, and, he might add, the navigating interests too, at least so far as the fisheries are concerned.

Mr. Verplanck claimed the right to express his own dissent to the report of the chairman of the committee; he occupied a singular and solitary position; neither agreeing with the views of the majority nor minority. The report contained many principles and arguments with which he agreed; but he protested against much of it, which represents the great burden of the existing tariff laws as falling almost exclusively in heavy taxation upon the planting or cotton exporting states, whilst the northern and middle states received from it nothing but benefits. He made his personal protest now, and should hereafter make a more formal one, by a more formal report. He objected also to the expediency of introducing the bill in its present form; from the sweeping reduction of duties, it offered no satisfactory basis for the final adjustment of the present question.

Mr. Mercer offered a resolution authorizing the printing of the report of a select committee of the house of commons of Great Britain on the use of steam carriages on common roads, with the minutes of evidence and appendix attached thereto.

The house then proceeded to the orders of the day, and after passing a number of private bills, took up the apportionment bill, the question being on striking out "48,000" and inserting "45,000."

On taking the question the motion was lost—yeas 68, nays 118.

A motion to insert "46,000" was also lost.

Mr. Fane then moved that "44,400" be inserted in lieu of "48,000."

Mr. Wickliffe moved a call of the house, which was sustained.

Mr. Adams advocated the amendment in an earnest appeal to the large states, and particularly to Pennsylvania, to sustain the proposed ratio, which would retain for the old states their present number of representatives.

Mr. Coulter replied at some length, and submitted his reasons for resisting the appeal of Mr. A. Mr. Clay and Mr. Polk opposed the amendment, and Mr. Wayne, Mr. Letcher, Mr. Carson and Mr. Slade, advocated it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, there appeared 97 for, and 97 against the amendment.

The house being equally divided, the speaker voted in the affirmative, and decided the question in favor of the amendment.

A motion was then made by Mr. Taylor to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out "44,400" with a view of inserting "53,000," which was finally negatived by a vote of yeas 66, nays 129.

The house the adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 9. Mr. Davis, of S. C. reported a bill making further provision for the naturalization of aliens, twice read and committed.

On motion of Mr. L. Conflict the committee on internal improvements were directed to inquire into the propriety of making an appropriation to defray the expenses of a survey of the river Delaware, with a view to the improvement of its channel from Trenton falls downwards, &c.; for the survey of the river Raritan, with a view to the improvement of the channel from the city of New Brunswick to Perth Amboy, and for the survey of the Passaic river.

On motion of Mr. Doddridge it was resolved to inquire as to the expediency of improving the navigation of the Monongahia river.

Mr. Davis, of S. C. moved the following resolutions; which was read, and laid on the table, viz:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to lay before this house any correspondence or information in his possession, which may, in his opinion, be communicated without injury to the service, showing the actual condition of our diplomatic relations with the government of the republic of Colombia; the present situation of that government, to what extent and on what provisions its authority is recognized, and such other information as may be requisite to direct the judgment of this house in relation to the estimate for the diplomatic service of the U. States, proposing an appropriation for the outfit and salary of a charge des affaires to the republic of Colombia.

On motion of Mr. Holland, the committee on public lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the minimum price of barren lands in Florida.

On motion of Mr. C. P. White, it was Resolved, That the committee of commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, that the ships and vessels of the United States may be registered, enrolled and licensed, de novo; and that the said registers, enrolments, and licenses should be issued without expense to the owners or owners of such ships or vessels. And also, that said committee inquire into the expediency of providing by law, that the account of hospital money receivable from the enrolled and licensed vessels employed in the coasting trade, pursuant to the act of the 16th July, 1798, for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, shall be verified by the oath of the master or commander of said vessel.

Mr. Mercer's resolution offered yesterday, was taken up, and a debate of an hour ensued the resolution was supported by Messrs. Cambreleng, Mercer, and Davis, of Mass., and opposed by Messrs. Mitchell, of S. C. Drayton and Burnwell.

The resolution was adopted by a vote of yeas 120, nays 61.

Messages were received from the president relative to the ratification and exchange of the convention between the United States and France, and the treaty between the United States and the Sublime Porte.

The house took up the apportionment bill, and various amendments were suggested as to the ratio of representation, and arguments had thereon—the house, without coming to any decision, however, adjourned.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 25—VOL. V. BALTIMORE, FEB. 18, 1852. [VOL. XLII. WHOLE No. 1,065

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ We have thought it absolutely necessary to the period of the volume, that a considerable part of this sheet should be yielded to notices of lately passed or current events, anxious as we are to dispose of the debate on the nomination of Mr. Van Buren—this, however, must be concluded with the volume, which will end on Saturday next. To effect this, we shall issue a supplement, and present the remainder of the discussion—presuming that every reader wishes to have and preserve it entire, because of peculiar circumstances belonging to persons and parties concerned. For our part, we have had much recent occasion to wonder at the manner in which this subject has been presented to the public, in many of the newspapers; certain replies to speeches being often given, while the speeches themselves were suppressed! These things chiefly belong to persons who have entered into the business of publishing, unworthily. The regular-bred printer will not dishonor the press in this manner, unless he has received the “pieces of silver” to betray truth—and then will do “by authority,” and to any amount agreed upon, so far as the means are supplied.

¶ In the sheet of the ADDENDUM to the current volume issued with the present number, will be found, among many other valuable articles, an account of certain manufactures in Rhode Island, which will astonish even those who are familiar with the progress and extent, product and importance of the “American System,”—and how that it penetrates and gives life to all the leading employments of the American people—interlocking one interest with another, and binding all in a common prosperity—even the cotton planting! We earnestly invite a careful examination of all the reports made to the New York Convention. Such a body of momentous facts have never been laid before the public, as flow from that assembly.

And, as chairman of the Permanent Committee of the New York Convention, the editor of the REGISTER has received a copy of the report of the committee on the cotton manufactures of the United States, and it shall be published, at full length, as soon as possible. It is a most able and faithful paper—the result of a great expenditure of labor and time, and will reflect lasting honor on the chairman and his valuable colleagues and contributors of information. We shall give the results below: they will startle the opponents of domestic industry, and cheer the hearts of the friends of a system which yields so rich a harvest of prosperity to countless thousands of the free laboring classes, and confers such incalculable benefits on the American nation. It should be observed, however, that the returns are only from twelve states—Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland and Virginia. It is known that there are many establishments in other states; but no returns having been made of them, they are not at all regarded in the aggregates; and these, with respect to the states named, are, no doubt, short of the real amounts.

The preceding includes the work, working people, and the materials consumed, in the machine shops, bleacheries and printeries.

¶ The capital above reported, for good reasons assigned, is thought to be from one-fourth to one-third short of its real amount—the floating capital, in numerous cases, not being added to the cost of lands, improvements and fixtures: so the real capital vested, in the states named, may be nearly sixty millions of dollars.

The spindles reported “building” are manifestly short—for there are no returns from Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland and Virginia—the machine shops of Rhode Island, only, are competent to the supply of 50,000 annually, and there are other large establishments in Pennsylvania, &c. The operating spindles will be greatly increased in the present year—unless because of adverse events; for many new and large factories are preparing.

The quantity of cotton returned as consumed exceeds our previous calculations, being 77,737,316 lbs. or 239,000 bales of 300 lbs. each, or 214,832 bales of the average weight of 361.86-100 lbs. as the committee has, no doubt, correctly estimated them, by actual purchases; for we are told that the bales are better packed than they used to be. The committee has a knowledge of thirty mills not included in the returns, because they had no accurate report from the states in which they are located, and it is possible that many more exist. So it would seem reasonable to believe that the amount of cotton consumed in our own factories, last year, was not less than eighty millions of pounds.

The whole export of cotton was

The first period of years 10 millions less, and the last 34 millions more, than the present amount consumed in the American factories! It would not be rash, we think, to say, that the consumption of the present year, (except because of adverse events), the domestic market, will take off 100,000,000 lbs. cotton! But the present accounts are sufficient to gratify the most sanguine friend of domestic industry, without regarding what they will be.

It may here be well added—that, for the last two years, or more, the demand for cotton for the American factories, has established the price of crops then coming in, and at higher rates than foreign orders were limited at—some gentlemen of New Orleans say from 1 to 2 cents per lb. and we are told that, in numerous cases, the earliest supplies are taken up for the home market. Is this nothing?—And American cotton goods are sold for a little more than one-third of what the foreign cost us in 1818.

But we have not room for further remarks. We recommend this bulky of facts, now for the first time presented to the American public, to the serious and solemn consideration of southern gentlemen—while baring that they are too much heated, or too far committed, to believe, "though one arose from the dead," to show the folly of the conclusions they have arrived at, in respect to a protected industry. We see that almost 150,000 of the free people of the United States are subsisted by a manufacture which consumes nearly one-fourth of the whole product of cotton, and gives a value to that fourth almost equal to that of the entire crop; so that the interest in cotton spinning is equal to the interest in cotton planting, to say nothing of the market which the manufacture affords to the farming interest, which is so restricted, if not absolutely denied, in all parts of the old world.

We shall conclude this brief article by giving the names of the committee on the manufactures of cotton, and the states allotted for their enquiries. They need not any man's enforcement.

For Maine and New Hampshire—Lloyd W. Wells and John Williams.

For Vermont and Massachusetts—Robert Rogers and P. T. Jackson, chairman.

For Rhode Island—James D'Wolf, James F. Simmons and Charles Jackson.

For Connecticut—J. H. De Forrest.

For New York—E. B. Shearman, James Wild and Richard P. Hart.

New Jersey, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, &c.—David Holman and Mark W. Collett.

Pennsylvania, Delaware and Tennessee—Lewis Wain and A. Brackenridge.

Maryland and Virginia—Columbus O'Donnel and James W. McCulloch.

☞ We have a copy of the memorial of the "Free Trade Convention," held at Philadelphia in September last. It takes fifty-five pages of large octavo! What can we do with it? It must, at least, be laid over for a considerable time—because of many previous engagements.

☞ I have an exceeding strong desire to take up the "Exposition," and the "Exposition of evidence!" which have been published at Philadelphia and Boston, respectively—and never were papers presented that might be more completely keel-hauled, or better deserved to be mistle-keas committed or willful errors made—but it is not possible that time or room should be given to this matter now. The chief foundation of all that is said about iron, is from the statements of an Englishman, Mr. Sarchet,—no native American dares make any movement on that subject, but as he lends—being a fine specimen of a free trader—the sulphureous PYTHIA of British makers of iron—whose opinions have the authority of inspiration in an American senate, invited to a consideration of American interests and American feelings—the points made concerning the woollen manufactures appear chiefly such as Mr. Cumbreleng has often presented, and especially when he CREATED, by a congressional report, nearly nine millions of tons of vessels for the British coasting trade, that that of his own country (though larger than the British), might appear insignificant!—and what is said about the domestic production of sugar seems mainly to rest upon the opinions of a West India sugar planter, and so on, perhaps, with respect to every other leading subject touched. If those concerned in the latter have any feeling, they will feel much ashamed of themselves on seeing a review of their "evidence" by a writer in the "National Intelligencer," who signs "Hamden." He has rendered that part of the "exposition" a thing only to be laughed at—and so will other parts of it be speedily rendered.

How WILL IT WORK? It has been generally stated, that the price of every article, the manufacture of which is protected by our tariff, has declined—sometimes said that other manufactures pretty nearly retained their old prices; the object of which was simply to show that increased supply had its natural tendency to reduce price in the first class of articles, while the want of competition kept up the former value of the latter. We hope soon to publish an extensive and curious table, that will show these operations with irresistible power.

We meet with the following in a furious southern "free trade" paper, as excerpt from the "Salem Gazette," a thorough-going advocate of that visionary thing—a creature of theory, found only in the books—and unpractised by any civilized nation in the world, having sea-ports and ships.

Messrs. Editors.—To show the entire absurdity of the idea that the protective system of this country has been the cause of the great reduction in prices, which has taken place since that system went into operation, please publish the following list of prices of articles before that period and at the present time, upon which it cannot be pretended that the tariff has had any effect:

	1816.	1851.
Wool beef, per bbl.	$13 50	$ 8 52
Coffee, short price, per lb.	20	11
Cotton, per lb.	29	9
Codfish, per 112 lbs.	5 00	2 75
Mackerel, per bbl.	14 00	5 52
Hog's lard, per 100 lbs.	17 00	10 00
Pork, mess, per bbl.	23 00	13 75
American brown soap, per lb.	15	5
Pepper, black, per lb.	29	15½
Tallow, per lb.	18	8
Tobacco, Kentucky, per lb.	14	4½
Tea, souchong, per lb.	85	65
Wine, Malaga, per gal. short price	97	39

☞ This is on the "high price"—but it is no matter. The first column, added up, is $75 37, the second $42 25—and it seems that the prices in 1816 were eighty-five per cent. higher than in 1851. Very well. But the south contends, and most decidedly, that it is the tariff which has reduced the price of cotton. Let us see. In 1823, the year before the "abominable tariff," according to the treasury tables, we exported 173,723 (100 lbs. cotton, valued at $1,445,000 dollars, or about 1½ cents per lb.; and in 1850, no less than 298,459,000 lbs. cotton, worth 29,674,000 dollars, or 10 cents per lb. Now, if the facts intended to be so gravely set forth in the "Salem Gazette," are worth one straw, they will show that the present price of cotton, which is about 10 cents, should be only a little more than six cents per lb. But being ten cents, it is manifest that cotton, through such a mighty advance in its quantity has happened, instead of declining 85 per cent. has had a rate of depreciation at only 17½ per cent.

But will the omnipotent cotton interest PERMIT it to be believed, that cotton should be subject to the same laws which regulate the price of all other commodities? We have taken the value from the year before the tariff which was to have destroyed every thing, and two years after the second tariff which was to have been much more wicked than the first. How does it work?

The tariff of 1816 had nothing to do with the price of articles, even if others have had, because of its limited operations, and the business of nations had not then settled down into a peace-establishment.

MR. CLAY'S SPEECH ON THE TARIFF. The public curiosity is greatly excited to see Mr. Clay's late speech in support of his resolution concerning the tariff, and in reply to Mr. Hayne. Those who heard it, and of either party to the question, speak of it as an unsurpassed display of argument and oratory; and, perhaps, have raised the public expectation too high—for, though all the argument of Mr. Clay may be retained and given on paper—it is impossible to present any thing like a correct view of the eloquence and power, the clear and harmonious voice and energetic manner, by which that argument was forced on the minds of a dense and delighted audience, and driven home to the minds of all persons open to an examination of the great truths expounded—for the words which he uttered caused the hearts of many to burn within them; and there is a boldness and self-collectedness in the orator, a daring frankness and freedom of remark, that are peculiarly his own—which must be seen and heard, if appreciated justly; heightened by flashes of wit, promptness in reply, and a countenance that no one can look upon without catching some portion of the zeal with which he supports the great "American System." For instance—in alluding to the government persecutions he had suffered, he exclaimed—"I neither expect the justice of this administration, nor desire its mercy. I scorn its wrath, and I defy its power." And when he had spoken of Mr. Calhoun's opinion in 1816, and the latter replied, "that was a tariff for revenue, not protection; the constitutional question was not debated." "No, sir," rejoined Mr. Clay, "for it was not then considered debatable."

And when he referred to the natives of foreign countries, who had taken such a leading part against the system, he said "the Irish made the best true-hearted Americans." So naturally indeed do they fall in with us, that he had been sometimes tempted to believe that Ireland did not naturally belong to the dominions of Great Britain, but that having been struck from this continent by some convulsion of nature, it had drifted into the vicinity of England, and there held fast to her government!"

As the speech abounds with statistical matter, a due preparation of a report of it requires considerable time; but we learn that it will probably be ready for publication in the course of the ensuing week; and we shall take the first opportunity of presenting it, entire, to our readers, as we did that of Mr. Hayne.

MR. McDUFFIE'S REPORT, &c. In our congressional journal last week, we inserted Mr. McDuffie's bill for reducing the tariff, and have since received his report, which shall have a place when permitted to make room for it. If that bill should pass, there would not be one specie-paying bank in the United States, in three months as to the period of its prospective effect should reach Liverpool. That is, on the 30th September next, every dollar, accessible through the banks, would proceed to the English "market"—the bank of the United States might be the last, but would surely stop payment.* At present, because of the excessive importations of last year, a greater degree of distress, for the want of money, prevails, than has been experienced for many years. The currency has, probably, been contracted more than $20,000,000 within the last six months, and is still contracting—as it must, so long as bills on England bear their present high rate of advance; because that specie, the basis of our currency, is exported, and the quantity on hand is rapidly diminishing; the returns of the bank of the United States showing a reduction of nearly five millions—or more than one third of its coin, in the time just stated; and hence thousands of projected improvements are stopped, and the mechanics feel that pressure which bears down the dealers, which must soon reach the farmers, and afflict every class with its pestiliferous influence. There is no escaping it. It is probable that the reduced value of property, on account of these things, far exceeds the whole cost of our foreign importations of last year; and yet the influx of British goods continues. Where this deranged state of business is to stop, no one can tell—it cannot, until by the poverty of the people they shall be unable to pay for foreign goods, or there shall be some revival demand for the products of their own labor. Such is the result of a full public treasury—such, in a great degree, the effect of frauds at the custom-houses, encouraging foreign productions and diminishing the demand for our own. We repeat it—the want of money is most seriously felt—the banks cannot relieve it; because that, to pay for English goods, the foundation of the currency is drawn from them. Large sacrifices of property are every day making, and credit is pushed to the utmost extent that it will bear. Many must become bankrupts, that would have been entirely competent to meet all their engagements under ordinary circumstances—for there is not nearly money enough afloat to meet the general demand for it. In the present state of the country, hundreds will be forced to feel the important truths proclaimed in the "report on the currency," inserted in the extra sheet that we published last week. That able report, we are sorry to say, must now come home to the firesides of many of our most worthy and most useful citizens.

THE PRESIDENT. There are frequent and rather strange accounts in the papers as to the real state of the health of the president: while, on the one hand, he is represented as very hale and hearty—full of life and spirit and zealously attending to business, it is said on the other that he is rapidly fading, and shewing many marks of imbecility, in body and mind. The "Richmond Enquirer" has almost as many bulletins of his health, as Mr. Kitchie used to give us about Mr. Crawford's in 1834; and in a late number publishes two letters from Washington, the first of which, after reporting "favorably of the health and spirits of the president," says "the recent storm, or rather deep-laid scheme to destroy him, seems to have given him new life and spirits!"—and the second letter contains this sentence,—"The rejection of Mr. Van Buren is only the first act in the drama; an attempt to send the bank of the United States bill to the president, will be the next." The writer adds, "I have no doubt he will reject it, if it ever reaches him." The third and last act of the drama, the letter states, will be "an attempt to crowd upon the president as many evils and evils as possible."

But the Philadelphia "Sentinel" decidedly says, that if the bank bill shall pass, the president will not refuse his sanction to it.

As to the president's health, the United States' Telegraph says—

"There never was a time when the people were so gulled; so betrayed; so deceived. They are made to believe that they are about to choose a president for the next four years, in the person of Andrew Jackson; when, in point of fact, every sensible man here, of every party, knows that, instead of choosing the next president in gen. Jackson, for the next term, as the people suppose, they will choose him in the person of the vice president, whoever he may be! So inform in gen. Jackson now; so little prospect is there of his living through the next term; that the prodigal crew who are living upon his influence, and are controlling the movements in the election of the president and vice president, are trembling lest he should expire before the period of the election arrives.

"We feel it our duty to speak boldly. Every one who visits him, is struck with the fact, that he is fast sinking; and that, if possible, his mental faculties are giving way faster than his physical strength."

"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" While some assert that the whole object of the general is to secure the succession to Mr. Van Buren, and that he would retire immediately after the result of the election, if favorable to his views; others speak boldly of the firmness of his bodily health and intellectual vigor! But this is certain, that there is a very unusual anxiety about the vice presidency, on the part of the friends of the administration; an honorable office, truly—but not hitherto regarded as one of sufficient political importance to divide a party—or to call a convention to select a candidate. The latter is, for the first time, arranged. Why?

MR. MONROE'S MESSAGE OF 1832. The "New York Journal of Commerce" gives a curious extract from the "London Metropolitan" for January, being a review of a recent work by Mr. Stapleton, who was the confidential secretary of Mr. Canning, which states as a fact—that Mr. Monroe's famous protest against the interference of the "holy alliance" in the affairs of continental America, or rather the former dominions of Spain, was sent forth under a "full understanding between him and Mr. Canning; that the ground assumed, was to be maintained, if necessary, by the combined force of the British and American arms."

It is a curious paper, and should have a place, had we a little room to spare from current matters. That part of the message of Mr. Monroe was received with the highest approbation by all the liberal portion of the people of the old world, and they thought that it was a death-blow to the progress of despotism in the new.

* Unless this bank, and the rest, should make ruinous importations of coin.

GEORGE WASHINGTON. In regard to certain proceedings at Alexandria, preparatory to a celebration of the centennial anniversary of the birth day of WASHINGTON, it appears that the charter of Alexandria lodge of ancient York Masons, was granted, in his name, as its first master in 1798, by the grand lodge of Virginia.

☞ We have been compelled to abridge the interesting proceedings had in congress, in relation to this anniversary, to a simple notice of the results agreed upon; but have laid them aside for future preservation in this work. It was agreed to deposit the remains of the "father of his country," with those of his lady, in a vault which had been prepared in the centre of the great rotunda of the capital, (on the responsibility of the architect); but Mr. John A. Washington, the proprietor of Mount Vernon, declines his consent to a removal of the remains of his honored relatives, &c.

COLONEL BENTON. We do not mean to say any thing personal of this gentleman—but the following remarks have so much quickness in them, that, perhaps, we shall be justified in presenting them:

"The Village Record, with reference to the frequent and sometimes peremptory defeats of his propositions offered to the senate, says—'He labors like a man at a pump, without any valve to the bucket; ever and aye with mighty diligence, and accomplishes—nothing.'

And a correspondent of the Pennsylvania Wagon, noticing one of his many speeches about the U. S. bank, says—"col. Benton is now *currycombing the bank!"

In one of these speeches, as we observe by the reply of Mr. Dallas, the colonel had said that the issues of the checks or drafts of the offices of the bank of the United States amounted to thirty or forty millions of dollars. Now the whole circulation of the bank—(as every body ought to know who says any thing about it), was only 23,300,000 in August, last—and has been much diminished since, as it needs must, because of a subsequent abstraction of several millions of dollars from its vaults, to pay for English goods, and embarrass every branch of business in the United States, by a sudden and severe contraction of the currency. But Mr. Dallas said that the amount of these checks or drafts did not exceed five millions. In another point, as to the draft of specie from the west, the colonel was equally unfortunate—but he lately spoke of thirteen millions of bushels of foreign salt consumed in the west, and the more willingly submitted to these knockings-off of seven eighths or nine-tenths of his magnificent aggregates!

THE CONSTITUTION. Among other proceedings had to act against the senate, is an attempt to shew that the members of that body, who voted for the rejection of Mr. Van Buren, represent a much less number of the people than those who voted for his nomination. If a "reform" of the senate is desired,—there can be no objection to such a statement of facts; but their influence would over-turn a leading principle of the constitution,

*"Currycombing!" It is a word happily coined to suit a particular state of things, and applicable to the following extract from one of the colonel's speeches about the bank:

"It carries all before it! It bestrides, as a colossus, the prostrate charter which congress gave it. It claps a foot upon a word here, and a phrase there—rears her gigantic form above all law—and boldly places an empire at defiance! And yet there are people to talk about new restrictions to bind this gigantic power; as if it was in the destiny of man that the weaker should ever bind the stronger party! No, sir! We are engaged with the real presence of that fabled monster—once believed to be the fabulous creation of frenzied poets—that monster which no art nor power can ever bind!—Which changed his form, at will, from bird to beast—from lion to serpent—from serpent to water—from a river of flowing water to a column of blazing fire! and thus eluded, in the act of receiving them, the grasp and catch of every chain that was thrown upon him."

and have a direct, if not inevitable tendency to dissolve the confederacy, which is represented in the senate, having no manner of regard to the people, except of those particular parts of them located in the several states,—to the legislatures of which, only, are the senators individually responsible. But there are several other cases under the constitution, in which persons representing majorities of the people, may not enact the laws or prescribe the conduct of government. One of the most powerful causes that led to the election of general Jackson to the presidency in 1828, was, that, in 1824, he obtained a greater number of electoral votes than Mr. Adams, who was chosen president by the house of representatives, voting by states; and yet the electoral votes obtained by Mr. Adams in 1824, represented a larger number of the people than the higher electoral vote of gen. Jackson, as will soon appear. And, though the general had 178 electoral votes in 1828, and Mr. Adams only 83, there was not a large balance of the people in his favor—for we must deduct 27 or 28 electoral votes because of the representation of slaves, (who are not of the "people"), and then 6 or 8,000 votes, changed in Ohio, Kentucky and New York, would have given Mr. Adams a majority of the electoral votes in 1828. And, on account of the slaves, a law may pass the house of representatives by a majority of twenty votes, and yet be passed in sheer opposition to the will of a decided majority of the people of the U. States. It is not worth while to make any comments on these things. The constitution was, of necessity and wisely, made up of concessions. Each state yielded a considerable portion of its own sovereignty, that a national government might be built up, for the common defence and general welfare."

By the constitution, the senate have, (and ought to have), the same right to reject that the president has to nominate—else the latter would have an irresponsible and kingly power. The senate has seldom exercised its authority in wantonness, or on mere party grounds—and it may not be presumed that it ever will. Very few of the leading nominations of the present president have been strongly opposed, though the expediency of many of the removals might well have been questioned; and in general, it can be easily conceded, that the president alone may be more liable to mistake the character and conduct of individuals than a majority of the senate, men as well capable of judging as himself, and of as lofty standing. The body representing twenty-four states may as rightfully complain of improper nominations, as the president of improper rejections. The right and the power, and the responsibility in either, is exactly the same. Years ago, the senate unanimously rejected the nomination of a foreign minister, by president Jefferson—Mr. Short.* It was not then suggested that the president was treated with "contempt." The result shewed that he had made a bad selection.

It is proposed in the official paper, the "Globe," and, of course, loudly followed in many others, to cut down the senate to two years, and strip that body of the power of confirming or rejecting nominations—for the sole cause that Mr. Van Buren has been rejected. So the constitution is to be changed, and a sovereign power given to the president, because one man has been disappointed! It is like the tale of the witch, who summoned all the fiendish spirits from the lowest depths of pandemonium, to help her to find a little dog that she had lost. But is it forgotten that gen. Jackson, being a member of the senate, voted against the nomination of Mr. Clay, as secretary of state, when offered by president Adams, and would have rendered to Mr. Clay the same result that has befallen Mr. Van Buren, if he could? But, and it is to be said, that general Jackson suspected or believed in a "bargain" made for that office between the president and Mr. Clay—how stands the case now between himself and Mr. Van Buren, as minister to England? Mr. Pointexter stated in the senate a fact which had long been understood by the people, that, previous to Mr. Van Buren's resignation of the office of secretary of state, a "bargain" had been made for the English mission,—which the late correspondence between Messrs. Branch and Forsyth establishes. If right to oppose because of one bargain, it must be right to oppose because of another.

But there were other reasons. It is not our design to go into the merits of this case; but the preceding facts struck us so forcibly that we thought it right to mention them, for public consideration.

It is very severely charged in certain newspapers, that Mr. Calhoun has coalesced with Mr. Clay, to reject Mr. Van Buren; but when the thousand times more important vote on Mr. Clay's resolution as to the tariff, shall be taken, that "coalition" will not appear; but a new one become manifest between Mr. Clay and Messrs. Wilkins and Dallas, of Pennsylvania, drawing in also, perhaps, Messrs. Dudley and Murcy, of New York!

Having mentioned that meetings had been held at Albany, New York and Philadelphia to condemn the senate, we should also state that great assemblies of the people have been held in the two last cities to support the senate, and deny any privilege or prerogative in the president to make appointments without the consent of that body!

THE TRUTH. The Richmond Whig, when alluding to the speech of Mr. Hayne, says: "In reading Mr. Hayne's speech, let the reader set down half the evils he enumerates as the effects of the tariff, to rhetorical flourish, and a southern imagination—and three-fourths of the other half to slavery; which, by rendering manual labor degrading in the eyes of those who consider themselves well born, causes southern youth to be brought up in idleness, and of course in habits of dissipation and extravagance. Trace the principle in its operation to encourage idleness and worthlessness, and repress exertion, and it is plain enough why, in the south, we see so many once opulent families in ruins, so many gentlemen of pedigree in penury, and the absence of that general prosperity so conspicuous and remarkable in every non-slave-holding portion of the United States—every portion, we say, without exception. This is a truth which every man in his own bosom acknowledges. But for its existence, we should never have heard a murmur against the tariff, upon which is poured all that discontent which the pressure of misfortune engenders, and which naturally seeks to vent itself upon something, which it calls the cause, whether truly or falsely. Take the most exaggerated estimate of the tax which Virginia is supposed to pay under the tariff, divide it per capita, and it will be found most inconsiderable, most insufficient to account for a nation's decay. It is not a political, but a moral cause, which is at the bottom of southern decline."

More important truths were hardly ever before compressed in a less number of lines. We have often had unpleasant feelings when such men as Mr. Hayne and Mr. McDuffie, (of vivid imaginations, but, as we would think, incapable of persisting in manifest error), have attributed the downward course of some parts of the southern states to the oppressions of the tariff. The groans of the people of these states were as melancholy, and their screams of distress as piercing, before the passage of the tariff law of 1823, as they have been since; and we shall, some of these days, extract the lugubrious passages from the late speech of Mr. Hayne, and contrast them with the speeches of other southern gentlemen in congress in 1822, 1823 or 1824. The facts, as stated, are precisely the same! Mr. Hayne may have dressed up the tales of misery in better words; and, perchance, there has been an accumulation of causes for them—for things have been getting worse and worse in certain parts of the south—but the substance of all that he said has been "many a time and oft" delivered on the floors of congress. It is slavery that has pulsed and halt depopulated lower Virginia, South Carolina, &c. and it will most assuredly render them as "desert places," unless something is done to arrest this overwhelming evil. How is it now? The deer has been hunted for many years in parts of Virginia that once had a thrifty population, and palaces have long been abandoned to bats and owls.* The tariff, with all the powers of mischief ascribed to it, has never yet been accused, (nor has it had time,) with growing forests of pines, and dilapidating substantial brick houses! The productive people, the thoughtful and the enterprising, have fled from the desolation that they saw before them, and abandoned the places of their nativity to the masters who own, and the slaves who disgrace, the industry of freemen. The late debates in the legislature of Virginia concerning their colored population, has brought out a mass of facts which the autocrat of Virginia, and all who wear the "collar" that he assigns them, and changes at his own good pleasure, were willing to have sent to the ——— mischief, for having dared to hint at, a few years ago; but now Mr. Ritchie has been graciously pleased to admit that "something must be done!" We are glad that even now he is brought to a confession of the retrograde movement of the "Ancient Dominion," and partially admitted the real cause of it. The truth is—the poor free white man is an ass, if he remains in a district of country in which he is dishonored, and where he is, as it were, daily called upon to defend that interest which depresses him to a rank only one degree removed from that of the negroes who surround him; but he seeks a new home, where labor is respected and rewarded, and he feels himself to be a citizen. There is hardly any part of Europe in which the poor are more ignorant than in certain old districts of our country, which abound with slaves. But we shall, as soon as we can, take up the debates in Virginia, and hold up these things fully to the public admiration.

And how is it, that Eastern Virginia is so prostrate and distressed, and Middle and Western Virginia so erect and thrifty? The laws of the state, and of the United States, which affect either, are the same! The tariff is as much a "curse" beyond the reach of tide-water, as upon the lower rivers of the states; but in one we see population declining and wealth disappearing, and in the other population advancing and wealth accumulating—fields are not deserted nor places turned into owl-roosts. The last number of the "Genius of Liberty" says—"but four suits have been brought by the office of the Valley Bank at Leesburg, within two years last past, although the bank has done an extensive and profitable business. This is as it should be." And we hear of this people wishing to make roads and canals, and know that they live on the fat of the land—and in peace. Are these different conditions the result of chance? No—the farmer of western Virginia holds his own plough, and the planter of eastern Virginia drives his deputy. The same things exist in the western and eastern parts of North and South Carolina and Georgia. The people of the two parts are as essentially different as if they belonged to widely separated states; the one is bold, hardy and industrious—the other rash, inefficient and lazy. The strength of all the southern states is in their western districts, in which there are few slaves.

And how is it that we have so many doleful accounts about the cotton planters of South Carolina? Is not the product of Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi, &c. the same in its general character, and as likely to be affected by the tariff? But it is well known that in these states the cotton-planters are among the wealthy and thrifty of the people: they say that they can make cotton for five cents, or even less, per pound, while the planters of South Carolina are starving at nine and ten cents. Alabama, but yesterday a wilderness, contains 309,206 persons, and is increasing mightily in wealth and power. Her great product is the same as that of South Carolina.† We do not hear of misery in this

* There are, probably, more ruins of houses to be seen in lower Virginia than in all the New England states, and New York! It is, indeed, rare to meet with a heap of ruins there. Houses decay in the first as well as the last mentioned section of our country—but in the one the remains are gathered and preserved for new buildings—in the other they are not wanted.

† South Carolina contains only 257,898 of the people of the United States, and shows an increase of only 26,000 since 1820—Alabama contained 190,171 of the people of the United States in 1830, showing an in-state. The other day, 90 negroes belonging to the estate of a person deceased, old and young, sick and well, males and females, were sold, and in families, for the great sum of $41,031 dollars, near Tusculooma. The cotton-planting then, cannot be a bad business in Alabama! But there are good reasons for this. Alabama is peopled by enterprising and industrious persons, who have been cast out of other southern states by the fear of poverty, and the examples of prodigality and waste set before them, (which they must have imitated or have lost their grade), and they do not waste millions of their earnings in the north, as the planters of South Carolina do, nor load themselves and their wives and children with foolish things. I once saw a puny little girl, and imbecile, as it appeared from refined laziness, so decked out, that a person said she had one hundred bales of cotton round her neck!—alluding to the cost of the jewels that agreed not with the color of her skin; and, as, perhaps, that exhibition cost her father $5000, which he ought to have expended on his own plantations—what had he to do, when dunned for money that he could not pay, but to curse the tariff, and declaim against the high price of negro cloths and cotton bagging!

But to return a moment to the point from whence we started—the complaint of "hard times" is an old one from the south, as we shall take an opportunity to show—and the cause of complaint will go on to increase in the parts of the country referred to, until, we do not know what shall happen—unless "something is done" to prevent free laboring white men from abandoning it. It is the amount of these which, like the overflow of the Nile, fertilizes the soil, and keeps the sands of the desert at bay.

SUBSISTENCE. In all questions of political economy, the cost of subsistence is an important consideration. We see it stated that returns from all the counties in the state of New York, except one small one [Queen's] give an aggregate of 15,564 persons relieved or supported as paupers, last year; of these 2,795 were foreigners, 419 lunatics, 224 idiots and 30 mutes. The entire average expense of supporting each person in the poor houses was $33 28 a year, or 64 8-10 cents a week; but this does not include the value of their own labor, for there are attached to the poor houses a considerable quantity of land. One dollar a week, then, would appear to be about the average personal cost of the paupers. The total value of the poor house establishments in the state is $830,350; but many of the counties have not yet made such establishments, though a great saving is shown because of them.

The report of the trustees of the poor of Baltimore city and county shew that the cost, per head, was 37 dollars 63 cents in 1826, and has been reduced to $25 92 in 1831. This includes all charges, except interest payable on monies due for the property on which the poor house is located.

This great reduction has been caused by the increased productiveness of the farm, and the quantity and value of articles made up or manufactured in the house, and the product of many articles sold. Those able to work are fully employed, and various branches of business are fitted to all able to labor, without oppressing them. The idle and the lazy find no resting-place in this establishment. The monthly average of the city papers for 1831, was 433 nearly.

THE SUPPRESSION VERT. Whenever certain persons have occasion to speak of the negotiations of Messrs. Van Buren and McLane about the British colonial trade, they always refer to THE West India trade. In a late number of the "New York Evening Post," it is proudly said that 520 American and 70 British vessels arrived at that port from the West Indies. Why not tell how many of them were from British West India ports, and how many of these were under the American flag? Such facts would be "secrets worth knowing." But we shall erase of about 105,000 since 1820. And the growth of cotton in the latter is rapidly gained an equality with the crop of South Carolina, and will soon have the greater product, have them by and bye—and it will surely appear that our navigation has received much injury from the boasted arrangement of the gentlemen named. On this subject we meet with the following, as extracted from the "London Morning Herald"—

"Our attention has been called to an article in the New Brunswick Herald, on the West India trade. The writer, who is evidently well acquainted with his subject, endeavors to show, and we think does show, that while the trade with the United States was indirect, the navigation was in the hands of the Americans, and that our government, in concluding the treaty with America, have forced the trade from American hands into those of British ship-owners. Our government appears to have had another object in view—namely that of imposing such additional duties on the direct trade to the West Indies, with certain exceptions, as in effect to be prohibitory. By this means the United States' produce is forced into our North American colonies, whence it is transported in British bottoms, duty free, to the West Indies. It appears, indeed, pretty clear to us that brother Jonathan has been, for once, overreached by father Bull, who, as Mr. Niles, in his Register, observes, has aimed a blow at the prosperity of the navigation of the nation, and at the prosperity of the state of New York, so far as it is to be effected by a diminution of its revenue from the canal."

A reference to the treasury tables may throw some light on this subject, as to past times—and if we had those for the year ending the 30th Sept. last, the value of this trade would be clearly discovered. That it has rendered injury to the United States, we have no manner of doubt; and are assured that those who have been engaged in the general West India business in Baltimore have found it so. A call for the arrivals and clearances, shewing the character of the vessels, and the quality and value of their cargoes, for the year ending 31st December, 1831, (if made by the senate), as to the principal ports in each state, would afford the means of preparing important comparisons, as to the trade with the West Indies, at large. Before this arrangement, 110 British vessels arrived at Boston in one year—and in the last year 566 such foreign vessels arrived. We suppose that the life has happened at nearly all our principal ports, though we see it said, under the head of "West India trade," that "a writer in the Norfolk Herald, states the clearances to have been at the port of Norfolk—

1831, 157

"In 1829, the British West India ports were closed; in 1831, they were opened, and of the 157 clearances of this last year, seventy-nine were to British West India ports; if these ports had been closed, there would not have been much difference between the two years."

But this—like the statement at New York, leaves us in the dark. We know not if all the clearances are included in both years—nor is the amount of American and British vessels stated, as to the clearances for British West India ports. Why conceal that very thing which it is the most important to know?

The New York Whig, in reference to this subject, says—

"In order to correct some of the false impressions, which the statement in the Courier and Enquirer is

* That is, the statement as to the arrival of 520 American, and 70 British vessels from the West Indies, which we met with in the "Evening Post" but seems properly to belong to the "Courier and Enquirer." We say it properly belongs to the last named paper—in which a certain thing charged against "senator Benton," of Missouri—the affair between himself and his brother, with general Jackson and his party, at Nashville, if we remember correctly, was peremptorily denied, because that "senator Benton," then in New York, had pledged his honor, or something else, that he did not do that thing. And the "rewarded" editor, perhaps, did not tell a lie—for the "senator Benton" that he meant was a member of the legislature of New York!

Again—and just fitted for the occasion. The New York Courier and Enquirer lately published the following in justification of the instructions of Mr. Van Buren to Mr. McLane, about the West India trade:

calculated to produce; we will state a few facts, resting on documentary evidence, in which the proper discriminations are made, and which are calculated to lead our readers to a right judgment in this matter.

"During 1823, '24, '25 and '26, four years, direct trade with the British islands was open, and the value of it was as follows:

1823.	1824.	1825.	1826.
$1,617,845	$1,750,703	$1,633,574	$2,078,871

"During the same four years, the whole West India trade including the preceding, was as follows:

1823.	1824.	1825.	1826.
$8,984,299	$9,270,642	$9,863,172	$10,808,376

"This shows an average amount of our whole West India trade for four years, of $9,731,724 a year, when the trade with the British islands was open and direct.

"During the next four years, 1827, '28, '29, '30, the direct trade with the British islands was suspended; but let us see what the whole of our West India trade amounted to, during that period:

1827.	1828.	1829.	1830.
$10,504,076	$9,380,920	$10,128,002	$10,122,194

"This shows an average, for these four years, of $10,033,048 a year, while the direct trade with the British islands was suspended, which is an average of $301,324 a year more during these four years, when the West India trade was lost, as the Courier and Enquirer would vainly have supposed, than during the four years when it was possessed.

"Now, what does all this show? Why, clearly, that while the direct trade with British islands was suspended, they did, nevertheless, continue to draw their supplies from this country, through the neutral ports of St. Thomas, St. Bartholomew's, Martinique, &c. &c., and our West India trade was increasing in value.

"But this is not all. While, during the suspension of the direct trade with the British islands, our whole West India commerce was growing in value, it was all carried in our own vessels. By the new arrangement, British vessels now participate in the carriage of this commerce; British merchants take a large and growing portion of the freights that were, during the 'loss' of the trade, paid to our own merchants; and British seamen are taking wages that were, otherwise, be paid to our own hardy mariners. The Courier and Enquirer says 'only' 70 of the arrivals at this port during 1831, are British, and 520 are American. If it had not been for the arrangements made by the Jackson cabinet, there would not have been one British arrival; the whole 590 would have been American. Our own vessels would have all the carrying. It is in this view, that the friends of Mr. Adams' administration consider this Van Buren arrangement, 'an injury to the country.' It is an injury to our country. It has not enlarged our commerce, while it has diminished our carrying trade; and in reference to the higher interests of national

"A case in point.—When England negotiated for a peace with France, during the time of the first consul, the proposal failed. When Pitt was left out of the ministry and Fox succeeded, he sent an ambassador to France and instructed him to say that a change of ministry having taken place, the French government must not allow the errors of the late ministry to affect the present negotiations. The treaty of Amiens followed. This was done by the proudest nation on earth, and no one complained. See British state papers."

On which the "National Intelligencer" of the 13th says—

"Now, the truth is, Mr. Fox was not minister of England at the time of the treaty of Amiens, nor until four or five years afterwards. The treaty of Amiens was negotiated under the ministerial auspices of Lord Sidmouth, (Mr. Addington,) Mr. Pitt being then not in the ministry, but not being considered as in opposition. If Lord Sidmouth gave any such instructions to the British ambassador at Paris, we would thank the author of the paragraph to tell us where they are to be found. Let us see the particulars of his 'case in point.'"

[The neglect to give the volume and page, satisfies us that the case in point was manufactured for this occasion. It was too important a matter to have been inserted so slightly—if genuine.]

honor, while it has restored nothing that was lost, it has lost what nothing can restore."

"THE CABINET COUNCIL." The Harrisburg Intelligencer of the 9th inst. (Feb.) contains a long account of the proceedings said to have been had at a certain cabinet council held at Washington, when the rev. Dr. Ely and the rev. Mr. Campbell were present. It is a bold statement, and, surely, a very strange one, it true.

THE NAILS have been much interrupted on the road between Philadelphia and Baltimore during the present winter, and this always will be the case, when the water communication is stopped, unless the power shall be discovered, and the will exercised by the government of the United States, to make certain parts of the road; which passes through a poor and thinly settled country, unable to make and keep up a good road—and the general travelling upon it would hardly preserve it in repair, it made.

DOGS AND SHEEP. The "Village Record" contains a full statement of the amount paid for the dog-tax in every township of Chester county, Pennsylvania, and of the damages paid for sheep killed by them. The account, in the whole, is in favor of the receipts. In Brandywine township the damages paid were $275 87—received $72 85; in Uwchland 179 15 paid, and 87 49 received, and so on. The sum of the payments, for the last year, were $2,542 06½, and of the receipts from the dog-tax $2,622 19.

PITTSBURG. The Gazette enumerates twenty-one steam vessels which have been built and fitted at Pittsburgh, and its vicinity, in the last season, and furnished by the factories and work shops of that bustling city; and yet the list is not believed full! The editor thinks that the great sum of five hundred thousand dollars was last year expended at Pittsburgh, in building and fitting steam boats, only!

In the list, the "Mohawk," of 555 tons, is the largest, and cost 33,000 dollars; but the "Henry Clay" of 482 tons, cost 35,000 dollars. The length of the keel of the latter is 164 feet—her cabins are splendidly furnished; she has a bust of the man whose name she bears, and is ornamented with emblems of the "American System."

CINCINNATI. Five hundred new buildings were erected in this city last year—and 13 steam boats, measuring 2,333 tons, and costing $184,500.

LOUISVILLE AND WHEELING are also going a-head, with as much proportionate rapidity as Cincinnati and Pittsburgh. They are also great seats of internal commerce and manufacturing industry.

News! A late English paper, noticing the arrival of a vessel from New York, says that the ballottings for a new president were going on, the majority of the suffrages being for Mr. Wirt.

A COLORED MAN, named Thomas Mitchell, had resided some time at Dayton, Ohio. He was arrested as a runaway slave from Kentucky, but released by the justice, because of some defect in the proof offered; but being arrested a second time, he was given up as claimed: on which a project was set on foot to purchase him, he himself contributing fifty dollars which he had saved—but the master would have him back again. He was secured and carried to Cincinnati, and deposited in the fourth story of an hotel; but he jumped out of the window and was killed. His master took the remains of poor Tom to Kentucky that they might have, as he said, "a decent burial in his own church yard."

DRY GOODS IMPORTED AT NEW YORK. A New York paper publishes a comparative statement of dry goods exported from Liverpool to New York, from the first of March to the thirtieth of November, 1830, and for the same portion of 1831, from which it appears, that of cotton stuffs, in 1830, the number of pieces was 935,810; and in 1831, 756,889; showing a decrease last year of 238,921 pieces, and in the number of yards a decrease of 2,632,412. Of worsted stuffs there were imported in 1830, 118,561 pieces, in 1831, 142,356 pieces; showing an increase for the latter year of 23,795 pieces. Of woollens there were imported in 1830, 107,854 pieces, and in 1831, 190,324; showing an increase for the latter year of 82,469 pieces. Of woollen-ends, the importation in 1830, was 33,333, in 1831, 38,327; showing an increase of 4,995. Of woollen yarn there was imported in 1830, 3,120 cwt., and in 1831, 73,900 cwt.; showing an increase of 70,780.

LIBERIA. The "Herald" gives cheerful accounts of this colony. A school for females on a liberal footing, had just gone into operation, through the liberality of Mrs. Sansom, of Philadelphia, who had sent out teachers and books, &c. The editor of the "Herald" laughs at a report that he intends to leave the colony—and says on his personal knowledge, as well as by the information of the colony physician, Dr. Toulson, that only two of the emigrants by the Valador, from Baltimore, had died, though Mr. Garrison, of the Liberator, has killed off many of them in his paper. Judging by what we see in the "Herald," the "Liberator" seems opposed to every thing which may hold out the prospect of benefit to the colored population, unless accomplished in violence; and he lately got up a petition to the legislature of Massachusetts to legalize marriages between white and black persons. A law forbidding such marriages, we think, ought not to have been passed—Mr. G. and others should have liberty to indulge their faculty, to the fullest extent; but as it is—so let it remain, for the present.

MISERIES OF THE IRISH ROOF. We would hope—most ardently hope, that the following picture from the Kilkenny Journal is exaggerated, whilst fearing that it is not. It is horrible! But here is the application—shall the labor of the people of the United States, for the love of "free trade," be placed on a par with that of the wretched beings described? Shall we relieve the misery imposed on the English and Irish population, because that royalty, nobility, and the priesthood, eat up their substance, and take a part of that misery on ourselves? This is the question. When these "reform" themes live—it will be time enough to think about so splendid a generosity.

"We shall again and again turn our thoughts to this subject, and, if possible, enlist public and private sympathy, in behalf of the most wretched and forlorn of our fellow christians, whose state of destitution is beyond description—wanting all the necessities of life, food, fuel, clothing, and bedding. What is to become of them? Are they, in a christian land, to be allowed to perish unnoticed and unknown? Let those who are incredulous as to the existence of this large mass of misery, but visit any of the lanes and alleys of this city, and they will be at once undeceived; even those parts of it where the wheel and the shuttle were once busily employed, are now the abodes of equal poverty and disease. What think you, fathers of families, to see a family of nine persons sitting down to a scanty meal of wet, not dry potatoes, in four and twenty hours? What think you, mothers, of the mother of six children being found engaged in stirring a pot of water in a corner where a fire was not, (using maternal deception), to silence the cries of hunger, until, weary with waiting, her children fell fast asleep?—of a man burning old shoes, to produce a smoke, as he told us, to keep out the damp? These are only specimens, selected from a dense mass of misery which now pervades this once prosperous, but now ruined and neglected city."

CUBA. It is officially notified that gen. Vives has, at his own request, been relieved of the captain-generalship of Cuba, and will be succeeded by gen. Don M. Riazorfo.

JAMAICA. Late accounts inform us that the rebellious slaves had been nearly reduced, and that a large number had been hung and shot. A Baptist missionary is loudly charged with having promoted these disorders, which are said to have been "unparalleled in the history of any country"—a "flourish," perhaps, about what has happened, but sufficient to shew that the outrages committed were of serious importance. It is most likely that the charge against the missionary was founded only in the wrong action of the owners of the slaves. The gambler, on losing his money, abuses the cards, but does not reform his use of them. "Tranquility," it was hoped would now be restored—tranquility on the smoking embers of desolated plantations, and amidst the carcasses of men. "The fullness of time" we learn is near at hand—in the West Indies.

The accounts say, that the excitement among the slaves was general—half of the estates in some of the parishes were destroyed by fire; the slaves also murdered many persons in the outset. About two thousand of them had been shot down or hung; and a large body were "so hemmed in that they could not escape," at the last accounts.

DUKE DE BOURBON. A most interesting investigation was going on before a tribunal at Paris, relative to the decease and distribution of the vast property of the late duke de Bourbon, one of the branches of the old royal family of France, and related to the present king. It was given out that the duke had committed suicide, soon after the revolution of the "three days"—but many circumstances led to a strong suspicion that he had been murdered, and that the chief agent in his death was a certain woman of English extraction, named Sophia Daves, alias the baroness Feuchere, the duke's concubine; and it is charged that previous to destroying him, she had forced him to make a will, giving two millions of francs and a splendid landed property to herself, but his immense fortune to the duke d'Aumale, one of the sons of the present king. The developments made are very curious. The enquiry is instituted by the princes Rohan, to obtain the property, and a strong disposition is manifest to implicate Louis Philip with Sophia Daves, in the murder of the old duke, having obtained such a will as they wished. The case was not yet decided—but the chief ground of suspicion against the king seems to have been in some courtesies which he had extended towards the woman—and it appears also that he had been on most friendly terms with the duke; but there was nothing strange in the direction which the latter had given to the honors and estates of Conde.

DUELS. A Paris paper relates as a fact that two students in Berlin having quarrelled, agreed to kiss the lips of a person mortally affected with the cholera, and that the dispute should terminate with the death of either. Each of them kissed the lips of a man in the last stage of the disease, but neither dying within twenty-four hours afterwards, their "mutual friends" declared that they should be reconciled.

A duel was fought on the banks of the Potomac, near Port Tobacco, on the 7th inst. between lieut. H. Matthews, of that place, and Dr. G. W. Jewson, of Virginia, in which the former was shot through the heart, and died instantly, and the other received a dangerous wound in the abdomen, but it was thought would recover.

And at Fort Mitchell, Georgia, gen. Sowell Woodfolk was shot through the heart and instantly killed, by maj. J. T. Camp, who was also wounded in the abdomen.

And again, in Georgia, a Mr. Fair was shot through the heart by a Mr. Gist. Three brothers of the deceased were on the duelling ground!

These may be called sharp shootings, indeed!

LONGEVITY—England and America. The London bills of mortality for the last year, in a population of about 1,300,000, shew 28,263 christenings, and 25,337 burials; of the deaths 4,807 were of consumption, 1,061 by asthma, 48 suicides and 563 of the small pox. Only three persons exceeded the age of 100 years.

The returns of the late census of North Carolina, the whole population of which is 738,470, shews 58 white persons and 247 people of color, aged more than 100 years. Massachusetts has only 55 persons in her 608,259, so aged.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS—NONE.

The splendid bridge on the Monongahela, which cost 140,000 dollars in 1818, at Pittsburg, gave way on the 21st January last. No lives lost, except that of a horse though two persons and five horses descended with the ruins.

The rev. Dr. Wilson, of Albany, N. Y. has published a sermon entitled "Prince Messiah's claims to dominion over all governments, and the disregard of his authority by the United States, in the federal constitution." The reverend gentleman might have been better employed than in making this sermon.

Very great damage has been sustained by the breaking up of the Susquehanna. The ice was piled up in some places fifty feet high. Several of the bridges have been injured, about a quarter of mile of one of them is said to have fallen; the Muncy dam has been carried away, and the Shamokin much injured—these dams were made to feed canals, but have perilled the navigation of the river.

A liberal appropriation has been made to repair the statue of Washington, belonging to the state of N. Carolina, which, it is stated, may happily be accomplished. A fine painting of the statue, as it was, has been preserved.

An increased attention is paid in many places to the breeding of silk worms. We hope that it may become general. Light labor and time now lost will produce millions, it applied to this object.

A large business continues on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road—more than eighty cars sometimes arrive in a day, with more than 1,100 barrels of flour and great quantities of other articles. When this road shall reach the Ohio, we may expect the arrival of a thousand cars, some days, and the departure of as many. Three hundred cars are now employed on the road.

A rail road is talked of from Richmond to York—the ground is said to be excellent for one, and materials abundant. With such road, persons may breakfast in Richmond and sup in Baltimore, and a vast saving of money and time would ensue. The latter is the great value of internal improvements, and is worth millions annually to England.

It is proposed to make a rail road from Brooklyn, (opposite New York), to the eastern end of Long Island. If ever this shall be accomplished, the journey from N. York to Boston will be a short one—as to time.

The legislature of Virginia has passed a law concerning the militia, which, among other provisions, has one limiting the fine for non-attendance at any "company, battalion, regimental, or other muster," to seventy five cents. During the debate in the legislature on this subject, Mr. Goode, one of the members of that body, observed that perhaps he ought to be the last to interfere, being, as he presumed, the only private present!

Letters have been received at New York from Raymond, the officer who pursued Rounge, who escaped with a part of the princess of Orange's jewels, whom he caught and carried to the Hague. The jewels now recovered are valued at 45,000 pounds sterling. The mystery about these jewels remains as it was.

There is a Ginard Journal at Philadelphia—and a Ginard bank, a Ginard-rail-road, Ginard square, Ginard street, &c. &c. may be expected, besides the Ginard college, Ginard school, &c. &c.

At Bangor, Maine, the thermometer on the 27th Jan. ult. is said to have stood at 35 degrees below zero. This was a "cold Friday," over the greater part of the United States. We thought that, in Baltimore, we never felt such biting cold.

We learn from the Tallahassee Floridian, that Achille Murat, who recently received a military commission from the Belgian government, but was deprived of it by a demand made by the French government, is expected shortly to return, with his lady, to his residence in Florida.

At the Hotel Dieu, in Montreal, on the 28th ult. Mr. Louis Gaudry dit Bourbonniere, aged 84, and Mrs. Celeste David, aged 74, celebrated the 50th anniversary of their marriage. The bride's maid aged 70 years, was the same who assisted at their marriage, 50 years ago.

The fine brig Amanita, captain Harvey, arrived at Baltimore on Sunday afternoon, in 66 days from Valparaiso.—This is the shortest passage which has ever been made between the two ports.

A Nova Scotia paper says that "one Charles Carroll" is not the only surviving signer of the declaration of independence—but that Alexander Robertson, then living at Shelburne, N. S. had also signed it!

A woman in North Carolina stands charged with having murdered her husband, and burned the greater part of his body and bones to ashes, in the fire place of her house. He seems to have been a bad man—but she is the mother of two children.

TWENTY SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

February 9. A message was received from the president of the U. S. transmitting a report from the secretary of war, relative to the fur trade, and the number of killed and wounded while engaged in it—referred.

Also a message communicating the ratifications of the treaties with France and Turkey.

Mr. Chambers submitted a resolution instituting an inquiry as to the propriety of allowing defendants, criminally charged in the courts of the United States, additional means to procure testimony and compel the attendance of witnesses.

Mr. Poindexter submitted a resolution relative to the reservation of Choctaw lands in the state of Mississippi.

Mr. Dickerson submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be requested to communicate to the senate copies of all instructions to collectors of customs, and other officers, on the subject of iron and manufactures, since the 30th of April, 1818.

The vice president presented the free trade memorial, as also a supplemental one from two members of the committee, praying for a repeal of the protecting duties.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. Sprague, Mr. Benton and Mr. Wilkins, were considered and adopted. Adjourned.

February 10. Mr. Tazewell of Va. presented a petition from sundry citizens of Chesterfield county, Virginia, against the reduction of the duty on coal.

Several memorials from banks, favorable to the renewal of the charter of the United States bank, were presented.

The resolutions moved yesterday by Messrs. Chambers, Poindexter and Dickerson, were severally considered and agreed to.

The resolutions relative to the arrangement of the West India trade, submitted some days since by Mr. Sprague, were taken up, and at his instance, postponed.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being Mr. Clay's resolution on the subject of the tariff.

Mr. Hayne said, that he had received a communication from the gentleman who had, as chairman, signed the memorial of the late free trade convention, (Mr. Gallatin,) giving the information that an erroneous impression had been created elsewhere, as to the prayer of that petition, from some remarks which had fallen from him (Mr. H.) on that subject, and which had been erroneously reported. Mr. H. said he rose to correct that misapprehension, and would do so by simply reading that part of the memorial which related to the subject. It was in the following words, viz:

"Your memorialists respectfully pray—

"1st. That the duties be so reduced, as to leave, after the extinguishment of the public debt, only that amount of revenue which may be necessary to meet the ordinary exigencies of the government.

"2d. That allowing a reasonable time for the gradual reduction of the present exaggerated duties on some articles, the duties on all the imported articles, not free of duty be ultimately equalized, so as that the duty on any such articles shall not vary materially from the general average rate of all the duties together, or in other words, from a uniform duty ad valorem on all imported articles subject to duty.

"3d. That wines, teas, coffee, and similar articles, be not added to the list of those now free of duty, but may, on the contrary, be subject to duties corresponding in proportion to their respective value, with those laid on other imported articles, subject to duty."

Mr. Knight took occasion (before Mr. Tyler, who was entitled to the floor, proceeded,) to read to the senate some statements, to show the great amount of corn, flour, &c. imported from the southern states, into Rhode Island, for the consumption of the manufacturing districts.

Mr. Tyler, in allusion to this subject, said he had that morning received a letter from a neighbor and friend with whom he had had many good tempered controversies respecting the tariff—who wrote him thus: "I have just sold my crop of corn to a Yankee, to be carried by him to feed the New England manufacturers—rascals, who, if it were not for the abominable tariff, would make corn for themselves." Mr. T. in reading this letter, declared his belief that it evoked the greatest delusion of mind on the subject. He then resumed his remarks in opposition to the resolution, and continued until the usual hour of adjournment, when not having concluded, the senate adjourned over to Monday.

February 13. Mr. Clay, from the joint committee appointed on the subject, made a report relative to the mode of celebrating the centennial birth day of GEORGE WASHINGTON. It provides for an adjournment of the two houses from the 21st to the 23d instant, out of respect to his memory; divine service by the two chaplains of congress, that an oration be delivered, and that the remains of GEORGE WASHINGTON be removed, on his coming birth-day, from Mount Vernon, to the capital at the City of Washington, for interment, agreeably to the resolution of congress, of December 24th, 1799.

According to the report of Mr. Clay, the chief justice of the United States had been requested to deliver the oration; but owing to official engagements and physical causes, had declined.

The report being read, Mr. Clay offered resolutions relative to the removal and deposit of the remains. A debate ensued on the resolutions. They were advocated by Messrs. Clay, Webster, Sprague, Bibb, and Holmes, and opposed by Messrs. Forsyth, Yazewell, and Tyler. The resolutions finally passed by a vote of, ayes 29, nays 15.

The senate then went into the consideration of executive business; and having spent some time therein, adjourned.

February 14. After the disposal of some morning business—

The senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Clay's resolution respecting the tariff.

Mr. Tyler rose, and, in a speech of an hour and a half, concluded his argument against the resolution.

Mr. Knight followed in favor of the resolution. When Mr. Knight had concluded,

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the resolution was then postponed until to-morrow.

The senate took up the joint resolution from the other house in regard to the removal of the remains of Mrs. Washington, and the invitation of certain officers, &c. to unite in the ceremony of removing the remains of GEN. WASHINGTON. After some discussion, the resolution was agreed to. The senate then adjourned.

February 15. The joint resolution from the house of representatives, relative to the invitation of certain distinguished individuals, to attend the ceremonies of the 22d February, was taken up; and

On motion of Mr. Forsyth, the names of all except that of the president of the U. States were stricken out, and the resolution thus amended agreed to.

Mr. Holmes submitted resolutions calling upon the secretary of the treasury, to inform the senate why the statements of the foreign commerce of the U. States, required by the act of the 10th February, 1820, have not been transmitted to congress—and why he has not reported an answer to the senate's resolution of the 22d December, 1831, calling for information relative to the British colonial trade, and when the answer is to be expected.

The senate resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Clay, relative to the tariff.

Mr. Grundy spoke two hours against the resolution, when he gave way for a motion to that effect, and the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Feb. 10. Mr. McDuffie, from the committee of ways and means, to which was referred the memorial of the president, directors and company, of the bank of the United States; also, sundry memorials from other sources, relative to the renewal of the charter of the said bank, made a report thereon, accompanied by the following bill, to renew and modify the charter of the bank of the United States:

A bill to renew and modify the charter of the bank of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c. That the act entitled "an act to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States," approved the 10th day of April, 1816, shall be continued in force for the period of twenty years from the 3d of March, 1836, and that the power shall be reserved to congress to repeal this act at any time after ten years from the 3d of March, 1836, upon giving three years notice of such intended repeal to the president and directors of the said bank.

And be it further enacted, That the president of the United States, after the 3d day of March, 1836, shall appoint one of the directors of each of the branches of said bank, in the same manner as he now appoints a portion of the directors of the mother bank, and with the same limitations as to their eligibility and term of service.

And be it further enacted, That any officers of the mother bank who may be selected by the board of directors, and designated to the secretary of the treasury of the United States, shall be authorized to sign and counteract notes, which shall be binding and obligatory on the said corporation, in like manner, as if the same were signed and countersigned by the president and principal cashier or treasurer.

And be it further enacted, That the said bank is hereby prohibited from issuing any notes which are not upon the face of them declared to be payable at the office from which they may be issued; and also, from drawing any drafts or checks for twenty dollars or any smaller sum.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the bank to furnish annually on the first day of January, to the chief officer of the treasury of each state, a list of the holders of stock, in said bank, who are residents in such state, with the amount of the stock held by each stockholder; and nothing contained in the charter of the said bank or in this act, shall be deemed to restrain the several states from taxing the real estate of the said bank, situated therein, respectively, or the proprietary interest of their respective citizens in the stock of the said bank, to the same extent that they may tax other real estate within their jurisdiction, and like interests in the stock of other corporations, or money lent at interest.

And be it further enacted, That in consideration of the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by this act upon the said bank, the president, directors, and company thereof, shall pay to the United States, out of the corporate funds thereof, on the 3d day of March, 1837, and on the same day of each year thereafter, during the continuance of the charter, an interest at the rate of — per centum upon the deposits from time to time to the credit of the treasurer of the United States in the said bank and its branches, during the preceding year.

And be it further enacted, That, after the 3d day of March, 1836, the said bank shall not establish any additional branch thereof, without the consent of congress.

Mr. Wayne said he understood that there was a counter-report to be presented by the members in the minority on the committee. He wished the second reading of the bill to be postponed until Monday next, that both reports might be printed together.

After some explanation—

Mr. McDuffie moved that the bill be referred to a committee of the whole on the state of the union, and that the bill and report be printed. Ordered, and, on motion of Mr. Ingersoll, an additional number, viz: 5,000 copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Alexander, from the minority of the committee of ways and means, on the question, in that committee, of a renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States, made a counter-report containing the views of the said minority in relation to a renewal of the charter of said bank.

Ordered, That 5,000 copies of said report of the minority be printed for the use of this house.

Mr. Cambreleng moved certain resolutions relative to the semi-annual statements of the bank of the United States—the statements of its branches, and as to its dealings in foreign bills of exchange, &c.

Mr. Letcher reported a bill to construct a road from Zanesville in Ohio, to Florence in Alabama—twice read and referred.

A message was received from the president communicating surveys of the Savannah and Tennessee rivers.

Mr. Everett's resolution, relative to a call on the president for the 4th article of the Chickasaw treaty, came up for the consideration of the house—when,

Mr. Hogan addressed the house against the resolution. When he had concluded,

Mr. Wilde moved to refer the resolution to the committee of the whole. The yeas and nays were ordered on this motion; but before they were taken, the house proceeded to the orders of the day, and after the transaction of some private business, adjourned to Monday next.

Monday, Feb. 13. A number of memorials favorable to the renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States, were presented.

A resolution providing for the surveys of Green and Big Barren rivers, was taken up and passed.

Mr. Lyon presented a resolution to inquire as to the propriety of adopting a more uniform mode of computing the mileage of members of congress.

Mr. Carr moved a resolution to inquire into the propriety of paying for certain Indian depredations in the state of Indiana.

Mr. Thomas, of Louisiana, from the joint committee appointed on the subject, made a report on the celebration of the centennial anniversary of GEORGE WASHINGTON's birth day.

The question of concurring with the report of the committee coming up, an animated debate ensued, which occupied the house until half past six.

The report was finally agreed to, by a vote of yeas 109, nays 76.

Tuesday, Feb. 14. Mr. Jarvis presented a resolution authorizing the painting of a full length likeness of WASHINGTON, to be placed in the hall of the house of representatives.

Mr. Adair moved a resolution inviting the president of the United States and the heads of departments, to attend at the ceremonies of the 22d inst. The resolution was afterwards amended by including the names of James Madison, Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, the judges of the supreme court, the post master general, and the relatives of WASHINGTON—passed.

Mr. Bates, of Maine, offered a resolution providing for the removal of the remains of Mrs. MARTHA WASHINGTON. Agreed to.

The house resumed the consideration of the apportionment bill—the question being on Mr. Clayton's motion to reconsider the vote, by which the ratio of "48,000" was stricken out and "44,400" inserted in lieu thereof; Mr. Clayton afterwards withdrew his motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. Evans's motion to insert 44,500 in lieu of 44,400, as at present in the bill—decided in the affirmative; yeas 108, nays 80.

After various motions as to the ratio, on motion of Mr. Polk, the bill was recommitted with instructions to insert 47,700 in lieu of 44,500. The house then adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 15. Mr. Drayton reported a bill for satisfying certain militia claims of the state of Georgia.

Mr. Washington reported a bill for improving Pennsylvania avenue, supplying the public buildings with water, &c.

After various propositions as to the number of the ratio of representation, the house concurred in 47,700, and ordered the bill to a third reading to-morrow; and then adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 16. On motion of Mr. Letcher, a resolution was adopted calling on the secretary of war for a statement of certain contracts made for cannon and shot.

A message was received from the president relative to the migration of the Indians.

The speaker laid before the house certain correspondence relative to the remains of Washington.

The apportionment bill was read a third time and passed. Yeas 130, nays 58.

The bill to settle the military claims of South Carolina, was ordered to a third reading, by a vote of yeas 130, nays 47.

A bill making appropriations for the revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1832.

A bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1832.

The bill to provide for the payment of arrearages in the naval service, chargeable to the emancipated contingent; prior to the first day of January, 1832.

A bill making appropriations for fortifications for the year 1832; were severally read and concurred in by the house, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MESSRS. POINDEXTER AND MOORE, OF THE SENATE, &c.

From the National Intelligencer, of Feb. 10.

The "card" which appears in our columns to-day is inserted reluctantly, but under a sense of duty to the senators of the United States by whom it is authorized, upon whom an attack has been made in the N. York Courier and Enquirer of a nature hardly to be answered by argument. With less provocation than has been given for it, we should have declined publishing the card. Were it merely personal in its character, we should have declined it. But it concerns grave, deliberate charges of subornation and corrupt wickedness against two members of the senate, which crimes are alleged to have been consummated on the floor of that body. We have no disposition to copy the whole of the article in the N. York paper, (of Feb. 7), to which the "card" refers, but we extract a sentence or two to shew the aggravated considerations which influence us to yield our inclination in this matter to a sense of justice.

The subject of the article is Mr. Clement, whose letter, it may be recollected, accompanied the speech of Mr. Pinckney on Mr. Van Buren's nomination. Referring to Mr. C. the Courier and Enquirer says—

"It now appears that this adventurer has found his way to Washington and there been retained by the honorable Mr. Moore, of Alabama, and Mr. Pinckney, of Mississippi, to coin falsehoods, and do such other dirty work as the new triumvirate may carve out for him."

The article in question further says—

"We pronounce the whole statement to be without the shadow of foundation—a wilful falsehood purchased by those who used it."

"We cannot vouch for the truth of his statement; but taking it in connexion with his letter, which must have been paid for—and believing as we do, that any persons who would vote as these gentlemen did on the nomination of Mr. Van Buren, would not hesitate to buy the falsehoods of such a man," &c.

"It is true—and we do not doubt it—then have these men disgraced themselves and the senate by as corrupt and unprincipled a purchase of fabricated charges as ever has been exposed to the just indignation of an insulted people."

A CARD.

It must be obvious to every honorable man, that Mr. Pinckney, of Mississippi, and Mr. Moore, of Alabama, cannot stoop to notice the infamous falsehoods which appear in the columns of the N. York Courier and Enquirer, relating to their recent vote on the nomination of Martin Van Buren. The editor has been regularly purchased, and paid for, by a lucrative office which he holds in the city of New York; it is his business to circulate through his columns lies to order—wholesale or retail; and no one can doubt that he, as in duty bound, faithfully performs his contract.

This king of the Jews, who has sold his character, and his conscience, and, like Judas, would sell his God for thirty pieces of silver, cannot be made to feel the influence of truth, or the reproaches to which his vile columns subject him; he is safe behind the mud-wall which he has erected as a secure battery, to protect him from all the approaches of virtue and honor. But as he alleges, and it cannot be doubted, that the infamous slanders which he publishes are manufactured for the occasion, and forwarded to him by members of either house of congress from New York: such member or members are thus publicly notified that if they dare to show their faces, and advance from behind the dark curtain which conceals them, they will meet with the most prompt and respectful attention from those whom they seek to calumniate through a corrupt, irresponsible journal.

TO THE PUBLIC.

I have read in the New York Courier and Enquirer, of the 7th instant, an article headed Samuel E. Clement, containing, among other things, an affidavit of John H. S. Browere, and alleging, upon the authority of two members of Congress, that I had informed the gentlemen referred to, that I "had been engaged to edit a newspaper in the state of Mississippi, by Mr. Poindexter, of that state, and Mr. Moore, of Alabama; that Mr. Poindexter had agreed to contribute his portion of the expense of establishing the paper in cash, but that in consequence of Mr. Moore being somewhat embarrassed in his circumstances, he had proposed giving an endorsed note for fifteen hundred dollars, that being his portion of the sum required." The same article alleges that my letter, addressed to Mr. Poindexter, by him submitted to the senate, and afterwards appended to his speech delivered on Mr. Van Buren's nomination, was a "wilful falsehood purchased by those who used it; and that I had been retained by the honorable Mr. Moore, of Alabama, and Mr. Poindexter, of Mississippi, to coin falsehoods, and do such other dirty work as the new triumvirate may carve out for him."

For the libel on myself, contained in this publication, I deemed it my duty to arrest James Watson Webb, the editor of the Courier and Enquirer, who is now in the custody of the marshal. In reply to the statement of John H. J. Browere, and the allegation that I had been removed from office by Mr. Barry, I give the most unqualified denial, to sustain which, I will, in a few days, submit proofs the most unquestionable. The statement relative to governor Poindexter and governor Moore, is a base and infamous falsehood.

The Courier quotes the conclusion of my letter in these words: "I regret that I am thus called upon to repeat any remarks that may have been inadvertently made to a friend," and applies the word FRIEND to Mr. Van Buren. This is a deliberate misrepresentation. I never claimed Mr. Van Buren as my friend. I was the friend of the administration, not the partisan of Mr. Van Buren. The "remarks" referred to, were those made to another individual in the course of a casual observation the evening before Mr. Van Buren's rejection. The substance of those remarks were by him communicated to Mr. Poindexter, and his note, with a memorandum by Mr. Poindexter, asking that the facts might be communicated in writing, was all that ever passed between governor Poindexter and myself upon the subject. Governor Moore was not consulted, and could not have known of the letter until it was submitted to the senate.

SAMUEL E. CLEMENT.

A CARD.

Washington city, Gadaby's hotel, Feb. 11, 1832.

In a "card" published in the National Intelligencer and United States Telegraph this day, Gov. Poindexter of Mississippi, and Gov. Moore of Alabama—both members of the senate of the United States, charge the surveyor of the port of New York, with writing the article which appeared in the editorial columns of the New York Courier and Enquirer, on the 7th instant, and of which the following is an extract:

"What we have stated as to Mr. Clement's knowledge of Mr. Van Buren, and the circumstances under which he became the depository of Mr. Van Buren's confidence, we have from two members of congress from this state, whose veracity never has been questioned, and on their authority we make the following statement, for the truth of which we are ready to vouch:"

"Mr. Clement informed the gentlemen referred to, some days previous to the appearance of his letter, that he had been engaged to edit a newspaper in the state of Mississippi, by Mr. Poindexter of Mississippi, and Mr. Moore of Alabama—that Mr. Poindexter had agreed to contribute his portion of the expense of establishing the paper in cash, but that in consequence of Mr. Moore being somewhat embarrassed in his circumstances, he had proposed giving an endorsed note for fifteen hundred dollars, that being his portion of the sum required."

"Thinking as we do, that Clement is an unprincipled fellow, and has written what he knows to be false in relation to Mr. Van Buren, we cannot vouch for the truth of his statement; but taking it in connexion with his letter, which must have been paid for—and believing as we do, that any person who would vote as these gentlemen did on the nomination of Mr. Van Buren, would not hesitate to buy the falsehoods of such a man as Clement, we give to the statement full credence. If it be true, and we do not doubt it, then have these men disgraced themselves and the senate, by as corrupt and unprincipled a purchase of fabricated charges, as has ever been exposed to the just indignation of an insulted people. To that people, and to their own consciences, we leave them and their resurrection man, Samuel E. Clement."

"The undersigned does not deem it necessary to comment upon the undignified character of the "card" of the honorable senators, but begs leave respectfully to assure them, that the entire article referred to, was written by him, and forwarded for publication from this city. The two material facts alleged in that article, are—first, that the disclosures said to have been made by Mr. Van Buren to Clement, were, according to Clement's own admission, made at his first interview with Mr. Van Buren, which was purely accidental, and never but once repeated. Second, that Clement had asserted that gov. Poindexter and gov. Moore offered to furnish him with funds for the establishment of a newspaper in the state of Mississippi. These two charges are now repeated, they are susceptible of proof at any moment, and for their truth, as well as for whatever opinions or sentiments are contained in the article alluded to, the undersigned holds himself personally responsible. He would further inform these honorable senators, that the members of congress from New York referred to in the foregoing extract, do not seek concealment "behind" a "dark curtain," and that an application to the undersigned for their names, or for any other purpose, "will meet with the most prompt and respectful attention from" their obedient servant,

JAMES WATSON WEBB.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

From the National Intelligencer.

The treaty with France, recently ratified by the senate of the United States, and the ratifications of which were exchanged with the French minister (M. Serurier), on the 2d instant, was yesterday transmitted by the president to congress; and we had an opportunity of hastily running over its contents. The first article, which is the most important to claimants at least, is in the following words:

"Article 1. The French government, in order to liberate itself completely from all the reclamations preferred against it by the citizens of the United States, for unlawful seizures, captures, acquiescences, confiscations, or destructions of their vessels, cargoes, or other property, engages to pay a sum of twenty-five millions of francs to the government of the United States, who shall distribute it among those entitled, in the manner and according to the rules which it shall determine."

Art. 2 provides that the above sum is to be paid at Paris in six annual instalments, with interest at the rate of four per cent. on each of the instalments.

Art. 3 and 4 provide that the government of the United States, on its part, for the purpose of being liberated from all reclamations, &c. is to pay to the government of France the sum of 1,500,000 francs, in six annual instalments, &c.

Art. 5 provides that this treaty will not preclude the prosecution of claims, other than those coming within its scope, in the courts of the two countries respectively.

Art. 6 provides that the two governments shall reciprocally furnish any documentary evidence in their possession to facilitate the adjudication of claims.

Art. 7 is in the following words:

"The wines of France, from and after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention, shall be admitted to consumption in the states of the union at duties which shall not exceed the following rates by the gallon, (such as is used at present for wines in the U. States), to wit: six cents for red wine in casks; ten cents for white wine in casks; and twenty-two cents for wines of all sorts in bottles. The proportion existing between the duties on French wines thus reduced, and the general rates of the tariff which went into operation the 1st of January, 1829, shall be maintained in case the government of the United States should think proper to diminish those general rates in a new tariff.

"In consideration of this stipulation, which shall be binding on the United States for ten years, the French government abandons the reclamations which it had formed in relation to the 8th article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana. It engages, moreover, to establish on long staple cottons of the United States, which, after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention, shall be brought directly thence to France by the vessels of the United States, or by French vessels, the same duties as on short staple cottons."

Art. 8 provides for the exchange of ratifications.

THE RUSSIAN TARIFF.

From a London paper of December, 23.

The accounts received yesterday from St. Petersburg, bring a copy of the new tariff of duties, which had been issued by order of the emperor of Russia. The document occasioned much surprise among the merchants and others connected with the Baltic trade. On the 19th ult. (O. S.) the order was put into force at the customs; an additional duty of 12½ per cent. on all imports, not entered before the 19th, with the exception of brimstone, corks, and corkwood; besides which, the duty is increased for the importation of 1832, on the undermentioned articles, as follows:

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE,

ON THE NOMINATION OF MARTIN VAN BUREN.

Remarks of Mr. Marcy.

Mr. Marcy said, that he had intimated heretofore, more than once, that it was not his intention to offer to the senate any observations upon the main question now before them. What regarded the public conduct of the present minister to London, was better understood by other members, and what was to be said in explanation or vindication of it, would be better said and better received from most of them, by reason of their great experience in public affairs, and their particular knowledge of the transactions which have been brought under review in this discussion. He had determined that it would be his duty to trouble the senate with remarks, only, in case topics should be introduced into the debate, with which he might well be supposed, from his local situation, to be particularly acquainted.

The occasion which rendered it proper that he should say something, had arisen in consequence of what had fallen from the honorable senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay). His attack was not confined to the nominee; it reached the state, which he, (Mr. M.) represented in this body. One of the grounds of opposition to the minister to London, taken by the senator from Kentucky, was the pernicious system of party politics adopted by the present administration, by which the honors and offices were put up to be scrambled for by partisans, &c. A system, which the minister to London, as the senator from Kentucky alleged, had brought here from the state in which he formerly lived, and had for so long a time acted a conspicuous part in its political transactions. I know, sir, said Mr. M., that it is the habit of some gentlemen to speak with censure or reproach of the politics of New York. Like other states, we have contests, and, as a necessary consequence, triumphs and defeats. The state is large, with great and diversified interests; in some parts of it, commerce is the object of general pursuit; in others, manufactures and agriculture are the chief concerns of its citizens. We have men of enterprise and talents, who aspire to public distinction. It is natural to expect from these circumstances, and others that might be alleged to, that her politics should excite more interest at home, and attract more attention abroad, than those of many other states in the confederacy.

It may be, sir, that the politicians of the United States are not so fastidious as some gentlemen are, as to disclosing the principles on which they act. They boldly preach what they practise. When they are contending for victory, they avow their intentions of enjoying the fruits of it. If they are defeated, they expect to retire from office. If they are successful, they claim, as a matter of right, the advantages of success. They see nothing wrong in the rule, that to the victor belongs the spoils of the enemy.

But if there be any thing wrong in the policy which the senator from Ky. has so strongly reprobated, he should know that this policy was not confined to the minister to London and his friends in New York, but is practised by him, (Mr. Clay's), own political friends in that state; he should know that if to one man more than any other now living, the existence of that policy is to be ascribed, it is to one of the senator's own political friends. The practice of making extensive changes in the offices, on the change of parties in that state was begun, I believe, before the nominee was upon the political stage; certainly while he was quite a young man, and before he had acquired great consideration in political affairs. I must be permitted, sir, to say, that, of all the party men with whom I have acted, or been particularly acquainted, (and the number of such is not small), I know of no one who has acted with, or advised to, more moderation than the person whose nomination we are now considering.

When the senator from Kentucky condemns the present administration for making removals from office, and then ascribes the act to the pernicious system of politics imported from N. York, I fear he does not sufficiently consider the peculiar circumstances under which the present administration came into power. General Jackson did not come in under the same circumstances that Mr. Adams did, or Mr. Monroe, or Mr. Madison. His accession was like that of Mr. Jefferson. He came in, sir, upon a political revolution. The contest was without a parallel. Much political bitterness was engendered. Criminations and recriminations were made. Slanders of a most extraordinary character flooded the land. When the present chief magistrate took upon himself the administration of the government, he found almost all the officers, from the highest to the lowest, filled by political enemies. That his cabinet was composed of his friends no one will complain. The reasons for thus composing it will apply with considerable force to many of the officers under the hands of the several departments.

If the dismissal of the subordinate officers in these departments were made, it will not be asserted that all opposed to the administration were discharged. I have heard it confidently asserted, by those who I supposed spoke with knowledge on the subject, that many, perhaps majority of those retained—and almost all were retained—belonged to the opposition—they are the political supporters of the honorable senator from Kentucky.

I have good reasons—very good reasons, for believing that it is the gentleman's rule of conduct, to take care of his friends when he is in power. It requires not the foresight of a prophet, to predict, that if he shall come into power, he will take care of his friends, and if he does, I can assure him, I shall not complain; nor shall he be in the least surprised if he imitates the example which he now so emphatically disavows.

Now I am up, I will offer a few words relative to the much censured instructions to our former minister to England. I must say, I have discovered in them nothing to merit or provoke the harsh strictures bestowed on them. They do not, in my opinion, furnish a fit occasion for the senator from Kentucky, to impute to Mr. Van Buren, as he has done, with passionate emphasis, the frequent violation of a charge of fidelity and culpable ignorance. The language, which he desired might be taken down, is, "that Mr. Van Buren stated what was false or that he was culpably ignorant for not knowing that it was false." The instructions allege, that those who first asserted certain claims to interfere with the regulations of Great Britain, as to the colonial trade, abandoned them. The senator from Kentucky chooses to consider this a declaration, that the administration first asserted the claims, and then abandoned them. If we admit his construction to be the true one, to what does it amount? He does not deny—indeed it is expressly admitted, that the late administration asserted the claims, and then waived them.

What is then the mighty difference between the assertion in the instructions, and the fact as admitted here? We are told that the instructions were not the first to assert them—that they were set up under the administration of Mr. Monroe. If this pretended falsehood is of such flagitious character as has been given to it, it is natural to expect that it would change very materially the meaning of the sentence. It there be the least error in the instructions, it is in the use of the word first; strike out that word and let us see whether the meaning of the sentence is materially changed. Why then the late administration was the first to assert the claims, and then gave them up or asserted them after they had been previously asserted by Mr. Monroe's administration. If there was any thing wrong or reprehensible in asserting claims or pretensions, and then, give them up, the course incurred by the late administration for so doing, is not much mitigated by the circumstance that a preceding administration had asserted similar claims or pretensions. It appears to me that if a cause of censure had not been very much waived, such an one as this would not have been hinted up and put forth as presently.

The manner in which our late minister to London was instructed to conduct the negotiation, may, for ought I know, be unusual; but it does not appear to me to be censurable. The whole affair presents itself to me as a very plain matter. The British government, by their act of parliament of 1815, offered to the United States a participation in the trade with her American colonies on certain conditions, the particulars of which it is not at all necessary now to consider.

The administration, for some reason or other—probably in the hope of getting better—refused the terms offered, and claimed more advantageous ones as a matter of right; but afterwards, finding, I presume, that better terms could not be obtained, and their claim of right could not be sustained, concluded to take those that were first offered and had been refused. When they proposed to take these terms, the British government told them they were too late, and positively refused to grant what it had before offered. The colonial trade was lost to the country. The late administration attempted to recover it—they made more than one attempt to open a negotiation with the British government, for the purpose of obtaining that trade on the very terms on which it had been offered to, and refused by them. This was the situation of affairs when that administration went out of power. The commercial interests of the country required that their successors, who thought the terms offered by the British government should have been accepted, should make an effort to regain that important trade. As negotiation had been repeatedly and peremptorily refused to the government of the United States, it was necessary to offer some excuse for attempting it again. That excuse was formed in the public and notorious fact, that the administration of the affairs of the United States had passed from the hands of those who had refused the offered terms, into the hands of those who thought the offered terms ought to have been accepted, and who conceived their predecessor to be accepting them. Mr. McLane was instructed to use this fact to remove any obstacle to opening the negotiation for the recovery of the lost West India trade, in case any obstacle should be interposed on account of the manner in which the late administration had managed this affair. I confess that I cannot see any thing wrong in these much censured instructions. I see no involving of favors on party considerations—no subordination of honor or dignity. Gentlemen may call it a conspiracy; but I call it a plain dealing, and the result has shown it was a successful negotiation.

Remarks of Mr. Miller.

Mr. President I understood the honorable senator from Massachusetts, when he addressed the senate early in the debate to say, that he intended to move to have the injunction of secrecy removed, with a view that the public might be informed as to the grounds upon which this nomination had been opposed and supported; and, from the expression of opinion from those around me, I have no doubt but that motion will prevail. The situation in which I stand in relation to the parties here, and at home, require me briefly to assign my reasons for the vote I shall give. I may be permitted to declare I have the most perfect respect for this body, individually and collectively. The observations I shall make are to be shown to the public, the senate, and my constituents for a specific inquiry into the conduct of those who stand around me, in the hurry of debate, making of severity on the conduct of the nomination, it will be considered as springing from a conscious sense of what I owe to myself and the state I do represent; and not as, in the slightest degree, to implicate the feelings of any one here, much less influence their opinions. Thus called on to give a vote on a responsible and delicate subject, it would have been desirable that I should have the same grounds to rest on which others have had who have remarked in the debate; but I have not this consolation. Upon this question I am isolated, and have reasons which have not as yet been brought forward, which are peculiar to myself. I stand here like one of the sons of Ishmael, my hand is against every one, and the hand of every one against me.

The senator from Mississippi (Mr. Poindexter,) said, on yesterday he had heard, in his absence, that a motion had been introduced for a specific inquiry into the conduct of those who stand around his superintendence, of the state department, and that this inquiry had been resisted by his friends. And I understood the honorable member from Georgia to say, the senator from Mississippi was misinformed as to the course of the friendship the nominee on these motions. Sir, it will be recollected, when this appointment first came under consideration, that I suggested doubts upon my mind in relation to it. I supported the motion to refer it to the committee on foreign relations, desiring to submit myself under the authority of that most respectable and enlightened committee, upon several points incidentally thrown out, such as to the cause of the late dissolution of the cabinet; the propriety of having a resident minister at the court of St. James' when we had only a charge of affairs from that court here; and the propriety and reasons of the recall from that court of our very popular minister, Mr. McLane. It was then urged by a senator from Georgia (Mr. Kane,) a gentleman of high intelligence and sterling character, that the character of the senate required the investigation, after the suggestions thrown out by myself. I certainly did not intend to put the character of the senate in issue by any thing thrown out by me; nor do I think it was so placed; but it is equally certain I meant, and had the right to put the character of this applicant for office in issue, so far as to clear up my objections to him; if unclouded thereby. When the resolutions of the senator from Maine were under consideration, I did not entirely concur in the propriety of sending them to the committee. There were objections to the call made on the president, which might involve the senate in difficulty. I doubt the expediency of one branch of the government ever formally asking another co-ordinate branch to state the reasons of its conduct. There are questions of privilege of a delicate character, which ought not to be sported with. We ought not to put ourselves ever in a position to be insulted with impunity. When we make a call on the president, it ought to be such a one as we have the right to insist on being responded to. Hence early in the session, before I was yet warm in my seat, I objected to the call proposed to be made by the senators from Maine, on the subject of the northeastern boundary. I voted therefore with the mover, to lay the resolutions on the table; but I certainly did believe that those who voted against laying the resolutions on the table, were not in a position to be insulted with impunity; and must admit, any impression as to the course the friends of the nominee did send, are in confirmation of the views taken by my friend from Mississippi. I can scarcely be mistaken on this matter; but lest I may be so, I take the liberty to put directly the question to the senator from Georgia, (Mr. Forsyth,) whether he did not by voting to lay on the table the resolutions of the senator from Maine, intend to follow up his vote, if successful, by voting to reject them (Mr. Kane,) replied rose and answered, that he did intend so to vote, to reject them.

I perceive I did not err in the opinion I entertained of the course of the friends of the nominee, and in conformity with what was suggested by them, I have taken the trouble to inform myself on some of the points. Yet I still would be satisfied to let a committee be charged with this subject, should the friends of the nominee require it. Otherwise, from the facts I have heard and believe (the names of the gentlemen giving the information are not authorized to be given up); they are the most intelligent and respectable, on whose statements I rely most implicitly, I have determined to vote in the negative on this question. The gentleman from Georgia has told us, that he is both the personal and political friend of the nominee. In this he has the advantage of me. I never had the honor to see him; I did not happen to meet with him in our pilgrimage, once considered myself his political friend. I must not, however, be misled by the names of those who may be considered the faithful adherents of the present administration. I am left to follow, untrammelled by the force of party, what is right, approving what is commendable, and censuring what is reprehensible. Upon the objections of a personal and political character, I reckon not the least the agency he has had in situating the president from a portion of his old and not his votary personal friends, his friends and supporters, rendering a very respectable and useful service to the people of South Carolina distressed, moreover less, to the chief magistrate, whom they have formerly held in the highest estimation, as well for his public services as for his supposed sound political principles. For my own part, I was hired up with a personal regard for the charector of the president—he was the native of my own district, reared up by one relation, and him self the patron of another. My father was his friend—he taught my elder brothers and sister the first rudiments of their education. I hope the senate will pardon me for reading a sentence or two extracted from an address made by myself previous to his election, as illustrative how far I sustained him, upon personal as well as political grounds.

Extract from a speech at dinner at Sumpter, 1828.

"Permit me to return you my sincere thanks for the complimentary notice it has pleased you to bestow upon old Waxaw. He must have a heart as cold as marble, who does not kindle with enthusiasm at the mention of his native land. My kindest and most endearing recollections are blended with that little spot of land to be found on our map, between the angle made by the North Carolina line and the Catawba river. It was there I was first made to admire the fame and the talents of Davie. It was there that Jackson was the idol of the country, in the mild radiance of his youthful virtue, a long before the lustre of his name, as a distinguished and able general, had overpassed an admiring and grateful nation. While all of us are proud that our state has the honor of presenting to the republic a great a man, I can assure you that Jackson is equally proud of the land of his nativity. We have a guaranty, in the philosophy of nature, of his local attachments. Should your predictions and your hopes be realized, and the 4th of March next shall give us Jackson as our president, the triumph will be one of magnificence and grandeur. It will be a triumph of the people, over the power and patronage of the government—it will be a triumph of the spirit of the constitution over its abuse and perverted exposition. We may then hope to see, and to elect, a practical and common sense administration. No light-houses in the skies—no splendid missions—no entangling alliances—no governmental excursions to bring out the capabilities of the nation, by partial, unjust, and unconstitutional legislation. Bred up in the Jefferson school—elevated by the democracy of the country, we shall look to him to restore simplicity and economy. We shall see a pure patriot, who, having power and influence, will use it to add not to the prosperity of the union, I then will the enemies of the constitution be confounded, and its friends rejoice at the illustrations. It will be emphatically a great day to the American people, and a glorious one for S. Carolina."

Now, sir, it will, I think, by almost every one who hears me, be admitted that the events of the present administration have not entitled me to much consideration as a prophet. Indeed, immediately after the address a very distinguished and highly valued friend of mine, now in the city, was older and better acquainted with men than myself, wrote to me and pleasantly remarked that so much of my address as alluded to General Jackson, was ad captivandum he presumed. But I replied, with the greatest sincerity, that I did hope and believe if he were elected, should appoint a strong cabinet, and bring about him the best talents of the country, his decision of character and purity of purpose, aided by sound constitutional advisers, such predictions would be verified. That the y had failed signally, and hence now to the one who alludes to the local attachments of General Jackson, to S. Carolina, I readily admit, and for that failure, as far as my vote will go, I intend to make the nominee responsible.

I happened to be in Charleston, from which place I reside some distance, when the news of the late cabinet was announced, although none of the rumors, of dishonest and disturbing character in relation to "Barham" and Mr. Eaton, had taken hold of the public mind, his appointment was unpopular. And the 4th of March was not considered as an infelicitous manifestation of popular gratification, owing to the objections taken to the cabinet by some of the distinguished citizens of Charleston, not now my political friends. It was urged that Mr. Eaton had never the talents, the weight of character, or scientific information, to make efficient and successful the administration.

Although it was understood that the gentlemen in congress from South Carolina—who abstained from any opposition, who toiled gallantly in the house, and at home in the canvass, did not seek any reward but an honest and faithful administration of the government. It was supposed by us at home that their claims would not be overlooked.

I believe the president did go so far as to tell the eminent and accomplished gentleman now chief magistrate at South Carolina, but for his violent and decided anti tariff sentiments, he would have made him secretary of war. Sir, I regret to find that I think the American people regret it. There were considerations of a political nature, which would have made this a most felicitous appointment. The popular attractions of this gentleman, his talents, his manners, and finally bearing, might have staid the rapid decay of public confidence in the administration of the national government in general, and furnished a better ground for his friends at home to suppress their expressions were less substantial if he participated in their perceptions. Sir, the organization of the cabinet was, no doubt, the result of an impetuous and preconceived scheme, to make the nominee the successor, and Mr. Eaton was the instrument through which it was effected.

Mr. Branch, from North Carolina, Berrien, from Georgia, and Rives sent to France, from Virginia, were intended to complement those states. South Carolina was skipped in the arrangement, and why? It was because you rejected them. You made the obstacle to the approach of popular favor with the administration at its commencement, even up to the moment Van Buren was introduced into South Carolina—upon the adjournment of congress, 1830, no doubt the result of a preconceived by a back from the mountains, and a wave from the shores at the same time. From that time, the claims of our citizens were, for the first time, taken notice of. Those only confined to the party who now favor the pretensions of the nominee. Sir, we have an appointment now on the table of charge of affairs in Belgium, a Frenchman who, par excellence, claim to be the union party—one every way worthy of the trust as I have already borne testimony to, and I am told we have another arrival today from the same quarter in quest of executive favor.

Nothing will be left undone which is presumed likely to give the minority the ascendancy in South Carolina. Every man of any consequence among them has a right to expect something—vice president, governor of a territory, minister, or charge of affairs, of something else. And where are they? We are informed of their existence by their memorial presented against the tariff and nullification. As they have come into the senate as a party, I shall speak of them as such. The great body of this party, resident in Charleston, took it into their heads, on the last 4th of July, to celebrate that day as a party, and sent for foreign aid, made a formal communication to the president to continue their assistance—something after the manner of the instructions to Mr. McLane—and the aid was furnished in a letter containing a threat against the opposite party of military force, to coerce state legislation to conform to federal legislation. Sir, this letter has given umbrage to the majority of the Jackson party in South Carolina, for the other party is composed principally, I mean in Charleston, of Adams men; men who look to the general government for favor and patronage, who follow the changes of successive presidents like the sun flower does the sun.

This letter has been publicly censured in the popular meetings of the people, and by the legislature. I hope I will be excused for making a single remark upon the character of the threat intimated in this letter. It sometimes happens that our most able and distinguished men, those most favorable to constitutional right and civil liberty, in the possession of private power, do forget right—Such was the case with that great apostle of free institutions, Mr. Jefferson, when he took it into his head that because he wished to see laws faithfully executed, he had a right to use the military force of the United States to turn a private citizen out of his possession of what was thought by him, the then president, public property. (I mean near the battery, New Orleans.) And pray how did he escape the responsibility of the law for so doing, when he was sued for the value of the thing? Livingstone, who is now writing a learned book, in the shape of instructions to his lawyers about the legal right of the United States to the property in dispute, but by his counselling pro nullity; placing his defence on the technical legal ground, that he could not be sued in Virginia, for a trespass committed in Louisiana; certainly, not a very meritorious defence, for the military head of the nation. Well it may be asked, what would be the result of the president sending a military force against the state laws of South Carolina. Sir, if he headed his force himself, one of our judges would wring him with a rule, as Dominic Hall did, when at the head of his army, and if he did not obey the rule, he would be committed. We have his own precedent, that as a peaceable citizen, he would submit to the constitution, which makes the civil authority of a state greater than the military authority of the United States.

Without resting wholly on the objection taken to the exceptionable circumstance, in which Mr. McLane is desired to place his own government in the wrong, I agree entirely in the force and power of the arguments against this appointment, in that particular. It will furnish a decided reproof to such public functionaries as desire to compromise the national honor, from personal motives. I consider the attempt to suture Mr. Van Buren under the responsibility of the president entirely indefensible, he is, in law and in fact, the man who is responsible.

Would any one consider the president responsible for the position taken in the last report of the secretary of the treasury? We have his report distinctly at variance with the president's views on the bank, and alleged to be his own, for which the president is not responsible. Here then is proof that the heads of the departments are considered the responsible organs of the government, in their respective spheres. I deprecate as criminal all efforts by politicians to avail themselves of foreign assistance, who then it is an attempt of union men in South Carolina to enlist in their cause the general government, or secretary of state of the United States, to propitiate Great Britain. My patriotic prompts me to go for South Carolina against the United States, and the United States against the world. No statement of correct feeling or correct principles would ever as to a foreign government put his own in the wrong. I know it is often the practice of secondary men, those who find themselves in the back ground at home, to take such a position as will make them popular abroad; I do not envy such men their inglorious distinction; I want no better evidence of the want of good sense, or good feeling, to find any one setting himself up against public opinion at home, as the champion of an interest abroad. It remains yet to be seen whether the great benefits of this treaty, achieved by rebellions on the constituted authorities of the nation, will be more substantial than the amazing favor, of granting, by special grace, the anti tariff and anti nullification memorial, to go to the committee on finance.

I have understood upon the best authority, a member of congress then, but now, that this odious tariff act of 1828, became a law owing to Mr. Van Buren's failure to redeem a pledge to vote against amendments, which would have prevented the nullifiers to a certain extent, voting for the same, thereby, after putting his hands on a political firebrand in a more substantial than would have been, had they have treated him as inimical. With these evidence of a faithless conduct towards the southern interests, he could scarcely expect to become a favorite with those whom he had deceived.

Sir, one of the most decided objections I have to the confirmation of this appointment, is, that the most active influence of the patronage of the government was exercised with a view to make this nominee at the end of the present incumbent's term of office, the president. I believe this power was exercised for this purpose, to a criminal and corrupt extent. I have been informed by a gentleman of the most unquestionable integrity and high character, that the post office patronage was avowedly lent to this purpose; and that within one month after the late secretary of state took possession of the seals, the postmasters, by order of that department, were appointed upon this principle, removed or retained by this criterion, and some very singular specifications of the circuit through which the applicants made their approaches and sent in their adhesion, were detailed to me. The senator from Maryland, (Mr. Smith), has told us of instances in Maryland, in which the proscriptive principle was not applied to the friends of the late administration. Sir, that was not the test. It would have been more satisfactory to have known whether, in the exercise of the rule, some indication was not afforded to those who were preferred, that Mr. Van Buren for president. This was, I understood, the passport, the Shibolet, which admitted to the treasury through those departments under the control of the secretary of state. This is not all: I am informed, he introduced, under his patronage and influence, mere boys into profitable appointments, one not more than 16 or 17 years of age, in the most wanton exercise of official favoritism, thus perverting the public trust, and abusing his power not only in turning out, but in turning in.

In the south the proscriptive system never was adopted, nor could it be. It is so odious—so much at war with the principles of justice, that no administration could venture to adopt it in S. Carolina. For my own part I do not think the power to turn out one man and put in another, as a mere arbitrary exertion of executive authority, does exist. I think it a violation of the constitution, and I think myself to maintain any course which this senate can adopt to restrain the use of such power. It is the essence of tyranny, and the precedent on which it rests is to be found in those gloomy days of federalism and consolidation, when those of the convention which formed our constitution, who wished to have a monarchy, were entrusted with the new government as the friends of the constitution; when the preamble to the first revenue law was interpolated with an imbedded power, when the judiciary act was enacted, when the alien and sedition laws were considered constitutional; when, in fact, it was thought nothing but fair by the advocates of monarchy and executive power and supremacy, to acquire, by construction, under the constitution, what they failed to get in the convention. I am prepared to put my negative on its exercise. It is at war with civil liberty and the genius of our institutions, and ought to be abandoned or prohibited. I am perfectly satisfied that practices have been introduced in its most odious form, and brought secretly to bear upon the president by a ringleader left here in the interest of the nominee.

Again, sir: It is pretty generally admitted that the court party was established under the auspices of the late secretary of state, and speaks his sentiments, and acts under general instructions to pursue such a policy as will bring him into power.

One of the means resorted to, to effect this purpose in the south, is to strengthen the northern or union party in South Carolina, who are supposed to be friendly to him, and use up the love of union with the lure of peace; transfer through the affection the people bear to the president, their attachment to his favorite, and to widen and accerate the president towards his old Carolina friends; hence, when no hope exists for whipping in any one into the views of the central frugency, the most bitter denunciations are pronounced on them "by authority." Thus, when Branch, Ingham and Herndon, honest and honorable men who know the strength of the court party, even express a willingness to act on principle with the administration notwithstanding their personal wrong, the understrappers of the nominee tell them they are influenced by fear of the people. In pursuance of the same reckless spirit of hostility towards those it is my pride and my honor to be identified with, while this nomination is pending, the following article appears in the Globe:

"It is evident that the political leaders of the nullifiers are not ready to come out in open hostility to the president, because that would go to defeat their own efforts to control the state of South Carolina, and while they cunningly contrive to keep a footing among the South Carolina Jacksonians, gradually to undermine him there, they proclaim to the rest of the union that they entertain feelings of gratification in considering the late message of the president as affording indications of a change more favorable than heretofore to the principles maintained" by them. Thus, it is hoped, will operate against him in the other states. The Columbia school of politicians would do honor to such a master as Machiaveli."

I submit whether I do not stand justified in the opinion of the senate, in pronouncing this a wanton and unwarrantable calumny. Look at the message. It is skillfully framed to please the south with general phrases, suited to the tariff interests. Look at the treasury report, in which a measure is established on the plank with the message; and I must ask where is the strongest proof of Machiavelism to be found in the federal papers or the state resolutions? [Here Mr. Miller read extracts from papers from Pennsylvania, to show that the message was understood there as in S. Carolina.] Sir, the present administration seems disposed to test indifferent and well secured supporters, by a rule resorted to against farmers or hunters, to select from a redundant kernel what superannuations can be made by the ruling party. For my part, I am determined not to place myself in the power of such political friends as will attribute my support to fear, and not to principle. As soon as I vote for the nominee, I shall be told I dare not do otherwise, your friends at home attempt to break down the president by praising him, and they dare not do it openly, and you vote for Mr. Van Buren to injure him, not from any principle of attachment to the president, but because you want to make the tariff states believe he is anti-tariff, and thereby break him down upon the Machiaveli plan. We are told we dare not oppose the president. Sir, the people I represent dare do any thing that brave and generous men dare do; and standing here I dare speak the truth and vote against the principal, who uses such agents to represent them at the court of St. James. I believe, sir, the statement read by the senator from Mississippi, as to the nominee's reason for the dissolution of the late cabinet, in his friends in New York; I believe he did say that it was owing to a conspiracy formed by the vice president, secretaries of the navy and treasury and attorney general, to exclude a virtuous woman from society, and I do believe that in making this statement he did not speak the truth.

I believe, moreover, from the information before the public, that he planned, was the beginning and end, the Alpha and Omega, of the breach in the personal friendship between the first and second administrations, and that the motive may be found in the circumstances, and the motive is as palpable and manifest. Who else had any interest in raking up these by-gone transactions in which you acted your part honestly and faithfully, both to the public and general Jackson? Sir, I recollect something of the Seminole war. It was in this dark and difficult hour of the president's life, that I first saw, and first had an opportunity for manifesting my friendship to him, at a time when the sedate and venerable fathers, such as Mason, Barbour and Smith, of South Carolina, loomed and spoke in dark hints of censure and reprobation; I declared my determination to sustain him right or wrong. I felt grateful for his military services, and would not censure him while he was the exponent of our government in a quarrel with Spain, to censure him. I recollect to have heard the doggerel verse about William Fell, affirmatively applied to me by the senator from Kentucky, then a speaker of the other house, who told me as an insult, stood forth publicly and boldly in connection to him. I recollect also that my friend from Mississippi took in that debate. He was the able, eloquent and accomplished advocate of his military fame, and when he concluded was cheered from the galleries—but where was the senator from Georgia?

If I mistake not, Cobb, Crawford, &c. led the VAN of attack. After all, this matter was rather excusable than justified. It was the generous attachments of young men, and not the sober judgment of the old statesmen, that sustained the nominee in the Seminole war; and I am at a loss for any good reason to re-suscitate it, except to enable parties to change position. With all the hazard of differing from the senator from Georgia, I declare my determination, in the execution of the appointing power, to hold any one as criminal who boldly, openly, and indecently invades public sentiments and public morals. As the guardians of female character, we must sustain the majesty and supremacy of the laws, and the sacred conduct of the commanding general in the Seminole war; and I am at a loss for any good reason to narrow down the distance in society which separates the suspected from the modest woman, and upon such information as satisfies me I believe the nominee obnoxious to such a charge. The gentleman from Georgia has, in bold and eloquent language, asked for the nominee, at the hands of the senate, justice. Sir, I will give him justice—the measure meted to others. I will give him him. With cold and Sardonic smiles, he dismissed from office the most faithful public servants, without any reference to economy or the public interest. He proscribed the Carolinians—recalled a popular minister from the Russian court, the son of one of the signers of independence, and sent the Roanoke senator, relying on his influence in the good old dominion to further his pretensions. He recalled Mr. Poinsett, an accomplished gentleman, from Mexico, and sent a French character, a gambling statesman, a Carolinian by birth, it is true, but one who has long ceased to cherish or honor his country. These are not my political friends, but they are my countrymen.

I may do injustice to the state department on the question or real of Mr. Middleton, Mr. Poinsett, and Mr. Watts. I do not know whether they desired to be recalled or not, but presume they did not.

Sir, I do not complain that our favorite sons are unrequited for their faithful services or turned out of office. It is not this which calls forth my censure and indignation. It is the belief that my friends and fellow citizens are hunted down with savage ferocity, not for political opinions, but because they are supposed to be your friends—that we will not make war on you, is the heresy which must be expiated with fire and flog.

And shall we not retaliate? I hold the nominee responsible for this breach in our ranks. Nay, more, I hold him responsible for the unbecoming pledges made to the public, pending the late presidential canvass. What were they? One term of service as president; retrenchment of public expenditure; no official tampering with the press, to perpetuate the dynasty; no selection of members of congress for offices of profit. Public expectation on these topics has not been realized. I excuse a generous confiding president, and hold the wily subtle sniveler and his subalterns liable for the failure. I will pay a portion of my share of the debt by putting my veto on the appointment.

Sir, we are told, if we reject the nominee, we shall surely make him vice president, and such is the substance of a letter before me from one of his confidential and favored editors. No one can mistake the object of the Baltimore convention; it is to nominate him in any event. Look at the source whence it originates; observe the double delegates from Ohio gotten up under the central influence of Mr. Fremont, in a hall, in a bar, in a saloon, and ask, whether it can be made fire on our side or not. I shall not resort to the common pretence of left-handed friendship, and place my reasons for voting on the ground that he is too useful to be absent. I shall do what is my duty, and let the consequences take care of themselves.

In closing my remarks on this somewhat exciting topic, permit me to express my acknowledgments to the senate for their consideration, while I have stated in a hasty and uncorrect manner, the reasons of my dissent from the claims of the nominee to public confidence, and the reasons of my refusal to vote for his confirmation.

Remarks of Mr. Forsyth in reply to Mr. Miller.

Mr. President: We are told by the senator who has just concluded, in the beginning of his extraordinary speech, that he intended to publish his remarks for his own vindication. No friend of Mr. Van Buren will complain of the fulfillment of this intention.

Of the long list of offenders committed by Mr. Van Buren it was natural that the senator should begin with those at home. He says general Jackson has been separated from him and his friends by the artifice of Mr. Van Buren, and he tells us of his own zeal and devotion to the hero of New Orleans, and read extracts from his own speech at the Waxaw, when he assured his auditors that "the philosophy of nature" was "a sufficient guaranty" for the general's "honor and attachments." It is almost incredible that Mr. Van Buren should have so wantonly misrepresented the services of a man who is exhibited; and with due deference to the senator, I would suggest that he was very mistaken in his theory; "the philosophy of nature" was not so strong a guaranty as imagined. Not, is what is insinuated, fact? Has general Jackson forgotten his local attachments, the land of his birth and of his earliest affections, where he has so many devoted and disinterested friends? No, sir, it is not possible general Jackson has not separated from South Carolina, nor has South Carolina yet withdrawn from him, although the senator seems to be earnestly hunting up causes for a division.

The radical party in South Carolina—the unionists—have the senator say, given in their adhesion from interested motives to Mr. Van Buren for the succession to the presidency—and this is another of his crimes. Now, sir, I do not know that it is true that they desire the succession for Mr. Van Buren; certainly they might go further and farther, and fare much worse and not get quite so far. For this supposed interested adhesion they are stigmatised here by one of their senators. Am I trading, Mr. President, upon almost forbidden ground; traveling into a neighboring state to mangle in its party strife; but I feel for these radicals—these unionists; we acted together in bygone times; we think alike still; and if I were not to say a word in their behalf, as the two senators of the Senate are of the party opposed to them at home, they might chance to be condemned for the want of the plea of not guilty to the charge exhibited against them. Under these circumstances, I stand bound to repel the imputation cast upon the anti-nullifiers of South Carolina, and taking up the evidence, shall prove that they are unjustly charged. What is this evidence? The senator who makes the charge on the question of the Seminole war, stood by the general with firmness and zeal; defended him right or wrong. The radicals were among his reprovers, and the question is emphatically asked, where was Georgia then? Georgia then was where she is now, and where I trust she will ever be found, by the side of the unionists, standing up for the right and reprehending the wrong. The senator seems to imagine that the true patriotism consists in favor of one's friends, in seeking to discriminate between truth and error. Such is not our theory—for violated laws, we hold all responsible, friends and foes. Recent developments have shown that general Jackson had means of defence he did not use, but if there is one Georgian, one radical, who regrets the part he took on that transaction, I thank God, to me, he is unknown. I trust, sir, that to none for his own error in defending what he now insinuates was wrong, he does not, under the power of some master feeling, intend to censure every thing that is right.

Mr. Cobb and Mr. Crawford have been named by the senator. Mr. Cobb is no longer among us to answer. He did his duty, according to his conception of that duty, in this and in other acts of his public life. His friends know that his conduct was open, and his motives pure. The ground he stood upon here, he never abandoned while he lived. Mr. Crawford, I am surprised the senator should think—[Mr. Miller said he alluded to Mr. Crawford (Joel) a member of the house of representatives when the Seminole question was agitated.] I am glad to be corrected. Mr. Joel Crawford acted with his friends, and it is guilty of the charge of having voted for ransoming into the Seminole war. He lives to remember not to regret that act.

This union party, which seems to haunt his imagination, if I am not strangely mistaken, had the honor, a short time since, to number him as a member of it, [Mr. Miller denied that he had ever been.] Well, sir, the senator ought to know; but in this fact, I cannot be mistaken—the senator was a candidate, brought forward by this party for the state government, and the charge of participating for two years in the elevation of the accomplished gentleman who now stands at the helm of her affairs. The recollection of that fact should have prevented a charge against them of being, from selfish motives, sure of office, devoted to the dominant power, following like the sun-flower, the motions of the ocean sun. To this last charge, I do not plead for them; not guilty; they do follow, like the sun-flower—the sun-flower does not change its motion for the ocean, or its shade of blue, or its color, or its elevating its broad face to the light of heaven, it stands unchanged, and is found when he sets in the western, as it stood when he rose in the eastern sky. Poetically understood, as Ovid describes the heliotrope, the senator is right, what is good in poetry is not always good in prose, and the charge is, that for interest sake, the South Carolinians, unfriendly to the senator, know no will but the president's and are obedient to his whistle.

We are taught to expect a shade of them here seeking as the rewards of devotion, honors, and trusts, foreign missions, &c. &c. one of them being already before us, as the avowed courier of a thousand more! No allusion could have been more unfortunate. Who and what is the gentleman at whom this arrow has been cast, the first of the school of office seekers? Why, sir, the senator himself speaks highly of his character. Described by his colleague as a high-minded man, of extensive information, and unimpaired integrity, in whose hands the elevation of the interests of the people may be safely confided. And are such men office-seekers, and interested devotees to existing power in South Carolina? If so, what are the patriots? They must be angels. They cannot be men. The senator may eulogize his friends to the utmost of his power, exalt them in the seat of talent and integrity to the highest pitch, I venture to place his opponents by their side, and challenge comparison without fearing or intending to depreciate in the slightest degree the honor of any of S. Carolina's distinguished sons.

The arrangement of the first cabinet did not please the senator. South Carolina was neglected. Governor Hamilton was told he might have been secretary of war, but for his violence against the tariff; and what seemed to have added venom to the sting, South Carolina was not only passed over, but an attorney general was looked for in Georgia; and all this was the work of Don Daniel of New York. The senator is difficult to please. He liked not the first, and likes less the second cabinet. But how was the fact in regard to governor Hamilton? If my memory deceives me not, he has publicly declared he might have had office, had he desired; he did not desire it. In this, and in all other things, he is incapable of deceit. Passing over the unpardonable offence of going to Georgia for a member of the first cabinet, does the senator really suppose the elucide of the late attorney general was the work of Mr. Van Buren? [Mr. Miller nodded an assent.] The senator never committed more egregious mistakes. Of late the man of the day, his equals in professional attainments and talents, admitted to be great, I think he is the last man who would have been selected by Mr. Van Buren and sure I am, Mr. Van Buren, is the last man on earth to whose influence the attorney general would have been willing to owe his place.

Considered as the originator and the fosterer of the disagreement between the first and second cabinets of the government, Mr. Van Buren is to bear the extremity of the senator's wrath. On this subject, Mr. President, I can only refer the senate to the explicit and prompt denial of the justice of the charge by the party accused, long since publicly made, and never yet impeached by any one having a claim to character. The facts before the public prove that the charge is the coinage of a distempered brain, baseless as the fabric of a vision. If the senator has any desire to clear this for his reputation, I repeat what he has said, and positive denial, in the name of an absent friend; and if he ventures upon the investigation, I pledge myself to satisfy even his pre-occupied mind, that not a shadow of suspicion can rest upon Mr. Van Buren's fame. I speak on the highest authority, when I state to the senate, that his deportment in relation to this controversy, deserves the respect and admiration of every honorable and disinterested mind.

The Globe, the Globe! the official paper, has abused the senator and his friends. The editor was brought here by Mr. Van Buren, and he is accountable for all it contains—all that is bad, I mean; he gets credit for no good, appear where it may.

This charge is made because the Globe is called the government paper, Mr. Van Buren and the government being previously identified. I must not be misunderstood as defending the editorial management of the Globe. I see with regret many attacks on persons for matters that ought not to be brought before the public. I detect and investigate of the private transactions, all malignant scrutiny into the every day business of political aspirants. Their private characters are known to the people; and so far as character should operate to their prejudice, it will be weighed. Even the denigrative recommitments of the Globe, deserve censure. But, sir, I do not admit that Mr. Van Buren or the administration is responsible for the lighter offences, much less the enmities of any newspaper, written even for the Globe, which, as the gentlemen may consider it, is as pure as this uncolored sheet, compared with the journals that are published by its side. But does the senator mean to assert that every one who aids in the establishment of a newspaper, is responsible for its enormities? Will the senator consent that his friends and all his opponents shall be judged by the same rule? I ask him to glance his eye back over the history of the press in this district for a few past years. Does he remember the Federal Republican, the Washington City Gazette, the Washington Republican? Does he know any thing of the National Journal and the United States Telegraph? Has he present to his recollection the atrocious calumnies by which they have been polluted—their dark insinuations and open falsehoods by which the reputation of the virtuous of both sexes has been wantonly and grossly assailed? Blame has flown—all flew in all corners of our country as if borne on the wings of the wind. If all these things are present to his view, will he admit that those who patronize these journals were participants in the hateful crime? Can he trust the reputation and honor of his friends to the application of his own rule?

[The vice president asked if the senator from Georgia had any allusion to the occupant of the chair?]

Mr. Forsyth. By what authority, sir, do you ask that question? The vice president said the allusion appeared to be so direct, he had a right to ask the question.

Mr. Forsyth. I deny the right; and if it is considered as a question of order, I appeal to the judgment of the senate.

The vice president said if the allusion was directed to him, there was no foundation for it.

Mr. Miller rose and addressed the elisor.

Mr. Forsyth said the senator from Georgia, who he said was in some danger of losing between the chair and the senator.

The vice president said the senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. Forsyth. That being understood, I give way with pleasure to the senator for any explanation he may desire to make.

Mr. Miller explained, and concluded by saying—as to the rule by which he judged others in relation to the official press, he was willing that it should be applied to himself and his co-workers.

Mr. Forsyth replied to the argument as explained, and then said—As to the public press, the senator consents that he and his friends shall be judged by his own rule. Then God help the senator's friends, for they are beyond all human aid, and so are all those who patronize and support, in times of high party strife, a thorough bred partisan newspaper. Leaving to others to adopt or reject the rule, and to apply it or not to the patrons and supporters of the Journal and Telegraph, and to the former patrons of the Washington Republican, the Washington City Gazette and Federal Republican, I deny, emphatically, Mr. Van Buren's responsibility for any article in the Globe. If the senator will produce a satisfactory proof that he has been instrumental in establishing a press here or elsewhere, for the purpose of dragging down by calumnies any good man's name, my vote shall damn him here—my voice every where.

In the spirit of manly frankness, not in the spirit of this discussion, I appeal to the senator to reflect upon the irreconcilable contradiction between all his conclusions to Mr. Van Buren's prejudice, and the charge of the chief magistrate, and the character of the president with his present friends and the people, but according to his own conceptions of that character before the president had the misfortune to think that the senator and his friends were pursuing a policy dangerous to the union of the States. He was, described by the senator, all that was good and great, and performed with the purest patriotism more important services than any man since the days of Washington. His known firmness has been called in evidence, by his adversaries, as the character he held up by his enemies as a roaring lion, requiring implicit obedience from all who venture to approach his den. Take the good or the bad of this description—Judge this matter by the opinion of the president's friends, by the senator's, or by the president's enemies, and the part allotted to Mr. Van Buren could not have been played here. What, sir, this pure patriot, this great public benefactor—this self-willed, obstinate man—this roaring lion, to be a wet rag in any man's hands, a name of war, to be punched into any and every shape by Mr. Van Buren's fingers! If the senator will calmly reflect, he will be compelled to acknowledge that he is or has been greatly mistaken. The president is not what he is declared him to be—what his friends or his enemies believe him to be—or else flagrant injustice has been done to Mr. Van Buren. I will not quarrel with the senator's choice. He may take either branch of the alternative. He cannot hold both.

The formidable array of facts in support of this charge of corrupt management against Mr. Van Buren, reminds me of an occurrence said to have happened in France.—There it was seen such a thing as an action to recover damages for seduction, which may be brought by an unfortunate lady who has listened too credulously to a flattering tongue. A pretty lady who had quarrelled and parted with her lover, called on an advocate to bring a suit for the damages he has sustained. She described the origin and progress of the liaison, the happiness enjoyed while it lasted, and the time of its duration, and then its fatal end. The advocate listened with profound attention to the story, and saw that it was one of those cases in which it was difficult to say who was in fault, the gentleman or the lady, and that an action could not be maintained for seduction. How to convey this, without offending the fair one, was the difficulty. All Frenchmen, of all professions, avoid that as the deadliest of sins. The advocate managed it with the proverbial skill of his profession and of his country. "Madam, it would give me infinite pleasure to obey your wishes, and punish the ingrate who has separated him from so much beauty; but I am obliged to tell you that seduction is not a seduction, and I cannot bring an action." This seemed very strange to the lady, as she had but a very minute in her detail of all the facts. Putting and putting she left the advocate to his books and briefs. The whole affair was forgotten by him; but in the course of a few days the lady burst triumphantly into his room, exclaiming with joyful eagerness, "another fact, sir, he seduced me again this morning." And so it is with the senator. His facts, like the lady's, do not go to the point he must reach to defeat his pursuer. Each case is like unto the other, and all like the seduction of that morning.

Remarks of Mr. Clay.

Mr. Clay, (in reply to Mr. Forsyth and other gentlemen), observed that a doctrine had been advanced much more important in its consequences, than the nomination under consideration. It had been maintained, that the instructions, so often adverted to, were the president's instructions; that he alone was responsible for them; and that the secretary of state stood in no manner amenable on account of them. This doctrine was directly at war with the genius of all our institutions, which suppose every public functionary to be responsible for every official act he performs. This responsibility runs through our entire system, and stretches to every officer of government, from the highest to the lowest. If the president sanctions instructions, emanating from the department of state, undoubtedly he also is responsible for them; but this cannot screen the secretary of state from his share of the responsibility. Is not a secretary of state impeachable under the constitution? Suppose he is guilty of treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors? Is he not to be impeached by the house of representatives, tried, and convicted? And would it be any defence that the crime was committed by the command of a president? If he is directed to perpetrate an act forbidden by law, or repugnant to the national honor, he can withhold his signature, and surrender the seals of office. It is remarkable, that it appears there were no cabinet consultations when the instructions were given, and, consequently, Mr. Van Buren's responsibility was greater. I have no objection, if it could be proved, to the instructions which I gave, in conformity with the directions of the president, when I was in the department of state. Most certainly, I never gave an instruction, or prepared a diplomatic note, without a full consciousness of the responsibility under which I acted.

It has been argued that the real cause of the objection to this nomination is the mortification which is felt at the success of this administration in carrying the colonial trade, and its general success in the management of our foreign affairs, when contrasted with the previous administration. With respect to the value of the colonial trade, under the arrangement which has been made, and its effects upon our navigation and commerce, I hope, that an opportunity for an ample discussion of them will occur, when it will not be difficult to show that what has been done is decidedly more disadvantageous to us than the previous state of that trade. But what is the arrangement? There is no treaty, no compact, nothing obligatory upon Great Britain. The operation of an act of the British parliament has been simply extended to our intercourse with the British colonies. What we have gotten proceeds from the breath of a British parliament, and the same breath can take it away, whenever they please. Let us look at the other vaunted instances of the diplomacy of this administration. The residue of our claims on Denmark, for which indemnity was not obtained under the late administration, have been satisfied. But that Mr. Wheaton was engaged in negotiation respecting them prior to the termination of that administration. A treaty is understood to have been made with Turkey. But the information which led to the negotiation was procured during the late administration, which had actually commenced a negotiation, and would in all probability have concluded it to a successful conclusion, if it had remained in power. A treaty has been signed and concluded with Austria by the present administration. But that Mr. Wheaton was engaged in negotiation respecting them prior to the termination of that administration. A treaty had even been appointed to proceed to the signature, when the caution of the Austrian minister prompted him to refer the treaty to his government for its approbation. The French treaty, providing for the satisfaction of the claims of our citizens on France, has been concluded during this administration; but the whole world knows that it has proceeded from a fortunate conjuncture. If it had not been for the revolution of July, we should probably not have obtained the treaty.

Now, under the last administration let us see what was done. It concluded at Washington treaties with Guatemala, Denmark and the Hanseatic cities, founded on the most liberal principles, and forming models for future treaties. It made treaties and with England and the emperor of Brazil, with Sweden and with Mexico, the latter of which remained to be ratified by the Mexican republic. It adjusted the difficult subject with England relating to satisfaction for slaves taken during the late war. During that administration indemnity was obtained for claims of American citizens, on Colombia, the Brazil, Denmark, Sweden and Russia. In respect to the indemnity from Russia, I request permission of the senate to relate an anecdote which reflects to much honor upon the emperor Alexander. Baron Maltitz being one day in the department of state, I casually observed to him that I thought

* There is a statement in the published speech of gen. Smith which, if he made it in the senate, did not attract my attention. He says he asked whether the terms proposed by the British act of parliament, of July, 1828, were satisfactory; and that I said I "considered they were all we could ask." Now, I am perfectly confident that the senator's recollection is inaccurate, and that I never did say to him that the terms proposed by the act were all we could ask. It is impossible I should have said so. For, by the terms of the act, to cede powers not colonial, (and of course the United States), to its privileges, those powers are required to place the commerce and navigation of Great Britain, (European as well as American), upon the footing of the most favored nation. That is, if we had accepted of the terms as tendered on the face of the act, we would have allowed British vessels all the privileges which we have granted by our treaties of reciprocity with Guatemala and other powers. The vessels of Great Britain, therefore, would have been at liberty to import into the United States, on an equal footing with our own, the productions of any part of the globe, without a corresponding privilege on the part of our vessels to visit Great Britain. It is true that the king in council was authorized to dispense with some of the conditions of the act, in behalf of powers not possessing colonies. But without the condition, embracing the principle of the most favored nation, would have been dispensed with or not, was unknown to me at the time the senator states the conversation to have happened.—And, long after, Mr. Vaughan, the British minister, was unable to afford any information as to the act of parliament. That very authority, vested in the king, demonstrates the necessity there was for further explanation, in the negotiation.

With respect to the note from me to the senator, which he says he received accompanying the draft of the bill introduced by him, it would be more satisfactory if he would publish the note itself, instead of what he represents to be an extract.

H. C.

† My belief was, and I so stated, that Mr. Hughes was instructed to aid Mr. Connell, the agent of the claimants against Sweden to procure indemnity. Mr. Hughes was instructed and charged with a negotiation for the claims of our citizens on Denmark, in which he was assisted by Mr. Connell, the agent of the claimants there also. Having had no recent access to the department of state, it was possible I was mistaken in my recollection of the instructions being specifically instructed to represent to the Swedish claims, and that I confounded the two negotiations. In point of fact, however, Mr. Hughes, either under his general instructions, the particular instruction given by Mr. Adams, or as incident to his diplomatic character, did aid, and, by his address, essentially aid Mr. Connell in the liquidation of the Swedish claims.

It appears that the present secretary of state, at the instance of an individual member of the senate, has undertaken to furnish a copy of instructions transmitted to a foreign minister, and to negative the existence of other instructions, so far as the records of the department would enable him to negative their existence. Hitherto, instructions have been only communicated to congress upon the calls of that body, or voluntarily by the executive. They have been sometimes even refused to one of the houses of congress.

H. C.

the Russian government had not treated us well respecting that claim; that it had been repeatedly, during a long course of years, brought before that government; that we could get no answer to our representations; and that we were at least entitled to a decision one way or the other. He communicated this conversation to his government; the emperor Alexander, as I was subsequently informed, sent for the papers, personally inspected them himself, and directed the payment of the claim. It was accordingly adjusted and settled by baron Toulz and myself by an exchange of diplomatic notes.

The gentleman from Georgia contends that the late administration submitted to indignities from the British government; and that it repeatedly knocked at the door of the British minister at London, to renew the negotiation, without gaining admittance.—The gentleman is mistaken. After the refusal of Mr. Canning to treat of the colonial intercourse, an elaborate dispatch was on the 11th November, 1826, transmitted to Mr. Gallatin, containing a vindication of the whole course of our government, in which, without retaliating on Mr. Canning's sarcasms, the honor, good faith, and character of our government are maintained, whether with ability or not it does not become me to pronounce. In that dispatch Mr. Gallatin is told: "What may be the nature of the proposals which you were authorized to make, upon the renewal of the negotiation so confidently anticipated, it is not now proper should be communicated to the British government. Respect for services, no less than for that government, forbids that we should intrude upon their consideration, proposals against which they have deemed it proper to shut their ears." Mr. Barbour succeeded Mr. Gallatin; but he was not, according to my recollection of his instructions, charged with any renewal of the negotiation. No man was ever more tenacious of the honor of his country than the late president, and he would have been the last to have authorized a degrading or derogatory solicitation to renew the negotiation. It is alleged that he forbore for a long time to issue his proclamation interdixing British vessels, coming from the colonial ports, an entry into our ports. The situation of that administration was peculiar. During a great part of it, the opposition had the majority in congress. At the session 1825-6 congress had taken up the subject of the colonial intercourse, although it failed to pass a law. In the dispatch to Mr. Gallatin, already cited, he was informed that the whole matter would be communicated to congress. It was communicated at the session 1826-7. Could the president with propriety have issued his proclamation during that session? Shortly after its close, congress having omitted to legislate in respect to the colonial trade, the president, without hesitation, issued his proclamation in conformity with the existing law.

The gentleman from Georgia further contended that the withdrawal or waiver of the demand, on the part of the late administration, of the admission of our produce into the British West Indies, on the same footing with similar produce from the British colonial continental ports, was equivalent to the abandonment of the pretension made by the present administration; and that it was a mere difference of diplomatic phraseology. But I cannot agree with the gentleman. The withdrawal or waiver of the demand, was a concession, the operation of which would have been temporary, limited to the duration of the treaty, in which it was expected the negotiation would terminate. Upon the expiration of the treaty, the right would have revived, and might have been insisted on in future negotiations. The demand it was expected the equivalents would have been obtained, and especially some provision for our trade on the St. Lawrence and the St. Pierre. But when the demand is abandoned, as an unsustainable pretension, when our government is denounced for having brought forward such a pretension, and too long and too tenaciously clung to it, how can we ever hereafter assert it? With what face can an American negotiator again put forward the demand? It could only be done by following the bad example of our administration disavowing to a foreign government the acts of its predecessor.

The more I reflect upon these instructions the stronger am I convinced of their reprehensible nature. If there be one point more than all others of which all governments, whatever may be their form, are justly most jealous, it is that of a foreign interference in domestic affairs. But of all governments, republics should guard with the most anxious care against such interference. All history, from the days of Greece and Philip, proclaims that this is the point of most danger. But these instructions invite the attention of the British government to the fact of our dissensions, present it as a topic for consideration, for persuasion, for deliberation. When that government is thus legitimately put in possession of the fact, do we not know that the transition from deliberation upon those divisions to action is short and perilous?

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. Marcy), supposes, in advancing to the practice of protection which I understand prevailed with the dominant party in his state, that I had reflected upon the character of that state; and he alleges, that the practice has existed for thirty years, with every dominant party, and was rigorously exercised many years ago, by my friends. Nothing was farther from my intention than to reflect in the smallest degree upon that powerful and respectable state. On the contrary, I honor and admire it for its protective institutions, its unimpaired public works, and its enterprise and intelligence. But I must pronounce my abhorrence of the practice to which I allude, no matter with whom it originated, whether friend or foe, or by whom it may be continued. It has been carried by the present administration to the most odious extent in Kentucky. Almost every official incumbent who voted against the present chief magistrate, and who was within the executive reach, has been hurried from office; whilst those who voted to have been retained, no matter how long they had been in the situation. It is not pursued in Kentucky by the state government, when in the hands of the opposition to this administration. Very lately, governor Metcalfe has appointed to one of the three highest judicial stations in the state, a supporter of this administration. The gentleman appointed is a nephew of the gentleman from Maryland, (general Smith); and although highly respectable and eminent in his profession, he is not more so than twenty other lawyers in the state belonging to the opposite party. The governor also renewed the appointment, or commissioned several gentlemen opposed to him in politics, as attorneys for the commonwealth. And recently, the legislature appointed a president of one of the banks from the ranks of the friends of this administration, and several other officers.

Remarks of Mr. Brown.

Mr. Brown said, that unwilling as he had been to participate in this discussion, he could not, in justice to his own feelings, and to the distinguished individuals, whose nomination as minister to England was then before the senate, refrain from giving utterance to the mingled sentiments of indignation and regret, at the course which the debate had taken—a course which struck him as at least extraordinary, and extremely unjust towards the nominee.

The acrimony with which Mr. Van Buren had been assailed, the epithets which had been so liberally bestowed on him, required some vindication at the hands of those who were favorable to confirming his nomination, against the injurious, and as he believed, unwarrantable charges which had been preferred against him. He would here take leave to remind gentlemen, that reproachful epithets afforded but a poor substitute for argument, and more especially when addressed to a body whose deliberations should be governed by calm and dispassionate consideration.

The senate had been told by the honorable gentleman Mr. (Clay), who had preceded him in this debate, that Mr. Van Buren, when acting as secretary of state, had disgraced his country, by certain expressions contained in his instructions given to Mr. McLane, late minister to England, in relation to the negotiation between the United States and Great Britain, on the subject of the West India trade. Waiving all discussions as to whom the responsibility should attach, for instructions given to our foreign ministers, whether to the president of the United States or to his secretary of state, he would concede to those opposed to the nomination the principle contended for by them, that the secretary of state was responsible for his official conduct, to the fullest extent. He knew Mr. Van Buren too well, to believe, for a moment, that he would desire that any shield should be interposed to screen him from a proper responsibility; he believed he would sooner court the strictest inquiry, than endeavor to escape from it. But to return to the instructions: What was the language which was deemed so exceptional? In order to remove the impression, that a feeling of hostility was felt in this country towards Great Britain, which the improvident course of the late administration, in relation to the West India trade had produced, the late secretary of state had alluded in his instructions to the change which the people of the United States had made, in those who administered our government, in the following language:—"The opportunities which you have derived, from a participation in our public councils, as well as other sources of information, will enable you to speak with confidence (as far as you may deem it proper and useful so to do) of the respective parts taken by those to whom the administration of this government is now committed, in relation to the colonial trade, hitherto pursued upon the subject of the colonial trade. Their views upon that point have been submitted to the people of the United States, and the counsels by which your conduct is now directed, are the result of the judgment expressed by the only earthly tribunal in which the late administration was amenable for its acts." In making this suggestion, Mr. Van Buren had asserted what was most true; public opinion had discarded the late administration from power, and the party to whom the people of the United States had committed the reins of government, had been, and were then, favorable to the proposed arrangement, he could therefore recognize in this no solid objection; but to his mind, it had more the appearance of the capriciousness of verbal criticism, than any thing else. If there was any thing in the language which he had noticed of a submissive tone, as gentlemen had supposed, by proceeding a little farther in the instructions, they would have found language which would effectually have removed all their apprehensions, and shows if the late secretary of state knew how to use the language of conciliation, he also knew how to speak in a tone of manly firmness when urging the just claims of his country.

That part of the instructions to which he had reference was as follows: "If Great Britain deems it adverse to her interests to allow us to participate in the trade with her colonies, and finds nothing in the extension of it to others to induce her to apply the same rule to us, she will, we hope, be sensible of the propriety of placing her refusal on those grounds. To set up the acts of the late administration as the cause of forfeiture of privileges which would otherwise be extended to the people of the United States, would, under existing circumstances, be unjust in itself, and could not fail to excite their deepest sensibility. The tone of feeling which a course as unwise and untenable as is calculated to produce, would doubtless be greatly aggravated," &c.—Here was language firm and spirited, and indicating any thing else but a disposition to yield or compromise the honor of the country, and he could but consider it as extremely unjust on the part of the opponents of the nomination to single out detached parts of the instructions, without adverting to their general tenor, and viewing them as a whole; the only fair rule to be resorted to, in the exposition of public documents.

But to come back to the charge of disgrace which had been so strongly urged and relied upon. How, say, has the minister to England disgraced his country? Where was the evidence of the imputed disgrace to be found? Was it to be found in the fact, that an arrangement had been made between the United States and Great Britain, in relation to her colonial trade, substantially on the very same basis as that proposed under the administration of Mr. Adams, and were gentlemen who then approved that measure, now prepared to condemn the present administration for having succeeded in forming such an arrangement with the British government, as the late administration had proffered, and had failed to accomplish? Sir, and Mr. Brown, it appears to me that there lies the rub; the objection to Mr. Van Buren, he feared, with some gentlemen, was not that he had done too little, but that he had done too much. Under his auspices, as secretary of state, a restoration of the West India trade had been effected, which the late administration had, by several successive missions, vainly endeavored to effect for several years.

He called on gentlemen who had spoken so pathetically of their country's disgrace to adduce some proof in support of the charge. When had the American name stood more honored abroad? Under what administration, from the origin of the government to this time, had the national character held a more lofty elevation? There was no civilized country, but what American character, American institutions, were the themes of the highest panegyrics, and in none more than in that country, with whom this dishonorable transaction is said to have taken place. The lively sensibility which the president had on all occasions shown to the honor of his country, forbade the supposition that he would ever have sanctioned instructions to a foreign minister, by which the character of his country was to be compromised. That he had authorized the language of conciliation to be used, in the instructions to the minister to England, was most honorable to him. From what president could a spirit of conciliation and courtesy towards England, come with more propriety than from him, by whose valor in the field her pride had been humbled?

There is no mark more inadmissible, as regards the degree of wisdom with which a nation is governed, than the respectability of that nation in other countries. All history will testify to the truth of the remark, that an administration conducted feebly, is contemptible abroad, and that which is conducted with wisdom and vigor, never fails to secure respect.

Mr. Brown said, he would not institute a comparison between the management of our diplomatic affairs, under the present administration, and that which had preceded it, and it would be from no apprehension that the result would not redound greatly to the credit of the existing administration.

Mr. Van Buren had, he believed, while acting as secretary of state, accomplished more in less time than any of his predecessors. Comparatively inexperienced to the new station to which he had been called to act, the ease with which he had adapted himself to it, the rapidity with which he had comprehended the arduous and difficult duties of secretary of state, bore honorable testimony to his abilities as a statesman.

It had been objected to the nominee, that he had introduced into the government of the United States, the party intrigues and discipline said to prevail in his own state. Without stopping to notice what he considered an unjust reflection, on the public character of a great and patriotic member of this confederacy, he called upon those who made the charge to support it by proof. It was honorable to the reputation of Mr. Van Buren, both public and private, that when his enemies were asked to furnish evidence in support of the charges urged against him, that they were unable to fix upon him any one of them by the semblance of proof. Possessing talents of a high order, and rapidly growing in the esteem of his countrymen, it was not a matter of surprise that he had been marked out as the victim of unmerited persecution.

Mr. Brown could conceive of no adequate reason or motives for rejecting the nomination of the minister to England. He was peculiarly fitted for the station which he then filled. His thorough and intimate acquaintance with the commercial relations of the two countries pointed him out as a fit and proper representative of our interests at the court of Great Britain. The state of New York had repeatedly vouched for his character and standing, by bestowing on him the highest civil honors within her gift. Mr. Brown said, he therefore considered it a duty which he owed to the country, and to the individual then representing us at the court of Great Britain, to vote for confirming his nomination.

Remarks of Mr. Webster—on the second day.
Mr. Webster said, in reply to some remarks of Mr. Forsyth, that it was, in his judgment, a great mistake, to say, that what was now called the American "pretension," originated with Mr. Adams, either as president, or secretary of state. By the way, it is singular enough that the American side of this question, is called, in the instructions before us, a pretension, too long persisted in; but the British side of it is called a right, too long, and too tenaciously, resisted by us. This courteous mode of speaking of the claims of a foreign government, and this reproachful mode of speaking of the claims of our own, is certainly somewhat novel in diplomacy. But, whether it be called, respectfully, a claim, or reproachfully, a pretension, it did not originate with Mr. Adams. It had a much earlier origin. This "pretension," now abandoned, with so much scorn, or this claim, said, reproachfully, to have been first set up by the late administration, originated with George Washington. He put his own hand to it. He insisted on it; and he would not treat with England, on the subject of the colonial trade, without considering it.

In his instructions to Mr. Morris, under his own hand, in October, 1783, president Washington says—"Let it be strongly impressed on your mind, that the privilege of carrying our productions, in our vessels, to their islands, and bringing in return the productions of those islands to our own ports and markets, is regarded here as of the highest importance; and you will be careful not to countenance any idea of our dispensing with it in a treaty. Accertain, if possible, their views on the subject for it would not be expedient to commence negotiations without previously having good reasons to expect a satisfactory termination of them."

Observe, sir, that president Washington, in these instructions, is not speaking of the empty and futile right of sending our own vessels, without cargoes, to the British West Indies; but he is speaking of the substantial right of carrying our own products to the islands, for sale and consumption there. And whether these products were shut out by positive act of parliament, or by a tariff of duties, absolutely and necessarily prohibitory, could make no difference. The object was to provide, by treaty, if it could be done, that our products should find their way, effectually and profitably, into the markets of the British West India. This was general Washington's object. This was the "pretension" which he set up.

It is well known, sir, that no satisfactory arrangement was made, in general Washington's time, respecting our trade with the British West Indies. But the breaking out of the French revolution, and the wars which it occasioned, were causes which, of themselves, opened the ports of the West Indies. During the long continuance of those wars, our vessels, with cargoes of our own products, found their way into the British West India Islands under a practical relaxation of the British colonial system. While this condition of things lasted, we did very well without a particular treaty. But when the European wars, and our war all ceased, then Great Britain returned to her former system; then the Islands became shut against us; and then it became necessary to treat on the subject. And, sir, we proposed to treat; our ministers were, successively, instructed to treat, from that time forward. And, sir, I undertake to say, that neither Mr. Madison, who was then president, nor his successor, Mr. Monroe, gave any authority or permission to any American minister, to abandon this pretension, and give it up, or even to waive it, or postpone it, and make a treaty without providing for it. No such thing. On the contrary, it will appear, I think, if we look through papers which have been sent to the senate, that under Mr. Madison's administration, our minister in England was fully instructed on this subject, and expected to press it. And as to Mr. Monroe, I have means of being informed, in a manner not liable to mistake, that he was, on this subject, always immovable. He would not negotiate without treating on this branch of the trade: nor did I ever understand, that, in regard to his matter, there was any difference of opinion whatever, among the gentlemen who composed Mr. Monroe's cabinet. Mr. Adams, as secretary of state, wrote the despatches and the instructions; but the policy was the policy of the whole administration, as far as I ever understood. Certain it is, it was the settled and determined policy of Mr. Monroe himself. Indeed, sir, so far as it is from being true that this pretension originated with Mr. Adams, that it was in his administration that, for the first time, permission was given, under very peculiar circumstances, and with restrictions, to negotiate a treaty, waiving this part of the question. This has been already alluded to, and fully explained, by the honorable member from Kentucky.

So then, sir, this pretension, asserted in the instructions to have been first set up in the late administration, is shown to have had president Washington for its author, and to have received the countenance of every president, who had occasion to act on the subject, from 1789, down to the time of the present administration.

But this is not all. Congress itself has sanctioned this name "pretension." The act of the 1st of March, 1823, makes it an express condition, upon which, and upon which alone, our ports shall be opened to British vessels and cargoes from the West Indies, on the same duties as our vessels and cargoes; that our products should be admitted into those islands, without paying any other or higher duties than shall be paid on similar productions coming from elsewhere. All this will be seen by reference to the third section of that act. Now, remember, sir, that this act of congress passed in March, 1823, two years before the commencement of Mr. Adams's administration. The act originated in the senate. The honorable senator from Maryland who was spoken on this subject to day, (Mr. Smith) who was then a member of the senate, and took part in the discussion of this very bill; and he supported it and voted for it. It passed both houses, without material opposition in either. Now, sir, how is it possible, after referring to this law of 1823, to find any apology for the assertion contained in these instructions, that this claim is a pretension first set up by Mr. Adams's administration? How is it possible that this law could have been overlooked, or not remembered? In short, sir, with any tolerable acquaintance with the history of the negotiations of the United States, or their legislation, how are we to account for it, that such an assertion as these instructions contain, should have found its way into them?

But the honorable member from Georgia asks, why we lay all this to the charge of the secretary, and not to the charge of the president? The answer is, the president's conduct is not before us. We are not, and cannot become his accusers, even if we thought there were any thing in his conduct which gave cause for accusation. But the secretary is before us. Not brought before us by any act of ours, he is placed before us by the president's nomination. On that nomination we cannot decline to act. We must either confirm, or reject it. As to the notion that the secretary of state was but the instrument of the president, and so not responsible for these instructions, I reject, at once, all such defence, excuse, or apology; or whatever else it may be called. If there be any thing in a public despatch derogatory to the honor of the country, as I think there is in this, it is enough for me, that I see whose hand is to it. If it be said, that the signer was only an instrument in the hands of others, I reply, that I cannot concur in conferring a high public diplomatic trust on any one who has consented, under any circumstances, to be an instrument, in such a case.

The honorable member from Georgia asks, also, why we have slept on this subject, and why, at this late day, we bring forward complaints. Sir, nobody has slept upon it. Since these instructions have been made public, there has been no previous opportunity to discuss them. The honorable member will recollect, that the whole arrangement with England was done and completed, before ever these instructions saw the light. The president opened the trade by his proclamation, in October, 1830; but these instructions were not publicly sent to congress till afterwards, that is, till January, 1831. And they were not then sent, with any view that either house should act upon the subject, for the whole business was already settled. For one, I never saw the instructions, nor heard them read, till January, 1831; nor did I ever hear them spoken of, as containing these obnoxious passages. This, then, is the first opportunity for considering these instructions.

That they have been subjects of complaint out doors since they were made public, and of much severe animadversion, is certainly true. But, until now, there never has been an opportunity naturally calling for their discussion here. The honorable gentleman may be assured, that if such occasion had presented itself, it would have been embraced.

I entirely forbear, Mr. President, from going into the merits of the late arrangement with England, as a measure of commercial policy. Another time will come, I trust, more suitable for that discussion. For the present, I confine myself strictly to such parts of the instructions as I think plainly objectionable, and reprehensible; whatever may be the character of the agreement between us and England, as matter of policy. And I repeat, sir, that I place the justification of my vote on the party tone, and party character of these instructions. Let me ask, if such considerations as these are to be addressed to a foreign government, what is that foreign government to expect in return? The ministers of foreign courts will not bestow gratuitous favors, nor even gratuitous smiles, on American parties. What, then, I repeat, is to be the return? What is party to do here, for that foreign government, which is done, is expected to do, or is asked to do, something for party here? What is to be the consideration paid for this foreign favor? Sir, must not every man see, that any mixture of such causes, or motives, in our foreign intercourse, is as full of danger, as it is of dishonor?

I will not pursue the subject. I am anxious only to make my own ground fully and clearly understood; and willingly leave every other gentleman to his own opinions. And I cheerfully submit my own vote to the opinion of the country. I willingly leave it to the people of the United States to say, whether I am acting a factious and unworthy part, or the part of a true-hearted American, in withholding my approbation from the nomination of a gentleman as minister to England, who has, already, as it appears to me, instructed his predecessor at the same court, to carry party considerations, to urge party merits, and solicit party favors, at the foot of the British throne.

* The circumstance did not occur to Mr. Webster's recollection at the moment he was speaking, but the truth is, that Mr. Van Buren was himself a member of the senate, at the very time of the passing of this law; and Mr. McLane was at the same time a member of the house of representatives. So that Mr. Van Buren did himself, certainly, concur in "setting up this pretension," two years before Mr. Adams became president.

Remarks of Mr. Ewing.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, said he rose for the purpose of replying to the honorable senator from North Carolina, (Mr. Brown), and with a view also to add something to what had been said by the honorable senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster), who had placed the question before the senate, in nearly all the aspects in which it had presented itself to his (Mr. E.'s) mind.

The hon. senator from North Carolina has said, that the treaty negotiated by our minister at London, under the instructions which are now the subject of animadversion, is a splendid treaty—that it has yielded, and will yield a golden harvest to our people; and that it is the success of the negotiation, casting all others in the shade, which has excited envy and animosity against the parties concerned in that brilliant transaction. Sir, said Mr. E. it is the common resort of all men, when brought to answer for a misdemeanor, to retort the charge of envy, or enmity against their accusers. Pretences of this kind can always be advanced—though not always sustained; and when supported by evidence, and not resting on mere assertion, they are entitled to no weight, except in those cases in which the accusation to be repelled, rests for its support upon the evidence of the envious and malignant accuser. What has it to do with the question before the senate, whether the nominee is the subject of love or hatred of malice or good will? Here is no room for falsehood, and little for misconception. We have before us, under his own sign manual, the very paper on which we must acquit or condemn him. We have it before us here, sir; it will go abroad to the nation and the world, with the sanction or censure of the senate stamped upon it. Friendship cannot brighten, nor envy deepen its shades. Before us, and before the American people, upon its own merits must it stand or fall. Nor does the hon. senator touch the question under discussion, when he tells us that an arrangement effected pursuant to these instructions, is advantageous to the United States; that it adds to our commerce, and puts money in the pockets of our people. I neither admit nor deny his assumptions as to that fact, for it is not now a proper time for the discussion of that subject. On another day, on a fit occasion, and with open doors, shall (I trust) this matter be investigated, and then, perhaps, their golden visions will vanish into air. But it is not the arrangement to which I now object, but the manner in which it was sued for. Let it be, if gentlemen please, a splendid boon, a golden gift obtained from Great Britain, by the superior talents and favor of this subtle secretary; that gold is bought too dear, which is purchased at the expense of our national honor; which is sued for, begged for of a British minister; knelt for, prayed for, before a British, or any earthly throne.

But, sir, said Mr. E. this tone of submission, of supplication and apology, is not to my mind the most objectionable characteristic of this paper. We have, it is true, since the first formation of our government, been divided into parties at home. Our people have differed in the choice of their rulers. Sometimes on principle, sometimes merely as to men; but heretofore, whether in peace or war, abroad we have presented an undivided front, and never before has there been a solitary instance in our country, when our dissensions have been sent abroad by the accredited agents of our government, and urged as argument for the consideration of a foreign power. But, by this despatch, sir, our family quarrels, our private animosities, which, in common decency, ought to die within our own doors, are presented in bold relief, and made the subject of earnest representation to the British crown. For what honest purpose is this thing done? Does any man suppose that the British minister or the British monarch cares who is at the head of our government, unless they expect to profit by the ascendancy of some individual or party? If it were "the country, the whole country, and nothing but the country," which the secretary sought to benefit by this official act, why did he urge to England, (for it mattered not to them), the opinions of the dominant party in this country? Sir, the American republic—the nation, is lost sight of in this despatch, and the minister is instructed to present himself at the British court as the emissary of those who had come into power as he assumes, because they supported British claims against American pretensions. I once more ask the attention of the senate to a paragraph of this despatch.

"The opportunities which you have derived from a participation in our public councils, as well as other sources of information, will enable you to speak with confidence (as far as you may deem it proper and useful so to do) of the respective parts taken by those to whom the administration of this government is now committed, in relation to the course heretofore pursued upon the subject of the colonial trade. Their views upon that point have been submitted to the people of the United States; and the councils by which your conduct is now directed, are the result of the judgment expressed by the only earthly tribunal to which the late administration was amenable for its acts. It should be sufficient that the claims set up by them, and which caused the interruption of the trade in question, have been explicitly abandoned by those who first asserted them, and are not revived by their successors. If Great Britain deems it adverse to her interests to allow us to participate in the trade with her colonies, and finds nothing in the extension of it to others to induce her to apply the same rule to us, she will, we hope, be sensible of the propriety of placing her refusal on those grounds. To set up the acts of the late administration as the cause of forfeiture of privileges which would otherwise be extended to the people of the United States, would, under existing circumstances, be unjust in itself, and could not fail to excite their deepest sensibility. The tone of feeling which a course so unwise and untenable is calculated to produce, would doubtless be greatly aggravated by the consciousness that Great Britain has, by order in council, opened her colonial ports to Russia and France, notwithstanding a similar omission on their part to accept the terms offered by the act of July, 1825. You cannot press this view of the subject too earnestly upon the consideration of the British ministry. It has bearings and relations that reach beyond the immediate question under discussion."

"I will add nothing as to the impropriety of suffering any feelings that find their origin in the past pretensions of this government to have an adverse influence upon the present conduct of Great Britain."

Can any one read this miserable paragraph, mystified and involved as it is, and doubt for a moment as to its interpretation? You will be able to speak with confidence (as far as you may think it proper and useful so to do) of the course pursued by those now in power, in relation to the colonial trade. What is this but saying, in other words, to the American envoy—tell the British minister that we, who are now in power, supported British claims, and opposed American pretensions; as to the colonial trade; our opinions upon that subject were submitted to the American people, and, because we entertained views favorable to British claims and hostile to American pretensions, the people placed us in power, and prostrated our opponents? This is the plain meaning of that part of the despatch, when stripped of its circumlocution. Is this true, sir? And, if it were true, is it, I ask, the kind of message with which an American minister is to be sent to a foreign court—thus to humble and debase himself, and degrade, if not libel his countrymen—especially to the haughty court of Great Britain?

But this is not all. Warmed with his subject, and new light breaking in upon him as he proceeds, the secretary closes this paragraph in his despatch with this special injunction: "You cannot press this view of the subject too earnestly upon the consideration of the British ministry. It has bearings and relations that reach beyond the immediate question under discussion."

"You cannot press this view of the subject too earnestly." What view? Why, that those who favored American pretensions, have been put down—and we, who support British claims, are lords of the ascendant. But why press this earnestly upon the consideration of the British ministry? Because, adds the despatch, it has bearings and relations which reach beyond the immediate question under discussion. And what were these bearings and relations? On what did this view of the subject bear—to what did it relate, beyond the simple question of the question of the colonial trade, it indeed it could have borne on that? Sir, the motive lurking in the heart of the writer of this despatch, is here disclosed. He stunts the self-declared representative of a party—holding out, as a partizan, professions of submission and subservience to Great Britain—and claiming, as the reward of his adherence to her interests, the concession of privileges which had been withheld when treated for in the name and behalf of the nation. The concessions on the one part, and the boons and privileges on the other, were not intended to terminate in the matter then under discussion. No, they had bearings and relations which reached beyond, very much beyond them. Why? to convince the British ministry that the secretary is devoted to their will! would they not lend their aid to elevate him in his turn to the highest station in our republic? Have they not the same motive in giving a president to the United States that Russia once had in giving a king to Poland! In his view, it was easily done. Let the ministry yield to his solicitations as a partizan, what they had refused to the manly diplomacy of the nation; and let the American people feel, or be persuaded that they felt, pecuniary benefits resulting from these concessions. Then let the British presses be made to teem with praises of the candor, skill, and talent of the American diplomatists. The weight of foreign influence, with political tactics and party organization at home, he might reasonably suppose to be irresistible. And then, sir, having reached the summit of his ambition, could he not reward his august friend and ally, by yielding up other American pretensions to other British claims? Sir, the British nation has for a century past held a controlling influence over the politics of Europe. It has been the "setter up and putter down of kings." States and nations have received their gold, and become their pensioners; and it is not probable, if the lure is thus held out to them by our men in power, that they will be slow in seizing an occasion to control also our destinies.

It is for these reasons, in addition to those already urged, that I have made up my mind to vote against this nomination. I have reflected on the subject, deliberately, calmly, and I hope impartially. The office is high and responsible. The stations which the nominee has heretofore filled, have been elevated and conspicuous. I have felt, sir, and still feel, the responsibility under which I act in refusing my assent to this nomination; but I refuse it without hesitation or doubt. Sir, if a man without fortune and without name, an officer holding some humble post, had shined as deeply in his sphere as did this nominee in his, he would have been suckered, by common consent to sink into oblivion, perhaps into infamy. And surely our censure should not fall with less weight on the political sins of the high, than of the humble in station.

In coming to this conclusion, I, for one, have given little weight to the many reasons which are rife in the land touching the political character and conduct of this nominee in other matters than that here developed. Something, indeed, it has weighed upon my mind, that he is now, by an arrangement which appears to be his own, our accredited minister at that very court to which he thus pressed his partizan claims; and where, if he chose to do it, he could best mature a project for bringing foreign influence to bear upon his political fortunes at home. But chiefly I rest my censure upon the despatch which is before us, and in which I cannot be deceived.

Remarks of Mr. Hayne.

Mr. President: Before the question is taken on this nomination, I desire merely to state the grounds on which my vote shall rest. I do this as an act of justice to myself, without desiring or intending to influence the vote of any gentleman here. When the resolution offered by the senator from Maine (Mr. Holmes), was before the senate a few days ago, proposing, among other things, an inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Van Buren, I took occasion to say, that though I could not vote for that resolution, because, in the form in which it then stood, it proposed to make a call upon the president, which I did not consider as quite respectful in its character; and also, because, even in relation to Mr. Van Buren himself, it was altogether too vague and indefinite to lead to any practical result; yet that, if any senator would move for an inquiry, in proper form, I would not only vote for it, but cheerfully abide by the result. The friends of Mr. Van Buren, while opposing the resolution of Mr. Holmes, had not themselves thought proper to institute any such inquiry. I do not mean to censure them for this, nor to draw any inference from their course in this respect, unfavorable to Mr. Van Buren. They believed the charges against him requires no investigation, and for my own part I was willing to acquiesce in the suggestion which had been thrown out, that from the nature of the case it was peculiarly proper that each gentleman should make the necessary inquiries for himself, and having satisfied his own conscience, act accordingly. I have Mr. President, pursued this course, and by the result shall my conduct, on this occasion, be governed. From the time when Mr. Van Buren took possession of the department of state up to the moment of his departure for England, I have been an attentive observer of the passing events here. I have also, since this nomination came before the senate, taken pains to inform myself, from the very best sources, as to the correctness or incorrectness of my first impressions with respect to the conduct of Mr. Van Buren while secretary of state, and the result has been, a firm conviction that I ought not to give my advice and consent to his appointment as minister to England. From facts and circumstances which have fallen under my own observation, many of them notorious to the whole country, as well as from information derived from sources on which I implicitly rely, I have arrived at the following conclusion: that when Mr. Van Buren came into the cabinet, he found a state of circumstances here that opened a door to the establishment of an influence favorable to his personal views; that, instead of exerting himself to remove the causes of discord and dissension by which the executive was unhappily surrounded, he dexterously availed himself of them, and wielded them for the promotion of his own personal and political interests, and for the advancement of his friends and supporters to office, to the exclusion of almost all others. It is known to all who hear me, that gen. Jackson came into office under most auspicious circumstances, which, properly improved, could not have failed to secure for his administration the highest honor, and as I still believe lasting benefit to his country.

It is notorious that the fruits of the great political victory which brought him into power, have been, in a great measure, lost. The expectations of the country have not been fulfilled. Dissensions and discord have divided a party who were once cemented together by the strongest ties. Men who espoused gen. Jackson's cause at the earliest dawn of his political fortunes, who stood by him in the heat of the contest, have been discarded from his confidence, and forgotten, while those who came in (like Mr. Van Buren himself) at the eleventh hour, who never lifted a finger in his defence, or raised a voice in his favor, now have undisputed sway. Sir, I have no doubt whatever, that, for all this, the country is chiefly indebted to the influence of Mr. Van Buren, successfully, though cautiously, directed to the single object of advancing himself, at the expense of all who were supposed to stand in his way; and what is worse, at the expense of the success of the administration, and at imminent hazard to the best interests of the country.

I firmly believe, sir, that it was not until Mr. Van Buren discovered, in the course of the last winter, that, by creating a unity of interests between the president and himself, and alienating him from his faithful and true friends—instead of elevating himself, he was pulling his benefactor down—that he determined to break up the cabinet, by withdrawing himself, and driving his colleagues from their stations; taking care, however, to provide a safe retreat for himself in this mission to England. I think the dissolution of the cabinet, under all the circumstances which attended it, was most unfortunate for the executive, and disreputable to the country; and such, I am persuaded, is the opinion of the great body of the people, of all parties, throughout the U. States. From all that I have seen and heard upon that subject, I have not the shadow of a doubt that this event would not have taken place, but for the firm and manly resistance made by certain members of the cabinet to the views of Mr. Van Buren. If they had existed under his banner, and consented to follow his lead, all would have been well. I believe, moreover, that Mr. Van Buren, while secretary of state, used the influence derived from his high office, for the purpose of controlling, injudiciously, the domestic and social relations of this community; and that his conduct was, in other respects, inconsistent with the dignity of his station and the character of the country. Having arrived at these conclusions, after a careful and deliberate examination of the whole case, my duty is, of course, made plain. We are called upon to give our advice and consent to the appointment of Mr. Van Buren to a high and most responsible office. I know that a decision in his favor will be regarded here, and held up elsewhere, as a triumphant acquittal from all the charges that have been preferred against him. I cannot consent to be an instrument in producing such a result, believing, as I do, that these charges are true.

Allusion has been made to the strong prejudices which are said to have followed Mr. Van Buren through his whole political career, and of which it is said he is now to be made the victim. For my own part, I am unconscious of being under the influence of any such feelings. Though I have never had the honor to be closed among the personal and political friends of this gentleman; yet, so far from having ever indulged any prejudice against him, my feelings towards him have been of an opposite character. Up to the time of his going into the cabinet, but a single circumstance had occurred to shake my confidence in him as a public man; and notwithstanding this, he went into the department of state with my "salvage and consent;" and I should have continued in the same relation towards him to this day, but for a course of conduct while in that office, which I honestly believe has brought incalculable evils upon this country. In coming to these conclusions, I have not been governed, as has been supposed, by "vague rumors merely." My opinions have been made upon facts and circumstances which are notorious, some of which have fallen under my own observation, and upon information derived from the most unquestionable sources. It is possible I may be deceived, but if so, I can only say, that so strong are the convictions under which I am acting, that if I were a juror in the box, sworn to give a true verdict in the issue now made up between Martin Van Buren and his country, I should feel myself constrained to give that verdict against him. On this conviction I shall act. Be the consequences what they may, I shall do what I believe to be my duty, in recording my vote against Mr. Van Buren as minister to England.

Mr. Brown, on the conclusion of Mr. Hayne's remarks, adjured parties not to pursue this discussion; it could lead to no good. Every one's mind no doubt was made up. Let us vote, and avoid any further irritation, already too great on his subject.

Mr. Forayth said, I am aware of the propriety of the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina, and do not rise to continue the discussion. The gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hayne) has expressed his opinion—he will of course act upon it—that is his affair—he has founded it on sources within his reach; these sources are not disclosed—we cannot speak of them. No evidence other than that already before the public, has been referred to by him. We cannot examine what we do not see. All this is for the judgment of others. The honorable senator has said, that the course he has taken in coming to his conclusion, was suggested by the friends of Mr. Van Buren. This I must deny. The suggestion of that course was made by the senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster) who is not to be numbered among the friends of the person nominated, either politically or personally. Although believing investigation unnecessary, we have stood ready, at all times, to vote for it in any form, but disgraceful to the senate. The whole question will soon be before the public, and we are ready to abide by the result.

Mr. Murcy's remarks in reply to Mr. Clay.

Mr. President, I will trouble the senate with a few words in answer to what has just fallen from the honorable senator from Kentucky. He did not intend, he assures us, to apply his animadversions to the whole state of New York, but only to the dominant party there—the political friends of the minister to London [Mr. Van Buren.] But, sir, the state of facts relative to the conduct of parties in that state, will not allow of such a restricted application. If there has been any thing estimable in that respect, the honorable senator's own political friends must come in for a full share; if any distinction is to be made, it cannot be in favor of those whose good opinion he enjoys. A recurrence to facts will show, that proscription—if it is to be called—enters more deeply into their practice when they get power, than it does into the practice of those who are selected as the particular objects of attack. I could refer to recent instances to verify the assertion. Give them success only in a single city, and the work of removal from office at once begins. They have very few "spared monuments;" almost all are swept off—from the highest to the lowest—down even to the lamp-lighter. The truth is, sir, the political friends of the senator from Kentucky are not converts to the liberal doctrines he has avowed on this occasion. If they have ever heard of them, they heed them not.

After all, Mr. President, it is quite evident from what we have heard, in relation to the conduct of parties in Maryland and elsewhere, that New York does not differ from other states. Political men in all of them have the same passions, and are actuated by like motives, and only differ in conduct by reason of some difference in their circumstances. Where there is alternation of success and defeat, there will be removals—called restoration or retaliation, by those who use power; and proscription by those who feel it.

If the honorable senator understood me to speak of only one office-holder; a single spared monument, as he called it, friendly to the late administration, being retained, he had misapprehended me. The number of changes made in that state is small; and I can assure him, that notwithstanding the ferocious and proscribing policies ascribed to us, he has many friends now enjoying offices under both the general and state governments: more than that, sir, Mr. Van Buren has been censured by some of his own political friends, for having counteracted, as they suppose, the efforts which have been made, in some instances, to effect changes.

So far as my observation has extended, I can discover no sort of resemblance between the condition of actual office holders opposed to the administration, and that which has been described? They were portrayed as a class of men in the most abject state of fear and trembling, not daring to speak but in whispers on public affairs, and even under restraints in their social intercourse. They may present themselves, or be presented in this light to the honorable senators; but I am sure they are not so presented to others, for that is not their true condition. Their political predilections and sentiments are not restrained by fear or expressed in whispers—their opposition is open and active, and sometimes noisy, and yet they remain in undisturbed possession of their offices.

I must again allude to the grounds of the removal of some subordinate officers by the present administration, in order that it may be understood upon what principle the act is vindicated, and to repel the charge of wanton proscription. The necessities of the late administration were such that it compel of these officers to become partisans in the struggle. Many of them mingled in the hottest of the fight; they were paragraph writers for the newspapers, and the distributors of political handbills, and thereby exposed themselves to the vicissitudes to which those are always exposed, for whom the political contests in free governments are waged. If among this class of officers there was more mortality attendant upon the late conflict, it was because there was more disease.

The senator from Kentucky has denounced removals from office as a violation of the freedom of opinion, and the liberty of speech and action. He advocates the liberty of speech and action. He advocates a course of conduct towards political opponents, characterized by great moderation and forbearance, and what is more, he professes to have conformed his actions to his precepts. We all of us, I believe, admire these liberal sentiments, and feel disposed, in our abstract speculations, to adopt them as the rule of our conduct. The theory is, indeed, beautiful; but, sir, do we put them in practice when brought to the experiment? I would ask the honorable senator, if he has himself practised them? I will not say he has not, because he assures us he has; but I will say that some part of his public conduct has exposed him to a strong suspicion of having departed from the path which he now points out as the true one, and of having wandered into that which he now thinks it is so censurable for others to have pursued.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 26—VOL. V. BALTIMORE, FEB. 25, 1832. [VOL. XLI. WHOLE NO. 1,068

It will be recollected, sir, that there is considerable patronage attached to the department of state. To it appertain the selection of the newspapers in which the laws of the United States are published. I well remember that while that honorable senator was at the head of that department, and when the fortunes of the late administration began to wane, the patronage of publishing the laws was withdrawn from certain public journals, which had long enjoyed it. What was the cause of this change—this removal from office, I believe I may call it. It was not a violent and vindictive opposition to the existing administration. Some of these journals had scarcely spoken in whispers against it. No, sir, it was for lukewarmness—for neutrality—a want of zeal in the cause of the administration was alleged to be the offence; proscription was the punishment. Where was then that sacred regard for the freedom of opinion and the liberty of speech and action which we now hear so highly extolled? Was not this an attempt to control public opinion through the medium of the press, and to bring that press into a subserviency to the views of the men in power?

Sir, I wish not to be misunderstood. I have not alluded to these things for the purpose of accusation. I do not even complain of the manner in which the honorable senator used the patronage entrusted to him; but I do complain that he has seen fit to bring before this body the conduct of a political party in New York as a theme of reproach and annihilation, when its conduct is not distinguishable (except for some moderation and tolerance) from that of his own personal and political friends in that state—when its conduct does not differ from that pursued by political men in other states; and when it has a justification, if it needed one, in the honorable senator's own example.

Remarks of Mr. Miller in reply to Mr. Forsyth.

Mr. Miller kept no note of his rejoinder to Mr. Forsyth. He replied at the moment to such suggestions as seemed to require notice at his hands. The publication of Mr. Forsyth's speech in reply, renders it proper that the rejoinder by Mr. Miller should be published in correct and explain portions of Mr. Forsyth's reply.

Mr. President, I will trouble the senate with only a few observations in reply. The gentleman from Georgia has said that I seemed earnestly hunting for causes for a divorce from the president. This is not so. I mean in this case to vindicate the character of my constituents from servile devotion to an administration that shows no respect to their feelings and their character. Upon every point connected with the interest and principles of South Carolina, and the correct policy of the nation, it shall have my support. The senator seems to consider the union party and the old radical party in South Carolina as identical; and as well versed as he may be in our local politics; he will permit me to put him right. The union party in South Carolina cannot be said to have had an existence antecedent to 1830, unless they may be considered in fact and principle the old federal party. Taking this for granted, the gentleman knows how far back he may be able to establish a "by-gone" fraternity with his union friends. I do not know more than one of the old radical party who ever acted with the gentleman, and he will scarcely be regarded sufficient to give a party name to a very respectable portion of the population in South Carolina. The gentleman admits that his friends, as well as himself, stood up for principle, and against general Jackson, in the Seminole war. He says Georgia was then where she is now, beside the unionist, standing up for the right, and reprehending the wrong.

I am inclined to believe that if the gentleman would retrace the history of his own state, he would find himself and his friends occasionally as much at war with the union, as ever the South Carolina unionists have been. Upon the whole, one remarkable difference is found in the honorable gentleman's course and mine. I am constant with my position. He censured general Jackson when he was out of power, and I sustained him; and he sustains him in power, while, in the case now before the senate, I do not, for the reasons detailed, which he affects to consider most extraordinary. He must not indulge in visionary apprehensions as to what I shall do. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. He says the union party brought me forward for governor and thereby postponed the present incumbent. The gentleman here tells again into an error, the same persons who brought me forward for governor, brought me forward for the post I now fill; and I consider myself here representing in the senate the principles of the old radical party, which is another name with us for the old republican or State Rights party.

The gentleman says that I liked not the first cabinet, and less the last. This last assertion is not warranted by any thing which has fallen from me. It is not true that I like the second cabinet less than the first. I have voted to confirm the appointment of all the latter, and I would not vote for all the first if they were before us now for confirmation.

The gentleman denies, with great emphasis, the fact of the nominee having any agency in the ripping up the cabinet transactions in relation to the Seminole war. I stated my belief from the facts before the public, and the gentleman and myself draw different inferences from those facts. He says the facts before the public prove that the charge is the "coining of a discoloured coin, and baseless as the fabric of a vision." [Mr. Miller did not understand Mr. Forsyth, as using in the debate, such strong language, and will now repeat his belief, as he heretofore has done, and further his impression that he could, upon the evidence, convict him before any impartial jury, unless the gentleman should furnish to such jury other information than he has done to the senate. If he mistake not, the gentleman had something to do with this matter, and his opinion may be entitled to a consideration which Mr. Miller's does not possess. The high authority referred to, together with the personal knowledge of the senator, may convince him, but not others, who are less informed on this subject.]

I shall not take any step; to prove the guilt or innocence of the nominee, as requested by the gentleman. It does not concern the public or myself farther than it constitutes a feature in the history of the present life, and I am at liberty to state my belief and when called on to give my vote.

The gentleman misunderstood me, if he supposed I objected to the establishment of the Globe, as the government paper, by Mr. Van Buren, or any one else. I concede the right of every man, public or private, to establish presses; but in doing so, they must take them cum onere. If they abuse me and my friends, by their express or implied authority to obtain favor with others, they must look to those who they themselves desire to propitiate for support.

Now what are the facts here? Pending the nomination, a majority of the legislature, constituting the entire mass of my political friends, pass a resolution approving of so much of gen. Jackson's late message, as recommends a reduction of the tariff to a revenue measure, and the most disingenuous and base motive is attempted to be fixed upon them, by an administration print, which is the mouth-piece of the nominee and his party. In this matter, I put myself on my reserved right, and if I had no other ground to stand on, I would substitute my will for the reason, and reject the patron of such a press. It is one of the sovereign rights of a freeman to put those who ask his vote for office, at least upon terms of respect.

Mr. Marcy's remarks on the resolutions offered by Mr. Holmes.

When the resolutions offered by Mr. Holmes were under consideration, and towards the close of the debate, Mr. Marcy observed that he had not intended to make a single remark upon the subject then before the senate; yet he was unwilling to give a vote, from which it might be inferred, unless it was accompanied with a word of explanation, that he wished to suppress inquiry. That was very far from his intention. If any honorable senator has reason to believe that the person whose nomination is now under consideration, is chargeable with improper conduct, and will introduce a resolution specifying the charge, and asking for inquiry, he would give it his support as readily as any member of that body; but the resolutions offered by the senator from Maine, (Mr. Holmes), were of an exceptional character; for in addition to impeaching, indirectly, if it may be so considered, the integrity of the president, by proposing to ask if he had stated the true reasons for the dissolution of his late cabinet, it will bring before the committee, if it should be adopted, a mass of matters very difficult to be inquired into, and not at all connected, as he conceived, with the vote to be given on the nomination of Mr. Van Buren. No committee to which these resolutions will be sent, will voluntarily enter into the various matters which some gentlemen may suppose to be within the scope of the inquiry into the causes of the dissolution of the late cabinet, and the senate ought not to impose that labor on them, unless it be proposed to show that Mr. Van Buren had an agency in that affair. It is not pretended—certainly not by the resolutions—that he was connected with the event. It is true, that the resolutions, after the introduction of much irrelevant matter, propose to inquire whether Mr. Van Buren had not participated in practices disgraceful to the national character, &c.

Let any senator, who believes such practices ever had in point of fact, any existence, put them forth specifically in a resolution, and he would, he said, vote to send it to a committee for investigation; and if they were found to be true, let the nominee be rejected. The designation of offenses by the terms of "practices disgraceful to the national character," was very vague—quite too vague. The nature and character of these practices should be defined, that the senate may know the duty they impose, and the committee the duty they are required to perform.

The proposed resolutions, as now shaped, make no specific charge, and give no cert-in direction to the inquiry. He therefore felt himself called on to vote against them, or to vote for laying them on the table; but when a case for inquiry was presented, he would vote for going into it. Indeed, he wished to be distinctly understood as inviting inquiry; but in fairness, it should be on specified charges.

To some of the practices intended probably to be in the resolutions, we have, he said, the solemn public denial of Mr. Van Buren, accompanied with a challenge to all the world for proof and no man had yet been found to accept that challenge and come forth with proof. Those who best know the character and conduct of the nominee feel the fullest confidence that nothing dishonorable or degrading in the slightest degree, can be substantiated. So far, therefore, from closing the door of investigation, they are willing to be instrumental in opening it.

¶ We have now given, we believe, all the speeches concerning the nomination of Mr. Van Buren that have been reported and published, whether delivered by his supporters or opponents. As it has been several times asked, what did Messrs. Tazewell and Tyler say—may be proper to add, that, so far as we are informed, they only said yes, when the question on ratification was put to them, though a writer in the Richmond Enquirer says they "should have been heard in a voice of thunder." Mr. Mangum is said to have offered a few remarks, in which he objected to the tone and tenor of Mr. Van Buren's instructions, but thought that they did not call for, or justify, his rejection.

¶ The present number completes the 41st volume of the REGISTER. It contains 480 pages—and the Addendum of reports made by the committees of the New York Convention makes 64 pages more, in all 544 pages of close matter; besides the title page and table of contents which we expect to publish this day fortnight. This volume and the last, perhaps, contain a greater amount of reading and record matter than ever was published in book-form for the same money, under the same circumstances, and a rigid impartiality has been observed as to the selections. The extra expenses of the year now ended, to give value to the REGISTER as a book of reference, have exceeded one thousand dollars—and yet other gratuitous sheets would have issued, if the cost of them could have been afforded. The new year, it is hoped, will give increased means, and the quid pro quo shall be furnished with as much pleasure as it is received.

There are very few copies of the present and last volumes more than must be laid aside for the whole sets of the work kept full—and these volumes will not be sold separated from a regular subscription for the coming year—or the payment of ten dollars, for the past and running year.

Several reports of committees of the New York convention are yet to be circulated as added to the REGISTER; but those to issue will be annexed to the ensuing volume—some of them will not be ready for a considerable time; and a great deal of labor in statistical matter must have to be delayed until after all the reports are in. The whole, however, shall issue with all possible despatch, for the public information.

¶ There was a great meeting of the employers and journeymen hatters held in Baltimore on Thursday evening last, and a committee was appointed to remonstrate against the principles of the bill reported by Mr. McDuffie, or any other proceeding which shall have a tendency to reduce the amount of wages paid to working people in the United States. We have not time or room to give particulars. It may be expected that like proceedings will be had by the manufacturers and workers in leather, cabinet wares, and the many other trades which have reached a high degree of perfection, through the paternal care of a wise and enlightened government. It is unreasonable to expect that these should be placed in open competition with the pauper laborers of Europe—for they have to bear "the burthen and heat of the day"—they are the rank and file of the country; as glory in prosperous peace, and sure defence in war.

THE CENTENNIAL BIRTH DAY OF WASHINGTON seems to have been very generally celebrated by processions, orations, and social and convivial meetings of the people of the United States—by the firing of cannon, ringing of bells, display of flags—by civil, religious and military ceremonies—and by shows and exhibitions, plays and sports of various kinds; a relaxation from business having generally taken place to honor the memory of the "father of his country"—"first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen;" whose example is precious to America, but whose name is the property of all who love, or shall love, liberty in every clime and every age, and will endure—until "chaos shall come again."

The proceedings had in congress, in preparation for the day and on the day itself, shall be laid aside for preservation—for they will be much looked to in times to come, and persons will wonder at some things that happened! We are also specially desirous of giving place to the thrilling speech of Mr. Burges, of Rhode Island, in support of the proceedings suggested to honor the memory of the "mighty dead." It is one of the best finish-and eulogiums that we ever met with—and among the apparent efforts of that learned and powerful orator.

At Washington, divine service was performed by the chaplains to congress in the hall of the representatives—there was a military procession, a large dining party and two public balls. The vice president, speaker of the house of representatives, &c. attended service in the capitol and the ball at Carusi's saloon: the president is not mentioned as attending either. Mr. Webster presided at the dinner party, assisted by gen. Mercer, of Virginia, gen. Jones, of Washington, and gen. Vance, of Ohio. Mr. Webster pronounced a speech of an hour's length, in which he is said to have "exceeded himself"—and gen. Mercer, gov. Barbour, Mr. Huntington, Mr. Newton, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Sinner, Mr. Prague, Mr. Pendleton, Mr. Robbins, Mr. Cox, and Mr. Crane, also addressed the company. All the addresses were reported, and will be published.

The ceremonies of the day were rendered more interesting by the presence of the "Washington Grays," of Philadelphia, an elegant company of volunteers, who had made the journey to visit the tomb of Washington on the anniversary of his hundredth birthday.

We desire also to give some account of the proceedings in our own city and at other places. The procession at Philadelphia was so large that it required two days for it to pass; and from the preparations made at Boston, New York, and many other cities and towns, at Wednesday, the 22d inst. would seem to have been days of general rejoicing.

STATISTICS. We have often complained of the want of statistical knowledge. Few nations called civilized are such beggarly accountants of their affairs as our own, except as to the ordinary operations of government. We may be said to have nothing at all, in statistics, except the population tables every ten years, and the annual treasury reports concerning navigation and commerce—miserable and meagre enough in themselves, while the little practical good that might be in them, is rendered valueless by the delay that attends their publication. Let this be "reformed."

With respect to this subject, the committee of the New York convention to which was referred "the subject of chemistry as connected with manufactures and mechanical arts," have the following strong and happy remarks:

"Statistical facts are valuable in proportion to the promptness with which they are known. When delayed, they are more a matter of curiosity than of practical usefulness."

"A well organized system of statistics would not only be a guide to the statesman, enabling him to legislate in the intricate subject of trade understandingly, but would inform the merchant on the important matter of consumption and supply, and save him from the many errors into which he is liable to be led, by reason of his unavoidable ignorance in this particular. Such intelligence often, and promptly communicated, would, in a great measure, prevent the occurrence of that scarcity and consequent enhancement of price, which so frequently takes the consumer by surprise; and, on the other hand, would guard against that excessive glut and consequent ruinous reduction of prices, which have done more to involve the enterprising merchant, and injure the manufacturer, than all the foreign competition that can be combined against them."

Under the impressions so well expressed in the preceding extract, we were much pleased to observe the following proceedings in the senate of the United States, on the 15th inst. and tender to Mr. Holmes our hearty thanks for the resolution that he offered:

Mr. Holmes rose to offer a resolution calling for information according to the act of congress, 1820, requiring the secretary of the treasury to lay before congress, at the opening of the session, a statement of the commerce of the United States with all countries. Mr. Holmes said that, as the provisions of the act have been made particularly to enable congress to obtain information that would enable them to act understandingly on questions which might arise relative to commerce, the importance of the resolution would be seen at once. By the act, the secretary was requested to make the return as soon as possible after the 1st of December, at each session. The returns were to be made quarterly, near the 1st of September, December, March and June. The last year, this document, which should have come in early in December, was withheld until after the close of the session; and at the first of March the senate were informed that the secretary would not be able to make it out during the session of congress; and it was not until eight weeks after the members had returned home that the statement made its appearance. It was very extraordinary that the statement was not made out on the 1st of March. We know that it was not received until eight weeks after congress adjourned, and the senate will see that it is important to ask the reason why the statement was not given before the close of the session, in order to apply the proper remedy, if there was in fact any reason why this could not be done. We are now far advanced in the present session—the subject of our commercial relations with the British colonies has come up before congress, under peculiar circumstances—information has repeatedly been sought for from the executive, and yet this document is withheld, which all must see to be important and necessary to enable congress to act understandingly upon this question.

The document referred to should have been communicated to the senate near the 1st of December—and more than two months have elapsed since the time which the secretary is required by the act of congress to present it, and yet nothing has been seen or heard of it. The request might be made and the returns given all within the space of six days, and yet for seven weeks it has not been done, and the duty has been neglected. He wished also to know what had become of the answer to the resolutions that were long since submitted by himself and his colleague relative to the trade between the United States and the British West India colonies calling for important information, most of which could have been given long before now? Some of it might not have been obtained at that time—but can it have been necessary to spend two months in collecting it? In order to know the reason why this information had not yet been received, and why documents so important to the senate were withheld—

Mr. H. submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, that the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform the senate why the statements of the foreign commerce of the United States required by the act of the 10th February, 1820, have not been transmitted to congress, and if there is any impediment to a compliance with the provisions of that act, what legislative provision is necessary to remove it.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform the senate why he has not reported in answer to their resolution of 22d December, 1831, calling for information in regard to the British colonial trade, and when the answer is to be expected.

Surely, time enough has elapsed to obtain and prepare the facts belonging to the business of the year which ended five months ago, on the 30th September 1831. Millions have been lost to the people for the want of statistical knowledge. They only get acquainted with commercial facts when they are "more matters of curiosity than of practical usefulness," and the labor and cost of preparing and publishing them is almost as if wasted.

OUR RIVERS. There was a tremendous rising of the waters of the Ohio and its tributaries on the 9th and 10th inst. On the latter day it was forty feet above low water mark at Pittsburg—many parts of the city were overflowed, and Alleghany-Town was under water. Houses, barns and stacks of hay and grain, were instantly passing down the Ohio—fifty houses are said to have been swept away, or turned over, on the Alleghany river alone, but the noble bridge and aqueduct resisted the flood and stood fast; among other things, 16,000 barrels of salt were carried off by the rise of waters in the Kiskeminitas. At Wheeling, the flood was 5 or 6 feet higher than ever known before: 42 houses were swept away from South Wheeling—35 houses were seen passing down the Ohio on the morning of the 11th, and a large warehouse, filled with flour, lodged on the upper part of the island! A gentleman who ascended the river in a steam boat, says that they met two hundred houses descending with the torrent. The amount of damage sustained must be, indeed, heavy—for all the towns and villages, on the whole course of the river, must have partially suffered, and the low lands have been swept of every thing that was moveable. The line of desolation is several hundred miles long—but as yet it does not appear that the life of any person has been lost.

The floods in the Susquehannah have, also, been awful. In some places the ice was piled up fifty feet high.—The bridge at Columbia, perhaps the greatest structure of its kind in the world, has been nearly carried away.

It is stated that the Indians from the Rocky mountains, who some time since arrived at Washington, spoke of the present as a season of floods—because that the bearers had built their houses much higher than usual!

"PASSING STRANGE!" The editor of the "Harrisburg Intelligencer" of the 17th inst. expresses "regret, that those to whom was entrusted, by the tariff convention in New York, the dissemination of the reports of the several committees, should have been so negligent of their duty. We have yet seen no report of the committee on iron, and we have seen no man in this section of the country who has. Why is this?"

We ask, how is this? The report on iron was promptly published—and widely distributed early in December; and a package containing nearly 1000 copies was sent, carriage paid, to two members of the convention resident at Harrisburg—the report was published as an "addendum" to the Register on the 17th of December, (as have all the reports yet in, two or three just received excepted), and so distributed far and wide—and further, 2000 copies of this report on iron were deposited at the lodgings of the gentlemen composing the Pennsylvania delegation in congress, for general circulation—supposing they would feel a deep interest in this matter; and yet many copies have been variously sent into Pennsylvania, at no small expenditure of labor and time. How then it has happened, as stated in the "Harrisburg Intelligencer," is wholly past our finding out—for the editor receives the Reports raw, and should, at least, have seen one copy of all the reports that have been published.

MONEY. The pressure for money continues—for large quantities of specie are exported; and the effects on persons extensively engaged in business are distressing—in many cases, the acquisitions of an industrious and useful life are swept away in a moment, by the bankruptcies of individuals thought solvent, and who, most probably, would have faithfully met their engagements, had the usual facilities been extended to them. Powerful efforts have been made, however, to encourage or sustain worthy men—but we should be glad to believe that the "worst is over." Specie has rapidly departed from us, and no business is doing to bring much of it into our country—it is deficient in quantity, and an alarming contraction of the currency necessarily follows.

A NEW LEAF FROM THE BOOK OF CONTROVERSY! The National Intelligencer of Tuesday last contains four closely printed columns of letters given to the publisher Charles J. Wickliffe, esq., one of the Kentucky delegation in congress, which we feel compelled to postpone—because that our present number terminates a volume, and the insertion of many articles belonging to its period is required; and besides, it is most probable that this new matter will begot other statements, and it is best that every particular subject should be confined within a volume, if practicable.

The general facts are these: It has been repeatedly stated in the "Globe," and by Mr. Eaton, in certain of his addresses, appeals, &c., that, during the session of congress 1829-30, a meeting of members of congress, friends of Mr. Calhoun, was held, for the purpose of forcing Messrs. Van Buren and Eaton, but especially the latter, out of the cabinet; and the names of individuals, particularly that of Mr. Wickliffe, have been bandied about as connected with this "CONSPIRACY;" hence the present exposition.

Mr. Wickliffe states, that in March, 1830, Messrs. Hugh L. White, Felix Grundy, Robert Desha, Cove Johnson, and James K. Polk, of Tennessee; and George M. Bibb, and Henry Daniel, of Kentucky, met him, at his request, in Mr. Bibb's room, with a view to consider the propriety of urging on the president the necessity of holding cabinet councils, which had then recently been discontinued; that all the gentlemen present joined heartily in the proceeding, and appointed Mr. Bibb to make known the wishes of his friends to the president of the United States—which was done accordingly. That this was the only subject considered by the meeting alluded to—supposed to consist of the most firm and resolute of the friends of the president; and the least likely of any to enter into a "conspiracy" to favor Mr. Calhoun, or embarrass the administration of General Jackson.

In consequence of the charges preferred, as briefly stated above, Mr. Wickliffe addressed letters to all the gentlemen named,* requesting they would state what happened at the meeting in March, 1830, at Mr. Bibb's room. Messrs. Daniel, Johnson, and Bibb, have freely and fully replied to Mr. Wickliffe, entirely sustaining the facts just stated as to the objects of the meeting and the proceedings had on that occasion; but Messrs. Polk, White and Grundy have declined to furnish statements of what passed in Mr. Bibb's room—not being satisfied of the necessity or propriety of any exposition of the subject; they would "not keep alive discussion from which, (as Mr. White says), no public good can result."

Mr. Daniel says, that a resumption of the practice of holding cabinet councils was wished, because "that the advice of such council is 'more disinterested than the advice of the irresponsible swarms of individuals who surround every executive.'" Mr. Johnson says to Mr. Wickliffe, "I then and still believe that your motive for getting up that meeting was pure and patriotic, to advance the interest of the country, and the issue of the administration," and that the proceedings had relation only to the holding of cabinet councils. Mr. Overton, (one of the oldest and firmest friends of gen. Jackson, being then on a visit to him), was invited to attend, though not a member of congress—but did not. His purposes and proceedings, however, he says, (in reply to Mr. Wickliffe), were made known to him; he heard of nothing that he thought inimical to the president or major Eaton; but gives it to be understood that if he had attended the meeting, he should have agitated the removal of the latter; and says that he had advised the president to dismiss major Eaton, as well as major Barry. Mr. Bibb's letter is long, and very particular as to the points charged against the persons who attended the meeting, and peremptorily denies all the allegations made as to a subversive to Mr. Calhoun, a desire to "dispose of" Mr. Van Buren or major Eaton—or to do any thing more than recommend weekly meetings of the cabinet, in council. His letter concludes in the following strong terms:

"I regret that you should have been driven to the necessity of defending yourself against the accusation contained in those publications—an accusation founded on a total perversion and distortion of your motives and conduct. This you may look upon as springing from that curse to which men in power are incident—to be attended by those who seek to ingratiate themselves by misrepresentation and detraction; whose selfish aims may thrive by falsehood and the passions, but sicken and die in the sunshine of truth and reason."

Mr. Blair, editor of the "Globe" refused to publish the statement of Mr. Wickliffe and the letters noticed above, though his paper first published the articles which rendered this exposition necessary. Hence its appearance in the "National Intelligencer."

The whole shows a strange state of things. We feel it more necessary to publish this correspondence, for the reason that the refusal of the "Globe" to insert it, will probably be followed by that of all the editors appointed to publish the laws, "by authority."

* Except Mr. Desha, who had already vindicated himself on the points made against the meeting.

"A TOUCH OF THE ROMANTIC." The following is an extract from a grave report of the committee on commerce of the house of representatives of the United States, presented by Mr. Cambreleng, Feb. 3, 1830—and of which, because of the importance of the facts that it contains, some six or ten thousand copies were ordered to be printed!

"Of the coasting tonnage of Great Britain, there was no account authorized till 1823; in that year it stood at 7,527,827, in 1827, it was 8,648,868 tons. Part of this increase is owing to the inclusion of the Irish tonnage; but it is principally to the rapid increase of her navigation in the coasting trade. The mere increase in coasting tonnage for five years, is more than equal to the whole enrolled and licensed tonnage of the United States, whether employed on our coast, on the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, on our northern lakes, or in the fisheries."

The time was, when congressional reports were regarded as solemn affirmations of ascertained truth, deliberately weighed by the committees, and they were held responsible for the facts set forth; the time is, when reports of committees are smuggled into the house, and no responsibility is encountered because of the contents of them. The preceding extract shows an enormous devotion to error, or an extraordinary amount of stupidity. On one of the horns of this dilemma, the "honorable chairman" of that committee must rest. His assertion as to the increase of the British coasting tonnage, plainly shows that he himself was silly enough to believe, or wicked enough to impose that belief on others, that Britain really employed 8,648,868 tons in her coasting trade! It is a THUNDER! The best tale of "Mendez Pinto" was but a type of this giant official MISTAKE!

The forthcoming volume of Mr. Williams' truly valuable work, the "New York Annual Register," has the following item:

Tonnage of Great Britain and Ireland.

From an abstract of returns made to parliament, it appears that the number of ships and vessels belonging to the different ports of the British Empire, in 1829, was as follows:

	Ships and Vessels.	Tons.
England,.....	13,977.....	1,758,465
Scotland,.....	3,228.....	308,297
Ireland,.....	1,413.....	101,994
Isles of Jersey, Guernsey & Man, &c.....	492.....	31,603

Grand Total,.....19,110.....2,199,959

Entered the Ports of the United Kingdom in 1829,

	Vessels.	Tons.	Men employed.
British,.....	13,659.....	2,184,535.....	122,185
Foreign,.....	5,218.....	710,303.....	39,342

Cleared.

British,.....	12,636.....	2,063,179.....	119,262
Foreign,.....	5,094.....	730,250.....	38,527

Steam Boats owned in the United Kingdom.

	Vessels.	Tons.
England,.....	241.....	20,611
Scotland,.....	75.....	5,953
Ireland,.....	26.....	4,791

Total,.....342.....31,353

The Tonnage of the United States of America in 1829, was as follows:

	Registered	Enrolled and Licensed	Total.
Tons, 650,143.....	610,654	1,260,977

The amounts of the tonnage of the principal ports are as follows:

	Ships and Vessels.	Tons.
London,.....	2,663.....	572,835
Newcastle,.....	987.....	202,379
Liverpool,.....	805.....	161,780
Bristol,.....	316.....	49,535
Hull,.....	579.....	72,248
Sunderland,.....	624.....	107,628

So, the whole tonnage of England, Scotland and Ireland, and of the adjacent isles, was only 2,199,959 tons, in 1829, or two years after Mr. Cambreleng said that the coasting tonnage, alone, of the United Kingdom was 8,648,868 tons. What a rapid decrease there must have been in these two years, being no less than in the sum of nearly six millions and a half of tons, or about three times as much tonnage as the United Kingdom ever possessed! This is not easily reconciled—but the facts are "officially" stated, and what free trader dares dispute them?

SOLENN—AND IMPORTANT! It will be recollected that lieutenant Webb, the colleague of major Montecucoli Massachussetts Noah, (who is also high-priest and king of the Jews, by his own proclamation), in the editorship of that most venomous and voracious journal, the "N. Y. Courier and Enquirer"—(in which "democrats" are made by new nibbings of the pen, or turned into "federalists" at the good pleasure of these omnipotent politicians, though both have been hurled out of the great manufactory of "patent republicanism" at Tammany Hall), a good while ago journeyed from N. York to Washington, (venting his rage along the road, and telling every body what he would do), for the express purpose of cow-hiding general Green. Some days after his arrival, the gallant lieutenant met the gallant general, and, bravely presenting his cow-hide, politely requested that the latter would take a little of its oil! But the general thought that two were necessary to an arrangement of that sort, and drew from his breeches-pocket a mahogany-tipped pistol—of which the lieutenant took a close observation, and ascertained that the stock and barrel were exactly eight inches and three quarters long; but fearing that it might "go off," he lowered his cow-hide and made a learned speech at the general, who laughed for a while, but, being in a hurry, he politely requested the lieutenant to stand aside, which he did—having the fear of the percussion-stock before his eyes — and then the lieutenant went back to New York, taking the cow-hide with him, to be laid up, with major Noah's title to the kingship of the Jews, in perpetuum rei memoriam of the ridiculous and sublime. And so that matter ended.

But this same lieutenant Webb, now made into colonel Webb—("son of the late general Samuel B. Webb, of the army of the revolution and de-lcamp in general Washington"), recently addressed a very modest letter to some person unknown to us, who gave it to the public, as a specimen of the beautiful in politeness—and general Green made certain contemptuous remarks on that part of the letter which related to himself. Then was the anger of the colonel roused! He received the blessing of the high priest of the Jews and surveyor of the port of New York, and was again off to Washington, breathing gunpowder and proclaiming death! Having arrived, he sent a Mr. Barrell to general Green with a bit of paper "ready cut and dry," which he was required to sign. But when it was presented, the general enquired of Mr. Barrell if he was the representative of colonel Webb, and the latter assenting—the general went to his desk, and, taking a cow-skin in one hand and a pistol in the other, said to Mr. Barrell, "sir I am going to cow-skin you," and he did it. Some persons interfered and not much damage was done—and Mr. B. regaining possession of his hat and spectacles, which had been knocked off in the scuffle, returned to make a report of what had happened, bringing with him the "apology" that general Green would not make. Then the colonel knowing not exactly what he ought to do—consults "nearly thirty

†That the people might see how detestable are the means by which the wires of party are worked, and how despicable are those who pull these wires, we should publish this letter of "James Watson Webb"—but it would give the thing a greater degree of importance than it deserves;—and error enough has been committed in this way, perhaps, by inserting the present article.

‡Mr. Green seems to have regretted that he felt it necessary so to treat Mr. Barrell, who seems a worthy man; but had he been a thinking one, we would have calculated the effects of the message that he was charged with.

gentlemen of standing and respectability," as he says, and "at four o'clock on the afternoon of the same day posted up, in front of Gadsby's and Brown's hotels, the following card:"

"TO THE PUBLIC.

I publish general DUFF GREEN to the world, as a SCOUNDREL and a COWARD.

JAS. WATSON WEBB, of New York.

Washington, February 6, 1832.

But this was not all. The colonel, for the amusement of the public, (and we assure him it has caused many a laugh), went to work, and prepared a full account of the whole affair, telling many queer things, which he published on a broadside of large foolscap paper, favoring us with two copies; and we would advise, in return for this compliment, that we would advise, and placed at the left hand of the entrance into Tammany Hall—the right, for all that is contemptible and ridiculous, being appropriated to the proclamation of major Mordecai Manassah Noah, high priest and king of the Jews, grand sachem of the snake tribe, and surveyor of the port of New York—once rejected by the senate, but re-nominated and "rewarded."

HOT TIMES AT WASHINGTON! The "Telegraph" of the 22d, distinctly, and without ceremony, charges John H. Eaton, secretary of war, and gen. Coffee, the nephew by marriage of gen. Jackson," then being commissioners, on the part of the United States, to conclude a treaty with the Choctaws in Mississippi, with having "wrote a great number of letters to the most influential citizens," urging the rejection of the governor of Mississippi's appointment of Mr. Poindexter, as a senator of the United States; and any, "if the president will authorize any one to deny" the facts stated, they "can be proved, according to the strictest rules of law," &c.—And adds, that notwithstanding this interference—and the fact, that though Mr. Poindexter was far distant from his state at the time and his health such "that many believed he was incapable of business of any kind," he was elected with only five dissenting voices, &c. These are bold charges—and, if true, of most extraordinary character.

And the "Telegraph" and "Globe" contain many letters which have passed between Mr. Poindexter and his friend, Mr. Warren A. Davis—and Mr. Moore, of Alabama, and his friend Mr. Miller, of South Carolina, with Mr. Hoffman, Mr. Angel, and on the part of Mr. Soule, and Mr. Bergen, members of congress, from New York, because of the matters referred to in the "cards" published in our last. It is probable that we might have made room for the several notes of the persons named—but colonel Webb, of the "New York Courier and Enquirer," had a part in the correspondence between Mr. Moore and Mr. Bergen, and the excessive length of his statements and remarks would forbid a present insertion of the whole, if we could reconcile ourselves to copy from the "Globe" so coarse an article.

"A TOUCH OF THE RIDICULOUS." An essayist in a New York paper speaking of the cost of ship building in England and America, after going into some very nice and accurate calculations, makes it out that, because of dearer tobacco, and the extra price of iron, hemp, and sail cloth, a ship of 500 tons costs exactly 9,147 dollars more in the United States than in England—which more counterbalances the increased cost of wood, in the

In proof positive that this "free trade" gentleman is right, we offer this simple fact—that ALL the magnificent packets and other first rate ships that ply regularly between Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and Liverpool and London, are AMERICAN built, and navigated by American seamen, though British built and navigated vessels may enter our ports on the same terms as our own!!! But this, by the license which "free traders" use, perhaps will be ascribed to the want of capital and enterprise in Englishmen to interfere in that important and profitable branch of navigation! Pshaw!

The result of this tale is like a certain discovery of the perpetual motion. It was beautiful in its theory, but had one practical fault—IT WOULDN'T GO. "Nothing else was the matter with it!"

REMONS. It is said that Mr. Rives is to be transferred from France to England, with an outfit of $9,000—that Mr. Livingston is to succeed Mr. Rives—that Mr. Tazewell is to succeed Mr. Livingston—that col. R. M. Johnson is to succeed Mr. Cass, who is to succeed somebody else, not named. These things have been repeated several times, and it is possible that some of the changes are contemplated.

"FREE TRADE." From a late London paper. It is remarkable that, while the silk weavers of England are all complaining, and not without cause, of the wretched condition to which their trade has been reduced by the competition between them and the French, the weavers of France are absolutely in a state of insurrection in consequence of the low rate of wages to which they have been brought down, in order to enable their masters—or rather, their masters' masters, to undersell the British manufacturers. There must be something radically bad in this state of things. Silks of all descriptions are in great demand, yet those who live by manufacturing them can scarcely procure the means of existence. It appears to us that the competition now existing between the French and English silk manufacturers is injurious to both parties—though not, perhaps, in equal proportions. The English certainly suffer the most by it. At any rate, we are of opinion that if French silks were prohibited tomorrow, the French manufacturer would not be injured by the measure. As it is, the French and English manufacturers are set to knock each other down, like two pugilists at a prize fight, for the benefit of the standers by. As a proof of the mischievous effects of this state of things, with regard to the English ribbon weavers, we have only to state that the poor rates of Coventry have nearly doubled since the passage of the act admitting the importation of French goods. The following resolutions, which were passed at a public meeting held last week at Coventry, sufficiently illustrate this fact:—

"That the poor rates in this city have nearly doubled since the passage of the act. They amounted for the year ending the 12th day of April, 1826, to £11,232 14s. 4½d. and for the year ending the 19th day of April last, to £20,314 5s. 6½d.

"That the payments to the casual poor, (consisting mostly of persons requiring temporary relief for want of employment in the parishes within the city), for the year ending the 12th of April, 1826, amounted to the sum of £4,069 2s. 3d. and for the year ending 19th April last, to £4,087 4s. 10d.

"That the poor rates for the parish of Foleshill, in the county of the said city, containing about 7,000 inhabitants, principally employed in the manufacturing of silk ribbons, amounted in the year ending the 25th of March, 1826, to £1,819 8s. and in the year ending the 25th of March, 1830, to £3,462 18s. 4d.

"That the payments to the casual poor in Foleshill, for the year ending the 25th of March, 1826, amounted to £527 6s. 11½d. and for the year ending the 25th of March, 1830, to £1,538 2s. 10d."

Here is a practical illustration of the benefits of "free trade." If England will admit American breadstuffs on the payment of a small duty, such as is assessed on our cotton, her great landholders and fat national priests would be "reformed," alias broken down, in less than two years, and there would hardly be enough of tax-paying people left to supply money for the poor rates alone; for these would be yet mightily increased because of our interference with the agricultural labor of England: and on the other hand, if we admitted freely the cheaper products of British labor in manufactures, (and so generally they now are, because of the wretchedness of the working people), we should not have one dollar to jingle against another in six months, and the hundreds of thousands of persons dependent on manufactures and the mechanic arts would hardly obtain a sufficiency of bread to keep soul and body together. The cheap price of provisions has only a distant relation to the facts suggested. When industry was prostrate in 1821-22, though bread was "cheap" it was hard to purchase enough of it, in many parts of the U. States, for labor was not in demand, and money was wanting wherewith to pay for it. Thousands have miserably died in Ireland because of the lack of food, though potatoes were at less than one-third of a cent per lb. for that third of a cent could not be earned. And it is a strange fact—one indeed of most solemn importance when considering such subjects, that, when money has been raised in England to relieve the starving population of Ireland, a large part of it has often been disbursed at Liverpool, in the purchase of provisions which had just been received from Ireland, to liquidate the "balance of trade" which is continually grinding the latter to the bone, and perpetually heaping one privation on another, until the poor laboring classes in Ireland are always in a state of semi-starvation; or divested of those comforts which render life desirable. What would WE think if English charity should be expended in the purchase of American flour at Liverpool, to feed the people of Maryland?—But such is exactly the case in which Ireland is placed by her "free trade" with England—in which also her nobles and wealthy men expend the money which they wring from their tenants and other dependents; every new drain of value creating some new suffering for this unfortunate people. If "cheap" labor is beneficial, how prosperous ought Ireland to be—if "dear" labor is injurious, how great should be the amount of individual suffering in New York and Pennsylvania. If slave labor is most desirable, how happy must be the people of lower Virginia and South Carolina,—and it saucy and well-fed labor is ruinous, how deplorably conditioned are the inhabitants of the New England states! Pah!—we have no patience with that breed of scurvy politicians that would put the free laborers of the United States, the farmers, mechanics and manufacturers, on a level with English paupers or Irish peasants—which, as to subsistence, is below that of the slaves which blacken so many parts of our own country.

We shall add a few extracts from late English papers on this subject.

Mr. Edward Gibbon Wakefield has lately published at London a pamphlet entitled "Swing Unmasked." The following are extracts. It is not easy to believe that the facts set forth exist—but there is no manner of doubt that they do.

"What is that defective being with callous legs and stooping shoulders, weak in body and mind, inert, pusillanimous, and stupid, whose premature wrinkles and furtive glance tell of misery and degradation? That is an English peasant and pauper; for the words are synonymous. His sire was a pauper, and his mother's milk wanted nourishment. From infancy his food has been bad as well as insufficient; and he now feels the pains of unsatisfied hunger nearly whenever he is awake. But half clothed, and never supplied with more warmth than suffices to cook his scanty meals, cold and wet come to him, and stay by him, with the weather. He is married of course; for to this he would have been driven by the poor laws, even if he had been, as he never was, sufficiently comfortable and prudent to dread the burden of a large family. But, though instinct and the overseer have given him a wife, he has not tasted the highest joys of husband and father. His partner and his little ones being, like himself, often hungry, seldom warm, sometimes sick without aid, and always sorrowful without hope, are greedy, selfish, and vexing; so, to use his own expression, he 'hates the sight of them,' and resorts to his hovel only because a hedge affords less shelter from the wind and rain. Compelled by parish laws to support his family, which means to join them in consuming an allowance from the parish, he frequently conspires with his wife to get that allowance increased, or prevent its being diminished. This brings begging, trickery, and quarrelling, and ends in settled erast. Though he have the inclination, he wants the courage to become, like more energetic men of his class, a poacher or smuggler on a large scale; but he pilfers occasionally, and teaches his children to lie and steal. His subdued and slavish manner towards his great neighbors shew that they treat him with suspicion and harshness. Consequently, he at once dreads and hates them; but he will never harm them by violent means. Too degraded to be desperate, he is only thoroughly depraved. His miserable career will be short; rheumatism and asthma are conducting him to the work-house, where he will breathe his last without one pleasant recollection, and so make room for another wretch, who may live and die in the same way."

The picture drawn by Mr. Wakefield of the relation in which the rich and the poor stand to each other in England is a most hideous one; but who will say that it is not a faithful one?

"Is nothing done by the 'nobility, clergy, and gentry,' to conciliate the affections of the pauper mass, by whose toil all their own wealth is produced? Charity! The charity of the poor laws, which paupers have been taught to consider a right, which operates as a curse to the able bodied and well-disposed, whilst it but just enables the infirm of all ages to linger on in pain and sorrow. Soup! Dog's-meat, the paupers call it. They are very ungrateful; but there is a way of relieving a man's necessities which will make him hate you; and it is in this way, generally, that soup is given to the poor. Books, good little books, which teach patience and submission to the powers that be! with which such paupers as obtain them usually boil their kettles, when not deterred by fear of the reverend donor. Of this gift the design is so plain and offensive, that its effect is contrary to what was intended, just as children, from whom obedience is very strictly exacted, are commonly rebels at heart. What else? Is nothing else done by the rural rich to win the love of the rural poor?"

"Speaking generally, since all rules have exceptions, the privileged classes of our rural districts take infinite pains to be abhorred by their poorest neighbors. They enclose commons. They stop foot-paths. They wall in their parks. They set spring-guns and man-traps. They spend on the keeping of high-bred dogs what would support half as many children, and yet persecute a laboring man for owning one friend in his cor. They make rates of wages, elaborately calculating the minimum of food that will keep together the soul and body of a clothopper. They breed game in profusion for their own amusement, and having thus tempted a poor man to knock down a hare for his pot, they send him to the treadmill, or the Antipodes, for that inexpressible offence. They build goals, and fill them. They make new crimes and new punishments for the poor. They interfere with the marriages of the poor, compelling some, and forbidding others to come together. They shut up paupers in workhouses, separating husband and wife, in pounds by day and wards by night. They have poor men in carts. They superintend ale-houses, decoy skittles, deprecate beer-shops, meddle with fairs, and otherwise curtail the already narrow amusements of the poor. Even in church, where some of them solemnly preach that all are equal, they sit on cushions, in pews, boarded, matted, and sheltered by curtains from the wind and the vulgar gaze, whilst the lower order must put up with a bare bench on a stone floor, which is good enough for them. Every where they are ostentatious in the display of wealth and enjoyment, whilst in their intercourse with the poor they are suspicious, quick at taking offence, vindictive when displeased, haughty, overbearing, tyrannical."

The following is an extract from a letter from Mr. G. Fordiani, jun. to the editor of the "London Morning Chronicle," and published in that paper:

"Sir—The letters of your lively correspondent, 'Q. P. Q.' are read with great interest by many of your readers. Frightful as is the picture which he draws of France, it is less frightful, I conceive, than that of our own country presents at the present time. In every point of view, the comparison is in favor of France. The distress in France is chiefly confined, I suppose, to the unemployed in cities and some large manufacturing towns; but in our own country, the distress extends over the whole surface. The numbers of unemployed and distressed manufacturers in Great Britain and Ireland must be much greater than the number of the same class in France, in comparison with the whole population. Then we must add to this evil the state of the farming poor, who are still employed on the roads, in gangs of twenty to forty, plotting the destruction of their masters' property by midnight fires. If there are men in Paris who must support themselves out of a shilling per day, there are many thousands in Ireland who are obliged to live, (or rather to starve), on two pence a day. The comparison must be greatly in favor of France, because the causes of distress are much less in that country. Compare the debts of the two countries, and the general expenses of carrying on the respective governments. Then look at the comparative costs of established religions. What an immense difference in this single item! The clergy of England and Ireland cost the country more than the clergy of all Christendom besides.—Perhaps you think the comparison might stop here; but that must not be the case, for, to quote your own words, "Taxation in this country is much heavier than is usually thought, immense sums being levied in the country for local purposes, to which, in other countries, the taxes are assigned." Under most of the governments of the continent, the church, education, the administration of justice, the maintenance of the poor, the police, &c. are paid by the state. For all these objects immense sums are separately paid by the people of England; the county rates alone equaling the whole revenue of many a continental kingdom."

It is enough—and these things are true. Such are the fruits of "cheap" labor—such the inevitable progress of a society where the people are divided into masters and slaves, great proprietors or wretched dependents. The middle class, that was the glory of England when the phrase "free born Englishman" meant something, has nearly disappeared, and the cold-blooded aristocrats of our own land will so "rule rough-shod" over our, at present, free and happy working people, if they are asses enough to permit it; and throw up their hats and hurra for a party that would send them and their children suppers to bed. In the awful presence of the SUPREME JUDGE of all things, let it not be imputed to me, that I have had any part in such degradation of HIS creature man!

ADMONABLE. We copied into our last an account of a duel near Port Tobacco, in Maryland, in which one of the parties was said to have been killed and the other badly wounded. It seems that there is no manner of truth in the story.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY. We have received from New York a well written pamphlet on this subject.—The plan of the writer is the purchase and colonization of two millions of persons, by the government of the U. States! It so disposed, it is, perhaps, within the means of the national government, and the range of circumstances, to keep the colored population in check; but even that would require a large expenditure of money—if practicable to colonize and provide for them, as we must needs suppose would be done. But the southern people will not agree to be "taxed" to pay for what they regard as their own property—and will, indeed, generally resist the adoption of any measure which looks to a final extinction of negro slavery in the United States. They love their slaves, and say that their slaves love them. We do not see any reason why those who are not slave-holders should press this subject, in separate persons so much pitched to one another—an mutually antagonistic—so happy and contented. We only irritate, by self-righteous feelings to enter into this question. A general emancipation and removal, if ever brought about, must work their own way, and the time will come when something must be done. At that time, I suppose gentlemen can find constitutional power by which those of the non-slaveholding states may assist them—no doubt the latter will cheerfully do so; but until then, we are not for obstructing our services on those who scornfully reject them, and would wish them to "manage their own concerns in their own way." We shall do the same. They delight in slave-workers—we love white and happy and easy working people. De gustibus non disputandum. But in those states wherein emancipation and colonization are sincerely desired, let the work go on—as in Maryland for example; and it cannot be complained of by Virginia and the states further south, that Maryland, or the non slave-holding states, should decidedly throw back any part of their colored population which they are disposed to hurl from them, no matter on whom the mischief, that they apprehend to themselves, may fall! We have enough already of such burthens to bear, for others; and will not consent to receive "foreign" persons of color, to be fed at our expense. If "charity begins at home" with them—so it does with us.

THE CHOLERA. We have accounts from England to the 14th January. There are no official statements as to the progress of the cholera; but 66 new cases were reported at Newcastle on the 8th and 9th Jan. and some at other places. It would seem that the cholera had rather subsided, and as if the disease was assuming a less fatal character. It has been computed that since the first appearance of the cholera, fourteen years ago, it has destroyed fifty millions of persons. But that cannot be—though whole districts in Asia seemed almost depopulated by it.

"NULLIFICATION!" At Saco, Maine, on Christmas eve, the rev. William Jenkins married Misses Theophilus, Richard, Thomas, Titus, Jonathan, Ebenezer and John Hinchinson—to Misses Martha, Eliza, Sarah Ann, Mary, Judith Virginia and Peggy Wells. So seven Wells were "nullified" in one evening! A profitable affair for the parson, unless he worked by the job, and at wholesale prices.

THE RAIL ROAD. The business on this road is going on to increase. On Monday last 1,464 bbls. flour, 10 tons pig iron, 66 bushels of rye, 300 do. shorts, 29 tons granite and 48 tons wood, reached Baltimore: 95 wagons arrived and 40, laden with various merchandise, departed.

MARYLAND. It may be expected, we think, that the legislature of this state, at the present session, will pass a strong law to prevent the introduction of slaves and the ingress of free persons of color, and also making liberal provisions for the colonization and comfort of such of the latter as shall be willing to remove to Africa.

BALTIMORE. The board of directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, having refused to suffer the barge attached to the steam-boat lines to pass, unless 10,000 dollars (the demand for a whole year) was paid—passengers now proceed, by land, by way of Frenchtown and Newcastle, as heretofore. They will very soon be conveyed on the rail road. It is well made a question, whether the canal company has not forfeited its charter, by refusing a passage to a boat, (properly fitted for the canal), on paying the lawful toll.

The rail road is so nearly ready that a car has passed the whole distance, from wharf to wharf. If the weather is good, it will be in use next week.

DIED, at Annapolis, on the 17th inst. John Edelen, esq. a member of the house of delegates from Charles county—one of the most upright and estimable sons of Maryland—intelligent and honorable.

NAMES. Some Pennsylvanian at Washington, who, among other things, has complimented the people of his state because that a colored man, a native of Pennsylvania, has been appointed fire-walker and errand runner at one of the public offices in the metropolis, and signs himself "Tulpehocken, of Yellow Breeches," is a correspondent of the Philadelphia "Sentinel"—insists, "that Tulpehocken is as good a Pennsylvania cognomen as Rando ph is Virginian, and if my mansion happens to be on the Yellow Breeches, is not that as fair a stream as Rondo ph? whatever ours the "ancient dominion" may take about it."

"ECONOMY." There have been extensive dissections among the "Harmonists," at Economy, in Pennsylvania—and 217 persons, males and females, have signed and published a paper withdrawing all authority from the Messrs. Rapp, as to the management of their concerns, &c. Mr. Frederick Rapp replies, and states that of the signers 55 are minors, and 32 not regular members of the society—and that a large majority of the members are satisfied that they, [his father and himself] should continue as heretofore. The controversy has led to the institution of legal proceedings—those who have withdrawn demanding their share of the property accumulated, and the whole facts will, in due time, be before the public. As the property of the society is exceedingly valuable, it is hardly to be expected that the suits will terminate speedily. There will be causes for the "law's delay," on one side or the other.

DELAWARE. The legislature of this state recently adjourned. Among the acts passed was one prohibiting the use of fire arms to free negroes and free mulattoes, regulating their meetings for public worship and for other purposes.

VIRGINIA.—The bill relative to the removal of the free colored population of that state was passed by a vote of 79 to 41. Its leading features, according to the Richmond Whig, are as follows:—

The bill excludes coercion, except as to those Free Negroes who remain in the state contrary to the law of 1806 (a numerous class). It makes an appropriation of $35,000 for 1832—and of $90,000 for 1833, for the transportation of Free Negroes willing to go, of the class above mentioned who are compelled to go, and of such as may be emancipated, the owners not providing the means—to some place beyond the limits of the U. States, left to the discretion of the Central Board. This board is to consist of the Governor, Treasurer, and Auditor, ex officio, who are clothed with the power of appointing agencies at Norfolk, Petersburg or other places.

ALABAMA. Among the acts passed at the late session of the legislature of this state was one relating to "century publications." It requests the governor to open a correspondence with the governors of those states in which such publications have been or may be issued, for the purpose of procuring their suppression, or at least of preventing their being sent into the slave-holding states. It further declares that the refusal of any state to make use of the means which it possesses, for the suppression of such publications, will be regarded by Alabama "as evincing of a spirit hostile to that friendship and good understanding which should characterize sister states, and as inimical to her peace and safety."

NEW ORLEANS. Bernard Marigny has been elected a member of the legislature of Louisiana, from this city, after an ardent contest, beating Samuel J. Peters 130 votes. Mr. M. is said to be a "Jackson man," and Mr. P. a friend of Mr. Clay—but the contest [much to be regretted] was more between the American and French population, than political parties; and the latter succeeded.

TEXAS. The introduction of slaves, by emigrants from the United States, in defiance of the laws of Mexico, seems to have excited the attention of the government—but the colonists, for the sake of their negroes, talk of resisting! We hope that the settlers will be compelled to obey the laws, or quit the country. The conditions on which they might occupy it were well known before they entered upon it—and, on every account, should be respected.

EUROPE. The leading powers seem to have one common fear of the effects of a general European war, and hence have resorted to all sorts of management to preserve an armed peace. Each seems jealous and fearful of the other—and no one has confidence in his neighbor, though much courtesy is extended in their relations one with another. A disarming has been repeatedly spoken of—but every thing remains on the war establishment. The latest accounts would show some gathering of the elements of discord. An armed interference in the questions depending between Holland and Belgium, would now probably lead to important events; and if Don Pedro shall get a footing in Portugal, and Don Ferdinand, of Spain, interfere, as it is probable that he will, in behalf of the dearly beloved Don Miguel, England will probably have something to say about the matter. So much, we think, may be assumed—that the affairs of Europe are very unsettled and interesting; and England and France are exceedingly liable to internal commotions, at the present time. In the first, the poverty and wretchedness of the people seem nearly to have reached that point at which resistance must begin.

TUMULT IN THE FRENCH CHAMBERS. The late papers contain a report of some exceedingly violent proceedings in the French chamber of deputies. The minister of public instruction, having appeared at the tribune to defend a large vote of money for the civil list than had been proposed by the commission, and having uttered the sentiment in reply to a deputy,—"If you banish luxury from the palace of the king, it will soon be banished from the houses of its subjects," the deputies of the extremes of the chamber rose and rushed aloud—"Louis Plût à son sujet!" M. M. Caler, Clerc, Louville, Labrousse and others exclaimed, the king has not subjects. Order, order! let the minister be called to order! M. Marchal—Those who make kings, are no longer subjects, but citizens. During five minutes not a word was heard except personal and outrageous cries against the justification. The tumult and disorder continued during the remainder of the sitting. Although the president might be seen ringing with violence his great bell, yet it could not be heard. No one paid any attention to the president, and the most tumultuous and violent observations were made by all parties, one against the other, in various parts of the chamber. At half past six the sitting closed in the midst of noise, menace, and agitation.

This matter assumed so much importance that 164 members of the chamber have signed a formal protest against the use of the word "subjects," as applicable to the people of France; and even Lafayette, whose health had not permitted his attendance in the chamber, requested that his colleagues would receive his adhesion to their protest.

JAMAICA. We have awful details of the late proceedings of the slaves in this island. One hundred and fifty estates had been laid waste by fire—some of them the most extensive in the island—and the whole damage, from this cause, is put down at fifteen millions of dollars. More than two thousand slaves had been killed or executed—hung up by scores, and without much ceremony, or shot down at sight; and a great number had been flogged a la militaire. The number of white persons killed, is not stated. At one time it is said that thirty thousand negroes were embodied, some of them armed. They had been dispersed, but many were thought to have retired to the mountains. The governor issued a proclamation denouncing the punishment of death on all who did not surrender before the 10th of February, and orders were issued against the publication of the confessions of any of the "rebels, relative to the conspiracy." The "Maroons," appear to have rendered most important service to the white population, in this great emergency. We thought that all of this class of persons had been expelled—by one of the grossest violations of the faith of treaties which had marked modern times; and yet the remnant combats on the side of those who so much wronged their fathers and their country.

A Kingston paper of Jan. 27, our latest date, says—"It is evident that the neck of the rebellion is broken, but whether the measures which have been pursued will induce the rebels who have taken shelter in the mountains to return to duty or not, time only can show."

A letter from the head quarters of Major-General Hilton, dated Jan. 24, says—

"We are here in the midst of burnt estates, but you must not suppose that the whole country looks black and burnt. With the exception of the works, the whole country is green; few of the canes have been burnt, and those which have, still show green tops."

Martial law would be continued until late in the present month, February; for it is stated—"If measures at once decisive, and justice summary, as well as punishment severe, be not pursued, the country will be ruined long ere the last head of the hydra is cut off. If business be not done immediately, we shall be undone."

QUEER THINGS. The editor of the Danville, "Virginia" Reporter, calls the rejection of Mr. Van Buren,

"unprecedented and factious!" One similar case appeared in the administration of Mr. Jefferson, and a second in that of Mr. Madison, and perhaps there were others, and a "factious" proceeding was not then imputed. The senators thought, as they had a right to think, that the presidents had not selected proper men as ministers to foreign courts—as they think now.

At the late "Jackson Convention" held at Columbus, Ohio, a "whole" blockhead offered the following resolution—but somebody happened to recollect that the present president had, in his own person, established the precedent of the very proceeding which the principle of this resolution was wisely designed to condemn—and so it was not agreed to!

Resolved, That we consider a candidate for the presidency of the United States opposed to the incumbent of that station, disqualified for the proper discharge of the duty of a senator in congress, and incapable of performing justly the constitutional functions of an adviser and executive counsellor."

That convention, however, passed the following resolution—which exactly chimes with the one offered by Mr. Clay to the senate, and which has been so ably discussed by himself and others—

Resolved, That we approve of reducing the revenue of the general government to a conformity with our expenditures. But by such an adjustment as will operate to the protection of our domestic industry."

A late number of the "Richmond Enquirer" contains a long essay signed, "A voice from the country." It speaks of "the prostration of the dignity and integrity of the senate of the United States, by the coalition of Clay, Calhoun, and Webster—who, with their united forces, have accomplished one of the darkest and foulest deeds that ever disgraced the annals of any country."

"That this triumvirate have leagued together to aim a blow at the president, will not be denied; and at the same time, to gratify their malignity and hatred towards a man—to borrow an expression from a great writer—the daily beauty of whose character makes them ugly—and whose magnanimous conduct forms a happy and striking contrast to those desperate ingurgers."

"The ground which this party in the senate took for rejecting Van Buren's nomination, is a deliberate insult to the people. An administration, of which, you might say Clay was at the head, had lost entirely the confidence of the people—and which had been dismissed from their service in consequence of the mismanagement of their affairs—that in order to secure, by negotiation with a foreign power, an important interest of the nation, Messrs. Clay and Webster should think that it was improper and highly dishonorable that any allusion in the instructions given to Mr. McLane, should be made to this defunct—this puritan and black-legged administration, so justly termed by Mr. Ranilolph—upon which the people had passed their verdict, and upon which they had stamped the seal of their eternal disgust and disapprobation."

"Let me now ask, my fellow-citizens, where were the senators from Virginia when this foul plot was hatching and brought to consummation in the senate? Her voice was dumb—silent as the grave. She should have been there, and heard in a voice of thunder! Her representatives should have proclaimed this dark deed, and held it up to the execration of the people. That the senate chamber should have been made the scene of such an infamous cabal—a place hitherto deemed sacred and inviolable from all political intrigue, is mortifying and disgraceful."

"Mr. Clay was aware of the keen and canine appetite with which Mr. Calhoun was prepared to devour his victim, and therefore insidiously contrived to place the banquet before him. With what eager delight he seized upon it, we have already seen."

There is a great deal more of such matter—but these brief extracts are sufficient.

The "official" of New York, the "Courier and Enquirer," whose senior editor holds a profitable office, speaks of the senate in the following terms.

"If combinations and coalitions, not to say CONSPIRACIES, in the senate, to abuse a high trust—shall be made manifest, the people in their sovereignty must interfere and amend the constitution for their own safety. The period is not, in our opinion, remote, when the constitution will undergo revision on the following points:—

"1st. An apportionment of senators according to population—their election by the people, and for a shorter period.

"2d. Limiting their powers to purposes wholly and exclusively legislative."

This is going the "entire swine."

Sometime ago—just before the rejection of Mr. Van Buren, the "Richmond Enquirer" said—

"We are not aware of there being a single man who is now importuning him to offer or accept [of the nomination for the vice presidency.] For ourselves, we firmly believe that his nomination is not the object of the Baltimore convention. We have disclaimed every such desire—and, if such were its object, we should be the first to desire no such convention to be called."

The "Albany Argus" has a foul quarrel with the "New York Courier & Enquirer." The editors have called one another almost every thing but honest men—though on some points they harmonize. The former quotes the latter, when speaking of the president, as follows:

"We know the general—his merits and well earned reputation. We love him for his kindness to ourselves—we honor him for the honor he has added to his country—we rejoice at his success, for it has been sought and obtained by enlarging the happiness and prosperity of the union—we will support him in the coming conflict, [remember the promise] for his purposes are pure, and his ambition the ambition of a patriot. It is not his fault, although it is a national misfortune, that traffickers in politics—political brokers—following in the wake of his popular career, and raising their voices in clamorous praise, are found scattered over this fair state, and reaping a golden harvest, while their profligacy is undiscovered amidst the triumphs of the democratic party. It is time that the people should awake from their lethargy. We loose nothing by unmasking and driving from our ranks those who proclaim themselves advocates of general Jackson, for the money which is to be made."

[The italics are given as we find them in the "Argus."] The "New Hampshire Patriot" thus speaks of the "Courier & Enquirer":

"There is scarcely a doubt remaining on our minds, that the New York Courier & Enquirer is owned, soul and body, by the United States Bank, and that before long it will be arrayed in open hostility to the administration and general Jackson, either by a nominal transfer to other proprietors, or by a bolt outright of its editors. Then there will be another great cry raised of 're-action.' Duff Green and Stephen Simpson, we fear, are not the only editors who have supported the cause of democracy from motives exclusively selfish."

The New Hampshire Patriot says that scarcely any less feeling is manifested among the democracy of that state, on the occasion of the rejection of Mr. Van Buren, "than was manifested on the rejection by the same senate of the honorable Isaac Hill."

The "Globe" publishes the following as a letter written in Prince William county, Va. After assailing the vice president for forgetting "what was due to the administration of Andrew Jackson," the writer says—"As to the Messrs. Miller, Chambers, Poindexter, Moore, Foot, Frelinghuysen, and all the GANG of legemen and deserters—they deserve pity or punishment, according to the strength of their capacity to understand right from wrong. No doubt many thought that whatever Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun done must be right—and they merit pity, while others, with understanding enough to know what was right, were worthless enough to do what was wrong, 'Verily, verily, they shall have their reward.'"

BRIEF NOTICES.

A panther, nine feet long, from the nose to the tail, was lately shot in the Alleghany mountains, near Schellsburg, Somerset county, Pennsylvania. Animals of this kind were numerous in these mountains fifty years ago—but an "armed people" has rendered them scarce. The Pyrennees would soon be cleared of wolves, if such a population as we have inhabited the parts adjacent, for they have nearly cleared our own mountains, already.

The importance of the establishment of the American colony at Liberia appears to be justly appreciated by some of the British writers. The Westminster (London) Review says, in reference to it:—"The Americans are successfully planting free negroes on the coast of Africa; a greater event possibly, in its consequences, than any that has occurred since Columbus set sail for the new world."

The culture of the plant from which opium is derived has lately been introduced into Egypt, where it has perfectly succeeded. It has been productive the past year of a profit of more than three millions of francs. The Egyptian opium is now in greater demand than that from the Levant and Asia Minor.

We forgot to mention that Anderson, the English singer, was announced to perform at the Adelphi theatre, in Baltimore, on a certain night last week—a most humble apology having been made for him in the papers; but before he appeared on the stage, the house was attacked from without—the green room invaded, the windows broken, and a good deal of other damage done, and the design to introduce him abandoned. The man is made too important—but it now seems settled, that his "occupation is gone" in the United States.

The first volume of the new edition of Marshall's life of Washington—written over by the celebrated judge, its author,—has just been completed by the publisher at Philadelphia. The National Gazette states that the portrait of Washington, engraved for this work, by Mr. Longacre, is one of the finest specimens of American advancement in the art. In Europe, it would be deemed worthy of the reputation of any engraver of London or Paris.

Capt. Ross, who sailed from England three years ago to discover a North West passage, has not been heard of since. It is feared that the ship's company have perished.

The theatre at Providence, R. I. has been sold to be converted into a place of worship.

It is stated that a navigation round or through the famous raft in the Red river will soon be made, in pursuance of the act of congress appropriating money for the purpose; the work being much advanced under charge of lieutenant Sewall, of the engineers.

A large party of very respectable gentlemen, of New York, lately gave a public dinner to general Santander, late vice president of Colombia, in testimony of their respect for his public and private character.

A man of the name of Sovereign appears to have murdered his wife and six children, in London district, Upper Canada. The description is horrible. Sovereign has since confessed the fact, and starved himself to death!

The ship Dee, of Liverpool, having 300 casks of gunpowder on board, was struck with lightning and blown up. All the ship's company, 40 in number, were lost.

The brig Java, of Salem, from Batavia, was recently wrecked on our coast during a snow storm, and went to pieces. She had 600,000 lbs. of coffee, and 14,000 lbs. of nutmegs on board.

Professor Hare, of Philadelphia, was lately badly wounded by the explosion of a small bottle of fulminating silver, containing about two ounces. It was at first feared that his hand would have to be amputated—two persons, at the distance of ten feet were knocked down, and two other persons wounded.

TWENTY-SECOND CONGRESS—1st SESSION.

SENATE.

February 16. Mr. Troup presented the memorial of the corporation of Savannah, praying for the erection of barracks in that city.

Mr. Foote reported a bill relative to pensions—read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Kane moved a resolution inquiring into the propriety of making an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Kaskaskia river in Illinois.

Mr. Foote submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of regulating and fixing, by law, the compensation of the officers of the navy, with a view to regulate the compensation of the officers of the army and navy, agreeably to their relative rank in the service.

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of regulating and fixing, by law, the compensation of the army, with a view to equalize the compensation of officers of the navy and army in a peace establishment.

Mr. Holmes' resolutions calling on the secretary of the treasury for information as to the delay in the publication of the statements of our foreign commerce, and of his not having complied with the call of the senate for information with respect to the British colonial trade, were taken up.

Mr. Forsyth opposed the resolutions, and Mr. Webster and Mr. Holmes replied to him.

Mr. Forsyth moved to lay the first resolution on the table, which motion was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Marcy, Poindexter, Robinson, Smith, Troup, White, and Wilkins—19.
NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Miller, Moore, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silbee, Sprague, Tazewell, Tomlinson, Waggoner, and Webster—19.

The yeas and nays being equally divided, the chair decided the question in the negative.

The question was then taken on laying the second resolution on the table, and it was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Chambers, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Marcy, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Silbee, Smith, Tipton, Tomlinson, Troup, Webster, White, and Wilkins—32.
NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Holmes, Ruggles, Seymour, and Tazewell—3.

After some further debate, by Messrs. Tazewell, Chambers, Webster and Holmes in favor of the first resolution, and Mr. Forsyth, in opposition, the first resolution was adopted.

Mr. Clay's resolution relative to the tariff was then taken up, when Mr. Grundy, in a speech of two hours, concluded his remarks in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Ewing having expressed a desire of addressing the senate, on to-morrow, on the subject, moved an adjournment. The senate then adjourned.

February 17. Mr. White, presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Jefferson county, Tennessee, in favor of re-chartering the bank of the U. States.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. Foote, yesterday, relative to the pay of the officers of the army and navy, were amended by adding the marine corps, and then adopted.

The apportionment bill from the house of representatives was then taken up, and read the second time, and referred, at the instance of Mr. Webster, to a select committee.

Mr. Clay's resolution relative to the tariff was then taken up, when

Mr. Ewing addressed the senate two hours in favor of it, without concluding, when the senate adjourned to Monday.

February 20. Mr. Silbee presented the petitions of the banks of Newburyport, Massachusetts, praying that the charter of the bank of the United States may be renewed. Referred.

Mr. Moore presented a similar memorial from the bank of Alabama. Referred.

On motion of Mr. Ellis, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and when, after the lapse of an hour, the doors were opened,

The special order of the day, Mr. Clay's resolution, relative to the tariff, together with Mr. Hayne's amendment, was taken up; and Mr. Ewing resumed and concluded his speech in favor of the resolution.

Mr. Miller expressed a desire to address the senate on the subject to-morrow.

The appropriation bill for fortifications was taken up, read twice, and referred to the committee on finance.

The bill making appropriations for revolutionary and other pensioners for the year 1832; and the bill making appropriations for the naval service for 1832, were respecitively taken up, read twice, and referred to the same committee.

Also, the bill from the house, for the payment of arrears of the naval service charged on the contingent fund, prior to January, 1832.

The vice president communicated a letter from the secretary of the treasury, in reply to Mr. Holmes' resolution, calling for the reasons of the delay in the transmission of the annual commercial statements. [The secretary recommends that collectors, hereafter, be directed, under proper penalties, to make their returns monthly instead of quarterly.]

The bill for the adjustment of the claims of South Carolina, was twice read and referred.

The senate then adjourned.

February 21. The vice president presented the memorial of Joseph Nourse, late register of the treasury, praying that his claim against the United States, ascertained by judicial decision, may be paid. Referred.

Mr. Miller presented the memorial of the citizens of Camden, S. Carolina, praying for an examination into the causes of the failure of the road between that place and the city of Washington, and also for the reduction of the postage on letters. Referred.

Mr. Bell, of N. H. and Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, presented sundry memorials from the banks in their respective states, praying for the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. Webster, from the select committee, reported the bill for the apportionment of representatives, without amendment.

Mr. Smith, from the committee of finance, reported the several appropriation bills referred to that committee yesterday, without amendments, which were severally read, passed and returned to the other house.

The vice president communicated a report from the secretary of war, shewing the number of licenses granted to trade with the Indians.

The senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Clay's resolution relative to the tariff, &c.

Mr. Miller, of S. C. spoke two hours in support of Mr. Hayne's amendment; when he gave way for a motion to adjourn. The senate adjourned.

February 23. Several memorials were presented from the states of N. Hampshire, Ohio, and Kentucky, favorable to the bank of the United States.

The bill for the adjustment of the claims of South Carolina, was reported without amendment.

Mr. Benton reported a bill to repeal so much of the laws relative to brevet rank, as authorize the president to confer that rank on officers who may have served ten years.

Mr. Holmes submitted a resolution inquiring into the propriety of providing by law for a more permanent tenure of office for judges of territories or for a different mode of appointment.

Several bills for the relief of private individuals were passed.

Mr. Miller concluded his speech on Mr. Clay's resolution—and was followed by Mr. Dallas—when the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Feb. 17. Mr. Irwin reported a bill to aid in the education of deaf and dumb persons.

Several bills and reports on private claims were received and reading is deferred.

Mr. Branch reported a bill for the regulation of the navy and its fleet, and navy hospital funds—twice read and committed.

Mr. Archer reported a resolution for the reference, to the committee on foreign affairs, of that part of the president's message to the last congress relative to the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse.

Mr. Blair reported a bill to construct a road from Portsmouth, Ohio, to a point south of the Linden mountains in North Carolina—referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Jarvis reported a bill making appropriations for the public buildings.

The resolution moved some days since relative to the painting of a full length likeness of Washington was taken up, and, after an animated debate, adopted.

The house then proceeded to the orders of the day, and took up the engrossed appropriation bills.

That for the naval service having been read a third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island, moved its re-commitment, with instructions to strike out the appropriation of seventy-two thousand dollars for the navy yard at Brooklyn. He supported his motion in a speech of length and animation. Mr. McDuffie opposed his motion as did Messrs. Virpawick, Cumberleng, White and Hoffman. Mr. Binger supported it in a speech of much power. The bill was finally passed.

The bill for arrangements in the naval service, and the bill for fortifications, were then severally taken up and passed. The house then adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 18. Mr. Drayton reported a bill for the relief of certain officers whose property was destroyed at Fort Delaware—twice read and committed.

Mr. Hathough moved a resolution inquiring into the propriety of making an appropriation for the construction of piers in the Delaware river, at the mouth of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the following resolutions, reported by Mr. Jarvis, from the committee on the public buildings, on the 14th inst.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be authorized to employ Horatio Greenough, of Massachusetts, to execute in marble a full length pedestrian statue of Washington, to be placed in the centre of the Rotunda of the capitol; the head to be a copy of Hamilton's Washington, (in the capitol at Richmond) and the accessories to be left to the judgment of the artist.

After a desultory debate, the resolution was adopted by a vote of ayes 114, nays 50.

The house then took up the bill for the relief of Susan Deatur—A debate ensued, but before any decision was had, the house adjourned.

Monday, Feb. 20. Mr. McKay, of N. C. appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

Several memorials from different parts of the union favorable to the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, were presented and referred.

Mr. Drayton, from the committee on military affairs, reported the bill to authorize the secretary of war to relinquish the title of the United States to the site of Fort Gansevoort, in the harbor of New York, which bill was read a first and second time, and committed.

Mr. Cumberleng made the following report:

"The committee of commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Moses Smith, has examined his improvement for adjusting the polarity of the needle in the mariner's compass. Though simple in its character, they have no doubt of its great utility to mariners, and that the discovery is worthy the patronage of the navy department."

The report was read and concurred in.

Mr. Thomas, of Louisiana, in fulfillment of one of the items contained in the report of the joint committee, appointed to make arrangements for the celebration of the centennial birth-day of George Washington, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives, That in respect to the centennial birth-day of George Washington, the two houses will adjourn from the 21st to the 23d of the present month; and that the presiding officers of the two houses be respectfully authorized to adjourn them accordingly. Agreed to.

Mr. Howard's motion for a reconsideration of the vote ordering the printing of certain documents on the subjects of canals and rail roads, came up for consideration; and, on motion of Mr. Mercer, was so amended as to include the printing of that part of a document, shewing the relative utility and cost of rail roads and canals, and cert- in other parts of said document, to be selected by the committee on roads and canals. The resolution, as amended, passed.

The bill, in addition to the act granting relief to certain insolvent debtors of the United States, came up for consideration, and, after discussion, was postponed until to-morrow. The house adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 21. Mr. Bion reported a bill to graduate the price of public lands—twice read and committed.

Mr. Irwin presented the memorial of the inhabitants of Zanesville, Ohio, in favor of the renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States—referred.

Mr. Wickhiffe reported a bill making provision for the sale of the public grounds in the cities of Pensacola and St. Augustine, and to reserve certain lots and buildings for public purposes.

The speaker presented a communication from Michael Nourse, praying a subscription on the part of congress to a fac simile edition of the accounts of general Washington during the revolutionary war. [General Washington received no compensation for his services other than his actual expenses—and these accounts, it appears, were kept in his own hand writing.]

Mr. E. Everett's resolution relative to the Chickasaw treaty came up for consideration, and was amended so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire to whom, and on what conditions, the tract of land reserved by the 4th article of the treaty with the Chickasaw tribe of Indians of October 19, 1818, was leased: Whether the said tract has reverted to the United States on the failure of the conditions, or the expiration: Whether any change has been made, or attempted to be made, in the lease aforesaid, inconsistent with the conditions and object of the reservation; and, if so, when, by whom, in whose favor, and to what effect, and change was made, or attempted to be made: By whom the tract aforesaid is now occupied, possessed, or claimed: What was its reputed value in 1818, and what it is now, as far as the same can be ascertained; with power to send for persons and papers, and with leave to report what measures, (if any) it is proper for this house to adopt in the premises.

A great deal of desultory discussion followed, and many questions were started and decided—one between the speaker and Mr. Wickhiffe, on a point of order, in which the former gave way. The previous question was called for and not sustained, and motions to postpone, &c. lost. At last, the previous question was again moved and carried—and the yeas and nays on the resolution being ordered, they stood thus—

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, Allison, Appleton, Archer, Armstrong, Babcock, Banks, Noyes Barber, John S. Barbour, Barnwell, Bartow, Isaac C. Bates, Branch, Briggs, Bucher, Buird, Burger, Caboon, Chandler, Choate, Claiborne, Collier, Silas Condit, Bates Cooke, Crane, Crigton, Daniel, Davenport, John Davis, Dearborn, Denny, Dewar, Dickson, Doddridge, Drayton, Duncan, Ellsworth, G. So the house agreed to the resolution, and the inquiry was referred to the committee on the public lands, with power to send for persons and papers.

The house then adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 23. Mr. Branch moved certain resolutions calling upon the war department for information relative to the live oak lands belonging to the United States in Florida.

Mr. Clayton offered, by leave, the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to examine into the affairs of the bank of the U. States, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report the result of their enquiries to this house.

Mr. H. King submitted a resolution inquiring into the mode of appointing lieutenants of the navy to vessels of war, &c.

The bill defining the qualifications of voters in the territory of Arkansas, was read a third time and passed.

The speaker laid before the house communications from the war department, showing the claims of Connecticut for military services; the number of licenses granted to trade with the Indians, and two other reports on the claims of certain individuals.

The bill granting patents to certain aliens, was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The house then took up the appropriation bills for the support of government, and amended the same, and then adjourned.

FINE WOOLLED SHEEP.

Mr. Niles.—When the wool-growing branch of American industry has become of such great importance to several sections of the union—and when every experiment which has been judiciously made, demonstrates that it would prove equally so to the central and westerly parts of the middle states, and to Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, owing to the small expense of transporting wool compared with the value of the article; which remarks, I think, will equally apply to the westerly parts of Virginia and North Carolina, and the easterly parts of Kentucky and Tennessee—duty compels me to reply to Mr. Tallmadge's letter which appeared in No. 1160 of your very useful and ably conducted Register, lest his observations may prove detrimental to the extension of the breed of that useful animal. I have been an attentive breeder of Merino sheep for twenty-two years, and six years of Saxony—and my own experience, as well as that of my neighbors, has proved, that the Spanish merino has a more vigorous constitution, is a harder animal, and much less liable to diseases, than is the Saxony. As the first fine woolled sheep were introduced into Saxony from Spain in 1765, this assertion may appear somewhat extraordinary, but Mr. Tallmadge admits the fact; although, so far as my observation extends, the cause he assigns for it is not supported by experience. In 1826, a greater number of Saxony sheep were imported than I believe were before, or have been since, all put together. Two cargoes were sold at Brighton, in May of that year, containing nearly 500, which I closely examined, and think there were not twenty among them of any one flock; which was readily determined by the ear marks. I purchased fifty-four—four of which only were from the same flock. I put 8 bucks out of those to 300 merino ewes; and the progeny was more feeble than I had ever witnessed from merino bucks. I did not raise more than 3 lambs from 5 ewes, for two successive years, and, in putting full blooded Saxony bucks to the ewes thus crossed, I have not raised more than two lambs to five ewes. I have been still more unsuccessful in raising lambs from the full blood Saxony ewes and bucks, although they have been rather better kept than my other sheep. From my full blooded merino stock my increase was commonly 9 lambs to 10 ewes, and never less than 4 lambs to 5 ewes; and those merino bucks had always been selected for fineness and weight of fleece and shape, from my own flock. A more distant cross could not have been made than between the Saxony and merino—and yet the same ewes which commonly raised nine lambs from ten ewes, and I believe never less than four lambs from five ewes when put to merino bucks of the same stock, only raised three lambs from five ewes when crossed with the imported Saxons. Hence it is evident that the lesser increase, on the part of the Saxony breed, must be attributable to some other cause than breeding "in and in." The form of the sheep alone will satisfy an experienced agriculturist of the true cause. They are long legged, thin quartered, flat sided, narrow loined, not sufficiently deep chested, and long necked. All domestic animals of this shape have feeble constitutions. But it may be asked, how does it happen that those sheep which are descended from the Spanish, are so inferior in form to them? The most probable solution of the question is, that the persons who were sent by the elector of Saxony into Spain to select, were not aware of a fact known to every attentive breeder, that individuals of the same flock which have the most feeble constitutions generally, have the finest and lightest fleeces; and as fineness was their principal object, they selected the finest woolled sheep, without any reference to form of carcass or weight of fleece. In this they have succeeded—for the Saxony wool is certainly finer than the Spanish; but the latter will, sheep for sheep, at least, yield one third more in weight of wool, and it possesses the felting or tulling property in as high a degree.

A WOOL GROWER.

FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.

U. States' district court, N. York. Before judge Betts.
The United States vs. six cases woollen cloths, Nos. 179 to 184, marked F. Joseph Roberts, claimant. This was an action brought to establish the forfeiture of the cloths, on the ground that they were invoiced below their real value with the intention of defrauding the United States' revenue.

On behalf of the United States, it was shown that the goods were brought to this port from Liverpool in the ship Napoleon last February. The goods were invoiced at various prices, from 5s. 9d. to 6s. 8d. per yard. The custom house appraisers valued them at 22 1-5 per cent. above that rate—an amount which brought them within the $2 50 minimum. Subsequently the goods were appraised by two merchants, chosen in the manner directed by law, and they also estimated their value far above the invoice, but yet exempting one piece of cloth from the $2 50 tariff. According to the invoice the duty would amount to $858 15 cents, while, according to the valuation laid by the merchants who made the second appraisement, the duty amounted to $2,148 90, making a difference to the revenue of $1,290 75.

Mr. Erastus Ellsworth, one of the gentlemen who made the second appraisement, testified that cloth costing in England about 6s. 8d. is worth in this market about $2 75, and several witnesses testified that they saw the goods in question at Mr. Hone's auction room, where they were sent by the marshal for sale; and they believed the cloths worth from $3 25 to $4 25 per yard. The bond which the claimant filed in court, binding himself, in the event of condemnation, to pay a sum above the amount of the appraisement with the duties, was also read in evidence.

The claimant did not give in any testimony.

From the Baltimore Republican.

At the late December session of the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland, before his honor judge Glenn, came on trial, on an information—

United States vs. Seven bales of merchandise.
Jabez Stead, claimant.

This was an invoice of merchandise, shipped on British account to the port of Baltimore, in the autumn of 1830. The appraisers reported to the collector, that three of the bales were overvalued, and four of them undervalued. The whole invoice amounted to 1,146l. 15s. 3d. sterling. Being seized and informed against, an application was made to the court to have them delivered on stipulation, and a commission to England to take testimony was taken out, on behalf of the claimant. The court appointed three experienced and judicious merchants to appraise the goods; whose return valued three of the bales lower, and four higher, than the invoice, making the whole valuation 1,094l. 6s. 10d. sterling, being 52l. 8s. 5d. less than the exporter's invoice. But estimating the value by the original invoice, they amounted to $2,400 or thereabouts; and estimating them at the valuation of the court's appraisers, the duties came to $1,101 more, notwithstanding the whole valuation was less than the invoice. The overvaluation had no effect to increase the duties on the three bales.

The goods, not having been taken on stipulation, were sold, by agreement, at auction—and the gross sales of the three bales, overvalued, amounted to $5,058 72, and the gross sales of the four bales, undervalued, amounted to $5,216 05 producing a loss on the three first, which were overvalued, and a great profit on the four last, having reference to the invoice. The overvaluation was intended, probably, in part to make the whole invoice bear a fair proportion to the actual value of the goods; but, chiefly, to procure a larger advance, from the consignees. The jury, without leaving the box, returned a verdict of condemnation against the four bales undervalued.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

We find the subjoined letter in the New York Courier and Enquirer on Friday last. It was written many months ago, and intended to remain, as it is marked, private; a copy of it was sent to Washington not long since, and probably obtained there for publication at New York. It serves to refute the charge which has been preferred against the president and directors of the Bank of the United States of interfering in party politics; and to exemplify the plan of total abstinence, which has been pursued by that institution.

[Nat. Gaz.

(PRIVATE)

Bank of the United States, Sept. 27, 1830.

Dear sir: I have recently received a pamphlet entitled "Proceedings and the Resolutions and Address adopted by the State Rights party at Charleston," which contains the following passages: "We had arrayed against us the influence of the president of the bank of the state of South Carolina, emphatically your bank, who was among the most zealous in his efforts against us, and among the most industrious in his cry of civil war, blood, and revolution. The president of the bank of the United States was not less active, and the head which presides over this great financial institution was seen superintending with an anxious scrutiny the polls at the election." And again: "But, if Charleston be fated to be governed by northern traders, officers of the federal judiciary, custom officers and officers of the United States' bank, we know," &c. And further: "All the power of the custom house, and of the bank of the United States, all the power of the federal judiciary, and even to a certain extent, of the bank of our own state, may be arrayed against us."

However unwilling to interpret very literally, expressions provoked by the ardor of political controversy, there is yet in these extracts a direct assertion of facts, which, unless the highly respectable gentlemen who make it are entirely misinformed, is calculated to excite extreme regret. In the administration of the bank of the United States, no principle is more fundamental than its total abstinence from politics. Its uniform object has been to devote itself exclusively to its own concerns, leaving public affairs to the public councils; to belong to the country, not to any section of it; to be true to every administration of the government, yet subservient to none; and, while composed of fellow-citizens of all parties, to be wholly unconnected with any. You know that during the many years in which I have enjoyed the pleasure of your correspondence, I have never made a single inquiry into the political opinions of any individual attached to the branch. I am at this moment equally ignorant and indifferent, and my only anxiety is, that they should so exercise their own rights as not to violate those of the institution. Undoubtedly, the officers of the bank are still citizens, retaining all their privileges of free thought and free action, but would the directors presume to control the political opinions of the humblest individual in their service. Yet it is not an unreasonable expectation that they who voluntarily engage in the employment of the institution should conform to its essential policy, and cautiously abstain from any conduct which may bring upon it undesired odium. Now, there is nothing more adapted to offend and estrange the community than an active and ostensible participation in popular elections by the officers of the bank. Whether they are in the right or in the wrong, whether the occasion be great or small, whether they succeed or fail, are matters of not the slightest consequence. All parties think themselves always right. To all parties all contests seem important; and all, if they do not succeed, are sure they ought to succeed; so that, whether victorious or defeated, each party retains a feeling against its prominent adversaries, which it inevitably transfers to the institutions identified with them.

The board of directors are therefore extremely unwilling that the officers of the bank should be zealous or conspicuous at elections, and the reproach thus publicly vouchsafed is of a character to excite great sensibility. That feeling I trust you will be able to remove or allay, so as to relieve the institution from the imputation of political interference, and I therefore take the earliest opportunity of inviting you to furnish me with the means of placing the subject before the board in a satisfactory light. This will be very acceptable to them, and particularly gratifying to yours, with great respect,

N. BIDDLE, president.

JOSEPH JOHNSTON, esq.

President of the office of the bank of the United States, Charleston, South Carolina.

A PROCLAMATION

By the president of the United States.

Whereas a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States of America and the Ottoman porte, was concluded and signed at Constantinople by the respective plenipotentiaries of the two powers, on the seventh day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty, and the said treaty was duly ratified, by the president, on the part of the said United States, on the second day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, in pursuance of the advice and consent of the senate, as signified by their resolution of the first day of that month; and whereas the ratification by the president, of the said treaty in the Turkish language, and in a translation thereof into the English, annexed thereto, was exchanged at Constantinople, on the fifth day of October, 1831, by David Porter, the charge d'affaires of the United States near the sublime porte, and Nedjib Effendi, Reis Effendi of the porte, for the ratification of the sultan: which convention, as ratified by the president, in the English version, is, word for word, as follows:

The object of this firm instrument, and the motive of this writing well drawn up, is, that—

No treaty or diplomatic and official convention, having heretofore existed, between the sublime porte, of perpetual duration, and the United States of America; at this time, in consideration of the desire formerly expressed, and of repeated propositions which have lately been renewed by that power, and in consequence of the wish entertained by the sublime porte to testify to the United States of America, its sentiments of friendship. We, the undersigned, commissioners, invested with the high office of chief of the chancery of state of the sublime porte, existing forever, having been permitted by his very noble imperial majesty to negotiate and conclude a treaty, and having thereupon conferred with our friend, the honorable Charles Rhind, who has come to this imperial residence, furnished with full powers to negotiate, settle and conclude, the articles of a treaty, separately and jointly with the other two commissioners, commodore Biddle and David Offley, now at Smyrna, have arranged, agreed upon and concluded, the following articles:

ARTICLE I.—Merchants of the sublime porte, whether Mussulmans or Rayahs, going and coming, in the countries, provinces and ports, of the United States of America, or proceeding from one port to another, or from the ports of the United States to those of other countries, shall pay the same duties and other imposts that are paid by the most favored nations, and they shall not be vexed by the exaction of higher duties; and in travelling by sea and by land, all the privileges and distinctions observed towards the subjects of other powers, shall serve as a rule, and shall be observed towards the merchants and subjects of the sublime porte. In like manner, American merchants who shall come to the well defended countries and ports of the sublime porte, shall pay the same duties and other imposts, that are paid by merchants of the most favored friendly powers, and they shall not, in any way, be vexed or molested. On both sides, travelling passports shall be granted.

ART. II.—The sublime porte may establish shish-bendars (consuls) in the United States of America; and the United States may appoint their citizens to be consuls or vice consuls, at the commercial places in the dominions of the sublime porte, where it shall be found needful to superintend the affairs of commerce. These consuls or vice consuls shall be furnished with berats or firmans; they shall enjoy suitable distinctions, and shall have necessary aid and protection.

ART. III.—American merchants established in the well defended states of the sublime porte for purposes of commerce, shall have liberty to employ carriers (brokers) of any nation or religion, in like manner as merchants of other friendly powers; and they shall not be disturbed in their affairs, nor shall they be treated, in any way, contrary to established usage. American vessels arriving at, or departing from, the ports of the Ottoman empire, shall not be subjected to greater visit, by the officers of the custom house and the chancery of the port, than vessels of the most favored nation.

ART. IV. If litigations and disputes should arise between subjects of the sublime porte and citizens of the United States, the parties shall not be heard, nor shall judgment be pronounced, unless the American dragoman be present. Causes in which the sum may exceed five hundred piastres, shall be submitted to the sublime porte, to be decided according to the law of equity and justice. Citizens of the United States of America, quietly pursuing their commerce, and not being charged or convicted of any crime or offence, shall not be molested; and even when they may have committed some offence they shall not be arrested and put in prison, by the local authorities, but they shall be tried by their minister or consul, and punished according to their offence, following, in this respect, the usage observed towards other Franks.

ART. V. American merchant vessels that traile to the dominions of the sublime porte, may go and come in perfect safety with their own flag; but they shall not take the flag of any other power, nor shall they grant their flag to the vessels of other nations and powers, nor the vessels of rayahs. The minister, consuls, and vice consuls of the United States, shall not protect, secretly or publicly, the rayahs of the sublime porte, and they shall never suffer a departure from the principles here laid down and agreed to by mutual consent.

ART. VI. Vessels of war of the two contracting parties, shall observe towards each other, demonstrations of friendship and good intelligence, according to naval usage; and towards merchant vessels they shall exhibit the same kind and courteous manner.

ART. VII. Merchant vessels of the United States, in like manner as vessels of the most favored nations, shall have liberty to pass the canal of the imperial residence, and go and come in the Black Sea, either laden or in ballast, and they must be laden with the produce manufactures and effects, of the Ottoman Empire, excepting such as are prohibited, as well as of their own country.

ART. VIII. Merchant vessels of the two contracting parties shall not be forcibly taken, for the shipment of troops, munitions and other objects of war, if the captains or proprietors of the vessels, shall be unwilling to freight them.

ART. IX. If any merchant vessel of either of the contracting parties should be wrecked, assistance and protection shall be afforded to those of the crew that may be saved; and the merchandise and effects, which it may be possible to save and recover, shall be conveyed to the consul nearest to the place of the wreck, to be, by him, delivered to the proprietors.

CONCLUSION. The foregoing articles, agreed upon and concluded, between the rasset (chancery of state) and the above mentioned commissioner of the United States, when signed by the other two commissioners, shall be exchanged. In ten months from the date of this temenueck, or instrument of treaty, the exchange of the ratifications of the two powers shall be made; and the articles of this treaty shall have full force, and be strictly observed by the two contracting powers.

Given the fourteenth day of the moon Zileasde, and in the year of the Hegra, 1245, corresponding with the seventh day of May, of the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty of the Christian Era.

(Signed) MAHAMMED HAMED,
Rais-ul-kutub, —(vice effendi.)

NOW, THEREFORE, to the end that the said treaty may be observed, and performed with good faith on the part of the U. States, I have caused the premises to be made public, and I do hereby enjoin all persons bearing office, civil or military, within the United States, and all others, citizens or inhabitants thereof, or being within the same, faithfully to observe and fulfil the said treaty, and every clause and article thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of [U. S.] the United States to be hereto affixed, and have signed the same with my hand.

Done at Washington, this fourth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and of the independence of the United States the fifty-sixth.

THE CHOCTAW'S FAREWELL.

In our paper to-day will be found an address to the American people, by George W. Harkins, the present chief of the Choctaw nation. Capt. Harkins, is the nephew, and successor in office of Greenwood Lathrop, and is now on his way with a large body of people, to their new residence in the west. The address was hastily written with a pencil, on board of the steam boat Hiram, the day before his arrival at our landing. The time was so short as to afford Capt. Harkins no opportunity to send us a revised sheet.

To the speculators and land jobbers, whose grasping avarice force this people from their homes and the graves of their forefathers, the language of this address will be unintelligible; but there are others, who, we presume, are not entirely devoid of shame, and to whom some allusion is made, who will feel the full force of its mild, but pointed rebuke. [Sketches.]

TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

It is with considerable diffidence that I attempt to address the American people knowing and feeling sensibly my incapacity; and believing that your loyalty and well informed sense could not be well entertained by the address of a Choctaw. But having determined to emigrate west of the Mississippi river this fall, I have thought proper in bidding you farewell to make a few remarks expressive of my views, and the feelings that animate me on the subject of our removal. Believing that our ill at stake and knowing that you are fully sympathetic with the distressed of every country. I confidently throw myself upon your indulgence and ask you to listen patiently. I do not arrogate to myself the prerogative of deciding upon the expediency of removal, yet I feel bound as a Choctaw to give a distinct expression of my feelings on that interesting, (and to the Choctaw) an important subject. We were lodged in by two evils, and we clear that which we thought the least. Yet we could not recognize the right that the State of Mississippi had assumed, to legislate for us. Although the Legislature of the State were qualified to make laws for their own citizens, that did not qualify them to become masters to a people so dissimilar in manners and customs as the Choctaws are to the Mississippians. Admitting that they understood the people, could they remove that mountain of prejudice that has ever obstructed the streams of justice, and prevented their salutary influence from reaching our devoted countrymen. We as Choctaws rather chose to suffer and be free, than live under the degrading influence of laws, when our voice could not be heard in their formation.

Much as the State of Mississippi has wronged us, I cannot find in my heart any other sentiment than an ardent wish for her prosperity and happiness.

I could cheerfully hope, that those of another age and generation may not feel the effects of those oppressive measures that have been so liberally dealt out to us; and that peace and happiness may be their reward. Amid the gloom and horrors of the present separation, we are cheered with a hope that ere long we shall reach our destined home, and that nothing short of the basest acts of treachery will ever be able to wreathe it from us, and that we may live free. Although your ancestors went treacherous on the field of danger and glory, our ancestors owned it as their birth-right, and we have had to purchase it from you as the vilest slaves buy their freedom.

Yet it is said that our present movements are our own voluntary acts—such is not the case. We found ourselves like a frightened stranger, following false guides, until we were surrounded on every side, with fire or water. The fire was certain destruction, and a ferocious foe was left him of escaping by water. A distant view of the opposite shore encourages the hope; to remain would be inevitable annihilation. Who would hesitate, or who would say that his plunging into the water was his own voluntary act? Painful in the extreme is the mandate of our expulsion. We regret that it should proceed from the mouth of our professed friend, and for whom our blood was co-mingled with that of his bravest warriors, on the field of danger and death.

But such is the instability of professions. The man who said that he would plant a stake and draw a line around us, that never should be passed, was the first to say he could not guard the line, and drew the stake and wiped out all traces of the line. I need not dwell from you my fears, that the present grounds may be purchased—I have my forebodings—who of us can tell after what manner war has already been done, what the next force may be, or the name of justice, or of peace, or of truth, for myself and for my injured people. Let us alone—we will not harm you, we want rest. We hope, in the name of justice that another outrage may never be committed against us, and that we may for the future be cared for as children, and not driven about as beasts, which are benefited by a change of pasture.

Taking an example from the American government, and knowing the happiness which its citizens enjoy under the influence of mild republican institutions, it is the intention of our countrymen to form a government assimilated to that of our white brethren in the United States, as nearly as their condition will permit. We know that in order to protect the rights and secure the liberties of the people, no government approximates so nearly to perfection as the one to which we have alluded. As east of the Mississippi we have been friends, so west we will cherish the same feelings with additional fervor; and although we may be removed to the desert, still we shall look with fond regard upon those who have promised us their protection. Let that feeling be reciprocated.

Friends, my attachment to my native land was strong—that cord is now broken; and we must go forth as wanderers in a strange land. I must go—Let me irritate you to regard us with feelings of kindness, and when the hand of oppression is stretched against us, let me hope that a warning voice may be heard from every part of the U. States, filling the mountains and valleys with echo, and say thus, you have no power, we are the over-ign people, and our red friends shall no more be your bad.

We ask you for nothing that is incompatible with your other duties.

We go forth sorrowful, knowing that wrong has been done. Will you extend to us your sympathies regards until all traces of dissension and opposition are obliterated and peace and good will ensue to the professions of our white brethren. Here is the land of our progenitors, and here are their bones; they left them as a sacred deposit, and we have been compelled to violate its trust; it is dear to us, yet we cannot stay, my people are dear to me, with them I must go. Could I stay and forget them and leave them to struggle alone, unaided, unprotected, and forgotten, by my great father, I should then be unworthy the name of a Choctaw, and be a disgrace to my nation. I must go with them, my destiny is cast among the Choctaw people. If they suffer, so will I; if they prosper, then will I rejoice. Let me again ask you to regard us with feelings of kindness. Yours, with respect,

GEORGE W. HARKINS.

SUNDAY MAILS.

From the Montgomery (Ala.) Printers' Gazette.

Albany, N. Y. Oct. 10th, 1831.

The Alabama Baptist association to the congress of the U. States. Whereas, sundry petitions have been presented to your honorable body, praying the suspension of transportation of the mail and the opening of the post office on the sabbath; and whereas, we have reason to expect a continuation of those petitions until the object asked for is obtained.

We, therefore, as religious bodies, in our associate capacity, and in the name of the churches and brethren we represent, have thought it necessary to express that right which we hold in common with all citizens of this government, to remonstrate against the grant of said petitions and to express our disapprobation of the measures asked for.

And, first, We object to the measure, because it would be a violation of the first clause of the first article of the amendments to the constitution, which says that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Now, if the law is passed on the sabbath day by law, the same law must not only decide which is the sabbath day, but necessarily enforce the observance of that day, so far as regards the mail department; and so far, would be the establishment of one article of religion, and a violation of the constitution as above quoted.

Secondly, We object to the measure, because it would produce a day of intestine war, both religious, political, and commercial, of one seventh part of the time, and would destroy, in that proportion, the importance and value of the constitution—an institution coeval in its existence with the government, intimately connected with its other departments, the labor and care of every administration, and the pride of the American people.

Thirdly, We object, because we deny that any earthly legislature has the right to establish a sabbath day by law, or to pass penal laws to enforce its observance, or to establish religion by law—or any article thereof—or to pass laws to provide for the maintenance of religion or its teachers. And we view it as preposterous in a legislature, to establish or enforce the observance of a sabbath day by law as it was in a pope to pass an edict that all infants should be baptized; and that legislature that assumes the power to assume the prerogative of God, offends against the majesty of heaven, and tyrannizes over the rights of conscience.

Fourthly, We object to the establishment of a sabbath day by law, because it is unnecessary to the worship of God. For profane—The Christians for the first three hundred years worshipped God publicly and privately in populous cities, towns, and villages—in public assemblies—in families—in public and private houses—not only without the intervention of law, or the establishment of a sabbath day, but in opposition to both law and law makers, the power of the Pagan world, and the rage of the persecuting Jews. We have no gentleman to show that the Christian religion, or any article thereof, of a Christian sabbath, was ever established by law before the days of Constantine; and yet religion prospered. God was worshipped, and that without distinction.

Fifthly, We object, because it is another effort to establish that old popish doctrine of uniformity, a doctrine as mischievous in its consequences as it is false in its nature. Uniformity, could it be effected, would be of no advantage to Christianity; for dissension produces investigation, investigation discloses error, and error truth shines. Then it is not difficult to see that it is anti-Christian religion and its teachers that formerly, as at the present, were and are calling to their support the strong arm of civil power, while the true worshippers of God have been the sufferers.

Our Sixth, and last objection that we shall offer, is, that the Baptists have not yet forgotten our whipping posts, prisons, floggings, laws, &c. that we suffered in the states of Virginia and Massachusetts. We do not admit that those sufferings to our torture and highly respectable states; but to the true Christian spirit of persecution that inflamed the religious teachers of those times, and caused them to influence the rulers to such acts of barbarian cruelty; nor do we possess hardness of feeling toward our persecutors: But our object is, to avoid the like consequences by rejecting the principle—persecution follows in the train with law established religion.

These several objections we respectfully submit to the wisdom of your honorable body, praying that they may be heard, and that the annals of this nation may never be stained with religious establishments in any shape or degree; and that religion may be unmarked of human trumery, that its virgin beauty may appear.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

ADDENDUM TO VOLUME XLII.

GENERAL CONVENTION

OF THE

FRIENDS OF DOMESTIC INDUSTRY,

ASSEMBLED AT NEW YORK OCTOBER 26, 1831.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

ON THE PRODUCT AND MANUFACTURE OF IRON AND STEEL.

In Convention, Oct. 27.—It was resolved that a committee of fifteen be appointed to report on the production and manufacture of iron.

The committee was afterwards charged to report on the production and manufacture of steel, and enlarged. And, in its final arrangement, consisted of the following gentlemen:

Messrs. Dunlop, (chairman), S. Richards, Valentine, Jones, Haldeman, Stewart, Keim, Henry, Pennsylvania, J. Richards, Scott and W. Jackson, N. Jersey, Newell, R. Island, E. T. Ellicott, Boyle, Maryland, B. B. Howell, Murray, Ross, J. Townsend, New York, Holley, Connecticut, Leech, Massachusetts, Philips, J. R. Coats and Chambers, Pennsylvania, Hammond, Vermont, and J. H. Pierson, New York.

REPORT ON IRON AND STEEL.

The Committee on Iron and Steel respectfully Report:—

That in discharge of the duties assigned to them, they have availed themselves of the information obtained by the convention of the manufacturers of iron, recently assembled at Philadelphia (of which several of your committee were members), which information was originally collected for the purpose of answering the call made upon the secretary of the treasury, at the close of the last session of congress—and is, they have every reason to believe, as precise and accurate, in all its parts, as any body of facts, of equal magnitude and importance, which, under similar circumstances, has ever been submitted to the public.

From abstracts of statements made to that meeting [annexed and marked A] it appears that at 202 furnaces, known to have been in operation, there were made in the year 1830, 155,348 tons of iron. This iron, further investigation enables your committee to say, is converted into 90,768 tons of bar iron, and 28,273 tons of castings, as there also set forth, which with the bar iron made at the bloomeries, amounting in that year to 5,853 tons, and making a total of bar iron of 96,621 tons, will, if estimated at the average wholesale prices of the principal markets of the country, as therein more particularly detailed, give an aggregate value for the production of that year of eleven millions, four hundred and forty-four thousand, four hundred and ten dollars.

The same statements exhibit for the three years ending with 1830, (when the bar iron made at the bloomeries is reduced to pig iron, and added to that made at the furnaces), the following results—

For 1828.	Iron 130,881 tons.	Value 10,861,440 Dollars.
" 1829.	" 142,870 "	" 11,528,134 "
" 1830.	" 163,542 "	" 11,444,410 "

Increase in quantity in two years very nearly 25 per cent.

Increase in market value not quite five and one half per cent.

It will be perceived in examining the last statement, that the increase in value does not keep pace with that of quantity—and your committee would here, for a moment, call the attention of the convention to this fact, to which they shall have occasion to allude more particularly hereafter, as affording a practical refutation of the doctrine, that an increased impost necessarily enhances the price to the consumer.

In this instance the average price of bar iron in 1828 was $118½. In that year an addition to the duty on hammered iron was made of 4 40-100 per ton, and on rolled of 7 dollars. In the following year the price fell to 114 2-3, and in 1830 to 96 2-3; shewing a decline in two years of 21 2-3 dollars per ton, in the face of the increased duty above mentioned—a decline effected exclusively by domestic competition, inasmuch, (as will hereafter appear) no corresponding diminution of price took place abroad, and the fall here, was greatest in those markets which are inaccessible to foreign iron.

In making these statements, your committee have been careful to found them upon data which they believe will bear the test of the most rigid scrutiny. They have been particularly cautious to guard against exaggeration. They believe the cause they desire to sustain needs no aid beyond the simple truth, and, when that is made known it will require no extraneous support, but may safely rest its claims to the favour of their fellow citizens, upon their sense of justice and expediency, and its own intrinsic merits.

Notwithstanding their own convictions on this subject, however satisfactory to themselves these statements certainly are, yet, as they are so much at variance with others which, having been extensively spread before the public under the sanction of a select committee of the senate of the United States, are, on that account, entitled to the most respectful consideration,—your committee will, in this place, submit some additional facts and statements in proof of what they have already adduced.

In 1810 the quantity of bar iron made in the United States was, agreeably to Cox's tables, - - - - - Tons 27,051

This quantity was probably short of the truth, as the tables are known, when they err, to err in this particular, excess never having been attributed to them.

We have no account of the quantity imported before 1816. It was then, of all kinds of bar iron, agreeably to a return made by the register of the treasury, upon a call by congress. 21,537 tons. If the importation of 1810 be estimated at three fourths of that of 1816—it cannot be far from the fact, and would be 16,152

Giving a total for the consumption of 1810, of bar iron—tons 43,208

Our population was then seven millions—it is now thirteen. If the consumption of iron be estimated at only the same rate, it would require for the year 1830 - - - - - 80,236 tons.

The importation of foreign bar iron for 1829, (the last return in possession of the committee) was 32,750—exported 260—for consumption - - - - - 32,490

Leaving a void to be supplied by the domestic article of 47,746 tons.

But if the consumption be estimated not only by the ratio of increase of the population, but also by that of the vast increase of every branch of industry requiring the use of iron, it cannot be doubted that the consumption of 1830 was fully three fold that of 1810; it is probable that it was even greater, but equal at that rate to 129,609 tons; from which deduct that part imported, estimated as of 1829, (from which it cannot materially vary), and the result is 97,119 tons, instead of 35,000 tons, as asserted in the statements referred to—corresponding in a remarkable manner (the difference being less than 500 tons) with the estimates of the committee founded upon the facts now collected; believed still to be under the truth, and shewing the extraordinary errors into which the most enlightened and intelligent may be betrayed, by adopting the conjectures of others without due investigation.

Your committee have already referred to the fact of the decline in the prices of iron from 1828 to 1830, as establishing the doctrine that a duty on a foreign article, which can be abundantly produced at home, does not necessarily enhance the price to the consumer. In further illustration of that part of the subject, and of other beneficial consequences flowing from the system of protection, they beg leave now to refer to the accompanying statements marked B and C. By the one it will be seen, that while iron in some foreign markets advanced from 40 to 50 per cent. from 1824 to 1825, and from 1822 to '25 experienced fluctuations amounting to nearly 75 per cent. on the lowest cost—our own varied but about 17 per cent. including an additional duty of about five, and actually receded at a subsequent period, although sustained by a second addition to the duty, to prices below what had prevailed ten years before, when the existing duty upon hammered iron was but nine dollars, or less than one half of that now levied.

This comparative stability, so important to the success of all well regulated industry, was due, exclusively, to the domestic supply, which effectually protected the consumer from the foreign speculator, who could otherwise have controlled this market, and produced here the same disastrous consequences that ensued in his own.

If such has been the result of protection upon the general market of the country, its effects have been still more striking, when examined with reference to particular, but most important districts. Our western brethren, the hardy pioneers of our country, were restrained and limited, in their contest with the wilderness, by the difficulty of obtaining, on almost any terms, this article so indispensable to their success, in every stage of their arduous onterprise. The second statement exhibits the prices of iron of various descriptions at different periods, at Pittsburg and Cincinnati, the great marts of the west. Comment can scarcely be necessary upon the facts there disclosed. The decline in price (in some instances more than one half,) has been in exact proportion with the stability given to the domestic manufacture, by additional impost on the foreign, until it has reached a point that now enables the mechanics of the first mentioned city, that Birmingham of America, to enter into successful competition with those of almost any other quarter, in the fabrication of nearly every article of necessity, and in one, justly esteemed the proudest effort of human ingenuity, they have attained a degree of perfection which enables them to challenge comparison with the skill and experience of any nation whatever.

As your committee are assured that contracts can be made for any number of engines at the prices indicated in the table referred to, it cannot be necessary that they should press this point further.

Here, your committee might perhaps leave this branch of their subject, satisfied with having, as they believe, demonstrated, that protection to the manufacturer, when effectual in amount and connected with such an assurance of permanence as stimulates enterprise and excites skill, does not operate as a tax on the consumer, but the reverse. But they believe that facts will justify them in going even further; and will enable them to maintain the position, that an impost may, under some circumstances, operate as a tax, not upon the consumer of the importing country, but upon the producer of the foreign article, compelling him, for the purpose of preserving even partial possession of the market, to reduce his own profits in proportion to the increase of impost, which reduction is, in fact, a contribution to the treasury of the importing country, and may relieve its citizens from the burthen of taxation to that extent.

The circumstances under which this may occur are two.—First, where the importing country is the only or the principal market for the article in question, and that article one which the exporting country unavoidably produces in the manufacture of some other of greater value. Second, where there is an increasing surplus of production in the exporting country, and an extensive and growing manufacture of the same article in the country where this surplus has theretofore sought a market.

Without detaining the convention longer than to make a passing reference, as an example of the first case, to the additional duty laid by the tariff of 1828 (since repealed) upon molasses, which duty was exclusively paid by the foreign planter, who thus contributed, during its existence, more than half a million of dollars per annum to the support of the government of the United States,—the committee will proceed, in proof and illustration, at once of the second, again to refer to statement marked B, and to that marked D, where, among other facts, it will be seen, that in July 1828, after the intelligence of our additional duty reached England, iron fell at once 4 44-100 per ton, and that in the following year a further reduction of 6 50-100 was submitted to. Our additional duty gave additional confidence to the American manufacturer—he extended his operations and increased the supply, without advancing the price. The foreign manufacturer could only reach the market by the payment of the additional impost. American competition prevented him from charging this to the consumer and he was therefore compelled to diminish his profits by this much, and to the same extent to become a contributor to the treasury of the United States.

An examination of the last mentioned statement [D] will shew that, by this means, through the instrumentality of American manufacturers, their foreign competitors have been made tributary to the public treasury, upon the article of iron alone since that article has been really protected, more than two millions and an half of dollars, while the consumer, as has been already shown, has been benefitted to an amount even greater than this.

If it be alleged that the same benefits would have resulted to the consumer—that the same decline in prices would have occurred without this competition—we answer, that such allegation would be contrary to all experience, which has taught all who have given attention to the subject, to know, that, while we are dependent, exclusively, upon foreigners for any article of consumption, they are enabled to prescribe their own terms, and that these always include a large profit to themselves. But the moment it is discovered that domestic ingenuity is at work to produce the same article, that moment their prices are reduced, and often to an extent that excites astonishment, when it is accompanied with the knowledge that no sensible change in the cost of production has taken place.

But it may be asked—if additional protection, by exciting domestic competition, invariably brings down prices, of what benefit is this protection to the domestic manufacturer? To this we reply—that permanence and stability, not high prices, are our objects. American manufacturers are not so blind to the constant and inevitable course of events, as not to foresee that, as these objects are approached, they must expect a more active competition from their fellow citizens, as well those who are already engaged in the same pursuits, as from others who may be induced to enter. But for this they are prepared—they can calculate its extent, and its effects are wholesome and salutary upon all. It stimulates to greater care, economy, industry and skill—profits are reduced, but they are stable; and the prudent man looks forward, with confidence, to realizing a fair reward for his labours. Against foreign competition there is no guarding, because the manner of its approach can never with certainty be foreseen, nor can its extent be calculated. The ordinary production of foreign industry, in any particular branch, may be estimated with some accuracy; but the extraordinary fluctuation, to which their markets are liable from great political convulsions and from other causes, cannot with any. Every violent change there, invariably forces upon our markets their vast accumulations, which, easily breaking down the feeble barrier of a mere revenue protection, involves in ruin all who have essayed competition in the same branch. The consumer may be benefitted for the moment, but a re-action certainly follows—great fluctuations engender a spirit of speculation; and mere gambling is substituted for all regular traffic. The frequent recurrence of these evils, (every where acknowledged to be such), is only to be prevented by a system of protection, which, when efficient for the main purpose, is, as has been proved, abundantly so for this also.

Having, as they believe, satisfactorily shewn the beneficial effects of a system of real protection to the consumer of iron, your committee will proceed with a few brief remarks upon its influence on the agriculture, labour and internal trade of the country.

From a critical examination of the returns from 73 furnaces and 152 forges, in a great variety of situations, the details of which are more particularly stated in the paper annexed and marked E, they find, that in the manufacture of the iron, in its first stages only, made in the United States in the past year, agricultural produce to the amount of nearly three and an half millions of dollars has been consumed; which vast sum has been paid by the manufacturers, and those employed by them, to the farmer, shewing how completely his interest is identified with their's, and furnishing him with the means of estimating the probable consequences to himself of the destruction of this branch of industry, and the conversion of so large a body of consumers into cultivators and producers.

By the same statement it appears that nearly twenty-five thousand workmen are constantly employed, receiving annually the sum of seven millions four hundred and ninety three thousand and seven hundred dollars; making, with their families, nearly one hundred and twenty-five thousand persons directly dependent upon this manufacture.

For transporting this iron to the markets where it is sold to the consumer, it is calculated that about one million and a quarter of dollars are annually paid, being a further contribution to labour and agriculture.

These facts, your committee believe, sufficiently shew how completely interwoven are the interests of agriculture and labour, with those of manufactures. They think, and they hope hereafter to demonstrate it, that those of commerce are not less so; but, for the present, will refer to one fact frequently alleged and recently and triumphantly reiterated, in support of a different view of the subject—namely, that every ship of the burthen of 500 tons, is subjected to a tax, occasioned by the duties on the foreign articles entering into her construction, of two thousand dollars, of which that on iron forms a large proportion. Without wishing to detract in the slightest degree from the merits of a branch of our industry that has secured so much of glory to our national character, as well as profit to our country, it must not be forgotten that this interest, which was one of the earliest subjects of national regard, has, for a long period, enjoyed a protection in the discriminating tonnage duty of 94 cents per ton, which, on a vessel of 500 tons, amounts to 470 dollars on every voyage; and, admitting the supposition that she makes three voyages yearly, such protection amounts to 1410 dollars per annum. And inasmuch as it is understood to be a principle of mercantile calculation, that a new outfit is to occur every five years, there is a protection amounting to seven thousand and fifty dollars against the tax of 2000—and if it be true that the community suffers by protecting our domestic industry, it would seem not politic for those interested in navigation to appear as complainants. And this, it must be observed, is independent of the 10 per cent. discriminating duty on all merchandise imported in foreign bottoms, imposed solely to foster the shipping interests of the country.

It may be argued that this system of discriminating duties is disappearing before the reciprocities offered and embraced in many of our commercial treaties. But let it be remembered, that these reciprocities have been the fruit of a rigid adherence to the protecting system, to which even the "mistress of the ocean" has been compelled to succumb, affording a perfect illustration of the efficacy of those principles for which we contend; and which will eventually oblige the manufacturing nations of Europe and elsewhere, either to extend the right hand of reciprocity to our agriculturalists, manufacturers and mechanics, as they have done to our merchants, or to sink before the unequal conflict with American ingenuity and American enterprise.

The committee deem it here proper to advert to the attempts which have, for some two years past, been made to array the interests of the manufacturers of iron, in its higher stages, to wit—hardware, &c. against its primary manufacturers, and the efforts which have accompanied these attempts to obtain a large reduction of the existing duties upon some descriptions of iron, and a total abolition of those upon others, for the alleged purpose of placing these two branches of industry upon an equal footing in the home market.

Fully to counteract such efforts, your committee believed it would only be requisite to ascertain what proportion of the value of the manufactured article consisted of the duty on the bar and sheet iron entering into its composition; and what, of that, upon the value given abroad by the subsequent elaboration. To determine this, they took a lock, called a Scotch spring lock, which weighed two pounds—they supposed that half a pound of iron was lost in making—total weight, $2\frac{1}{2}$, deduct half a pound of brass—weight of iron 2 pounds, which, at the highest duty of $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb. is seven cents. The sterling cost of this lock, with charges subject to duty, was twenty three pence, and the duty, as calculated at the custom house, very nearly twelve cents.

In this case, if the American manufacturer of locks had imported his iron at the highest rate of duty, he would have paid a tax (if the duty be a tax) of seven cents, and would have received a protection of twelve cents, as against the foreign manufacturer of hardware.

Another lock called a closet lock, cost, with charges, two shillings and three pence; duty as above nearly 14 cents, and weighed, with the same allowance, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a pound—duty, at the highest rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents, is 2 5-8 cents. Here the manufacturer of hardware would receive five times more protection on the same article than the iron manufacturer.

A third lock, called a mortice lock, cost, with charges, five shillings—duty as above 30 cents, and weighed, with the same allowances and deductions for brass, 2 pounds—which, at the highest rate of duty as before, is 7 cents.

Here the protection to the hardware manufacturer, as compared with the iron maker, is nearly four and an half to one. In all these cases the highest duty is taken on iron and the lowest on hardware.

The inquiries of the committee having, so far, exhibited results so entirely at variance with statements which had been widely circulated under high authority, they became apprehensive that it would be alleged these examples had been purposely selected with reference to such result; and, although they were, in truth, taken entirely at random, yet they believed it to be their duty to pursue the investigation on a more extended scale, and, if possible, to embrace the entire importations of the country—a course, the perfect fairness of which, they think, cannot be called in question.

It was known to one of your committee, that, when the applications already referred to, were before congress, a highly respectable house of this city, engaged both in the manufacture of iron and importation of hardware, had taken up the memorials and statements upon which the subsequent report of the select committee of the senate was founded, and examined them in detail. They were, accordingly, invited by the committee to assist them in the investigation—their aid was cheerfully and promptly furnished, and the result will be found in the document annexed and marked F.

To refer particularly to every part of this elaborate and most valuable paper, would occupy too much of the time of the convention, and would swell this report beyond all reasonable limits. Nor could justice be done it, by any reference, however particular. It is respectfully, but earnestly, recommended to the careful perusal of every member.

Your committee, however, solicit the attention of the convention to a few remarks upon some of the most striking errors of fact contained in the memorials, statements, and report already alluded to, which they deem too important to pass without such notice.

One great object of the memorialists was to obtain the importation of English iron at a very low rate of duty, on the alleged ground that it was superior to other iron for many, and equal for most purposes, for which iron is used.

In answer to this it is shewn that, although this iron can now be imported in every required form of bolts and bars, at full twenty per cent. less than other iron, yet, such is the character which experience has stamped upon it, that only one seventh of all the iron imported is of this kind, and, of the entire consumption, it forms but one thirty-ninth part! To admit the statement of the memorialists, in this respect to be true, would therefore be to suppose an ignorance of their profession and interests, on the part of the American blacksmiths and others, workers in iron, which your committee cannot for a moment sanction.

The memorialists stated that the duty on iron was from 159 to 282 per cent. or from 6 to 11 times the duty on hardware. The want of candour manifested by the general character of this statement, is fully exposed in the examination, where it is shewn that the quantity paying the duty of 37 dollars per ton, is but one seventh, and that paying 78 40-100 but one thirtieth of the whole importation, and but 1-39th and 1-112th parts of the entire consumption.

Your committee have already had occasion to advert to the extraordinary error committed by the memorialists, when they fixed the manufacture of iron in this country at 35,000 tons. They now beg to call the attention of the convention to an error as remarkable on the other hand.

For the apparent purpose of exhibiting, in mortifying contrast, the insignificance of the domestic manufacture, when compared with the foreign importations, the entire consumption is assumed at Leaving, after the deduction of the above	-	-	-	116,844 tons.

To be supplied from abroad the quantity of	-	-	-	35,000
				81,844 tons.

Of this last quantity it is stated that 47,798 tons were imported in the form of hardware, at a duty varying from 5.50 to 8.25 per ton, and that, in this way, this large quantity of iron was introduced at an aggregate duty of	-	-	-	284,293	17-100

"tion the duty of 3½ cents, would have paid"

1,568,526

"At this rate," they say—"the discriminating duty in favour of the British manufacturer (of hardware) was actually 1,284,232 83-100 dollars, "for the fiscal year 1828-29."

The above weights it is admitted are obtained by estimates—that is, by assuming one third of the gross value of the hardware imported to be the cost of the raw material of iron, and then bringing that third into tons at 23 33-100 per ton. The experiments on a small scale, already recited in this report, shewed the error of these estimates:—When brought to a practical test, on a scale embracing every article in the whole range of importation, their true character was made even more manifest. The committee again refer to the examination of Messrs. Green and Wetmore, by which it will appear that the whole weight of the above hardware (including brass, horn, and all other materials) was but 9,763 tons, instead of 47,798 tons, and that the duty actually paid was rather more than one hundred and four dollars per ton. That if the American manufacturer of hardware had imported the iron and paid the duty mentioned by the memorialists of 97 dollars per ton, he would have paid the sum of - - - $561,231

And would have been protected by a duty on the manufactured article of - - - - -

Making a discrimination, for the fiscal year 1828-9, in favour, not of the British manufacturer of hardware of one million two hundred and eighty four thousand two hundred and thirty-two dollars and eighty three cents—but in favour of the American manufacturer of hardware, over both the British hardware manufacturer and the American manufacturer of iron, of six hundred and forty-two thousand six hundred and twelve dollars.

Here your committee might, they believe, safely rest this part of the subject, deeming their duty in relation to it fully discharged. They will detain the convention only while they present a brief summary of the different, and, in some instances, opposite conclusions, to which a careful examination of the same subject has brought them, when compared with those put forth by the memorialists

They (the memorialists) say that the entire consumption of iron in the United States, is - - - - - 116,344 tons.

Your committee have shewn that, in domestic and imported bar iron, taking the imports (with the exception of hardware) as stated by the memorialists themselves, and in castings, it amounts to - - - - - 158,280 tons.

If the estimates of the memorialists, as respects hardware, had been retained, the quantity would have been swelled to - - - - - 196,315 instead of 116,344, and it is with reference to that quantity that the comparison of statements should be made.

The memorialists say that of this quantity consumed but 35,000 are made in the United States.

Your committee have shewn that of bar iron there is produced 96,621 tons.

And of castings - - - - - 28,273

Together - - - 124,894

but if reduced to pig iron, the mode of computation always adopted in Great Britain, the quantity would rise to 163,542 tons, instead of 35,000.

Of the quantity made here, the memorialists say but 10,000 tons reach the seaboard.

Your committee, upon what they deem good authority, believe that one third of all the bar iron, and more than two thirds of all the castings, pass through the markets on the seaboard—they shall have occasion to notice this item more particularly hereafter. For the present, they will only remark, that more than 10,000 tons are annually made in New Jersey alone, all manufactured within a few miles of the seaboard and nearly all sent to the markets there.

The memorialists say that of rolled iron ten-elevenths are imported in the manufactured state, and the remaining eleventh in the raw state.

Your committee have shewn that the actual proportions are a little more than two to one instead of 11 to 1.

They say that the quantity of rolled iron, in all its various forms, compared with hammered iron, is nearly in the proportion of two to one.

Your committee shew that the true proportion is but a little more than one to nine.

They say that of 90,000 tons of iron sold in the markets of the seaboard, but one ninth, including all descriptions, is American.

Your committee have shewn that of about 95,000 tons sold in those markets, about 52,000 tons, or four ninths, are of American manufacture.

They say that the American iron, compared with foreign iron imported in the shape of hardware, is in the proportion of one to six, or, out of 60,000 tons but 10,000.

Your committee have shewn that the true proportions are as nearly as possible the reverse—namely, as six to one, or but 9,763 tons imported in hardware against 52,000 tons American brought to the seaboard.

The memorialists allege that 47,798 tons of iron, in the form of hardware, were imported in one year. Your committee have shewn that the real amount was 9,763 tons.

The memorialists assert that the duty on iron is from 6 to 11 times that on hardware. Your committee shew that the duty on hardware is 3 to 4 times that on the iron entering into its composition, even if that duty be estimated at 37 dollars per ton, which is 11 dollars per ton more than the average rate.

The memorialists assert that sheet iron, in the form of tea trays, can be be introduced at a cost of 83 72-100 per ton. Your committee shew that the true cost is 396 22-100 dollars.

They assert that but eleven thousand persons are employed in the United States in the manufacture of iron. Your committee have shewn that the number is nearly twenty-five thousand.

Finally, the memorialists complain of the oppressive burthen which the protection afforded to this inconsiderable quantity, as they call it, of American iron, has been to them in their business. To shew the extent of this burthen, they had previously asserted that the existing laws had operated, in a single year, in favour of the British manufacturer of hardware over the American, to the amount of one million two hundred and eighty four thousand, two hundred and thirty two dollars and eighty three cents.

Your committee have shewn that the actual discrimination in favour of—not the British but the American manufacturers of hardware, that is of all of the petitioners themselves who are such, was, in that same year, at the lowest computation, very nearly six hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Your committee earnestly invite every practical American mechanic to examine this subject for himself—to look well into their statements, and ascertain to what extent his interests are guarded by existing laws; and having done so, they cannot doubt an unanimous opposition on the part of that respectable and valuable class of our citizens, to any such suggestions as those embraced in the concluding prayers of the memorialists which have been under examination.

Your committee feel that they ought to apologise for having occupied so much of the time of the convention in the examination of this memorial, which might be thought not strictly within the range of their duties. It would seem that errors of such magnitude must be self-evident, and could require no exposition. Your committee would willingly have adopted this opinion—but the importance that had been given to this document, by the course pursued in the senate of the United States, forced them to a different conclusion. In that venerable body it was referred to a select committee of its most distinguished members—a majority of whom, by adopting all its statements as facts, and its opinions and arguments as just, re-affirming them, indeed, after they had been questioned in counter memorials, have thereby changed their character, have lent to them the high authority of their names and station, and stamped them with an importance which they did not originally possess. They have been widely and industriously circulated under the imposing sanction of a report of the senate, and so much have they been relied on, that it has been triumphantly asserted they would “break the iron arch” which supports our system, and thus bring the whole fabric to the ground.

These were the considerations that governed your committee in the course they have pursued, and they hope to find in them a sufficient excuse for their trespass upon the time and attention of the convention. In the performance of this duty they have found it impossible to be brief—where so many assertions were to be met and refuted, this was out of the question. The same allegation met them again and again, in some new form, varied to suit the occasion—hence repetition was unavoidable. They trust their apology will be found in the necessity of their situation.

Before dismissing this subject, your committee owe it to justice and themselves to say, that they entirely acquit the distinguished gentlemen, composing the majority of the committee of the senate, of even a suspicion of any intention to mislead. They cheerfully concede to them the same sincerity and singleness of motive and purpose which your committee claim for themselves; while they regret, as they do most deeply, that they should have been made the instruments of so extensive a dissemination of error.

In the preceding examination your committee had occasion to notice and refute the statement, that but a small portion of American iron reached the markets on the coast. In a communication addressed to the convention recently assembled in a neighboring city, which derives importance from having been adopted by that respectable body as a part of its proceedings, it is, among other things asserted, that but 430,000 dollars in value of all the iron manufactured in this country, including duty or bounty reaches the seaboard. The presumed object of this assertion, as well as those in which the quantity was stated at 10,000 tons, is to make it appear that the abolition of the duty on foreign iron would affect but a small number of the manufacturers of the domestic article; while it would relieve the mass of the consumers on the sea board from the supposed tax upon the foreign.

To shew the value of this assertion your committee beg leave to refer again to statement A, where it will be seen that, in a small district of West Jersey, alone—iron amounting to more than half a million of dollars, is annually made, the whole of which finds a market in the neighboring sea ports.

Your committee were instructed to report upon cutlery, and the manufactures of iron in its higher stages.

They have found it impossible, in the limited time allowed them, to do more than ascertain that they are numerous and of great extent and value. They annex two statements marked G and H—the one exhibiting the annual amount of manufactures in a single county of Connecticut, the value of which is nearly nineteen hundred thousand dollars—iron constituting one-fourth, and those of that material in its higher branches nearly one-tenth. The second shews the value of manufactures for one year in the small county of Delaware, in Pennsylvania, amounting to nearly fourteen hundred thousand dollars, of which those of iron form more than one-seventh. These two instances, taken at random, may serve to convey some idea of the vast amount and value of the manufacturing interest of the entire country.

The committee have deemed the article of steel of sufficient importance to merit a distinct report which will be found annexed, marked I, and is respectfully recommended to the particular attention of all those who take an interest in that valuable branch of our industry.

The last consideration that occurs to your committee as properly within their duty to notice, is the capability of the United States to furnish a supply of iron equal to their own wants. Of this the committee cannot entertain the smallest doubt. The tabular statements heretofore referred to, shew that, in two years, from 1828 to 1830, the supply has increased very nearly twenty-five per cent. and it is known that old establishments, in many situations, are enlarging, and new ones erecting, giving assurance that this increase will be progressive, until not only the domestic market will be fully supplied, but a surplus remain for exportation, creating thereby a new source to meet the demands of foreign commerce and additional means of employment for our navigation.

If we compare our situation with that of Great Britain, in this particular, less than a century ago, we shall see abundant reason for self-gratulation. Ninety years since, her entire production of iron did not much exceed that which is now made in the state of New Jersey. In 1802, within the limits of a single generation, her furnaces were less in number than those now existing in the United States, and their production not more than will be made here during the present year—and this without availing ourselves of the means to which she is indebted for the extraordinary change which this comparatively short period has effected. We have the benefit of her experience—we can command her skill, if it be necessary—we have the mineral fuels, which have done so much for her, in unlimited abundance, when our forests fail—our citizens yield to none in enterprise and ingenity, when adequate rewards for the exercise of those qualities are held out—and knowing this, with the experience of our rapid progress in the last two years, furnishing, as we now do, more than three-fourths of the entire consumption, is it, we repeat, extravagant to assert, that we are fully competent to supply our own wants, and furnish a surplus to minister to those of our neighbors?

In conclusion, your committee cannot refrain from the expression of the gratification which the result of this investigation has afforded them. Deserted by the government, and denied that protection, which, at the close of the late war, was freely granted to almost every other interest, this important branch of domestic industry, so essential to the prosperity, if not to the existence of all others, and so closely allied to real national independence, seemed threatened with absolute extinction. A wiser policy, adopted at a later period, aided by the unconquerable spirit of American enterprise, has raised it from comparative insignificance to the elevated rank which it now holds; and to maintain it in which, it asks, as it believes, no sacrifice from its fellow citizens, engaged in other pursuits. Grateful for the consideration which its well founded claims upon their justice, after years of delay and suffering, at last obtained, it is now returning to them the full measure of benefit which it has received at their hands, and will continue to protect them, as heretofore, from speculation and monopoly from abroad, should it not a second time become the victim of that unnatural policy, which cherishes foreign while it neglects and destroys our native industry.

By order of the committee,

B. B. HOWELL, secretary.

SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT.

Before separating, the committee instructed the secretary to make a further report of any facts that might be received in time, for the permanent committee. In conformity therewith he has now to state, that Mr. Peter Townsend, who was delegated by those engaged in the manufacture of iron in this city, to visit all the establishments in this state and those east of it, has returned, and reported the result of his examination—by which it appears, that in New York there are in operation, of blast furnaces not included in the estimates of the above reports

In the whole 37 additional furnaces, making of pig iron and castings 25,250 tons, and a large number of forges employed in converting the pig into bar iron.

There are returns also of 32 bloomery fires in situations where it was not before known that any existed, making 30 tons each per annum, or nearly 1,000 tons yearly of bar iron, by this process—and the returns brought by Mr. Townsend shew that the committee estimated this kind of iron nearly 1,000 tons too low in the districts which he visited.

The result of the whole would be, if 20,000 tons of the above pig iron be converted into bars

The value of which, according to the mode of estimation already explained, would be thirteen millions three hundred and twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars.

It is hardly necessary to add that these additional facts strengthen all the inferences and calculations heretofore made by the committee.

NEW YORK, November 1831.

Appendix to the Report on Iron and Steel.STATEMENT A.

The committee of manufactures of iron appointed by the convention assembled at Philadelphia, to examine the returns received in answer to the circulars addressed to different individuals engaged in that branch of industry; report the following tabular statement, as the result of their investigations:

STATES.	1828.			1829.			1830.
	No. of furnaces.	Tons of pig iron.	Tons of castings.	No. of furnaces.	Tons of pig iron.	Tons of castings.	No. of furnaces.	Tons of pig iron.	Tons of castings.
Pennsylvania,	44	24,822	3,693	44	27,425	4,564	45	31,056	5,506
New Jersey,	11	1,733	6,264	11	1,941	5,998	10	1,671	5,615
Maryland,	5	2,247	483	5	1,715	1,065	6	3,163	1,259
Virginia,	2	400	50	2	702	72	2	538	43
Ohio,							7	5,400	250
Delaware,	1	450	350	1	450	350	1	450	350
Missouri,							2	590	250
	63	29,652	10,840	64	32,233	12,049	73	42,868	13,273

One furnace erected in Pennsylvania in 1830, will, in 1831, make 1,100 tons of pig iron.

In addition to the seventy-three furnaces mentioned in the preceding table, from which detailed returns had been received, the committee had information of one hundred and twenty-nine furnaces, in the states of Pennsylvania, New York, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Tennessee, New Hampshire, Virginia and Ohio, in actual operation; but from them had then received no returns. Taking the production of the seventy-three furnaces, from which returns have been received, as the rule for estimating the whole, and the following would be the result:

YEARS.	Furnaces.	Tons of pig iron.	Tons of castings.	Total of pig iron and castings.
1828	192	90,368	33,035	123,404
1829	192	98,234	36,720	134,954
1830	202	118,620	36,728	155,348

But as the greater part of the furnaces not included in the returns, are situated in districts where but few castings are made, the committee have not felt authorized to estimate the quantity of castings made at them at more than about 5 per cent. of their entire production, which would give the following proportions and results:

YEARS.	Furnaces.	Tons of pig iron.	Tons of castings.	Total of pig iron and castings.
1828	192	108,564	14,840	123,404
1829	192	118,405	16,549	134,954
1830	202	137,075	18,273	155,348

From the best information the committee have been able to collect on this subject, they estimate that of the pig iron made in these years, about ten thousand tons per annum, have, upon an average, been converted in the air furnaces and cupolas into castings, leaving to be manufactured into bar iron.

In 1828, of pig iron 98,564 tons, making of bars 70,403 tons.

1829,	"	108,405	"	"	77,432	"
1830,	"	127,075	"	"	90,768	"

And which quantities severally correspond with remarkable proportional accuracy with the returns from 132 forges, which accompanied the returns from the 73 furnaces first mentioned.

In East Jersey—in a part of Connecticut—in a large district of New York, and in Vermont, bar iron is extensively made by the process technically denominated blooming—or by a single operation from the ore, without the intervention of the blast furnace.

The returns already received justify the committee in putting down this description of bar iron for the Year 1828	at	5,341 tons,	} Of which 2,197 tons in East Jersey.

1829	at	5,654 "
1830	at	5,853 "

Making a total of bar iron

For 1828	of	75,744 tons,
1829	of	83,066
1830	of	96,621

And the entire quantity of iron in its first stage, as shewn in the following table:

DESCRIPTION OF IRON.	1828.	1829.	1830.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
Pig iron,	108,564	118,405	137,075
Castings from blast furnaces,	14,840	16,549	18,273
Bloomed bar iron, for the years respectively, reduced to pig iron, at 25 cwt. to the ton of bars.	7,477	7,916	6,194
Total iron in pigs and castings.	130,881	142,870	163,542

Total increase of all kinds of iron in two years, very nearly, 25 per cent.

For the purpose of determining the value of the above iron, the committee have taken the average prices of the principal sea ports, and those of Pittsburgh and Cincinnati, and have estimated that two-thirds of the bar iron made in the United States, is sold in the western markets—the proportion may be greater, which would increase the entire value.

In 1828, the average price of American hammered iron, in the principal cities east of the Susquehanna, was 105 dollars, and at Pittsburgh and Cincinnati 125 dollars, the average, estimated as above, would be 118½. In 1829 the prices were 100 and 122, giving an average of 114½, and in 1830, 90 and 100 dollars, average 96½. Castings, from the blast furnaces, are valued at 60 dollars, although many sell higher, and from the air furnace and cupola, at 4½ cts per lb.—which is certainly not above the average rate.

At these prices, the aggregate value of the iron made

In 1828	would be	10,861,440	dollars,
1829	"	11,528,134	"
1830	"	11,444,410	"

Increase in market value in two years less than 5½ per cent.—decrease in value from 1829 to 1830, nearly three-fourths of one per cent.

Sir—I have the honor to hand you the following prices of iron in Sweden, from 1815 to 1831—and you may consider the Russian new sable was at the same prices, and P. S. L. at 20s. sterling, per ton, higher, at the same periods.

Yours, &c.

STATEMENT C.

Shewing the effects of a tariff of protection on the article of iron at Pittsburgh and Cincinnati:—

In the years 1818, '19 and '20, bar iron in Pittsburgh sold at from 190 to 200 dollars per ton. Now the price is 100 dollars per ton.

In the same years, boiler iron was 350 dollars per ton. Now at 140 dollars per ton. Sheet iron was but little made in those years, and sold for 18 dollars per cwt. Now made in abundance and sold at 8½ dollars per cwt.

Hoop iron, under same circumstances, was then 250 dollars, and is now 120 dolls.

Axes were then 24 dollars per doz. and are now 12 dollars.

Scythes are now 50 per cent. lower than they were then—as are spades and shovels.

Iron hoes were in those years 9 dollars per doz. Now a very superior article of steel hoes at 4 to 4½ dollars.

Socket shovels are made at 4½ dollars by the same individual who, a few years ago, sold them at 12 dollars per doz.

Slater's patent stoves, imported from England, sold in Pittsburgh at 350 to 400 dollars—A much superior article is now made there and sold for 125 to 150 dollars.

English vices then sold for 20 to 22½ cents per lb. now a superior article is sold at 10 to 10½.

Brazier's rods in 1824 were imported, and cost 14 cents per lb. or $313 80 per ton. Now supplied to any amount of ½ to 3-8 diameter, at $130 per ton.

Steam engines have fallen in price since 1823, one-half, and they have one-half more work on them.

The engine at the Union Rolling mill. (Pittsburgh), in 1819, cost $11,000—a much superior one of 130 horse power, for Sligo mill, cost, in 1826, 3,000 dollars.

In 1830, there were made in Pittsburgh one hundred steam engines.

In 1831, one hundred and fifty will be made, averaging 2,000 dollars; or 300,00 in that article alone.

A two horse power engine costs 250 dollars; six horse 500 dollars; eight to nine horse 700 dollars. These last are the prices delivered and put up.

At least 600 tons of iron made in Pittsburgh are manufactured into other articles before it leaves the city, from steam engines, of the largest size, down to a three-penny nail.

Eight rolling and slitting mills of the largest power, are in the city of Pittsburgh—five of which have been erected since 1828.

Thirty-eight new furnaces have been erected since 1824 in the western parts of Pennsylvania, and that part of Kentucky bordering on the Ohio river, most of them since 1828.

The quantity of iron rolled at Pittsburgh was in

1828	tons	3,291 19 0 0
1829	"	6,217 17 0 0
1830	"	9,282 2 0 0

Being an increase of nearly 200 per cent. in two years.

The above facts were furnished by members of the committee residing at Pittsburgh, who vouch for their accuracy.

One fact there stated, suggests the following remarks to the committee:

To the report of the select committee of the senate of the United States, on the subject of iron, is appended, among other papers, one in which it is stated, that "it is now ascertained that the superiority of England over France is entirely due to the cheapness of iron: a six horse steam engine, for instance, in France, costs on the average, at least 500 dollars more than in England, owing to the cheapness of iron in Great Britain—It is still dearer in the United States than in France."

Here it is asserted that a six horse power steam engine costs 500 dollars more in France than it does in England, and that it is still dearer in the United States than in France. Now it so happens, that in the United States, at Pittsburgh, a steam engine, of that power, can be put up, ready for action, for the identical sum of 500 dollars.

PRICES OF IRON AT CINCINNATI.

1814 to 1818, bar iron 200 to 220 dollars per ton—now 100, 105, 110. The fall in prices has been nearly as follows:

1826	bar iron assorted	125 to 135 dollars.
1827	"	120 to 130 "
1828	"	115 to 125 "
1829	"	112½ to 122½ "
1830	"	100 to 110 "
1831	"	100 to 110 "

Castings, including hollow ware, 1814 to 1818, 120 to 130 dollars per ton: present price 60 to 65, and the quality much improved.

STATEMENT D.

The duties on iron imported into the United States, were, 1804 to 1812, 15 per cent.—double war duties from 1812 to 1816. In 1816, duties, rolled iron 30 dollars per ton, hammered 9 dollars. The law of 1816, fixing the duties at these rates, ruined many of the manufacturers and compelled them to abandon their works. By the act of April 20, 1818, the duty on hammered iron was raised to 15 dollars. This, in some measure, revived the manufacture, and many, who had abandoned, resumed their operations. The foreign manufacturer, to keep possession of the market, offered his iron at a less price; so that there was an actual decline here. In 1824 the duty on hammered iron was raised to 18 dollars, and in 1828 to $22 40. These additions to the duty had no permanent effect in raising the price. The foreign manufacturer could not advance his prices beyond those of 1824, because the American iron maker supplied the market at those rates; and iron, at a duty of $22 40, sells at less than it did at one of 9 dollars. The foreign manufacturer has been compelled to take the additional duties from his profits—and these deductions from his profits have been paid into the treasury of the United States, without adding to the price paid by the American consumer.

The following table shows the operation of the additional duty levied since 1816 on hammered iron alone.

STATEMENT E.

The following calculations were made by Hardman Phillips and George Valentine, esqrs. and are derived from the average returns submitted to the committee from two counties, (those most extensively engaged in the manufacture of iron in Pennsylvania), namely, Centre and Huntingdon, and have been carefully verified by a comparison with returns from 73 furnaces and 132 forges.

For each ton of bar iron and castings, made, the following agricultural produce is found to be consumed:

20 bushels wheat and rye, average at	75 cts.	$15 00
57 lbs. pork	5 "	2 55
43 " beef	4 "	1 72
10 " butter	12 1/2 "	1 25
2 bushels potatoes	30 "	60
1/2 ton hay	7 "	3 50

For every ten tons of bar iron one horse is employed one whole year, worth $100—and experience shews that the mortality among horses so employed is per annum one in seven, and constitutes a charge of, per ton of 1 43

For fruit and vegetables, of which no return has been made, we feel justified in putting down 1 00

$27 55

Which multiplied by the quantity of bar iron and castings, will give the sum of 3,415,950 dollars, paid by the iron manufacturers and those employed by them, to the farmers.

The same returns enable them to state, that every five tons of iron, as above made, requires one able bodied man throughout the year, or, in the whole, 24,979; and, as it appears that, upon an average, each one of these has four dependent upon him, it follows that 124,895 persons are supported by this branch of industry, in its first stages; and the average of the wages of the workmen being fully one dollar per day, or say 300 per annum, they receive for wages, in the whole, the large sum of 7,493,700 dollars, for the labor of one year.

The expense of transporting this iron to the different markets, by land and water, may be estimated at an average of $10 per ton—amounting to 1,248,940 dollars; the whole of which is distributed among those engaged in the transportation and coasting trade of the country, and sub-divided among those who furnish subsistence to the many persons employed, and in furnishing means for this branch of the business.

[*Since ascertained 30,973 tons—of which only 439 tons were British. The small amount of the latter importation, is the best possible evidence of the bad quality of English iron, as stated in subsequent pages, and of its unfitness for the usual purposes to which hammered iron is applied. All such iron pays the same duty.

STATEMENT F.

New York, 29th October, 1831.

To the committee on iron and steel, appointed by the convention of the friends of domestic industry, now in session in this city—

The following examination of the memorial of the workers of iron, and others, in Philadelphia, presented to congress in January, 1831, we submit to you for the use of the convention.

1st. Under their first head the memorialists embrace two subjects: first, the high duty on English iron, and secondly, its quality.

With respect to the rate of duty, we will answer when we review what is said on the same subject, under their 6th head.

With respect to its quality, the memorialists contradict the report of the committee of the senate,* which pronounced it "bad"—and say that "English iron is preferred for various purposes, on account of the decided superiority it possesses in various qualities—for its strength of cohesion, its excellence in welding, surpassing every other iron as in chains and anchors, in rails for railways, spikes and bolts; on account of the superior manner in which it is prepared in all the various forms required, as well as from its acknowledged superiority in durability; and for wheel tires for the same properties, as well as from the greater evenness with which it is always drawn,—and concludes by saying, that the American, Swedish, Russian and English iron all sell in the Philadelphia market at about $100 per ton.

In answer to the above we would remark, that the small quantity of English iron imported, in comparison with the total imports of iron, itself confutes their statement as to its superior quality; and conclusively shows that the properties it possesses are not in great requisition here. The ratio of English iron imported, being less than 1 to 7, notwithstanding the advantage it has over other foreign iron of being procured of any size, and at a cost of 20 per cent. less.

The little use to which this iron is put will appear more manifest, when compared with the total quantity consumed—as will be seen by referring to our statement under our 6th head; being only 1-39 of the total consumption; and this too with its advantages as to size and price, above mentioned. These facts show incontestably in what repute this iron is held by consumers. We have been importers, and wholesale and retail dealers in the article, for many years, and our experience is,—that the united testimony of all consumers is in direct variance to the statement of the memorialists, as to its good quality: the low price and the convenient size in which it may be obtained, is, as a general remark, the only reason why it is sold at all.

The memorialists particularize for what purposes this iron is decidedly superior: first, as for chains and anchors on account of its strength and cohesion and excellence in welding. If it has more strength of cohesion than other iron, it is new to us, as well as to all the workers of iron, that we have enquired of on the subject. We have no facts before us of the strength of English iron; but we have a certificate from commodore Hull, commandant of the navy yard at Washington, giving the strength of chain iron lately supplied by the New Jersey Iron company. The 1½ inch round, broke with 60 tons weight on it, the 1-8 inch round, broke with 41 tons weight on it.† If the memorialists have any trials to show that English iron has more strength of cohesion than this, they are right; but we have no idea that the English iron sent to this country will bear any comparison with the above. As to its superiority in welding, we have enquired of several blacksmiths as to the facts—and they universally say, that American iron is better for welding. As to its being used for anchors in this country, we have made enquiries, and cannot ascertain that any is used for that purpose in the anchors that come to New York. It appears very strange that American iron for anchors should be sold at $115 per ton, and preferred at that price, while English iron can be bought at $72—if the English is superior.

With respect to its being superior for railways—we cannot conceive how the fact could be ascertained, as an experiment, we think, could not have been made, in this early stage of railways in this country. But as to its superiority for spikes and bolts, we positively deny it. Being sellers of both English and American iron, we know that the American iron is always preferred, as to the its quality. The English is only used in small vessels of 70 tons and under; while in larger vessels the American iron, at 20 per cent. higher price, is universally preferred.

*This refers to a report of a committee of the senate made at the previous session adverse to the memorialists.

†The proof required by government for 1½ inch round iron is 25 tons; for 1-8 inch round iron 16 tons.

As to the "superior manner in which it is prepared in all the various forms required, we would reply—that the rolling mills in this country make all the sizes required quite as handsome, and far better in quality, than the English.

Lastly, with respect to its "superiority for wheel tires,"—the experience and information of the memorialists is in direct opposition to ours; nor can we conceive how persons would continue, for years, to purchase Swedish and American iron for that purpose as they do, at 25 per cent. higher price—if the English was superior. It is, without question, the poorest iron for that use that can be purchased, and is only used on account of its low price; which, instead of being $5 per cwt. we sell by the single ton at 25 per cent. less, viz: $3 75 per cwt.

2nd. The second head of the memorial speaks of the manner of making iron in England, which requires no answer.

3rd. Under this head the memorialists speak of the hardships of purchasing imported iron, of small size, at a high price—in consequence of the duty being 3½ cents per lb. on it. That difficulty is now in some measure removed, as one factory in New Jersey is prepared to supply the United States with a better article, and at less price, than it can be imported; and the rolling mills now erecting in different parts of the United States, will be able, from next spring, to furnish all the iron that pays a duty of 3½ cents per lb. at less price, and better quality, than it can be imported for.

The following statement will show the comparative price of common bar iron and ½ inch round in England, from 1806 to 1830.

Common bar iron, cost		½ inch round, cost
1806	£20 10 0	1806	£27 0 0
1809	14 0 0	1809	18 0 0
1815	11 0 0	1815	16 0 0
1822	8 0 0	1822	10 6
1830	6 0 0	1830	7 0 0

From the above it appears that the cost in England, as late as 1806, of common bar iron was £20 10— and at the same time the price of ½ inch round was £. 27, or £6 10 higher, which is a greater difference than is now made by our rolling mills; and we do not doubt but that the difference in price between bar iron and small round, made by our mills, will be reduced as the quantity made is increased, and our factories become more perfect, as has been the case in England. From 1806 to the present time, the price of iron in England has been gradually reduced in proportion to the increase of the rolling mills, perfection of machinery and skill of workmen. The present difference between bar iron and ½ inch round is but £1 per ton.

The quantity made in England in	1787	was	30,000 tons.
	1796	"	130,000 "
	1830	" nearly	700,000 "

4th. Requires no answer.

5th, 6th, 7th. Under these heads, the memorialists state that the present rate of duties on the raw material being so much higher than on the manufactured article, gives a decided monopoly to the manufacturers of hardware at Sheffield and Birmingham, that many articles can be imported at or under the present cost of bar iron—that they "have no other object in the relief they now pray for, than to enable them to bring their own industry into fair and equal competition with the foreign manufacturer." Here rests, the whole ground of complaint of the memorialists, viz: on the inequality between the duty on what they call the raw material and on the manufactured article. In order to substantiate the above they instance a number of articles of hardware, which they endeavor to show can be imported cheaper than the raw material itself. We will first examine their statements of the articles particularized, and endeavor to show that they do not prove the point they wish to establish, and then show the true proportion between the duties on hardware and on the raw material; and we think it will be made to appear, that the manufacturers of hardware, in this country, instead of being less, are protected to a much greater extent than those of iron—which, if proved, will show that the whole ground of their complaint is without foundation. The first articles they instance are hammers and sledges for blacksmiths, which they say "are imported at \$4 66 per cwt. which is 35½ cents below the cost of the bar iron in this market, exclusive of duty." We have imported hammers and sledges regularly for many years. The poorest article we ever heard of being sent to our market, cost $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb.—those we import are of a quality fit for use, and cost $8\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb. which is $\$9\ 25$ per cwt., while we sell English bar iron at retail, for $\$3\ 75$ —leaving a difference of $\$5\ 50$ per cwt. in favor of the manufacturer of these articles in this country. The next article they instance is wheel tire, which they say can be imported at less cost than bar iron. We have never known of its interfering with the sale of iron for that purpose. There has, indeed, been two lots of it imported into New York—but the house who had it, found a difficulty in selling it, and told us, to-day, that they would have no more.

The next article they advance is frying pans, and state that they are, and ever have been imported, at a less price than the cost of sheet iron, meaning to draw a comparison between the cost of iron in sheets and in its manufactured state. This comparison is evidently unfair, and calculated to deceive. Frying pans are not made of sheet iron only, but partly of sheet iron and partly of bar iron. We import the sheet iron part of frying pans, viz: the bowls, separate from the handles, and they cost, by an invoice dated January, 1831, 10 cents per lb. to import, while the sheet iron, in sheets, costs only 6 cents per lb. leaving a difference of 4 cents per lb. in favor of the sheet iron in a manufactured state. Frying pans, at the same time, cost 6 cents per lb. The next article presented by them is tea trays.—They state that tea trays, with one coat of japan, can be imported at $\$53\ 72$ per ton, while the iron required for the same purpose is selling at from 160 to 170 dollars per ton. We have imported tea trays for many years, and are totally unable to devise how this can be done. The largest tray ever imported, or, if imported would be used, is 30 by 22 inches; and the poorest article that we ever saw cost 52 cents each tray to import, and weighed 4 lbs. which is 13 cts. per lb. or $\$290$ per ton, instead of $\$53\ 72$, as stated by the memorialists. If tea trays were imported to cut up for stove doors, blowers, &c as stated in the memorial, the edges, which are turned up, must be cut off, or flattened to a plain surface. And unless the memorialists should be more successful than ourselves in an experiment made to ascertain whether it could be flattened out, as it was before it was made into a tray, that business would not amount to much. The smith into whose hands we put it, gave it its proper heat, and endeavored to flatten it under his hammer—but the edges burst and the iron cracked at the angles where it had been bent to form a rim; so we were convinced that the edges, or rims, must be cut off, which we had done for the sake of experiment, the weight of which was $1\frac{1}{4}$ lbs.—which, being only scrap iron, is not worth more than $\$25$ per ton, and this loss, added to the cost of the tray, would bring the iron imported in the shape of trays, suitable for other purposes, as follows—

One ton of trays as above, cost	$291 00
Loss in rims cut off, 37 per cent.	109 00
Labor in cutting, one cent per tray	6 60
	<hr/> 405 60
Deduct $7\frac{1}{4}$ cwt. scrap iron worth $\$25$ per ton	9 38
	<hr/> $396 22
Making the cost of sheet iron imported by this process, per ton,	<hr/> $396 22

The cost of importing sheet iron of the thickness of tea trays is $$135$ per ton, in stead of $$160$ to 170 —as stated in the memorial. We do not say that what the memorialists state is untrue—but we do know the above statement to be correct, and cannot conceive how it could be reduced to $$53\ 72$ per ton, when we make them to cost $$396$ per ton.

The memorialists next show that iron knitting needles can be imported, cheaper than wire No. 18. This is true, because there is so little labor in cutting wire into knitting needles. The amount of this article sold per annum, we think, may amount to $$200$ —two hundred dollars.

The memorialists next proceed to show that the duty on wrought nails precludes all possibility of competition between the domestic and foreign manufacturer. The fact about the nail making is, that the manufacture of nails (whether cut or wrought, it matters not) has been brought to such perfection in this country, that 40,000 tons are annually made here, while only 266 tons are imported.

The memorialists further state, that the duty on wire being high, operates against the manufacture of wire sieves and fenders. We think they are unhappy in their selection of these articles also, to prove their point—as from all the information we are able to collect, there are no wire sieves nor fenders imported into New York—but that market is supplied exclusively by the domestic labor.

The next article they bring forward is horse shoes—which they say can be imported at the price of bar iron, and have become an article of import. This might have been said for many years past, as attempts have been made, from time to time, to import them to advantage—but all experiments, within our knowledge, have failed. We ourselves made the attempt about three years since—but could not do it to a profit; and are perfectly willing that others should purchase experience at the same cost. Common English iron would not answer for horse shoes. We have imported best English iron in bars for that purpose—but never could get any good enough. The American and Swedish are exclusively used.

The last article they instance is hoops for coopers, bent and rivetted, ready for use—which, they say, can be imported cheaper than the hoop iron. This may be true, for aught we know; but we have never heard of any having been imported, yet are in the practice of importing and selling hoop iron; and if there had been any competition from that quarter, we think we should have known it. For our part, we do not feel disposed to enter into the import of finished hoops, and it appears that others in the trade have a similar indisposition. We leave the reader to judge whether on the few articles they have selected to show that the manufactured article can be imported cheaper than the raw material, they have proved the point, which, if they have proved, would establish the principle as to a few articles only, and not on hardware in general.

We now proceed to show the true relative proportion between the duties on hardware and on the raw material. The memorialists say that "the duty on iron is from 159 to 282 per cent. or from 6 to 11 times the duty on hardware." When they say the duty on iron is from 159 to 282 per cent. they speak in such general terms as to convey the idea that the duty on iron, generally, is that much. We will first show what is the average duty on imported iron.

The quantity of iron annually imported, as stated by the memorialists, is as follows:

	Tons.	Duty per ton.	Total duty paid.	For 5 years past cost per ton, including duty.	Total cost including duty.
Swedish and Russian	29,486	$22 40	$660,486	95 00	2,801,170
English bar iron	3,332½	37 00	123,302	75 00	249,938
Sheet, rods, &c.	1,108	78 40	91,571	130 00	151,840
	33,986		$875,359		$3,202,948

By the above statement it appears that the average duty on all the iron annually imported, is less than $26 per ton.

The following statement shows the annual consumption of iron in this country, as per report made to the convention of manufacturers of iron, lately held in Philadelphia.

In 1830 there was made at 202 furnaces	155,348
Of which was made into castings	28,273
Tons	127,075
Which rendered into bars, at 28 cwt. per ton, would yield	90,768
There was made of bloomed iron	5,853
Total bar iron made annually in the United States	96,621
Add the quantity imported	33,986
Annual consumption of bar iron, in the United States	130,007
Besides what is made from the blast furnaces into castings	28,273
Iron consumed in the United States annually	158,280

Though the duty on a small portion of the iron imported is high, yet, as we have shown that the average duty is less than $26 per ton—while the proportion of the iron imported that pays $37 per ton duty is less than one-seventh of the total imports, though it sells at 20 per cent. less than any other iron, and that part which pays a duty of $78 40 is only one-thirtieth of the entire importation.

But when we compare the quantity of iron consumed in this country that pays a duty of $37 or $78 40 per ton with the total consumption of bar iron, to say nothing about iron made into castings—it sinks into insignificance. The proportion of that paying $37 duty being only 1-39th part, while that paying a duty of $78 40 is only 1-112th part: to which if we add the iron made from the blast furnaces into castings, it will sink still lower.

In order to ascertain the actual duty paid per ton on iron, in the shape of hardware, we have taken an account of all our imports of hardware from June to November this year, as well as those of another hardware house for the same time, viz. Messrs. Hyers:—the result is as follows—cost sig.	tons and parts.	duty paid.	duty per ton.

G. & W. imports	£4,314	59 15 1 6	$6,180 24	$103 40
Heyers	5,710	69 19 1 4	7,112 02	104 50

The approximation of the duties paid per ton, by the Messrs. Heyers and ourselves, renders it certain that the above is as correct a view of the average duty paid on hardware as could be obtained*—from which we draw the following results:

There was imported of hardware in 1828--9 $3,346,146

The duty upon which, estimated as paid in the two importations above mentioned, is 30 per cent. 1,003,843

The weight of which, taking the two imports above stated as the data, was 9,763 tons.

If the American manufacturer of hardware had his iron at the average rate duty paid on iron, it would have been, on 9,763 tons, at $26 per ton 255,848

And he would have received a clear protection of $749,995

That is, the importer of the manufactured article would have had to pay four times as much duty as the manufacturer who imported the raw material and worked it up here—or, if the manufacturer of hardware had imported his iron, and paid the duty as on English iron, of $37 per ton, as calculated by the memorialists, he would have paid $361,231

And received a clear protection of $642,612

That is, the importer of the manufactured article would have had to pay nearly three times as much as the importer of the raw material, who worked it up here.

From the above statement of facts, the reader can judge how much weight should be given to what the memorialists say, as to the exclusive protection given to the raw material over the manufactured article.

8th. Under this head the memorialists recommend that pig iron should be admitted free of duty. They exhibit a calculation, to show that if pig iron was admitted free, that bar iron could be made here at $40 per ton. We will examine the correctness of these statements upon their own ground. We imported a parcel of pigs from England about the time the memorial was written, and so have the expenses of importation, which are as follows: There are two iron districts in England—Wales and Staffordshire; we will take the price of a ton of pigs in Wales, as it is less there, and more favorable to the memorialists.

Cost of 1 ton pigs in Wales	£3 5 0
Freight and insurance to Liverpool	0 8 0
Charges at Liverpool	0 1 8
Export duty	0 0 4
2½ per commissions for purchasing	0 1 9
	3 16 9
Exchange, insurance, 8½ per cent.	0 6 6
Freight to New York	0 10 0
	£4 13 3

* It included every article usually imported, subject to specific as well as ad valorem duty, anvils, &c. &c. No part could probably be a more fair specimen of the whole imported.

	£4 13s. 3d. is $20 70
Cartage in New York to store	30
Merchant's commission and storage 5½ per cent.	1 05
Transportation to nearest works	3 00
	25 25
28 cwt. to make 1 ton bar iron	10 11
	35 36
Cost of pigs to make 1 ton bars	10 00
200 bushels of charcoal to convert pigs into blooms, at 5 cents	7 00
Labor on do.	8 85
175 bushels of charcoal to convert blooms into bars	6
Labor on do.	3 00
Re-transportation to market	2 00
Water privileges, dam, and overseeing
	$71 21

Cost of bar iron made of imported pigs, free of duty, and this the memorialists say could be made for $40 per ton, and if puddled, less. We have shown that it could not be done for any thing like the money with charcoal; neither could it be puddled, as we know by experience. The consequence of a repeal of the duty on pig iron would be, not that we could make bar iron here at $40 per ton, but it would cost us $71 21, which is more than we now pay for iron imported from England, made of the same material, and, in doing so, would destroy all the furnaces within the influence of the imported pig iron.

That pig iron could be imported, free of duty, cheaper than we can make it in this country with charcoal, is without question; but suppose it to be admitted free, what would be the consequence? From these pigs we could either make an iron that would suit our wants, or we could not. If it were good enough for general use, all the furnaces within the reach of its influence must stop, of course, because they would be undersold, the selling price of American pigs being from $28 to 40. If it would not make a better article than we now import from England made of the same pig iron, we should not want more than we now take; for if the quality was adapted to our wants we would consume it now, its price being a sufficient inducement. By granting the prayers of the memorialists to admit pig, boiler, scrap, blooms, &c. free, and bar iron 25 per cent. ad val. duty, it is manifest that we must either substitute an inferior article of English iron in place of that made in this country; or, if we can make a better article from the pigs than they do, we will cause a considerable portion of our furnaces to stop, which would destroy more capital and throw out of employ more individuals than would be employed in manufacturing hardware, in very many years.

By granting the fourth, you would destroy those manufacturers of wire who have commenced since the tariff of 1823, in the faith of the government; one of whom told us that he can make this year wire enough to supply the United States, and sell it at a less price than it can be imported.

By granting the last, you would cut off all inducements to the manufacture of steel, which we think (and we have given the subject some investigation with a view to manufacture), can and will be successfully accomplished. Lastly, what would be the state of our country in case we had to depend upon a foreign supply for so necessary an article as iron, and especially when our main dependence would be upon England, who, in time of war, could blockade our ports, stop supplies, and cause greater evils than the nation we think is willing to expose itself to?

From the preceding statements it is manifest, that the quantity of iron manufactured in this country is not inconsiderable, as the memorialists call it— but is about four times as much as is imported in any shape, which is more than is made in any other country excepting England, more than 2½ times as much as is exported from Sweden, and as much as was made in England at the beginning of this century.

The amount annually manufactured in the United States is	tons 158,280
While the amount imported in bars, &c. is	33,968
Imported in hardware	9,763
	43,731

The value of American iron, as per report of the committee on the subject of iron appointed by the convention lately held in Philadelphia, is $11,444,419

While the value of that imported in bars, &c. including the duty is $3,202,948

Value of the iron in 9,763 tons, imported in the shape of hardware, estimated at the same rate as the above 678,670

From which it appears that the total quantity of iron imported in every shape, is about 1-4 of what is made here, and its value about 1-3

It is incumbent upon the memorialists to show whence we are to get a supply to meet the deficiency occasioned by the suspension of a large portion of our furnaces. For our part, we do not see how we could get a supply, unless we could make a better article out of English pigs, than they send to this country. Any one who is acquainted with the situation of Russia, with respect to the quantity we could get from thence, and the practicability, under the existing state of society and civil government, would think an increase of 10,000 tons a large calculation. Sweden exports only 50,000 tons per annum, that being the total quantity the law allows to be made for foreign consumption, as each factory is confined to a certain quantity in proportion to the wood land owned; and the wood land that is proximate enough to be used for iron making, has been brought into use for that purpose long since. Of that 50,000 tons we take 20,000, and a considerable portion of the remainder, say 10,000 tons (including the steel iron which the English monopolise), goes to England; the remaining 20,000 tons goes to the continent; so that we cannot get much more from thence without paying more for it than others can pay. But suppose we can get from Sweden an increased supply of 15,000 tons; there remains unsupplied yet upwards of 71,000 tons, which the memorialists will please inform us where to obtain, unless the price should advance enough to enable our own manufactories to go into operation again? In which case the proposed change would be of no avail.

We will conclude with showing the comparative value to the country of the present manufacture of iron and of hardware. If we should make all the hardware we consume and import the iron for it, as proposed by memorialists.

Made in the United States 158,230 tons iron value $11,440,410

Total amount of hardware imported, value 3,346,146

The value of the 9,763 tons iron to be imported to make this hardware, would be, free duty $90,520

2,955,626

They would, therefore, nearly destroy the manufacture of an article valued at $11,440,410 to establish one valued at 2,955,626, even if we allow that all the hardware now consumed could be made in the United States.

We think we have proven in the foregoing statements—

1st. That the quality of English iron, instead of being good as the memorialists represent, is the worst iron in use.

2d. That the duty on iron in bars, &c. instead of being from 6 to 11 times higher than the duty on iron imported in the shape of hardware, as stated by the memorialists, is but 1-4 as high, inasmuch the average duty paid on iron in bars, rods, sheets, &c. is $26, and that imported in the shape of hardware is $104 per ton.

3rd. That the quantity and value of iron, actually manufactured in this country, is not insignificant in amount, as there is made here per annum 158,000 tons $11,440,410 While that imported in the shape of bars and hardware is 43,731 tons, value, including the duty 3,881,618

And of course the statement made by the memorialists is not true, that there is only made in the United States 35,000 tons, and imported 81,000 tons.

4th. That by granting the prayer of the memorialists you would almost annihilate the manufacture of an article which has grown up under a protection to the value of $11,440,410, to establish one of $2,955,626. Yours respectfully,

GREEN & WETMORE.

STATEMENT G.

New York, October 31st, 1831.

B. B. HOWELL, ESQ.

Dear sir—In conformity with your request I herewith give you a statement of the iron produced in Litchfield county, Connecticut, with the manufactures of iron and steel, in said county; to which I have added the other productions of the county, as estimated by the delegates to the convention from that county. It may not be perfectly accurate, as a portion of it is founded upon conjecture; but the total will rather fall short of than overrun the true amount, as a very considerable list of articles, each of small comparative value, are entirely omitted.

I am, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN M. HOLLEY.

STATEMENT H.

MANUFACTURES OF DELAWARE COUNTY,* PENNSYLVANIA.

To the delegates to the convention to be held at New York—

The committee appointed, in pursuance of a resolution adopted at a meeting of citizens of Delaware county, convened agreeably to public notice, in Chester, on the 17th inst. "to ascertain the number and extent of the different manufacturing establishments in the county; the quantity of manufactures produced; the quantity of raw material consumed; the number of hands employed," &c. &c. Report—That, from the short time to which they were necessarily limited, they have been unable to collect that full and complete information on the subjects committed to them which the importance of these interests require. But referring the delegates for more minute details of the distribution of our manufacturing and mechanical industry, to a printed report (a copy of which is enclosed), taken by Benjamin Pearson, esq. under the direction of a committee appointed for the purpose in 1826, your committee offer the following statement, made up of such details as they have been able to procure, in addition to their personal knowledge of facts, and they believe it will prove in the aggregate not far from correct.

JOHN P. CROZER, Chairman.

October 22, 1831.

STATEMENT I.

REPORT ON STEEL.

On the subject of steel, your committee reports, that, as no preparation whatever had been made for collecting information antecedent to this convention in New York, they are not able to supply it from any other source than what is attainable in this city. They have no time left for collecting and collating tabular statements, or statistical reports, of the quantity of steel imported, and manufactured in this country; nevertheless, enough information has been acquired in the course of a day, to satisfy the committee, that the article in question is one that requires the continued protection of government. The committee assume the principle, that, if steel can be manufactured now, or within a few years, to supply the wants of our own citizens at a reasonable price, it cannot be an object towards which the legislature will be indifferent, and it is deemed expedient that even the limited information now produced, should be disclosed, in order to encourage reflection and secure that consideration which the article of steel unquestionably merits.

Without seeking further, the members of your committee are enabled, from their recollection, to enumerate fourteen steel furnaces in the following places, viz.

Pittsburg 2; Baltimore 1; Philadelphia 3; New York 3; York county, Pa. 1; Troy 1 New Jersey 2; Boston 1.

These furnaces are known to be now in operation, and of a capacity sufficient to supply more than 1600 tons of steel, annually;† an amount equal to the whole importation of steel of every kind. But it should be observed that steel for common agricultural purposes, is not the best, although it is most used; and that American is quite equal to English steel, used for such purposes in England. American competition has excluded the British common blister steel altogether. The price of blister steel is less than it was before 1828, and probably as low as it ever will be:—certainly as low as it ought to be, having a just consideration for the manufacturer and his customer. The only steel now imported from Great Britain is of a different and better quality than that just mentioned. It has been the laudable pride of American legislation to advance with the increasing enterprise of the people, and to encourage discoveries of those mineral treasures, towards which that enterprise might be profitably directed. The committee having shown the result of such countenance from government in the instance of common blister steel, may be allowed, to anticipate the effects of its continuance; and that protection will be hereafter acknowledged as the parent of perfection.

*Including families.

† Mr. Coates has subsequently requested the chairman of the permanent committee to add the following note:

This calculation is believed to fall far short of the quantity of steel made in the United States. It appears that the 14 furnaces have only one batch, or blast, in a month—whereas two weeks are sufficient for conversion of iron into steel.

Steel imported here from all parts of the world, except England, (although the German steel is freely employed in some branches of manufactures) amounts, to so inconsiderable a quantity that the competition for ascendancy in our own market must rest between that nation and this. We already supply ourselves to her exclusion, with common steel, and to give some idea how extensively it effects our manufactures, the committee will state two or three striking facts. The iron of this country, when properly made, has been found equal in quality to the Russian and Swedish iron used in England for conversion into steel, and being so converted, is employed in making large and rough implements of manufacture and agriculture. It is used in the fabrication of plough shares; it is worked up by shovel makers, among whom one in Philadelphia uses more than fifty tons a year. Scythe makers are among the best customers of a steel furnace, and cross-cut and mill saw makers use more than any other manufacturers. One factory of this kind in Philadelphia, requires a ton and a half of steel per diem, for every working day of the year. These isolated instances may give some idea of the vast consumption of steel in the numerous factories of the United States, and for this purpose alone they are stated.

The English however, continue to supply us with the superior qualities. These are

1st. Blister steel, from iron of the Danamoura mines in Sweden.

2d. Sheer steel, of the same origin.

3d. Cast steel.

As to the first, being the best quality of blister steel. A house in Hull monopolises all the iron made from Danamoura ore, under a contract by which the parties in Sweden are to forfeit 10,000*l.* sterling, if they sell to any body else—so that no other European country can furnish a good file without resorting to England for the steel that is made of Danamoura iron; this excelling all others in Europe for files and many other instruments. The British manufacturers, aware of the advantages of their monopoly, continue to exact the same price for their steel delivered in America, that they did before the duty on the Swedish iron was reduced in England from 28 88 to 56 66 per ton—thus proving that an article whose low duty approaches nearest to no duty, (almost “free trade”) is charged to this country at a rate no less than before the reduction of duty took place in England.

It is, however, a cause for congratulation here, that iron of similar or equal quality to that which has thrown all the advantages of manufacturing the best articles of cutlery into British hands, has been made recently by improved processes from the ore of Juniata, and both sides of the line between New York and Connecticut. The latter denominated the Ancrum, the Livingston and the Salisbury ore. Steel is now made at Pittsburgh, and may be made in New York and Connecticut, bearing a fair comparison with the best good L (L) or Danamoura steel, that comes from England. No difference is observed where trials have been made without disclosing to the judges the origin of either. Two establishments, one in New York, and another in Pittsburgh, have justified this statement, and encouraged a hope that the products of our own mines, smelted by means of modern improvements in the construction of furnaces and application of the blast, and elaborated by machinery lately introduced, will rival the best quality of steel that England can furnish.

The second kind of first quality British steel is called “sheer steel.” This is nothing more than blister steel drawn under a tilt-hammer into bars of the various sizes used in the fabrication of some articles of cutlery, and the finer kinds of edge tools. England has hitherto monopolised this branch also, from being in possession of the only European steel that would bear the expense of preparation; and from the perfection of her machinery. She has now the honor of transferring a portion of her experience and skill to the United States. Her workmen in steel, wanting employment or adequate recompense for labor at home, continually seek them among us; and it is believed that these may be afforded to such an extent as to yield them support commensurate with their industry—and that ingenious men, who, under other circumstances might have been compelled to pursuits not congenial with their education, or to be dependents upon public bounty, will become useful citizens, instead of idlers and beggars in the land.

The third kind of steel, best quality, is called “cast steel,” and this is made from the best blister steel, only. There is none made in the United States. Several attempts to make it with profit, have proved unfortunate.

The causes of failure were—

First—The want of best quality blister steel (of which only it can be made), at a reasonable price.

Second—The want, or expense, of crucibles of proper quality, wherein the blister-steel is to be melted and smelted.

The first difficulty may be surmounted by the discovery that iron, well made from the ores of Juniata, New York and Connecticut, may be converted to the best blister-steel: and the second difficulty is believed to be at an end, since the explorations of the present year have disclosed the existence of clay analogous to that of Stroubridge, which is considered the best in the world for crucibles. Centre, Clearfield and Lycoming counties, (Pennsylvania), have yielded large specimens of clay that satisfy geologists, mineralogists and chemists, of the identity of its properties with those of Stroubridge. Clay, in the vicinity of Baltimore, has been successfully employed in the manufacture of fire brick, and may probably be used for the manufacture of crucibles for cast steel, if properly prepared. The great impediments to the making of cast steel has not arisen from any mystery in the art, but the want of strength in the crucibles. Black lead, and a variety of clays, have been tried, but the weakness of these materials have hitherto caused a loss to the manufacturer, because the crucibles made of them would not bear moving when the melted metal was in them, (generally about 28 lbs.) The Stroubridge was the only kind of clay that possessed the requisite qualities of preserving its shape and soundness when exposed to the greatest heat, and its strength and tenacity when moved for the purpose of discharging the melted metal. Capital, enterprise and perseverance will be engaged to bring this desirable material, so indispensable to the finer arts of cutlery and machinery, into market—if protection be continued to the efforts which our citizens are willing to make.

If these views are correct—we have steel for agricultural purposes in the greatest abundance:—We have steel, (sheer steel), for nicer purposes, and we may cast steel for the most refined articles of manufacture, among ourselves. But this is not all, we may export our steel to Russia, Prussia and France, in competition with England herself; and thus justify the further importation of foreign commodities which we can have the means of paying for. The subject of steel becomes more interesting as our investigation of it advances; but it is believed that the facts and inferences now set forth, will suffice to continue the protection already granted, and to procure time for more extensive practical developement, which, if realized, will add to the means of domestic employment and beneficial intercourse with foreign nations.

[The preceding report on steel was presented by Mr. John R. Coates, of Philadelphia, to whom this branch of the subject had been specially referred, for a collection and arrangement of the facts; as was that on iron, proper, to Mr. B. B. Howell, of New York, by the general committee on the manufactures of iron.]

FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.

The committee, to whom was referred, the resolution "to inquire and report upon any evasion of the existing revenue laws,"

RESPECTFULLY REPORT:

That, in attending to that duty, they have found a difficulty in obtaining as complete a statement of facts, as it is desirable to present. Full and satisfactory evidence, has, however, been produced, to satisfy their minds of the existence of extensive frauds; but from the nature of the subject entrusted to them, few facilities were afforded to substantiate, at this time, by direct testimony, all the various devices which are resorted to for the purposes of evading the payment of the full amount of duties established by law. On application, by letter, addressed to the appraisers in this city, by your committee, for such evidence as they possessed,—these officers refused to furnish it, except under instructions from the secretary of the treasury:—but their application to the collector met with more favor, their inquiries having been promptly and satisfactorily replied to by that officer.

The principal evasions of the revenue laws have been made in the importation of broad cloths. By the law of 1828, every yard of imported woollen cloth, six quarters wide, costing six shillings and nine pence, sterling, may be legally entered at the dollar minimum. Every yard 6-4 wide, costing more than 6s. 9d. sterling, and not exceeding 16s. 10d. must, in conformity to that act, be entered at the two dollars and fifty cents minimum. In the first case the duty is 67½ cents per running yard—in the second case the duty is $1 67½ cents. This part of the law is thus particularly stated, in order to show the manner in which it is evaded. The law of 1830, passed expressly for the purpose of enforcing that of 1828, has hitherto but partially effected that object; it has been the means of developing the extent of the evil, rather than of arresting it.

This has been owing, in some degree, to the American opponents of the protective system—who have endeavoured to render that law as odious as possible; in which they have received material aid from those foreigners who are extensively engaged in importing—and from the agents of foreign manufacturers resident in this city. Some of the journals, opposed to protection, have also lent their aid to disparage the law; denying the existence of frauds, and thereby rendering the execution of it unpopular. Even some of the persons whose duty it was to enforce the law, joined in the cry that it was oppressive, and spoke openly of it as iniquitous and unjust.

Your committee are informed, and believe, that four-fifths of all the importations of dry goods into this port are on foreign account; and in the particular article of woollen cloths, seven-eighths of the whole amount are thus imported.

The value of the importations of broad cloths by four of these foreign agents, amounted, in the last twelve months, to one million and a half of dollars. Either from the force of public opinion, that no frauds existed, or from the ingenuity and management of those who committed them, but few frauds were discovered during the first year of the operation of the law of 1830. But little variation from the former practice of sending cloths to the public stores for appraisement, was adopted by the collector of this port. As formerly, and in general, only one package out of each invoice was sent for examination—which package, your committee believe, was properly examined; but singular as it may appear, that one package of cloths was generally invoiced at a price which made it liable to the duty on the two dollars and fifty cents minimum—at which price there was little or no inducement to defraud, since cloths, costing and entered under that minimum, are consumed in much smaller quantities, and because these must produce, on the average, five dollars per yard to pay cost of importation.

It is obvious from this circumstance, that the attempts at fraud were almost wholly confined to cloths at the lower, or one dollar minimum,—few of which were sent to the public stores for examination. To explain this more fully, it is important to state, that invoices were made up abroad to complete this mode of evading the examination of the cloths at the dollar minimum, by sending to the consignee, here, one case in each invoice of the higher priced cloths already named, or one that was fairly charged at 6s. 9d. and managing to have that alone selected as the one case out of the invoice to be sent to the public store, in compliance with the law and the practice above mentioned:—keeping back the other packages which, although invoiced at a price that would admit them to entry at the one dollar minimum, but which had actually cost from 20 to 50 per cent. higher, and ought to have paid duty on the two dollars and a half minimum. Thus it has been ascertained, that, in six months immediately preceding the first of April last, one foreign concern entered, at the custom house in this port, more than four thousand pieces, or about eighty thousand yards of broad cloths, which, with the exception of about three hundred pieces, were entered at a value, per invoice, not exceeding 6s. 9d. sterling, and those, for want of a thorough examination, were allowed to be entered at the one dollar minimum. These cloths produced, in this market, from three dollars and a quarter to four dollars and a quarter, per yard; while cloths, honestly invoiced and legally entered at the one dollar minimum, it is well known, did not bring more than from two dollars seven-fifths cents, to three dollars per yard—thus satisfying your committee that the government must have been defrauded of more than thirty thousand dollars on these importations;—and proving that the cloths which were sold at from three and a quarter to four and a quarter dollars per yard, were fraudulently introduced into the country: unless we are willing to admit the absurdity, that this market was kept fully supplied with cloths during a whole season, either at an enormous loss to the importer, or else at an extravagant profit, varying from thirty to seventy-five per cent.

Your committee are the better satisfied of the fact that these cloths were fraudulently entered, from the knowledge they have obtained, that, as soon as they were put into the possession of the parties entering them, all the marks and numbers by which they might be identified, were generally removed. In a late instance, a number of pieces of cloths were seized in an auction store in this city, under information given to the collector that they had been falsely entered; and when they were examined, it was found that the original marks and numbers, by which they might have been identified, had been taken off and others substituted. What the object of such practices are, your committee leave the public to judge. In further proof of this allegation, the collector of this port, being fully convinced that these modes of evading the revenue laws were carried on to a great extent, and being urged to adopt, as the only method of correcting the evil, the examination of entire invoices, has, during the last five or six months, caused all the cloths invoiced and attempted to be passed at the dollar minimum, to be sent to the public stores for examination:—the result of which has been, that about three thousand pieces of these cloths have been adjudged by the appraisers to have been undervalued, and to have cost from 7s. 6d. to 8s. sterling; consequently rendering them liable to the duty on the two dollars and a half minimum:—and, extraordinary as the fact is, in all but a few cases, the importers, after detection, have been permitted to enter their goods on paying only the duty under the advanced minimum, instead of being subjected to forfeiture, according to law.

One house, alone, has paid about fifteen thousand dollars additional duties on cloths thus put up; others five and six thousand dollars,—others smaller amounts; and only the very trifling and inconsiderable amount of about a dozen packages, during the past year, has been libelled,—and but one adjudicated on, which was condemned. Your committee feel themselves bound to express, in the strongest terms, their disapprobation of such an execution of the laws. Can stronger evidence be adduced of the intent to defraud the revenue by such importers, than the fact, that they will do pay, when so detected, one dollar and sixty-seven and a half cents the running yard duty on cloths, which they have just sworn that the cost in England entitled to entry at 67½ cents per yard?

Your committee not only believe the intent to defraud the revenue is thus apparent—but they are further convinced, that ~~revenue~~ is thus frequently committed with the greatest impunity!

Your committee take the liberty of pursuing this particular subject a little further. The investigations made have convinced them, that, notwithstanding the quantity of cloths thus found undervalued by the appraisers and put up by them, to the next highest minimum was very great; yet many hundreds, if not thousands of pieces have been allowed to pass as correct, in consequence of the standard of value, at the custom house, of the dollar minimum cloths being from 6d. to 2s. sterling per yard, below the value of said cloths, in the market from whence they came. This has been (as your committee believe), one of the principal causes why the collector has preferred the course of enforcing the payment of the extra duty of one dollar the yard, rather than libelling, and taking the risk of condemnation, when the appraisers had only estimated them at 6d. or 1s sterling undercharged;—although, in fact, from 2s. to 4s. sterling undercharged; and had they been so put up, by the appraisers, the intent to defraud would have been so manifest that there could have been no hesitation, on the part of the collector, to libel; but as, in most instances, they were only raised a few pence, the intent to defraud was less visible, and might not, in his opinion, be sufficient to be relied on for condemnation.

Among the evidences that have produced conviction on the minds of your committee, that the statements above made are true, the following are submitted:

In May last, two of your committee, with one of the most extensive American importing merchants, made application to the collector of the port, to be shown any cloths that were then in the public stores, that had been stopped by the appraisers as undervalued—he promptly and politely acceded to their request, and accompanied them to the stores where a number of bales were shown to them, and they examined five or six, which they estimated to have cost as follows:

1	package	7s. 9d.	to	10s.
1	"	8s.	"	10s. 6d.
1	"	9s.	"	9s. 6d.
2	"	10s.	"	10s. 6d.

Supposing that, as the appraisers are bound by law to estimate the value of the cloths in each package, by the best piece in it, and as the whole were much above the standard of the dollar minimum cloths, or 6s. 9d. and the best pieces full fifty per cent. higher, they took it for granted that all would be libelled and condemned. It has, however, now come to the knowledge of your committee, that none of them were libelled (although all of them were marked up, as they were estimated by the appraisers to have cost but 7s. 6d. except one which was estimated at 7s. 9d.) and the whole were permitted to be entered and the duties paid, under the two dollar and fifty cents minimum. Here is, certainly, a very strong case, proving the very low standard by which the appraisers must have been governed, it being from 2s. 6d. to 3s. per yard, (nearly fifty per cent), below the judgment of one of the most extensive American importers in the United States. The appraisers being bound by law to take the best piece in the package as the value of the whole; but there were two packages, in which there was but little variation of price, estimated as above at 10s. to 10s. 6d. the yard, which the appraisers only rated at 7s. 6d. to 7s. 9d.

Stronger presumptive evidence could not readily be adduced, that the prices affixed to the above named cloths by the appraisers, were much lower than their actual cost. It is not probable that the mere difference of 9d. sterling the yard, which brought them under the higher minimum and subjected them to the payment of one dollar the yard additional duty, would have been submitted to by all the consignees or owners, when they could have been returned to England, from whence they came (as has been permitted, though contrary to law), at a much less loss than to have paid the extra duty and sold them here—as 6s. 9d. cloth would pay cost and all expenses of importation, if it brought two dollars and seventy-five cents per yard; but a 7s. 6d. cloth (and only 9d. more cost), if entered according to law, must bring four dollars the yard to pay the cost and charges. That it would not bring any such price, by at least seventy-five cents the yard, is well known to all buyers;—the loss would therefore be seventy-five cents the yard.

If a cloth that cost in England 9s. to 10s. is only estimated by the appraisers at 7s. 6d., it is a fair, and in the opinion of your committee, a pretty conclusive evidence, that the cloths that really cost 7s. 6d. to 8s. and invoiced at 6s. 9d. would be allowed an entry at that price, without being detected; and that they have been, in hundreds of instances, there is not a shadow of doubt, or this market would not have been so liberally supplied with cloths selling at from three to three and a half dollars per yard.

Your committee deem it important to state further, that, in their opinion, the greater part of the cloths which have been raised by the appraisers from about 6s. 9d. the dollar minimum, to from 7s. 6d. to 8s. have subsequently been allowed an entry by the officers of the revenue, at the two dollars and a half minimum, have been admitted to entry in direct violation of the law of 1830.

This opinion seems fully confirmed by the circumstance, that, although this mode of raising the valuation of them was allowed by the law of 1823, that law subjected the cloths to fifty per cent. additional duty, while the law of 1830, in doing away this provision of the law of 1823, evidently substitutes seizure and confiscation in case fraud shall be detected. It is evident that so long as the practice prevails of only marking up goods that are found undervalued, the greatest possible inducements are held out to attempt frauds; since, in case of discovery, the party attempting fraud is not placed in a worse situation, after being detected, than he would have been in, had he honestly complied with the law. In either case, he would only pay the duty to which cloths are lawfully subjected. While this laxity in the admininistration of the law prevails, attempts will be continued to evade it.

That the evil now exists is established by the fact that, of the numerous cases in which attempts to enter goods at an under valuation have been detected by the appraisers, but in a few instances, as before remarked, have the goods been labelled; and, in but one instance, have the penalties of the law, by forfeiture been enforced.

While the statements already made by your committee, prove the great cause they have to complain of the manner in which the revenue laws have been administered, another cause of complaint arises from the established mode of computing the rate of duty. By instructions from the treasury department issued to collectors, immediately after the tariff law of 1828 went into operation, the duties which by that act were required to be assessed on woollen goods were diminished, and the practice of charging a less amount of duty than is required by law, has been continued to the present day. In the attempt to find analogy between those sections of the law which impose duties on cotton cloths, the secretary of the treasury gave what your committee deem an erroneous construction to the law.

The terms of the law are explicit, and require the collection of forty-five per centum ad valorem on the several minimum valuations which it establishes, and it goes on further to state, that, on all ad valorem duties, 10 per cent. additional shall be added thereto, if the importations are on this side the Cape of Good Hope, and twenty per cent. additional if beyond it. But the practice has been, under this false construction of the law, to omit this addition of ten or twenty per cent. intended to be levied, thus abandoning the ad valorem principle, as relates to woollen goods, whilst adhering to the principle on the raw material, wool. As the duties are now levied, wool pays sixty-five per cent., and cloths forty-five.

The late secretary of the treasury, not being satisfied with the construction which had been given to the law by his immediate predecessor in office, as related to the ten per cent., made a report to congress in which he suggested the propriety of a declaratory act on the subject, by that body.—The committee do not perceive the necessity of legislative instruction on this point, as the secretary of the treasury is bound to administer the law according to the meaning of the terms in which it is expressed. The evil of the present construction of the law is so great, and, in the opinion of your committee, the construction given so erroneous, that they cannot but hope that the interpretation which to them seems correct, may also soon be adopted by the present secretary of the treasury.

In respect to frauds on the importations of silk goods, a description of merchandise of small bulk, extensive variety and great value, according to the statements made to your committee by respectable American importers, great evasions of the revenue laws have also taken place; but as the prices of the various fabrics of silk, so essentially depend on the peculiar diversities of fashion and manufacture, it is more difficult to ascertain the actual cost, or market value, of such fabrics in foreign markets, than of any other of the staple imports of the country.

From the collector, as well as many other highly respectable individuals of this city, your committee are informed of numerous and extensive evasions of the revenue laws in the importation of iron. By a trifling variation in the form of the imported article, or under the names of scrap iron, railing, palisading, &c. large quantities of iron have been introduced, which paid a duty of only eight or ten dollars per ton, when the duty, as it has been stated, would have been as high as from thirty-seven to seventy-eight dollars per ton, if it were imported under the proper names of rolled or hammered iron, braziers' rods, &c.

It has appeared to your committee, that a public inquiry, by order of congress, into the mode of administering the revenue laws at the different custom houses, would afford such information as to lead to the enforcement and better execution of the laws. No seaport of this country has afforded so favorable an opportunity for executing fraudulent designs as the city of New York, where from twenty to thirty ships, from foreign ports, frequently arrive in the course of one week, and greater expedition is demanded in their unloading, and passing their entries through the custom house, than is consistent (as at present organized), with the just and careful execution of the revenue laws. Many entries, your committee believe, are made out with fraudulent intent, and the amounts carried out designedly wrong, in the expectation that in the hurry in which they are passed, they may escape detection.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

PETER H. SCHENCK, chairman.

New York, November, 1831.

The committee on frauds consisted of Messrs. P. H. Schenck, E. Elsworth, and J. B. Murray, of New York; J. B. Brown, of Boston; Z. Allen, of Providence; L. Waln and B. Reeves, of Philadelphia, and J. T. Barr, of Baltimore.

MANUFACTURE OF HATS.

Mr. Crolius from the committee appointed "on the subject of the manufacture of hats, and the materials used in the production of the same"—

REPORTED:

That, although the committee had been able in so short a time, to collect all the materials which so extended a branch of manufacture requires that its importance may be made manifest to this convention and the people of the United States, they ask leave to present the following summary views, which, they are entirely satisfied from the testimony before them, are within the amount of production and employment caused by this manufacture.

The home consumption of hats made in the United States, is per annum, equal to	$10,000,000
Exported	500,000
	<hr/>
	$10,500,000

Say, ten millions five hundred thousand dollars, as the annual value of the manufacture of hats.

And, on the information of practical men, extensively engaged in this business, they have reached the conclusion, that eighteen thousand persons are directly employed in this business, viz:—

15,000 men and boys,
3,000 women.

18,000

Who receive, in money, paid for their labor, the sum of four millions, two hundred thousand dollars a year—4,200,000.

The materials used in the manufacture of hats consist of wool, of various qualities, and of furs, which are of domestic and foreign production; also gums shellac and seed lac, glue, sulphuric and nitric acids, coppers, verdigris and dye woods—with trimmings of leather, cloth and silk, of foreign or domestic manufacture.

It is now about thirty years since the first duty was laid on imported hats; and since that time, (that the domestic manufacture might be encouraged and thereby established), the original duty has been considerably increased, by which American hatters were first enabled to make a stand against foreign manufacturers, and finally to drive them out of the market, by furnishing better and cheaper hats than the people of the United States had been supplied with, before an adequate protection was afforded in the duty levied on hats; the exports of which now make a handsome item in the treasury statements. A foreign hat is rarely seen in our country, except in the use of persons just arrived from foreign places, because of the imposing fact, that American hats, regard being had to their quality, are manufactured at a less price than must be paid for them elsewhere. Such are the results of protection extended to the hatters of the United States, that it directly employs 18,000 persons, who earn in wages 4,200,000 dollars, or, at an average of nearly 240 dollars for every person, per annum—and subsists, in the whole, from 50 to 60,000 individuals; and all this, while the consumer receives a better article at a reduced price.

But, to guard against foreign speculators and excessive supplies of foreign hats, your committee consider it essential to the interests of American consumers as well as manufacturers of hats, that the present duty should be fully maintained. Though not very high in its amount, it is effective in its operation, and the consequences have been as just stated—the principle of which your committee believe is equally applicable to other important branches of domestic industry: But do away that protection, and the irregularity on the home market would throw thousands of hatters out of employment, who, with their families, are now comfortably subsisted by the labor of their hands.

The committee would in conclusion remark, that the duty on foreign wool (which is extensively used by them, certain kinds being much better fitted for the manufacture of hats than our own), is equal to 65 per cent. on its cost, while the duty on hats is only 30 per cent., and the excess duty on wool, so far as it goes, has an injurious effect; they therefore would suggest such increase of duty on hats, and especially on hat-bodies or hat-felts, made in whole or in part of wool, as may meet the duty imposed on the material used—which they believe would be advantageous to the American people in general. All which is respectfully submitted.

CLARKSON CROLIUS, chairman.

The manufacture of caps is also a very extensive and important interest in the United States. There is one factory at Albany which, in dressing and preparing furs and skins, and in the making of caps, employs about six hundred persons, on an average, throughout the year, and pays out 2,000 dollars in weekly wages, or 100,000 dollars per annum, for labor only. There are two or three other factories of such articles at Albany—and several in other places.

The whole value of the manufacture of hats and caps in the United States, (for men's wear) may be put down as equal to about $15,000,000—fifteen millions of dollars a year. [Permanent committee.

Key West is a new source for the production of salt. Ponds have been made, the production of which, in a year or two, will supply, if the expectations of the owners are not greatly disappointed, from five to eight hundred thousand bushels per year.

† From 1808 to 1815 inclusive, the foreign commerce of the United States was much interrupted by European orders and decrees, with our embargo and non-intercourse laws, and the war; and the prices in those years are not intended to come into an exact and fair comparison—though it was proper to state them. Early in 1815 the price at Baltimore was as high, for some time, as six dollars per bushel.

The importations of 1831 is estimated at about five and a half millions of bushels. By comparing the present price of salt, with a duty of 10 cents per bushel, it will clearly be seen, that the consumer was supplied with this important and necessary article of consumption, taking the years 1824 to 1830, at 50 cents, when the duty was 20 cents per bushel. By the prices current of the present year at a duty of 10 cents, the consumer will pay an advance of 20 per cent. See B. This establishes one plain fact, that instead of the reduction of the duty on salt, supplying the citizens of the United States at a lower rate, it has had the effect, from the vacillating policy of the government, to discourage the necessary exertions of those who are concerned in this important branch of American industry, which, of course, has produced the difference in price. Your committee think they hazard nothing in saying that if the duty on salt was entirely taken off, the price would increase in the ratio of the present year, to at least seventy-four cents per bushel, as in former years when no duty existed.

G.

As a source of revenue, and as an encouragement to the domestic manufacture, the first congress which assembled under our present constitution were induced, on the 20th July, 1789, to pass an act imposing a duty of six cents per bushel on salt imported into these United States. At the next session, 1790, it was increased to 12 cents per bushel.

These enactments operated as a bounty for individual enterprise. Not, however, in the estimation of congress, equal to the hazard of investment. In 1797, the duty on foreign salt was augmented to 20 cents per bushel. This proved insufficient to call forth the capital and enterprise of our citizens: necessity seemed to require that congress should act on every article that appeared to languish, under what was then called a protecting duty. Despairing of its ultimate success, on the 3rd March, 1807, salt was declared free of duty from and after 1st January, 1808. This continued until 1st January, 1814. During these years, as per appendix B. salt ranged from 50 to 100 cents per bushel higher than at any other period from or since the formation of the government, (the period of the war, excepted). It may be worthy of remark, that the same act which renewed the duty for the encouragement of our own manufactories of salt, gave the bounty or drawback on the fisheries. The war of a second independence brought forth the energies of the country, and, from the close of that struggle down to the repeal of the last act laying a duty on salt, it ranged lower than at any other period since the adoption of the constitution.

General Washington, in December 1796, used the following language—

"Ought our country to remain dependent on foreign supply, precarious because liable to be interrupted?"

Mr. Jefferson, in 1808—

"The suspension of our commerce, produced by the injustice of the belligerent powers and the consequent losses and sacrifices of our citizens, are subjects of just concern. The situation into which we have been forced, has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements, and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming, will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent.

In 1816 he wrote thus—

"That to be independent for the comforts of life we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist. The grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts, or go without them, at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures, must be for reducing us either to a dependence on that nation, or be clothed in skins and live like wild beasts in dens and caverns. I am proud to say I am not one of them."

Mr. Madison in 1809, says—

"That it is not unworthy of reflection, that the arbitrary edicts of contending nations, to obstruct our trade with them, have so far abridged our means of procuring the productions and manufactures of which our own is now taking the place."

In his message of 1815, he said—

"There is no subject which can enter with greater force into the deliberations of congress, than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence in the United States during the European wars."

See Mr. Monroe's message 1821—

Again 2d Dec. 1823:—"I recommend a review of the tariff, for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defence and independence of our country."

Your committee have no means of ascertaining the number of persons employed in the manufacture of salt. Judging, however, from the amount of capital as per schedule A, which is seven millions of dollars, the number must be very considerable. It is a remarkable fact, as far as comes to the knowledge of your committee, that in no one instance has the people petitioned congress for a repeal of the salt duty. They are satisfied with obtaining this article of necessity at the lowest possible price. All of which is respectfully submitted. M. BRUEN, chairman.

A delegate from the county of Kanawha, state of Virginia. New York, 31st Oct. 1831.

The Permanent Committee believe that some additional statements concerning the manufacture of salt, may be useful.

A petition to congress, on behalf of the manufacturers of salt, in the county of Kanawha, Virginia, signed Lewis Summers, Joel Shrewsbury, sen. Lewis Ruffner, James Bream, Joseph Lovell, A. Donnelly, and Isaac Noyes, dated 9th Jan. 1828, and published by order of the senate, Jan. 21, 1828—stated, among others, the following facts, which are briefly condensed, for common reference.

In the early settlements of the western country, salt was as high as $5 per bushel, and for several years it fluctuated from 2 to 3 dollars; but the works at Kanawha, being commenced, it fell to 1 dollar. And, even during the last war with Great Britain, such was the domestic competition, that it averaged less than 87½ cents—though selling at 5 or 6 dollars on the seaboard. In some instances, it rose to one dollar, (at the works) because of the great demand for the north-western army, and the operations of speculators—but increased production enabled the manufacturers to extend their supplies to new customers, and considerably checked a general increase in price. At that time 12,000 bushels were made weekly at Kanawha.

Since this period, the salt works in the western country have been much increased—and so great was the competition, and large the supply, that salt was sold as low as 15 or 20 cents per bushel, in casks ready for shipping, in 1825—and in 1826, even at 12½ cents. This necessarily caused a stoppage of many of the works. There were 61 wells, of a capacity to supply 100 furnaces, but only 56 were in operation. The average price of 1827 is stated to have been 24½ cents, and the actual cost of manufacturing, including barrelling, &c. 19½ cents. The salt made, was 787,000 bushels, employing 471 regular laborers, using 1,695,000 bushels of coal in the evaporation of 64,000,000 gallons of water. The capital employed was estimated at $548,000, and the agricultural products annually consumed by the working people valued at $47,600—using 24½ tons wrought iron and 108½ tons cast iron, and paying for mechanics' bills 7,950 dollars a year. We recite these particulars to shew how one branch of industry interlocks itself with others. And further, should be added the labor and cost of transportations, in making barrels,* and building wagons, boats, &c. employing many and various other persons. In this petition, the whole products of the salt works of the United States, for 1827, were estimated at 4,113,000 bushels—one half of which were in the western country. By the returns of the marshals in 1810, the quantity of home-made salt reported was 1,238,365 bushels, worth 1,149,725 dollars; or almost one dollar a bushel in that year, when there was no duty on salt.—See the table of average prices, marked B—and it will appear that the duty has not had any apparent effect on prices—nor do we believe that it has had any real one; for a brisk domestic competition acts against the foreign supply, and reduces cost to consumers, and so it has been in respect to every class of protected articles.

Of the 4,564,720 bushels imported in 1826 no less than 3,533,796 bushels were from Great Britain and her dependencies—2,554,549 from England, direct.

The petition above referred to, contains some powerful reasoning against the then apprehended reduction of the duty on salt; but the Permanent Committee believe that their present business is confined to the facts as stated; and do not wish to pass from them into argument just now.

On the 22d day of October 1830, the salt manufacturers of Kanawha again petitioned congress for a restoration of the duty on salt.† They estimated the capital vested in this manufacture at 6,964,958 dollars, and shewed the capacity of the United States to increase domestic supplies: they computed that 3,653 persons were directly employed in the business;‡ who, among a multitude of supplies from the

* 130,000 barrels, costing 32,000 dollars, were required.

† A law with a prospective effect having passed to reduce it.

‡ They, and their families were estimated at 14,612 persons—subsisted by the manufacture of salt:

farmer, required about 600 tons of iron annually. They state a fact of ordinary occurrence, though seldom sufficiently noticed by political economists and statesmen—that, on a failure of supplies from Kanawha, (which had kept down the prices at from 45 to 50 cents), foreign salt, at Cincinnati and Louisville, immediately advanced to 75 cents. But the extraordinary exertions of the Virginia manufacturers, (stimulated by the high price), soon brought it down again. They say that the protection given to domestic salt has not diminished the foreign trade in the article—as the tables shew. Its chief effect has been to reduce the price of salt; the diminished price being the loss of profit to foreign manufacturers. A large part of the salt brought to the United States is imported in lieu of ballast. The price of iron, salt or molasses, for example, has never risen, (unless for a moment) because of higher duties imposed—nor the price of molasses, salt or coffee permanently declined, because that the duties have been lessened. Practical results are decidedly against the theory, that duties must needs be "taxes." It is the force of the domestic competition, which settles that question; as is fully shewn in the report of the committee on the manufactures of iron; and other facts known to every man of business, who has examined the subject.

A memorial to congress from sundry inhabitants of Massachusetts, published by order of the house of representatives, Jan. 23, 1827, presents the following facts:

That, during the revolutionary war, salt was sold for three or four silver dollars per bushel—that after the war, the manufacture increased, until the duty was taken off; but the state of Massachusetts, (recollecting "revolutionary sufferings"), to aid the manufacturers, exempted the salt factories from taxation. In 1813, the duty of 20 cents per bushel being laid, the manufacture revived, and became extensive—great improvements being made in it, to save labor as well as advance the quality of the article. The water is pumped into vats from the ocean—and the vats are covered to avoid the effect of rains, or of dews, at night. In Barnstable county, only, there were then 15,000,000 feet of such vats, worth $1,300,000, and having more than 1,000 owners. The price of salt which had been as high as 60 cents, having fallen to 33 cents at the works, the competition between the domestic and foreign supply, in the language of the memorialists, became "severe"—and they asked congress "what good reason there could be for destroying their only manufacture?" &c.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

In the year ending Nov. 1828, 1,160,000 bushels of salt were made at Salina, Syracuse, Geddes and Liverpool, in the state of New York. This paid a revenue to the state of 12½ cents per bushel; and left a clear profit for the year of $138,620.

From March 1827, to June 1829, the monthly production of salt at Kanawha, was 75,000 bushels—inspected.

In 1829 the Kiskeminetias salt works in Pennsylvania, employed two hundred road wagons.

At the beginning of the year 1831, there were 17,545,760 square feet of salt works in Massachusetts.

The following brief notices of the salines on the Kanawha, as generally applicable to those west of the mountains, are interesting.

At the point where the salt factories are established, the Kanawha river is about 150 yards wide. The "salt region" extends 15 miles along the river, and the quantity of salt manufactured may be extended to an indefinite amount.

The salt water is obtained by boring through a great rock, to the depth of from 300 to 500 feet. Copper or tin tubes are introduced to keep out the fresh water, which lies above the salt,—and the latter rises as high as the surface of the adjoining river, though all communication with it is cut off. The salt water is then raised to the top of the bank of the river, about 40 feet, by forcing pumps, and conveyed to the furnaces, as required. Bituminous coal abounds on the spot, and is used for the purpose of evaporating the water. Some of the salt water thus obtained, is so strong that it will hold very little more salt in solution.

These works at present, employ about 600 men, as salt makers, coopers, boat-builders, &c. The average price of salt has hardly exceeded 30 or 35 cents per bushel, at them. By means of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, and other channels of cheap transportation, supplies of salt may be obtained from the west in future emergencies—such as happened in the last war.

The Kanawha salt is purer than the Liverpool.

The fishing business in the waters of the Chesapeake, failed last year, and there was some excitement, because of the stock of salt on hand, and its anticipated fall in price, on account of the reduced duty to take place on the 1st January last—but the salt in the hands of the fishermen rather made a profit than a loss, when the duty retired five cents a bushel! And now, (Dec. 9) we see, that though the duty will be only 10 cents on the 1st of next month, the price of Turks Island salt is six cents higher than it was in March 1830, when the duty was 20 cents, and 3 cents higher than when the duty was 15 cents, which duty will be only 10 cents, three weeks hence. There has been a small decline in the price of Liverpool salt, in sacks of 4 bushels, since March 1830—but all other salts show no other change since that time except against consumers.*

*When it was proposed to repeal the duty, Mr. Finton, of Ohio, stated, in the house of representatives of the United States, that a reduced duty would not affect the cost to consumers, though destroying a large amount of domestic capital and employment.

Mr. Doddridge, of Virginia, said that he had seen $12 given in his county for a bushel of alum salt, and recollected when it was reduced to $5, because of the improvement of the mountain roads—but that the price remained at three dollars until the Kanawha works displaced the foreign article. He had seen the time when 24 bushels of wheat would not pay for one of alum salt—and, at the same place, he had seen salt so reduced in price that a barrel of it would not pay for a barrel of flour. He supposed that a bushel of foreign salt had not been consumed in more than half of his (congressional) district for the fifteen preceding years; and thought if such salt was wholly excluded, the whole quantity required would be furnished without inconvenience.

Mr. Reed, of Massachusetts, referred to many proceedings of the revolutionary congress to encourage the manufacture of salt, and at the date of these resolutions, he said that the business had been commenced in his neighborhood—by evaporating sea-water. That the capital now vested in the manufacture in Massachusetts amounted to 1,754,576 dollars—making annually 503,686 bushels of salt, equal to the best alum or Turks island. That the repeal of the duty in 1807, though almost ruinous to manufacturers, rendered only a small and temporary benefit to

The salt made at the factories in Massachusetts weighs about 75 lbs. per bushel; and in 1828, sold for 38 cents. The capital vested in them was estimated at about two millions of dollars.

The whole facts shew—that the amount of the duty had no apparent effect on price, and favor the opinion, that a diminished duty has rather had a tendency to increase the profits of foreign manufacturers and embarrass the operations of home manufacturers, by rendering the market uncertain, than to diminish cost to consumers.

To exemplify this we shall state the duties upon, and prices of molasses, at different periods—the supply of that article being also of domestic and foreign production.

Such are the operations of trade; which we expect to show hereafter in numerous instances, and offer the reasons for them. It is sufficient to observe, for the present, that such they are.

NEW YORK PRICES.

In support of the opinions just advanced, we shall add the following statements, derived from Mr. E. Williams' valuable work, the New York Annual Register, given in anticipation of the volume for 1832, which is speedily to be published.

consumers. That there were more than 800 small factories in his district—whose competition had reduced the price to 30 cents for 56 lbs. of salt,—[the duty then being 20 cents on that quantity]; and he estimated the whole capital employed in the domestic manufacture at eight millions of dollars.

REPORT ON THE CURRENCY.

The committee charged by the convention of the friends of domestic industry, assembled in New York, in the month of October last, to "report upon the currency of the country, as affecting or affected by the protecting system," beg leave to present the following report—

That to render clear and intelligible any statement they may make in relation to the "currency" of our country, as it may affect or be affected by the "protecting system," it is necessary to give to those terms a definite and distinct meaning, that will be recognized at once as just, when applied to the system of trade and political economy existing in the United States.

By the term "currency" they understand the medium of exchange used by contracting parties, in the interchange of commodities which are the product of labor, when direct barter or the exchange of one commodity for another, of supposed equal value, does not take place: But where time or space intervenes between the delivery of articles, that are the subjects of a contract, the written evidence that is given of the contract is the medium of exchange, and its transferable quality gives to it the character of currency.

By the term "protecting system," the committee understand such regulations of foreign commerce as shall protect our country from purchasing and importing, either voluntarily by its own citizens, or having forced into it by foreigners, an amount of the product of the labor of other countries, for which the product of the labor of our own will be insufficient to pay, when sold in foreign markets; and thereby prevent the accumulation of a balance of trade against the United States, that, if paid at all, must be paid by gold and silver: articles of commerce, the value of which is regulated like the value of all other articles of commerce—by demand and supply.

However some modern political economists may attempt to ridicule what is termed the "balance of trade," the committee do not entertain a doubt of its existence, as certainly between nations and communities of people, as between individuals of the same community;—nor that the amount of this balance determines as certainly the amount of gold and silver which a nation can retain, as it decides the amount that an individual can hold. Every person knows that the effect of contracting debts to an amount that his own income will not pay, must create a balance against him, to pay which he will first have to part with his money; secondly, with whatever other articles of value he may possess; and if these be insufficient to satisfy his engagements, that nothing but the humane policy of our institutions will save him from becoming the slave of his creditor, and being compelled to earn the amount of his contract by the sweat of his brow:—The bond having been fairly given, nothing but the inability of the debtor can release him from the fulfilment of his contract; and so with a community of debtors.

The committee are aware that our custom-house entries do not furnish any rule that can be relied upon to determine whether a balance of trade exists against this country or not. They furnish a tolerably accurate account of the quantity of the product of our labor exported, but give no data by which to ascertain the amount, in money, which that product of labor has sold for in foreign markets. The custom house entries probably, do furnish a reasonably correct mode of ascertaining the cost, in foreign countries, of the product of foreign labor, imported into the United States. The difference in amount, in money, between our exports and imports, as ascertained by their sale and purchase in foreign markets, is the true balance of trade.

To these preliminary remarks the committee will add what they suppose will be admitted by every one—that the product of labor alone is wealth—that all exchanges of the product of labor are commerce—that gold and silver are products of labor, to which coinage adds no increased value—that coined gold and silver alone are money—that money is but a legal measure of value possessing the peculiar quality of expansion, in the same proportion that the material of which it is constructed is diminished in the market—that currency is but the evidence of debts—that one hundred days' labor employed in Carolina, in extracting from the earth two thousand and twenty-five grains of gold, worth seventy-five dollars; and one hundred days' labor in Pennsylvania, employed in extracting from the ore one ton of malleable iron, worth seventy-five dollars; and one hundred days' labor employed in New York, in cultivating the soil and producing one hundred bushels of wheat, worth seventy-five dollars, have each contributed to the common stock of wealth an equal amount, and that the relative quantity of gold, iron, or wheat produced, at each of these places, by a given quantity of labor, establishes the value of labor or its product, at the place where it is rendered.

From the definition which has been given of currency, it will be perceived that the committee confine this term to such a medium of exchange as possesses merely the character of a representative of value—and that nothing else can be considered currency. In conformity with this opinion, money, or coined gold and silver, is not currency, because it is composed of the product of labor; and, as such, is an article of commerce, in even more universal demand than any other article which is the product of labor, because any other product of labor will, in every country, be given in exchange for it: but this is barter, and requires no medium of exchange.—It is a mere exchange of one product of labor for another, and is made in the same way and governed by the same principles, that one bushel of wheat is given for two bushels of Indian corn, or five pair of shoes for one hat.—No medium of exchange, or currency, is used in such transactions—one article of the product of labor being directly exchanged for another of equal value.

It has been already said that the currency is but the evidence of debts—and that it consists of contracts to pay, or deliver, at some stated time and place, a stipulated quantity of wealth, or the product of labor, and most commonly money; the quantity of which is defined by the number of grains of gold or silver which the laws require shall be contained in dollars or eagles; a certificate of which number is impressed upon each, by coinage; and, that these coins alone are money.

To give contracts promising the delivery of wealth, or payment of money, the character of currency, they must be transferable, so as to invest the holder with the right to demand and enforce a fulfilment of the contract. Bonds, notes and bills, whether payable to bearer, or to any one or his order or assignee, on demand, at sight, or at some future period of time, or at some distant place, and certificates of stock, constitute currency—which is not money, as used in the United States, but consists wholly of contracts to pay money. It is not the product of labor, and therefore has no intrinsic value. It is, however, an article of commerce, because a product of labor has been given for it; and because it is to be redeemed with a product of labor.—But there is the same difference between currency and money, that there is between the evidence of a fact and the fact itself.

As an article of commerce within our country, (and it is not an article of commerce elsewhere, with the exception of some of the public securities)—currency has its value defined by the price it will sell for, in gold and silver; and this is ascertained, first by the degree of confidence which is reposed in the ability of the party contracting to pay; secondly, by the opinion entertained of the moral sense which will induce him to comply with his engagements; thirdly, by the certainty with which the laws will enforce a compliance, if his moral sense shall fail to effect this object; and fourthly by the place where the payment is to be made.

Currency is the aliment on which banks, brokers and dealers in money subsist. They affix a value thereto at their own discretion—as for instance, to a bill drawn at New York, payable at Philadelphia, on demand or at sight, for one thousand dollars, they would attach the value of one thousand dollars, less the expense of transporting the money from Philadelphia to New York, and the interest on the money for two days, the time that would be occupied in obtaining payment; or if it be a bill or note, payable twelve months after date, they would attach a value of less than nine hundred and forty dollars to it, and so in proportion for any greater or less time that might exist between the date of the note or bill, and the time it would become due. But a bill drawn at New York, payable at sight in London, for the equivalent of one thousand dollars in the currency of London, would at this time be worth in New York about eleven hundred dollars, exchange on England being ten per cent. above par. Whereas a bill drawn for one thousand dollars, payable in some other foreign place, might be worth not more than nine hundred dollars—exchange on such place being as much below par. Thus the currency of the country is of innumerable degrees of value, and worth just what it will sell for, when brought to market for money.

Contracts promising the payment of money, are in fact, bills drawn upon the gold and silver that may be at the place where they are made payable. And gold and silver being articles of commerce, the value whereof depends like that of all other articles of commerce, upon demand and supply, the value of currency must always fluctuate in the same ratio that gold and silver fluctuate in value, when these are measured by other descriptions of wealth or products of labor. As an example of this kind, we will suppose that a bill of exchange had been drawn in the United States, and made payable sixty days after sight, in London, for a gold sovereign, which, at the time the bill was drawn, was worth but four dollars and forty-four cents in London; or an equivalent that we will call five days' labor; and that when the day of payment arrived, one half the gold that was in England had been, during the interval between the date and maturity of that bill, transported to the continent, in consequence of an adverse course of trade; then the same sovereign which, at the date of the bill, would have commanded but five days' labor, would, at its maturity, command ten days' labor—for in this ratio the value of money would rise and labor fall, in pursuance of immutable principles in the laws of trade, which regulate values by demand and supply, of universal and invariable application.

Currency that is based upon wealth, to be ascertained and measured by articles of commerce, such as gold and silver are, must fluctuate, as we have shown, in the same degree that the articles upon which it is based shall augment and diminish in value. In further illustration of this position, we will suppose that when a country contained thirty millions of dollars, in gold and silver, and one day's labor would purchase one dollar, a man contracted to pay one hundred dollars, at twelve months after date; and that between the date and maturity of such contract, fifteen millions of gold and silver were transported to other countries from that in which the contract had been made, then, the money that remained would increase so much in value, in consequence of its diminished quantity, there being no diminution in the demand, that it would require two hundred days' labor to satisfy that contract—whereas, one hundred days' labor would have discharged it, when the contract was made—the value of labor, in relation to articles uninfluenced by the foreign market, having fallen precisely in the same ratio that the value of money had advanced.

Still it must not be supposed that the fluctuations in the value of currency, caused by its being based upon an article of commerce, or the product of labor, present any argument against that basis; for the fact of its being based upon an article of commerce alone imparts any value to our currency. If it were not based upon something of intrinsic value; that is, upon something into which labor has entered, it would possess no value—for what would a contract to pay nothing be worth, even if the contract be fulfilled to the letter? It would still command nothing, and would not exchange for any thing that could add to the comfort or happiness of man: the whole object in the acquisition of wealth.

It would be impossible to state with any degree of accuracy, the amount of wealth which has accumulated in the United States since the first settlement of the country; which should be estimated by the quantity of labor that has entered into its construction, including both the wealth which is attached to the soil, and that which is floating and might be transported to other countries. Nor is it important that a conjectural estimate should be offered—for it is upon that portion only which is in the possession of the debtors of the country, that our whole currency is founded. And this portion of wealth, under the due execution of the laws, is pledged for its redemption, in money—and whilst our laws are duly executed, if the property of debtors will not purchase money at one price, to fulfil their engagements, it must at another. The general currency cannot therefore depreciate until that security shall be exhausted, or until the laws which enforce the obligation of contracts shall be impeded in their operation—contingencies not likely to take place, whilst the state governments are prohibited from passing any law that would impair the obligation of contracts, and the government of the United States shall protect the industry of this nation.

As currency is but the representative of value or wealth—in order to render its character still more clear, let it be supposed that a person has employed one thousand days' labor to construct a house; and that his necessities required, after he had constructed this house, that he should have one thousand articles, each of which it had cost one day's labor to create, at a time when coined gold and silver, or money, was so abundant that one day's labor would exchange for or purchase one dollar—and that, to obtain these articles, the owner of that house entered into one thousand separate written contracts to pay to one thousand different persons, or to their order, one dollar each, which he gave for the one thousand articles which his necessities required, and that he thus transferred his property in that house into currency—and so gave to the holders of this article of commerce a claim upon his house, by which they might become its legal owners, if he should fail to redeem his contracts in the time and manner stipulated. But, as these contracts for one dollar each may have been made payable at sixty days after date; and as the holders of these contracts may wish to exchange them for products of labor, they may effect this indirectly by selling them to banks, brokers or dealers in currency, for other contracts; which will enable the holders to obtain, promptly, such products of labor as they may want, even money itself, if they choose to call for it, in dollars or parts of dollars.

In such transactions the house, or the value thereof, represented by the original contracts, performs the functions of currency; whereas under a system of barter, or mere exchange, without the employment of currency, the property vested in the house could not become a circulating article of value. In the case we have stated, the security given by the owner of the house to the holders of his original notes, that had entered into the general currency, consists of the house itself, and such other contracts, or articles the product of labor, as he received in exchange for the notes or contracts that he had made; and this security is worth precisely what, under any circumstances, it could be sold for. It might happen that the value of money would be double, before the day of payment arrived, by reason of the quantity being diminished one half; and then the value of the house, which it occupied one thousand days' labor to create, would be diminished one half, and would sell for but five hundred dollars. Yet the products of one thousand days' labor, which the owner received in exchange for his notes or contracts, being still in his possession, would also be worth five hundred dollars—but not more. And although these two resources would enable him to redeem his one thousand original contracts for one dollar each; he, nevertheless, would lose his estate, in consequence of the rise in the value of money, caused by the diminution of its quantity, between the date of his contracts and the time they became due—and hence the appalling effects upon the debtors of a community, by a contraction of the currency arising from a diminution in the quantity of legal money.—His situation would be very different, however, if during the same period the value of labor had increased, owing to a fall in the value of money, caused by its having been doubled in quantity. In this case, the house which was originally worth one thousand dollars, but which under adverse circumstances might be sold for only five hundred dollars, would be worth two thousand dollars; and the products of labor, other than money, which the owner of that house had received in exchange for his one thousand contracts for one dollar each, would also sell for two thousand dollars; so that after he had redeemed his contracts, he would be in possession of wealth, which, if measured by the standard of money, would be worth three thousand dollars.

Your committee will not attempt to make any estimate of the amount of contracts, at any time, existing in the United States constituting its currency. That portion however of our country which consists of contracts to pay money on demand, whether issued by individuals or corporate bodies, such as bank notes, and which properly constitutes the circulating medium, of the country, may be estimated with tolerable precision, by ascertaining the quantity of coined money in the country, and then computing this description of notes as four times greater in amount—for this calculation is more than justified by the general statements of the most cautiously conducted banks, exclusive of deposits and bank credits. An estimate thus made will be sufficiently accurate to settle principles—and, if it be admitted that, six months ago, there were thirty millions of metallic dollars in the country, there was then, according to the above rule for computing the same, a circulating medium of bank notes, payable on demand, amounting to about one hundred and twenty millions of dollars—which being used as money, by courtesy, in the interchange of wealth, caused the products of labor to be then estimated by this standard. But if the amount of metallic dollars has since been diminished to twenty millions, by exportation, to pay a balance of trade against this country, which may be stated as a fact of recent occurrence, the quantity of notes payable on demand, or circulating medium, must have been diminished to eighty millions of dollars—and if the amount shall not be speedily augmented, the value of the products of labor must be adjusted by this standard.

Again, let it be supposed that the wealth of the country was twenty-four hundred millions of dollars on the first day of June last, measured by the then currency—now, it would be worth but sixteen hundred millions of dollars, as measured by the considerations in contracts constituting the present currency of the country—which shows a loss of eight hundred millions of dollars by this standard, that is primarily referable to the abstraction of only ten millions of money, to liquidate a balance of trade with foreign countries, created by excessive importations of the products of foreign labor, which could have been better supplied by our own industry, as far as our necessities required them.

How many men of wealth have been reduced to poverty by this unfavorable balance of trade—How many children will remain uneducated by reason of the adversity it has occasioned—and how many fathers will be required to labor twelve hours in the day to earn the same amount of money, that, six months ago, they could have earned in eight hours, can only be answered by the records of courts and the registers of asylums for the poor.

The committee would, however, do justice to themselves, if they did not declare it to be their settled conviction, that gold and silver are the only safe commodities of which to constitute money; and they are persuaded that they are supported in this opinion by the great mass of the American people, that to abandon the principle of making these the basis of contracts, would break up the foundations of society and disorganise all our civil institutions. Yet they are equally bound to declare their conviction, that there can be no security that this basis of our currency can be maintained, unless the power of congress to regulate commerce shall be so exercised, as to prevent the introduction of the products of foreign labor into our country, for which our surplus labor will not pay, when sold in foreign markets—a regulation, that can alone prevent such a balance of trade accruing against us as would withdraw the foundations on which our contracts rest.

A guide to national prosperity and safety more true and unerring cannot be found than a favorable balance of trade, sustained by such a regulation of commerce; nor one more fallacious, than that furnished by a tariff graduated by the mere calls of the government treasury, to defray ordinary or current expenses. A treasury, made to overflow by imposts on foreign goods, is but an evidence of great importations of the product of foreign labor; and shows clearly, that great exportations of the product of our labor must follow, to balance the purchases made in foreign countries; whilst it warns us that, if all other descriptions of the products of our labor are insufficient for this object, our money must disappear.

If an ample security against this state of things can only be obtained by a tariff of protecting duties, and these produce a surplus revenue, would it not be better to appropriate this surplus to any national object, rather than to pursue a different course, that must paralyse the industry of the people? Certainly, it would be better so to dispose of a surplus, thus created, than to permit the general wealth of the country to be diminished some hundreds of millions of dollars, when measured either by the standard of labor, or by contracts existing for the payment of money. Far better would it comport with the interest of the nation, to regulate commerce in such a way as shall increase our currency, by increasing the means of its redemption, to an extent, that a day's labor will produce so much more wealth here, than it will elsewhere, that emigration will flow to us from all parts of the civilized world, to assist in subduing our boundless forests, and render our waste lands, which are now tenanted by wild beasts, tributary to the happiness of the human family.

The events that preceded the late war furnish a lesson which ought always to be held in remembrance. Between the time when the embargo was laid in the year 1807, and the time that it was raised in the year 1809, the importation of foreign goods was permitted, and exchange on England rose in the U. States, 9 per cent. above par, payable in the currency of England, which was then 10 per cent. below metallic money. But after the embargo was raised and the non-importation act substituted, our exports became so large and our importations were so small—those from England being prohibited, that exchange on London fell, in 1811, in the U. States, 20 per cent. below par, and coin flowed into the country from every quarter: then the currency expanded to a degree that induced improvements in the soil, in manufactures and houses, to an extent that had never before been equalled. Let it also be remembered, that, when war was declared, and exportation nearly ceased, the precious metals left us with as great rapidity as they had previously sought our shores; and continued to do so, until contracts could no longer be satisfied in money; until the government itself could not comply with its engagements—in fact, until it could not even pay the interest of its debt in money. If it be asked why could it not comply with its engagements to pay money?—it may be answered, for the plain reason that money is an article of commerce, and, as such, had left the country to pay debts, which other products of labor could not be exported to discharge. The embargo of 1807 was a regulation of commerce that depressed the value of labor, and the non-importation act of 1811 was a regulation of commerce which augmented the value of labor. The one, suppressed our whole exports—the other, a part of our imports. The war too of 1812 destroyed our entire commerce with the enemy—yet it was declared and prosecuted to protect our foreign trade, and thereby to promote the general welfare. Assuredly, these positions will be admitted by the strongest advocates of free trade. And is not congress still charged with the duty of promoting the general welfare? Or, by what means can this be more effectually done, than by regulations of commerce that will promote the industry of our own citizens—enable them to comply with their contracts to pay gold and silver, when they have contracted to pay money, and also to use and expand the resources which a bountiful Providence has placed so abundantly within their control; and thus diffuse the greatest possible degree of benefit and happiness through the whole body of the people?

It is not contended that the trite remark, "that trade will regulate itself," is not in the abstract true; nor that money, will not, like all other articles of commerce, seek the best market: but admitting these axioms to be true—how are these ends accomplished?—Sometimes trade will regulate itself by means that must bring ruin upon a whole nation. It may regulate itself by permitting products of labor to be imported from countries where a day's labor can be obtained for twenty cents—where the laborer is but half fed and half clothed: and these products may be imported to an extent that would draw from our country such a proportion of our money, as would enable the possessors of that which remains to purchase a day's labor for eighteen cents. Then, and not till then, would money come, by the ordinary laws of trade, to us, in payment for the products of our labor; because these would then be cheaper here than elsewhere.

Though the committee entertain no doubt but that the maintenance of a balance of trade in favor of the country, is not only essential but absolutely necessary to preserve a general advancement in prosperity and wealth, in which each member of the community is interested, be he rich or poor, be he a possessor of houses or lands, of manufactories or mechanic arts; or be he the possessor of the elements by which wealth is acquired in any other way—all are interested in their respective degrees, according to their stake in the common family. But while the committee wish to express in the most unequivocal way their opinion upon this point, they must not be understood as advocating an exercise of the power of congress in the regulation of commerce, that will keep this balance of trade in favor of the country beyond the extent of a decided but moderate amount, which will augment the quantity of gold and silver brought into the country, and retain it in about the proportion that the population will increase in number.

The committee suppose it will be admitted, that stability in the value of all products of labor would be a desideratum in political economy, more desirable than any other; but that this is altogether unattainable, as long as diversity of soil and climate exists—causes producing effects against which the wisest legislation cannot effectually provide. As for instance, what would be the effect upon our country if an unseasonable frost in the month of June or July, should destroy our grain crops, by which the community would have to purchase their bread in foreign countries for one year—or, if by the same means in the months of August or September, the cotton and tobacco crops should be destroyed and their value as exports be lost to the country? A balance of trade would be immediately created, which could drain the legal money from the country, to an extent that would either suspend the laws enacted to enforce the fulfilment of contracts, or would pass all the property of the debtors of the country into the hands of their creditors, for nominal considerations, at forced sales.

But these are contingencies which no legislation can guard against, more than it can against war, pestilence, or other means used by the great first cause to arouse men to a reliance upon him for all their blessings—while the same evils, brought upon other nations, which would render a reliance upon us exclusively for the necessities of life, at our own prices, would bring to our country gold and silver in such quantities, as would augment the value of the products of labor here, when measured by this standard, so high, that no tariff of duties or any thing short of total prohibition, would prevent the products of the labor of countries thus impoverished, from being brought to us, with which to draw back our surplus treasure.

If then it be impracticable by any regulation of commerce, to produce stability in the value of labor; and stability, if attainable, would conduce to the general prosperity, it would seem clear that the nearest approximation to this point which can be attained, ought to be sought in all legal restraints upon commerce.

Nor must the committee be understood as advocating a general system of high duties, unless such duties be indispensable to produce, under ordinary circumstances, a balance of trade in favor of the country—that system of duties which shall operate as a positive and ample protection to our own industry, in developing to the greatest extent the elements which we possess within ourselves to supply in the greatest measure possible our own wants, and add to our own security, must be the most judicious system which can be devised in any regulations of commerce, intended to promote the general welfare—and this may possibly leave exempt from duty, altogether, many products of the labor of foreign countries, which are either necessary to combine with our elements in developing our own resources and augmenting our wealth, or which are necessary to add to our comfort, happiness or national protection and defence.

In conformity with the views of the committee, all contracts for the payment of money, which in their nature are transferable, either by assignment or by delivery, are currency, and as such, pass for just as much as they will sell for, in the market: yet all currency is not "circulating medium."

Circulating medium consists exclusively of that portion of the currency which approximates in value so near to gold and silver, that, by common consent, it is, in the ordinary transactions of society, accepted and used as money, at its nominal value. But the moment currency ceases to pass at its full nominal value, it assumes the character of any other article of commerce, and ought to pass for only as much as it will command in money. If it pass for more than it will sell for in money, the party who has issued the contract, if he has received a full consideration for it, gains the difference between the nominal and actual value at the expense of the public, if it be that description of currency which enters into the transactions of society as circulating medium or a substitute for money. The principle is the same, whether its value be one per cent. or ten per cent. below par: it ceases to be "circulating medium" equal in value to legal money. It is a depreciated circulating medium, and the circulating medium which existed in the United States during the late war, is an illustration showing how far such a medium may be permitted to depreciate, when the operation of laws for enforcing the obligation of contracts shall be suspended, either by common consent or from necessity, as was the case then, and will for the same reasons be the case again, if the country shall become involved in a war with a nation sufficiently powerful to prevent the exportation of all other products of labor except gold and silver, because the immutable principles upon which the laws of trade are founded, cannot be controuled by municipal regulations—If the stock of gold and silver on hand at the commencement of the war shall be drawn off and exhausted, contracts payable in these materials cannot be fulfilled—yet the ordinary intercourse of society requires a "circulating medium," and if this medium be formed of contracts to pay gold and silver, they are contracts to perform impossibilities—they cannot be paid in that which cannot be obtained—Under such circumstances, if the operation of the law be not suspended either by common consent or otherwise, a general bankruptcy of debtors must take place, including not only individuals but corporations, and especially banks, as their notes payable on demand would first come under the provisions of law, and be first rendered liable to its operation—No bank, whatever its power might be, under ordinary circumstances, could maintain specie payments, and continue to prosecute business and issue notes payable on demand, if gold and silver be exported and cannot be imported—For such contingencies an exercise of sovereign power is necessary, which would be highly inexpedient, if not illegal, under other circumstances.

As the portion of our currency that, from the facility with which it is convertible into legal money, is by courtesy used as money, and constitutes the circulating medium; and as this medium consists principally of bank notes, it may not be improper for the committee to present their views in relation not only to banks, but the effect which they have upon the industry and prosperity of the community; for the purpose of dispelling an opinion, too often entertained, that they possess a controuling power, at all times, over the property and wealth of a nation—and exercise that power, by making money plenty or scarce, at their pleasure.

Banks are nothing more than associations of individuals, who have joined their funds together in one common stock, to be employed by the agents of the proprietors, in the purchase of that portion of the currency which consists of bonds, bills and notes of other companies or individuals—and which are mere contracts to pay money, at some future time or place; and such purchases are made by them, upon the same principles that govern individuals or other companies, that are formed for different commercial objects.

In the United States, companies, generally, are incorporated by laws, under which the corporations surrender some of their natural and undeniable rights for the purpose of procuring a legal exemption, for each individual stockholder, from liability to a greater extent, on account of the acts of his copartners, than the amount of funds he has placed in the joint capital; and for the purpose also, of obtaining in law, the character and benefits of individuality in conducting proceedings in courts of justice. The public security is not perhaps so great in such companies, as it would be if they were not incorporated—or, without an act of incorporation, each copartner would be liable for all the debts of his company, to the extent of his whole estate. These banking companies however, have become very numerous, under the sanction of law; and they are all employed in buying or discounting currency that is payable at some future time; and giving for this currency their own notes, payable at sight or on demand. The quality of the currency brought to them for sale or discount, is judged of by them, according to the same rules that govern purchasers of any other article. That which they consider good is accepted, and that which is doubtful they reject. Contracts made by persons who are supposed to possess such an abundance of wealth, that, if it were brought to sale, even under the operation of law, would purchase as much legal money as would redeem all their contracts, are considered fair articles of commerce with a bank; articles, which it will purchase, and on such terms as the parties can agree upon, if bills of exchange; but if they are promissory notes, then the purchasers cannot legally buy them at a lower rate, in some of the United States, than six per cent. per annum, deducted from the nominal amount of such notes or bonds, without subjecting the purchasers to the operation of penal laws.

It has been supposed by persons well informed upon the subject, that there are in the United States about three hundred and thirty banks, in which capital has been vested to the amount of one hundred and forty-five millions of dollars. If this estimate be correct, it will follow that there must be now in the United States as many millions of dollars—provided however, that the capital of those banks was all paid in gold and silver and still remained in their vaults; but a supposition so preposterous as this will not be entertained by any one. For, in the first place, bank capital never was all paid in gold and silver, with the exception perhaps of the first bank which was established in this country; and secondly, if it had so been and were still in bank, it would have been wholly useless to the owners. Whatever legal money was paid in to constitute the capitals of our banks, has not only all been paid out for the contracts of individuals, based upon the products of labor, owned and possessed by those individuals—but the banks themselves have, in addition thereto, issued their own notes to an amount varying perhaps from one hundred and twenty millions of dollars down to sixty or eighty millions of dollars. It will thus appear that, if the bank capitals amount to one hundred and forty-five millions of dollars and they have issued their own notes to the amount of one hundred millions, which, in addition to their capitals, are invested in individual contracts or general currency—the banks have the power to call upon the community for two hundred and forty-five millions of dollars; or one hundred and forty-five millions more than the community can demand from them. If therefore, the banks were to decline purchasing currency, and that which they held would all fall due in equal proportions daily throughout one year, their calls upon the debtors in the community would be, daily, for the payment of about four hundred thousand dollars; but if it would all fall due within six months, which is perhaps nearer the time limited for its payment, their average daily calls, for legal money, would be at the rate of eight hundred thousand dollars.—These demands could not be paid; the money could not be obtained by their debtors—because there is not, and probably never has been, more than one-fifth part of this gross sum of money in the U. States, at any one time. Nevertheless, should the operations of law bring to sale, for such prices as it would command, a sufficient quantity of the property of debtors to liquidate these claims, it must be self-evident that it could not sell for more money than the country contained; indeed, that it would sell for just as much below that sum as the possessors of the money might choose to receive it at—unless, money should be brought or sent by its owners from foreign countries to exchange for the products of labor here, by reason of these being so much lower in this country than elsewhere as to hold out a sufficient inducement to foreigners to emigrate to the United States—or make purchases therein.

It is evident, therefore, that a combination of a few banks could monopolise, for a time, the whole legal money in the United States, and thereby temporarily reduce the value of the products of labor to any standard they might desire. But though the power to monopolise all the legal money of the United States may exist, in the hands of comparatively a few stockholders in banks, it may still be presumed that no danger will emanate from this source; because, firstly, of the difficulty of forming such combinations, and secondly of the restraint imposed by the moral sense of those who are charged with the administration of such corporate bodies. It must be admitted, however, that the security of the community against the effects of a partial or total monopoly of the money of the country, results more from the number of banks, and the competition which exists amongst them in trade—than from any restraint imposed upon them by law, or the probability that the balance of trade will bring into the country an amount of money so large that it would be impossible, or too difficult, for the banks to make a monopoly of it. Still it cannot be denied, that, wherever the power exists to abstract from the community the coin or legal money that is possessed by it, and upon which contracts based upon the products of labor have been adjusted, there the power must also be to regulate the value of all other products of labor in the possession of the community—whilst the sacred obligation to fulfil contracts, in the spirit and according to the policy of our social system, shall be maintained—and the parties possessing this power may be either creditors, living in foreign countries, or individuals and corporations in our own.

The committee consider banks, whether incorporated or unincorporated, as not differing from other private companies, whose operations are confined to a particular branch of commerce; and bank notes as not differing in any degree, either in their nature or in their effects upon society, from the notes of any other corporations, companies or individuals, whose ability and will to comply with their engagements, are unquestionable. It has been remarked too, that it is their business to trade in the currency of the country, and that the currency of the country rests for its value upon the amount of wealth in the hands of debtors, who are the parties that have issued the currency; and that, the banks themselves have, as debtors, issued from sixty to eighty or one hundred millions of dollars of that portion of the currency; which is the most speedily available in obtaining money; and that after they shall have paid the amount of their debts, they can call upon the community for the production of one hundred and forty-five millions more, at such times as their discretion might dictate. It thus appears, that the power which the banks possess over the wealth of the country results from the fact, that the amount of specie therein is much less than the amount of bank capital, and that the chief security which we have against an injurious exercise of that power for the benefit of their stockholders, is to be found in the moral sense and patriotism of bank directors.

It is now proper to show that it is not in the power of banks to relieve the community from a pressure for money, when a balance of trade exists against the country, however desirous the directors of banks may be to do so. These institutions are the principal depo-sitories of the gold and silver of our country—and their notes form a circulating medium payable on demand. Any person who can possess himself, be he a foreigner or citizen, of these notes, can therefore, at a moment's notice, demand that the vaults of the banks at which they are payable shall be unlocked, and their coin paid out, to be put on ship-board for exportation. Few banks, if any, in this country, have more than one half as much coin, at any time, in their vaults, as they have notes in circulation. They are, therefore, liable at all times to be called upon for more money than they possess. The security they feel that this will not be the case, springs from the expectation that the coin will not be wanted; or, if wanted, from a knowledge that their notes are scattered and distributed into the hands of so many persons, that they cannot be collected and brought in for payment except in small quantities, and during many days, and, that while this operation is going on, they can collect as great an amount of money from their debtors as will be drawn from the banks in coin; provided, they purchase no more currency and do not re-issue their own notes. Banks, it thus appears, must first feel the pressure of a call for money to pay a balance of trade due in a foreign place; and they, in turn, produce, not from choice, but from necessity, a corresponding pressure upon the debtors of the country; and these, under such circumstances, resort to a sale of the wealth they possess, in the shape of products of labor or articles of commerce, to procure money, with which to redeem the currency they have issued, and which is held by the banks. At such times, legal money, or gold and silver, will be more in demand than other articles—and such demand will become more urgent and pressing in proportion as the quantity of money diminishes; until, by the ordinary operation of the course of trade, which adjusts prices by demand and supply, the value of gold and silver is raised so high, when compared with other descriptions of wealth or products of labor, that these will here sink so low, when compared with the products of labor elsewhere, that gold and silver will come to us, to purchase labor or its product; because it can be purchased here, with gold and silver, cheaper than in other countries. When this state of things takes place, the balance of trade will be in our favor, and remain so, until as much gold and silver shall come to us as will, when measured by that standard, raise the value of labor higher here than in other places, when the tide will again turn.

But as every turn of the commercial wheel produces an unfavorable balance of trade, in attended by devastation and ruin to the debtors of a community, who always constitute the great body of the people in all commercial nations; and as great portions of the property of these must pass, at such times, into the hands of creditors, either domestic or foreign, for little more than nominal considerations; given at forced sales—the rich then become more rich, but all others suffer; a paralysis takes place in commerce; the relations of society are disturbed—and, as the whole economy of the nation has to be re-organised, a new generation must arise before general prosperity can again pervade the land. To guard against such catastrophes in the United States, it would seem that the power to regulate commerce was wisely and necessarily bestowed on congress.

Finally, your committee wish to be understood as being of the opinion, that the powers and operations of banks upon the wealth and prosperity of the nation, when their powers are used with sound discretion and in good faith, are highly salutary; provided their capitals, be moderate in amount—and a fair competition in their trade is maintained.

If incorporated banks did not exist, unincorporated banks would undoubtedly be established; and individuals would here perform all the functions of banks—as they do in England, by dealing in the currency, and issuing notes which would constitute a circulating medium. For if they did not, the same system of barter would, from necessity, have to be adopted in the interchange of commodities of value that exists in some other nations; and this could only be done by our being in possession of so much of the precious metals that an exchange of the product of one day's labor in silver or gold could always be made directly for any other product of labor, of equal amount or value—and into which an equal quantity of labour had entered. A state of things under which commercial prosperity could never be experienced, because the cost and value of the capital employed must always be equal in amount to that for which it would be exchanged; and hence no profit could accrue to either the buyer or seller, except what would arise from any difference in the value of the articles exchanged, that might happen from subsequent alterations between the demand and supply.

It will be perceived that the committee have confined their remarks upon the effects of the balance of trade, to the commerce of this with foreign nations. They have so done because it is this balance, alone, which operates upon the whole mass of the people of the United States. But balances of trade also exist between different portions of our own country, and between individuals of the same vicinity—as is evident from the prosperity of certain towns and districts and decline of others; and from the prosperity of some individuals and adversity of others. These are matters which may however, be wisely left to regulate themselves, under our happy constitution—which guarantees a free trade between the several states of our union—and to the influence of our equally wise laws, which, by destroying the right of primogeniture, have caused the wealth of this country to be diffused in as many hands as possible. Under such circumstances, the enterprise of our fellow citizens will regulate our home trade better than any regulations of the states respectively, could govern it. The people of this union are one commercial community—and, whilst the purchases and sales made by its members are made exclusively amongst themselves, this community cannot over-trade itself—for all its wealth will remain in the possession of some of its members, should it change hands every day; and to the community, as such, it will be immaterial whether it were chiefly in the hands of A and B, or C and D; as A, B, C and D, would have the whole of it.

This committee would certainly had if they attempted to show that any system can be provided, in relation to our general currency, that would be more advantageous to the community, or perfect and simple in its operation, or one, which is better calculated to afford every attainable facility in the interchange of wealth, and at the same time be so free from all tendency to vitiate the public morals, than that which now exists.—Based upon the product of labor, and relying upon the integrity of the laws of the states, for the certainty with which the fulfilment of contracts can be enforced—we regard it as a system commended to our approbation, not less by experience than by sound reason. But, let it be also remembered, that not only the stability of the system, but likewise its utility to the public, depends upon the power of congress to regulate commerce, being exercised in such way as will protect the industry of our citizens to an extent that shall, at all times, maintain a balance of trade in favor of our country; which is the only means by which gold and silver can be retained, or contracts payable in these commodities be fulfilled—or those ruinous depressions prevented in the value of property, which always bring distress and adversity upon the most enterprising portion of our citizens.

The committee feel that some apology is necessary for the length of this report, notwithstanding that they have perhaps sacrificed clearness to their desire to reduce the subject within a moderate limit; still they hope it will be acknowledged, that the importance of the question will furnish a justification, for the indispensable details into which they have been led. All which is respectfully submitted,

THOMAS ELLICOTT, chairman.

REPORT ON SUGAR AND MOLASSES.

Mr. D. W. Coxe, of Pennsylvania, in behalf of the committee to which was referred the subject of the production, manufacture and consumption of sugar and molasses in the United States, made the following report:

That, like other manufactures of the United States, those of the south claim the support and protection of the general government. Although sugar and molasses do not come within the ordinary conception of the term, yet they are in reality, like the fabric of cotton, derived from the produce of the soil, and that too by a most laborious, delicate and expensive process. Sugar, moreover, has become by long habit a necessary, and not a luxury of life in this country, where it forms an indispensable part of two of the daily meals of its most indigent inhabitants. The policy, therefore, of securing a cheap and certain supply of so important a comfort to every family, cannot be denied. In examining the subject of the protection of sugar and molasses, your committee assume as an incontrovertible maxim, advanced in the celebrated report on manufactures by Alexander Hamilton, that, in all cases, where a country possesses an ample supply of any raw material, full and entire protection, against rival foreign articles made from that material, will in time invariably reduce price, by home competition, to the lowest rate at which they can be afforded; to which may be added, that the examples of Great Britain and France fully confirm the truth of this axiom in relation to all their staple manufactures. Conclusive proof, however, is found in the experience of our own country upon this point, and the following apposite cases may be adduced. Coarse cotton cloth now sell for 6 to 7 cents the yard, the protective duty is 8½ cents the square yard. They were formerly worth 20 to 25 cents. Protection, therefore, has brought the price below the duty. Lead is now at 3½ cents per lb. in Missouri—the duty is 3 cents. It was formerly worth 6 to 8 cents. Common window-glass is now 4 to 4½ dollars the box—duty 3½ dollars per 100 feet—it formerly sold at 10 to 14 dollars. Cut nails now 6 cents per lb.—duty 5 cents—formerly worth 10 to 12 cents. Copperas is now worth 2½ cents—duty is 2 cents—before the late war it was 3 cents, but rose, during the war, to 20 cents. The same remark applies to various manufactures of leather, to coarse hats, to all cabinet and other wares of wood, to carriages, to the coal of Pennsylvania and other states, which bids fair to rival the fisheries and coasting trade in the employment of shipping, and as a nursery for seamen. Seven hundred and of sloops and schooners were loaded at Philadelphia alone the last year with this article. To these, among many others, may be added sugar and molasses. The aggregate quantity of the former consumed annually in the U. S. is estimated at about 150 millions of pounds weight, and already do we make, under the influence of the duty of 3 cents per lb. imposed in 1816, 100 millions of pounds, equal to two-thirds of the whole consumption of the country, which is now worth in Louisiana 5 cents per lb. The duty, as before stated, is 3 cents, and the former price, for many years, varied from 8 to 12 cents. Refined loaf sugar, manufactured from domestic and foreign brown sugar, is largely consumed at home, and beginning to be extensively exported. It contributes, consequently, to increase the demand for, and cultivation of, the former.

It is worthy of special observation, that Great Britain protects her colonial brown sugars by a duty of 12½ cents per lb. on the foreign article; France her's by a duty of 9 cents; while the United States are deemed by the modern economists very unreasonable for imposing only 3 cents for the same purpose. The consequence, however, of the British policy is, that she supplies nearly all the world with her refined loaf sugar, excepting only France and Russia, who, it is believed, prohibit the introduction of foreign loaf sugar altogether. The U. States ought to become the greatest sugar refining country, as they possess within their metropolitan limits an extensive sugar region, and allow, moreover, a drawback of 5 cents per lb. on their loaf sugar exported to foreign countries. Thus, the continuance of the 3 cents duty must ere long secure to this country a large share of the refining business.*

Of molasses, the quantity made, at the rate of 60 gallons for every 1,000 lbs. of sugar, is from 90 to 100,000 casks, of 60 gallons each, worth 14 to 16 cents per gallon, and of a quality very superior to any imported. This article was protected by the tariff of 1828, by a duty of 10 cents per gallon, but it was last year reduced to 5 cents, which is sufficient. Should the duties, however, on these two articles be now reduced, the consequence must, in the opinion of your committee, be most disastrous to the planters of the south, in which may be included the infant establishments of Georgia and Florida. The number of sugar plantations, large and small, in Louisiana alone, exceeds, from the best information, 500, half of which are supposed to be worked by steam, the remainder by cattle and horses.

Of the vast amount of capital employed in buildings, lands, slaves, steam engines, and other machinery, iron boilers, cattle, horses and implements of husbandry, clothing, the purchase of slaves, every thing except bricks, wood and mortar, are supplied from the other states, including those bordering on the Ohio and its tributary waters; to which may be added, the annual demand for corn, flour, staves, hoops, beef, pork, bacon and lard, required for the use of these estates, which, if ruined by a reduction of even one cent per lb. of the duty of foreign sugar, must cease to consume them, and thereby seriously injure those who depend on Louisiana for a vent for these articles, while the United States, deprived of her sugar culture, will again be at the mercy of the foreign sugar growers, who would then recover and hold a monopoly of the supply, and be enabled to dictate prices, as Great Britain assuredly would do, were the cotton, woollen and iron manufactures of this country overwhelmed by a similar inopposite reduction of the protecting duties; presenting a practical illustration of free trade doctrine, which sanctions the admission of foreign rival commodities without duty, and does not object to the exclusion of our own from the ports of that rival, or deem it a grievance requiring correction. Another infallible consequence of a repeal or reduction of the duty, would be again to force the whole of the sugar country into the cultivation of cotton, whereby 100,000 additional bales of cotton would be brought annually into the market, and thereby tend to augment the evil effects of over production. These are not all the disadvantages that would be experienced from even a partial repeal of the duty on sugar, at this crisis of depression in prices. The coasting trade of the country would be seriously affected; 100,000 tons of shipping and steamboats, now annually required to transport the sugar and molasses of Louisiana to the northern and western states, would be thrown out of employ. In fine, the strong tie of interest and dependency of one pursuit of industry on its correlative branch for employment, now existing between the sugar planters and those whose wants they supply, and by whom they also are supplied in return, would be rent asunder and dissolved, and our former condition of a reliance on foreign supplies, and a precarious foreign vent for the articles now consumed by the sugar growers of Louisiana, would naturally return.

There is yet a remaining consideration connected with this interesting subject, which your committee feel they ought not to omit to notice. The enterprising spirit of our southern brethren has, within a few years past, stimulated them to such extraordinary exertions in opening new sugar plantations and extending the old ones, that their pecuniary engagements and debts, contracted on the faith of a continuance of the present protection, have been greatly augmented in expectation of ultimate remuneration; and it is a lamentable truth, that the sugar planters of Louisiana are at this moment indebted to the extent probably of one-third of the value of their entire estates and slaves, and are paying an interest of 8 to 10 per cent. on loans that can only be extinguished from the avails of their future crops. Meanwhile these bold and adventurous undertakings are producing for the community at large the most beneficial results, and bid fair, by the reclaiming and draining of the rich alluvial lands of Louisiana, (formerly deemed of no value) to spread the cultivation of the cane over all that country, so as, in a few years, not only to place beyond all contingencies the future supply of the United States, but to add a new and important item to the list of exports. Believing, moreover, that it has been satisfactorily demonstrated that the price of domestic sugar has been reduced by protection, to the advantage of all, especially the poorer classes, your committee feel satisfied in expressing their decided opinion, that sound policy requires the present duty on foreign sugar should be allowed to remain undisturbed.

Appendix to the report on sugar and molasses.

The Permanent Committee of the New York Convention believe that many useful remarks and facts may be added to the report of the special committee, to whom the subject of the production, manufacture and consumption of sugar and molasses was referred—to shew the intimate and important connection of this branch of industry with others, and its general and powerful tendency to enlarge the internal trade of our country, and increase the common stock of national wealth. Certain facts collected by the planters of Louisiana, with the statements made by Mr. Johnston, one of the senators from that state in congress, and many other valuable papers are before us—of which we propose to offer a condensed view, and apply the data obtained to bring out probable aggregates.

At the time of the session of Louisiana (1803) there was a revenue duty of $\frac{1}{4}$ cents per lb. on sugar. The great influx of capital and enterprise which followed the session, caused a much increased application of labor to the cultivation of the cane. For many years, the experiment seemed a doubtful one; but the cane gradually adapted itself to the climate, and rendered the crop more certain, though still a precarious one—skill, also, was acquired by experience, and scientific power brought into use; and, in about twenty years after the session, the product amounted to 40,000 hogsheads per annum, and began to afford a profit on the large capital that had been employed in this business. In 1816, an additional half cent per lb. was added to the duty, to protect the cultivation; and, from that time, confidence in ultimate success being entertained, capital was freely vested in lands and slaves for the manufacture of sugar; and the present result is, a yearly product of about 100,000,000 lbs of sugar and 5,000,000 gallons of molasses, worth about six millions of dollars: of which amount at least four millions are annually paid by the planters to the people of other states, for provisions, manufactures and labor supplied.

Speaking with reference to the foreign demand for the agricultural productions of the United States, Mr. Johnston, in his letter to the secretary of the treasury of the 31st December 1850, says—

‘It is very doubtful whether it is possible, from any increase of agricultural products, to increase the value of the export. It will be seen, then, what proportion this will bear to the whole export, what amount of labor it will divert, and what interchanges it will create.

I refer you to the answer of the Central Committee of Louisiana, in which they present you the result of the operation of 20 plantations for five years, in the parish of Plaquemine, and in the most favorable position.

The capital of 20 plantations	$2,028,000

"It is extremely difficult to estimate the profit upon capital: the value of property which constitutes the capital, depends, in general, upon the interest it produces. There is loss of time and capital in making the establishment. The first four years will probably yield no actual profit, but the labor is employed in making valuable improvements, which add to the value of the estate and become capital. Besides, when in the most successful operation, the crop depends upon the seasons, and somewhat upon the soil, state of preparation, skill, and other causes. Thus a plantation with 99 slaves yielded—

Which is less than 4 hhd's. to the hand.

"This is an established plantation in successful operation: and the result greatly exceeds the other plantations in the neighborhood. This crop is made by 67 working hands. In some favorable seasons, as '27-'28, they made eight or nine hogsheds to the hand; and in others from 2 2-3 to 3. When one of these favorable seasons occurs, and an extraordinary crop is produced, it becomes a matter of great notoriety, is published in the papers, and thus the impression is made that the profit is immense, that the duty is unnecessarily high, and ought to be repealed or reduced. Under this false view of the subject, it has been brought before congress, and many members have meditated the reduction of two cents a pound, equal to the whole profit upon the labor. I cannot believe that the southern states, with a correct view of this great concern, will consent to destroy this national object; one essential to our independence and our comfort; to destroy the whole value of slave property; to ruin the people of Louisiana, now in a course of experiment; to strike out from the protection of government the only great object in which the south can feel any interest; an object which will be a full equivalent for all the south pays under the tariff system."

The twenty plantations, on an average for five years, yielded 4,379 hhd's. of sugar or 4,379,000 lbs and employed 1,086 working hands, requiring, in all 1,674 slaves. The whole product of sugar being taken at 100 millions of pounds—the following results appear:

As 4,379 hhd's. are to 2,028,000 dollars, so are 100,000 hhd's. to 46,300,000 dollars, the whole capital vested in the sugar estates of Louisiana.

And—as 4,379 hhd's. are to 1,674 slaves, so are 100,000 to 38,200 slaves, the aggregate required on the present sugar plantations.

The following extract from the appendix to the same letter of Mr. Johnston is highly interesting—

The capital invested in a plantation capable of producing, by the best management, 400,000 pounds of sugar, and 10,000 gallons of molasses, worth on the plantation 23,000 dollars, must consist as follows:

1,500 acres of land, at $50 per acre	75,000
90 hands, at 600 dollars each	54,000
40 pair of working oxen, at 50 dollars	2,000
40 horses, at 100 dollars	4,000
Horizontal sugar mill	4,000
2 sets of boilers, at 1500 dollars each	3,000
Buildings of all descriptions	25,000
12 carts	1,200
30 ploughs	300
All other utensils, such as timber wheels, hoes, spades, axes, scythes, &c.	1,500
	170,000

The annual expenses on the above plantation, cost

10,700 dollars in the following items:
Provisions of all kinds	3,500
Clothing of all sorts,	1,500
Medical attendance and medicine	500
Annual losses in negroes	1,500
Taxes	500
Horses and oxen	1,200
Repairs of buildings	700
Ploughs, carts, &c.	300
Overseer	1,000

*$10,700

Two crops of cane are generally made in succession on the same land, one of plant cane, the other of the second year's growth; it then lies fallow two years or is planted in corn and beans.

Gross proceeds	$23,000
Expenses	10,000
Net proceeds	12,300

Being about 7 per cent. on the capital invested.

The preceding facts, subject to the rule adopted above, might be used to bring out many important results. We shall only take one—the amount of provisions annually purchased by the sugar planters.

As 400 hhd's. of sugar are to 3,500 dollars paid for provisions, so are 100,000 hhd's. to 875,000 dollars, annually paid for pork, corn, and other supplies, chiefly furnished by Kentucky, Ohio, &c. and it should be observed that the supplies of clothing, mills, boilers, carts, ploughs, and other utensils, and of horses and oxen, as well as of slaves, are all derived from other states of the union. We say all—for the foreign products or manufactures which enter into the consumption of the Louisiana sugar planters, are of small importance or value.

"It should be observed, that only 2,000 dollars, of the 10,700 expended, can be brought into those classes of articles on which duties are payable—to wit, for clothing and medicine, being less than one-fifth of the whole expenses, which expenses are less than one-half the ultimate value of the crop.

We contend that negro clothing, generally, has not advanced in price because of the tariff—nay, are prepared to say, that protection has reduced the selling value of goods required for the use of slaves: but admitting that prices are increased because of the tariff—is there not an increased ability to pay them?

On this subject, and with reference to the "taxes" paid by cotton planters, we shall have something to say on a future occasion. The whole cost of such commodities as are "taxed" by the tariff, and used in South Carolina for the supply of slaves and plantations, producing crops worth eight millions, cannot exceed 800,000 dollars. Then she may pay, let us admit, a tax of 400,000 dollars a year on these things. Her proportion of a revenue of 55,000,000 is thus determined—

As 213 representatives in congress are to 25,000,000 dollars, so are 9 representatives in congress from S. Carolina, to 1,050,000 dollars—the just proportion which South Carolina ought to pay, and, possibly, may pay, on her general consumption.

The statement just given has reference to one of the best managed estates in Louisiana. With sugar at 5 cents per lb. on the plantation, its late price, it is stated that the capital employed does not yield 6 per cent. per annum.

The present consumption of sugar in the United States may be put down at 150 millions of pounds—one-third of which is imported. In 1840 it is estimated that 200,000 hogsheads of home made sugar will be required, employing or subsisting about 75,000 slaves, and go on to increase, if the production be protected. Mr Johnston says that Louisiana, alone, can supply the whole demand for sugar in the United States for 25 years to come. But there are large tracts of land fitted for the cultivation in Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia and Florida—especially the latter.

In 1829 there were 725 sugar plantations in Louisiana, and we have seen it mentioned that they have increased to more than 800. Many of them, however, are small estates, or not yet producing much sugar. It requires four or five years to bring them into a state of profitable production.

If all the sugar and molasses consumed in the United States were of foreign product, nearly 10 millions of dollars would be required to pay for these commodities. It would be difficult to find new articles for exportation to meet this amount. At present, the sugar planting in Louisiana, in supplies of food purchased for and consumed on the plantations, in horses and oxen required, in the subsistence of the iron and other manufacturers employed by it, furnishes a home market worth more than two millions of dollars a year to the agriculturalists of the United States. For it must be observed, that the planters, generally, purchase nearly all the corn, pork, oats, flour, horses, mules, oxen, and beef-cattle, which they need. The market thus afforded is incalculably important to the western states.

There are now from 130 to 150 steam engines on the sugar plantations. Their number would have been greater, but for the frequent agitation of the question concerning the duty on sugar.

Of the 100,000 hds. of sugar made, about 50,000 passes up the Mississippi in steam boats—thus shewing, (in the returns added), an interior trade of five millions a year. The remainder of the crop is for the local consumption, or sent to the northern ports—employing a large amount of tonnage.

Mr. Johnston expresses an opinion, that when the estates are paid for, and a general diminution in the value of other things takes place, &c. sugar may be made for four cents a pound. But this low price can be obtained only by continued protection.

We shall say nothing about the reduced value of property in slaves, if the planters are forced to give up the cultivation of sugar; but, if the present value of slaves be about 450 millions of dollars, the want of the Louisiana "market" for them would directly reduce that value not less than 200 millions—and it may be added, that the slaves on the sugar estates are generally better fed, clothed and provided for—than other field slaves—if for no other reason, because they are more valuable. But this is not all. A letter from a gentleman of Louisiana, which Mr. Johnston has approved by publishing it, says that if the labor and capital now given to the cultivation of the cane were transferred to cotton, the increased quantity would be three hundred thousand bales! What would be the effect of this excess in an already over-stocked market—what the effect on real and personal property in South Carolina, &c. where an inferior article is produced? These things are merely suggested—but they involve consequences of the greatest importance to a large portion of the United States—and are deeply interesting to the union at large.

We meet with the following statement as to the amount of sugars imported and consumed in the U.

States—otherwise, the amount of the importations less the quantities exported in the years given:

	White sugar.	Brown sugar.
1821	1,884,701	37,597,072
1822	5,241,622	68,617,248
1823	977,019	38,553,551
1824	8,475,772	71,484,960
1825	890,477	49,044,478
1826	4,747,304	59,008,795
1827	3,270,912	58,093,707
1828	3,367,866	42,687,059
1829	3,020,101	47,953,715
1830	4,557,131	71,900,123

The great fluctuations in the quantities stated, were probably chiefly caused by the fulness or deficiency of the crops in Louisiana. And, as the domestic supply has been large, so has the price of sugar uniformly declined. This is the natural effect of competition.

AVERAGE PRICES OF SUGAR AT PHILADELPHIA.

AVERAGE PRICES AT BOSTON.

	Brown Havana.	St. Croix.	Porto Rico.	N. Orleans.
1824	100lbs. 8 62½	8 75	7 75	7 62½
1825	10 62½	10 50	9 87½	9 50
1826	9 87½	9 75	8 50	8 62½

1829	9 50	9 12½	7 75	7 50
1830	8 37½	8 75	7 87½	7 50

It thus appears that the general price of brown sugar has declined from 14 dollars to 7½ dollars since 1818. That this reduction has been mainly induced by the domestic supply, we think cannot be doubted—seeing that this supply has increased to two thirds of the whole quantity consumed, and is continually pressing itself forward to meet the entire domestic demand.

The treasury tables of 1829 rate the brown sugar imported as costing 5½ cents per lb.—in those of 1830, the cost of such sugar is put down at 5.7 cents per lb. If these sums are truly stated, the "tax" imposed for the protection of the sugar maker of Louisiana does not amount to much! The Havana and St. Croix's sugars, however, appear by the tables given above, to be worth more in the market by about one cent per lb. than the N. Orleans. There are inferior sugars in the W. Indies which cost less than 5 cts. per lb.—but

* It is often proclaimed, by the opponents of the "American System," that sugar may be purchased for two cents per lb. in the W. Indies. A false impression is thus made in the words of truth. We see that the average cost (at the treasury) of all the sugar imported in the years 1829 and 1830 was 5½ cents per lb. This was very nearly as high as the average price at New Orleans in those years. The best Louisiana sugars, having large grains, that seem alive or moving, were worth from 5 to 5½ cents, and their quality is superior to the general run of foreign sugars imported, for taste and strength—but sugar may be purchased at two cents per lb. in New Orleans as well as in the West Indies. The quality regulates the price from two to 5½ cents, or higher, according to supply and demand.

It is a fact that Porto Rico sugars have not netted one cent. per lb. in the New York market, in the last summer. A removal of the duty then might not have affected the price: it would only have afforded a profit the treasury tables, which are our best and safest guides, shew that the average price of sugar in the W. Indies, (port charges, &c. included), was not one cent less than the price at New Orleans, regard being had to the respective market values of the several productions. It would then conclusively appear, that the real amount of protection, (admitting that the domestic supply has no effect to reduce the price of the foreign article), is only one cent per lb. which cent employs 46 millions of dollars in capital and 38,000 laborers—causes a consumption of between two and three millions worth annually of the products of American farmers and manufacturers, and checks the growth of cotton in the amount of 300,000 bales a year—which excess, if cast upon the demand, would reduce cotton to 6 or 6 cents per lb. and diminish present profits in its cultivation not less than 12 millions of dollars; or twelve times as much as the protection afforded to sugar apparently amounts to. We say “apparently,” for we have no doubt that the cultivation of the cane in Louisiana has a perpetual tendency to reduce the price of sugar in the West Indies. It cannot, indeed, be otherwise.

The large tracts of land that may yet be brought into the cultivation of the cane, forbids the idea of a “monopoly” for at least fifty years to come. Continued protection will yet further reduce price. Domestic competition, though sometimes injurious to individuals, is always safe to the people at large.

We have the following statement of the cost of molasses in the West Indies—expenses of the cask 7 cents per gallon, leakage and small charges 3, original cost 3—total 13. This is considerably lower than the average value put down in the treasury tables, though 1 cent more than the cost per gallon last year. Freight and duty are to be added to make up the value in the U. States. The cost of freight on molasses from New Orleans to the Atlantic ports, is about the same as to the importer. Yet this sugar came partially into competition with our own—though nearly its whole value was made up of duty, freight and charges, leaving but one cent per lb. to the producer. Had not the domestic supply been large enough to determine the general value of sugar in the New York market—it is manifest that the American consumer must have paid a price that would have allowed a profit to the West India producer, or American importer—but the home supply caused a loss to both, and protected the consumer. This is an operation which oftentimes takes place—and must, because that increased supply necessarily affects price. There is no manner of doubt, but that the protection of domestic industry has reduced the general cost of foreign commodities, in almost every instance, and with special reference to every leading manufacture which has had time sufficient to become established amongst us.

from Havana, but employs more tonnage, reference being had to the quantity transported.

We do not admit that duties must needs be “taxes”—nor shall we contend that they always reduce the price of those foreign commodities on which they act—but it is pretty well ascertained that such reductions have happened. The price of molasses in the United States averaged 57½ cents a gallon for the 12 years from 1816 to 1827 inclusive, when the duty was five cents a gallon; but for the three years 1828, 1829 and 1830, when the duty was ten cents a gallon, the average price was only 27 2-3 cents per gallon. A reduced price in the U. States, certainly, succeeded an increased duty: and a reference to the table just above presented shows, that the cost of the foreign article was 19.6 cents from 1821 to 1827 inclusive, the duty being 5 cents, and only 15 3 cents in 1828, 1829 and 1830, when the duty was 10 cents per gallon. And this it was that brought down the first cost of molasses to three cents per gallon, as stated in a preceding paragraph. It had been much more, and is now, at the latest advices about 11 cents per gallon, exclusive of the cost of the cask, duties and all other charges—the whole cost being about than 21 cents per gallon. The price at New Orleans, on the levee, that is, ready for shipping, all charges paid, is 26 cents. This molasses is 2 or 3 cents per gallon better than the Havana, generally. The middling and inferior qualities of the New Orleans, we see in the prices current, are worth five cents per gallon more than the like qualities of Havana molasses, in the Baltimore market. Thus the duty on the latter would appear practically inoperative; and so, indeed, it is partially rendered by the better commodity of domestic product.

In support of the probable facts just suggested, it may be mentioned—that salt at Turk’s Island, was 10 cents a bushel, when our duty was 20 cents,—but now 20 cents, the duty being 10 cents. May we not believe that this advance in price has been, more or less, caused by our increased demand? Can we do otherwise than apprehend, that that demand will reduce the domestic manufacture of salt? The present price of Turk’s Island salt at Baltimore is 43 cents per bushel—duty 10 cents. At this time in 1830, it was about 47 cents—duty 20 cents. We shall see if this salt does not hold an increased price compared with the amount of the duty. Such has been the result of past experience—and like causes have not failed to produce like effects.

Good Louisiana sugar sold at Louisville, Kentucky, in January 1829, at 7½ cents by the barrel. 39,063 hhd. and 1756 bbls. of sugar and 18,429 hhd. and 2,805 bbls. of molasses were sent to the northern ports of the United States from New Orleans in the year ending 30th September 1828—the up-river trade was about the same. In 1829, the whole product was 87,965 hhd. of sugar, and 39,874 hhd. molasses—208 additional plantations were commenced in this year; that of 1830–31 has been computed at 100,000 hhd. sugar and about 45,000 hhd. molasses.

We shall conclude by offering the following exhibit of the Consumption of sugar in Great Britain.

In 1700 it was only	10,000 tons; or	22,000,000 lbs.
1710	14,000	31,360,000
1734	42,000	94,080,000
1754	53,270	119,320,000
1770 to 1775 average	72,500	162,600,000
1786 to 1790	81,000	181,500,000

During the first half of the last century the consumption of sugar increased five fold.

The duty on foreign sugar is a prohibitory one of 68 shillings a cwt. On East India sugar 37 shillings, or 10 shillings more than on West India sugar. From the Mauritius, it is, by a special provision, allowed to be imported at the low duty.

At present (1831) the revenue derived from sugar and molasses in Great Britain and Ireland may be estimated at about 5,000,000*l*. Thus,— 160,000 tons consumed in Great Britain at 2*l*s. per cwt., duty is 4,320,000*l*.
 16,000 do. in Ireland at do 430,000*l*.
 20,000 do. molasses at 10*l*. per ton, converted into coarse sugar, baskets and treacle, 200,000*l*.
 4,950,000*l*.

The price of sugar, exclusive of the duty, may be taken at an average of the last few years at from 30 to 35 shillings.

This small table is presented to show the extent to which Great Britain proceeds to defend her West India colonies. She prohibits foreign sugar, and levies an extra duty of 10*s*. per cwt. (or more than two cents per lb.) on the produce of her own East India colonies; but the whole duty that we impose on foreign sugar to protect our own production, is no more than 3 cents per lb. And this strong fact further appears, that sugar in England, at the average of 32*s*. 6*d*. exclusive of the duty, but taking into consideration the general rates of exchange, or actual per of the value which we place on the dollar, measured by that which England places on gold, or her pound sterling, is very nearly eight dollars per cwt. or as dear as our sugar at Boston, though "taxed" three cents per lb. as we are told that it is! There is much matter for reflection in the facts just stated.

REPORT ON FOREIGN TARIFFS.

The committee appointed to prepare and report a schedule of rates and duties exacted on the principal exports of the United States, in the ports of Great Britain, Holland and Belgium, France and Russia; and the duties levied on some of the exports of those nations, when imported into the United States, beg leave to report:

That they have no data to enable them to comply with the instructions of the convention, so far as regards Holland and Belgium.

BRITISH DUTIES.

The duties on bread stuffs are prohibitory, unless in times of dearth.

For example—

When the quarter of wheat, of 8 Winchester bushels, averages 45*s*. the duty is 4*l*s. or about 90 per cent. and in that proportion for flour.—When the price of the quarter of wheat is 50*s*. the duty is 36*s*. 3*d*., or about 70 per cent. When the quarter is 62*s*. the duty is 24*s*. 8*d*. When the price of the quarter is 68*s*. the duty is 16*s*. 8*d*.

When barley is 16*s*. per quarter, the duty is 37*s*. 10*d*., or nearly 240 per cent. When the price is 24*s*. the duty is 23*s*. When the price is 33*s*., the duty is 13*s*. 4*d*.

When rye is 19*s*., the duty is 40*s*. When the price is 16*s*., the duty is 22*s*. 9*d*.

The duty on rice is 15*s*. sterling per cwt. being somewhat more than 100 per cent.

On manufactured tobacco per lb. 9*s*. sterling, or about 2,000 per cent.

On leaf tobacco 3*s*. per lb. or 1,200 per cent.

The duties on our lumber and some other articles, are from 400 to 1,500 per cent. more than on similar articles imported from British colonies. The difference is so great, that if the articles were procured here gratis, and transported free of freight, they would not in many cases be worth shipping.

We annex a few instances, out of above fifty, enumerated in a recent British publication.

	From the U. States.	From British Colonies.
Fir quarters per 120,	362 s . sterling	65 s .
Wainscot logs,	55 s .	12 s .

Olive wood, per ton,	169 s . 6 d	12 s . 4 d
Oars, per 120,	299 s . 3 d	19 s . 6 d
Spermaceti oil, per ton	532 s .	1 s .
Un-enumerated timber, per ton	28 s .	5 s .
Castor nuts, per cwt	18 s . 8 d .	6 d
Lath wood, above 12 feet long, per fathom	272 s .	25 s .
Hemp seed	40 s .	1 s .

In consequence of the difference, so far as regards lumber, the whole amount of the various species of this staple, which we exported to Great Britain in 1829, was $23,565.

FRENCH DUTIES.

The regulation of the duties on the importation of bread stuffs into France, are somewhat complicated. There are four classes of departments, in which the averages, whereby the duties are ascertained, vary considerably. It is not necessary to go into detail of the whole, and we shall therefore confine ourselves to the third class in which Havre and Rouen are situated.

When the price of the hectolitre (two Winchester bushels and seven-eighths of wheat, at Havre, is below 20 francs (3 dollars 69 cents), the importation is prohibited; when the price is above 22 francs, the duty is 25 centimes per hectolitre, when at 22 francs the duty is 1 franc 25 centimes; when at 21 francs, the duty is 2 francs 25 centimes; when below 21 francs, the duty is 8 francs.

N. B. A new system of duties on bread stuffs is at present before the chambers.

When the price of wheat at Havre is above 22 francs the hectolitre, the duty on rice is 50 centimes per hectolitre; when at 22 francs, the duty is 2 francs 50 centimes; when at 21 francs, duty 4 francs 50 centimes; when at 20 francs, duty 6 francs 50 centimes; when below 20; duty 9 francs 75 centimes.

Manufactured tobacco is prohibited altogether. Leaf tobacco can only be imported for consumption by the regie. The fabrication and sale are a government monopoly. Individuals may, however, import leaf tobacco, to be stored, and re-exported within eighteen months, unless purchased by the regie. Tobacco stored for the purchase of the regie, or for exportation, pays no duty.

RUSSIAN DUTIES.

Duty on leaf tobacco, per lb. about	2 cents.
Tobacco in rolls, or cut, and of all kinds of smoking, per lb.	29½
Cigars and snuff,	71
Fish, salted, smoked, or prepared in any way	7
Bowsprits, yards, masts, and ends of masts per peice	64
Spun cotton, per lb.	8
Colored cotton,	9½
Wheat, per bushel,	25
Flour, double the duty on wheat.

Russia does not depend for the protection of her manufactures on prohibitory duties. She prohibits, under penalty of confiscation, nearly all the articles with which she can supply herself. There are in her tariff from forty to fifty prohibitions, many of them general, embracing various species—for instance, all kinds of skins, all manufactures of iron, of fine steel, wood, leather, gold, silver, platina, &c. &c. &c.*

AMERICAN DUTIES.

On British merchandise.

It would extend this report too far, to notice the various articles imported from Great Britain; we

*We stop the press to say, that, by a new Russian tariff just received, an additional duty of 10-12 per cent. has been laid on all imports, excepting brimstone, corks and cork wood, and the duty on certain specified articles has been further increased.
 Permanent Committee.

shall therefore confine ourselves to the principal ones—iron, woollens, and cottons.

The duty on iron in bars or bolts, $37 per ton.

Iron in pigs, 62½ cents per cwt.

Vessels of cast iron, 1½ cent per lb.

Castings not specified, 1 cent per lb.

The duty on woollens below four dollars per yard, is 45 per cent.—above four dollars, 50 per cent.

But cases occur in which the duty is much higher: as woollens below 50 cents, pay duty as if they cost 50 cents; above 50 cents, and below one dollar, they pay duty as if they cost one dollar; above one dollar, and below $2 50, they pay duty as if they cost $2 50; and if above $2 50, and below $4, as if they cost $4. Thus a yard of broad cloth that cost $3, is rated at $4, and pays $1 80, being 60 per cent. But the importers here, and the shippers in Europe, knowing the state of the tariff, regulate their orders and supplies accordingly; and it is believed that the quantity imported that pays higher duty than 45 or 50 per cent, bears but a very small proportion to the great mass of our importations of woollen goods.

Cotton goods below 35 cents the square yard, pay 25 per cent. on 35 cents. Those at and above 35 cents, pay 25 per cent. duty on the actual cost. This duty is almost as prohibitory of all the very low priced cottons, as the British corn laws are of our bread stuffs.

On French merchandise.

The principal articles imported from France are silks, brandies, wines, and cambrics.

The duty on French silks, is 20 per cent.

On brandy, according to proof, per gal. 53 to 63 cts.

Wines, 10 cents.

Cambrics, 25 per cent.

On Russian merchandiss.

The principal articles imported from Russia are iron, hemp, flax, cordage, and sail duck.

The duty on iron is already stated under the head of the duties on British merchandise.

Tarred cordage is 4 cents, and untarred 5 cents per lb.

Sail duck, 10½ cents per square yard. It is to be raised half a cent a year till it reaches 12½.

Hemp, 60 dollars per ton.

Flax, 50 dollars per ton.

It cannot be irrelevant to state, that on all the merchandize rated ad valorem, imported into this country in 1830, amounting to $45,230,926, the duties averaged only 25.78 per cent.—of the whole amount $12,618,862 were below 25 per cent.—23,168,079, at 25 per cent.—and only $9,443,995, above 25 per cent. The total importation of that year was $70,876,920, of which $12,746,245, were free of duty, leaving about $12,909,749 for teas, coffee, cocoas, wines, sugar, salt, coals, spices, and all manufactured articles subject to specific duties.

All which is respectfully submitted

REPORT ON WOOL AND WOOLLENS.

Report of the committee on the manufacture of wool.

The committee directed by the convention of the friends of Domestic Industry, convened in New York in October last, represent to the permanent committee, that the committee on the manufacture of wool forthwith issued circulars, with various interrogatories, to the manufacturers of wool, in the several states represented in the convention. That they have as yet received but partial returns, and ask leave of the permanent committee, for further time to complete their report. It is much to be regretted, that the requisition of the permanent committee cannot earlier be complied with, in submitting the actual returns. But when it is considered over what an extent of country these inquiries reach, it is not surprising that information of such magnitude should require more time for the actual returns. From information already received, and from calculations based upon that information the committee are justified in submitting the following as general results:—in thus doing, they, with much confidence, believe that the amount will fall short of the actual returns, as to the ultimate value of the manufactures of wool.

All which is respectfully submitted.

(Signed) E. H. ROBBINS, chairman.

No. 1.

The probable number of sheep in the United States is 20,000,000, and worth on an average $2 per head, $40,000,000

The sheep farms generally do not support three sheep to the acre, summer and winter, though the land be pretty good and well managed. Of the 20 millions of sheep, it is supposed that about 5 millions are in the state of New York, having had 3,496,539 in 1825, the latest returns at hand; and it is known that many of these sheep are fed upon lands worth from 15 to 30 dollars per acre—and in Dutchess county, in which are over 500,000 sheep, the lands on which they are fed are worth about $25 per acre. It is then probable, that the average worth of farms in the United States, capable of supporting three sheep to every acre, throughout the year, are worth $10 the acre: 20 millions of sheep will require 6,666,666 acres—say 6,500,000 acres, at $10 65,000,000

Capital in sheep, and lands to feed them $105,000,000

The 20 millions of sheep produce 50 millions of pounds of wool, annually, the average value of which, for three years, 1829, 1830, 1831, exceeded 40 cts. per lb. or $20,000,000. (The crop of 1831, was worth more than $25,000,000.) The crop of wool, having reference to the whole quantity made into cloth of various qualities, is worth $40,000,000, which is about the gross annual product of wool and its manufactures in the United States. If the woollen goods imported, valued at 6 millions of dollars, be added, there will be allowed for each person in the United States, 3¼ dollars worth of woollen goods per annum, including blankets, carpets, &c. as well as clothing.

The fixed and floating capital vested in the woollen manufactures in the United States, such as lands, water rights, buildings, machinery and stock on hand, and cash employed, may be estimated at 40,000,000

Capital directly vested in the growth and manufacture of wool $145,000,000

The proportion between the amount of wool used in the factories and worked up by household industry, are as 3 to 2; and on the average, it will employ one person to work up 1,000 lbs. of wool annually, or 50,000 persons in the whole.

It is reasonable to suppose that each laborer subsists two other persons:—

say 150,000 in all, deriving a direct support from the woollen manufacture, whether household or otherwise. Each person will consume at least twenty-five dollars worth of agricultural products annually, or $3,750,000 worth of subsistence.

The average products of farms, cultivated for the supply of food, does not exceed $2 50 per acre yearly, after subsisting the cultivators and those dependent on them. It will therefore require 1,500,000 acres of land to feed those manufacturers and their dependants—worth, say $15 per acre, is

22,500,000

Capital Involved in the growth and manufacture of wool in the U. S.

$167,500,000

The annual value created by, or accruing to agriculture, because of the growth and manufacture of wool, may be thus shown:

Wool,	$20,000,000
Provisions to manufacturers,	3,750,000
Fuel, timber, and other products of the land, supplied,	500,000
Charges for transportation, and food of horses and other animals employed, because of the factories,	500,000
	$24,750,000

The following should rightfully be added, to show the whole operation of the woollen manufactures in the U. States:

For every 100,000 lbs. of wool manufactured, there is a constant employment, equal to the labor of six men, in the erection and repair of buildings, mill wrights and blacksmiths' work, and in the building and repairing of machinery, whether for wool worked up in the factories or in families—say 3,000 men, whose labor subsists at least 9,000 other persons—12,000 in all, and consume each $25 worth of agricultural produce, annually, is

300,000

$25,050,000

Making the whole number of persons employed, because of the manufacture of wool, 162,000; and requiring of the product of agriculture, for materials and subsistence, the very large amount, per annum, of twenty-five millions and fifty thousand dollars. And it should be observed that there is no foreign market to which we can send our 25 millions worth of wool and bread-stuffs and meats. It would all be as if annually lost to landholders and cultivators were the home-market destroyed, in abandoning the manufactures of wool; and those who are now consumers of the products of agriculture, must, of necessity, become producers, and lessen the prices of grain, &c.

No. 2.

The subject of the woollen manufacture might be much further pursued, as to the employment of persons and capital in various other branches of industry connected with it. Making of iron, mining coal, the whale fishery, the foreign and coasting trade, and all the dependent interests. The woollen manufacture is a great stimulant to the whale fishery, consuming annually about 180,000 gallons of oil.

The following statement will show its benefits to the navigating interest alone, independent of the coasting trade and fisheries.

A woollen factory, manufacturing 100,000 lbs. of wool per annum, into 40,000 yards of 6-4 wide cloths, will require of the productions of foreign countries, on which freights would accrue, as follows:

20 pipes of olive oil from Leghorn, a $10 per pipe	$200
100 boxes (of 100 lbs. each) of oil soap a $1	100
4,000 lbs. of Bengal Indigo, at 3 cents per lb.	120
15 tons dye wood a $6	90
3 tons madder, a $10 (Holland)	30
600 gallons sperm oil,	200
Other articles of foreign production	10

$750

The freight on the above 40,000 yards from Europe to the United States, is known to be, and is so set down at 500

Gain to our navigation in freight on the manufacture of every 100,000 pounds of wool,

$250

NOTE BY THE PERMANENT COMMITTEE.

It is worthy of remark, as shewing the great international exchanges of value caused by manufactures—that, though New York probably produces one-fourth of all the wool grown in the United States, Massachusetts manufactures one-fourth. The first exports large quantities of wool and flour and cattle, &c. to Massachusetts—so does Pennsylvania and the far-west. The wool sold by the farmers of the small state of Vermont, last year, is estimated as having been worth $1,200,000.

COASTING TRADE AND INTERNAL COMMERCE.

Mr. D. W. Cox of Pennsylvania, in behalf of the committee to which was referred the subject of the coasting trade and internal commerce of the United States, and the inquiry how far the protection of American manufactures had tended to improve them, made the following REPORT:

That these great interests are so intimately connected with each other, and with the foreign relations of the country, that it will be necessary to examine the entire ground in order to understand the subject in all its aspects and bearings.

The exports of domestic produce and manufactures for the year ending the 30th Sept., 1830, are divided according to the treasury report as follows:

Of the sea,	$1,725,270
Of the forest,	4,192,047
Of agriculture,	46,977,332
Of manufactures,	6,567,353

Amount of domestic produce,	$59,462,032
Exports of foreign produce and manufactures during the same period,	14,387,479

Making the total amount of exports for that year,

$73,849,511

The imports from foreign countries, during the same time, were 70,576,920

The exports employed of domestic tonnage,

971,760 tons.

Of foreign do.

133,436

Aggregate tonnage employed in exporting for the year,

1,105,196 tons.

The real aggregate amount of American registered and coasting tonnage for the year ending the 31st December 1829, was

1,260,798 tons.

Whereof the registered employed in foreign trade, was	650,143
enrolled, and licensed coasting tonnage,	610,655

1,260,798*

To which add vessels sold to foreigners, lost and condemned, in 1829, 43,240 tons.

Also add the difference during a period of many previous years, arising from sales, losses, and condemnations, never before corrected, 514 452

557,692,

The apparent aggregate tonnage before the account was corrected, thus appears to have been 1,818,490 tons.

The apparent aggregate of the year 1828, was 1,741,391 "

The increase in 1829 over 1828, was therefore 77,099 tons.

It appears, by the foregoing statement of the tonnage of the United States, that there has been a misconception in regard to its real amount, arising from the omission until last year, to credit the tonnage account kept by the treasury department, with the accumulated list of losses, sales, and condemnations for many previous years. It must however be recollected, that many vessels owned in the United States, trade under foreign flags, and therefore do not appear in the tonnage account. It is also well known, that the great improvements made in ship-building of late years, by combining the carriage of large burdens with fast sailing, have given this country a decided advantage over all others in the despatch of business; whence it may be inferred that the United States gain in celerity—in the performance of effective duty, and the preference obtained in the freighting business, at least one-fifth over their most judicious competitors (the British), so that it would not be extravagant to estimate the 1,260,798 tons of American shipping as equivalent, at one-fifth gain, to 1,512,957 tons of that of other nations. It may be here remarked, that the magnitude and extent of the American bays, rivers, and lakes, call into existence two descriptions of boats, unknown in Europe, which navigate the Mississippi, Alabama, Tombigbee, and other large rivers of the west and south, with their tributary waters. These boats, carrying 30 to 50 tons, are to be seen in countless numbers, on the Mississippi and Ohio especially, and are not licensed, or noticed in the custom house reports. By a conjectural estimate they amount from 150 to 200 000 tons, on the various waters of the U. States. To these may be added, the coal-boats of the Susquehanna, Delaware, Lehigh, Schuylkill, and Lackawanna, which this year delivered 200,000 tons of coal at Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York. This single item employed last year 1,172 coasting vessels, measuring 100,966 tons, and will, when coal becomes more generally used for steam engines and domestic purposes, require probably more tonnage than the entire present amount of our coasting trade, and ere long will far outstrip the fisheries, which in 1828 employed 100,796 tons. The steamboat tonnage is now about 75,000 tons, having greatly increased within the last two years. By means of steam the transfers and exchanges of merchandise are now effected with a celerity that can only be compared to the remittances of bank notes and drafts by mail, or to the circulation of the blood through the arteries and veins of the human body. It is a truly national vehicle, the practical and political benefits of which, by bringing distant points of the union into closer contact, will soon receive a more thorough development by the completion of the system of rail-roads and canals, now in a course of execution.

In approaching the consideration of the value of the annual internal commerce of this great and growing country, the committee are aware of the difficulty of ascertaining its precise amount and extent, there being no fixed and determined data to aid their investigation, as in the case of imports and exports passing through the ordeal of the custom house. They have however essayed different modes in order to approximate to something like a satisfactory result. 1st. Estimating the average annual exports and imports at only 70 millions of dollars each, employing about 1,100,000 tons of American and foreign shipping, and supposing those two sums quadrupled, as well as the number of voyages or trips made by the tonnage employed in the coasting and internal communications of the country, it gives a gross sum of 560 millions of dollars, as the value of the floating mass of property annually changing hands and in a state of transit through the United States. 2d Test. the population of the United States is now 13 millions of souls; one fifth whereof, or 2,600,000 persons, are probably of a productive age and capacity, earning for 300 days in the year, seventy-five cents, as the estimated value of their labor to the country, which would produce a sum of 585 millions of dollars. Now, this would appear a moderate computation on Adam Smith's principle, that "the gross revenue of all the inhabitants of a great country, comprehends the whole annual produce of their land and labor." 3d Test. Suppose the daily expense of 13 millions of inhabitants for food, raiment, repairs of and replacing implements of labor, education, amusement, and all incidental expenses, equal only to twelve and a half cents each, it gives a fraction less than 587 millions of dollars, Again: 4th Test. France, according to high authority, with a population of 32 millions of souls, derives from agriculture, commerce and manufactures, an annual income of 7,000 millions of francs, equal at 5 francs to the dollar to 1,400 millions of dollars, which in the ratio of the population of the United States, gives 570 millions of dollars gross revenue. These various comparisons seem to justify the conclusion, that 700 millions of dollars are not too large an estimate for this country, where labor is better rewarded than in the old world*. The composition and details of this sum, it would, however, be impossible even to surmise, until the reports of the different committees, appointed on the various branches of manufacturing industry, shall have been completed. Thus it appears, that the 70 millions of dollars exported from the United States, form only one-tenth part of their aggregate annual income, and as the greater part of the returns or imports consist of articles manufactured by machinery from wool, cotton, silk, flax, hemp, wood, iron and other metals, it follows that the United States exchange their rude products and manual labor against commodities which they might with the aid of that machinery,

* "It will be found on a calculation, that if only $100,000,000 of accumulation or profits, were added every year to the fixed capital, improvements and money investments of a country, they would, either on the principle of compound interest, or by the simple effect of an annual addition, so augment in value, as greatly to resemble the fable of the barley-corn or horse-shoe nails.

* The whale fishery employed by the last returns 290 ships, measuring 102,500 tons, valued at $7,500,000, and their fishing avails at $3,540,000.

and a small addition of manual labor, manufacture at home. Considering trade, therefore, as but an exchange of commodities, it is evident, that the nation whose labor is so divided and applied as to produce the greatest variety and value, exchanges with others to the greatest profit; and the country which gives its rude materials in return for manufactures, labors to a disadvantage proportionate to the multiplying power of the machinery used by the other party—that is, the labor of one man in the United States is given in payment for the 100th to a 300th part (as the case may be) of one working in Europe. This is partially exemplified by the improved spinning frame, which produces, with the accompanying apparatus, and the aid of a boy, as much yarn as 460 common spinning wheels. These inferences are corroborated by the fact, that the cotton, which costs here six millions of dollars, is worth, when manufactured in the United States, by machinery, thirty millions of dollars; but in England, where finer goods are made, the same quantity of cotton produces about sixty millions of dollars. This corresponds with Mr. Huskisson's general estimate of the aggregate value of the cotton manufactures of Great Britain, which he stated in 1826 at 37 millions sterling, equal to 180 millions of dollars—that is, the 18 millions of dollars cost of 350 millions of pounds weight of cotton annually consumed in England, is multiplied tenfold in value by machinery.—Here, then, is a solution of the problem of British wealth and power, the foundation of which is manufactures, considered as the creation of the inventive power of man.

The effect of adequate protection to this most important branch of industry, may be made intelligible to the plainest understanding, by the following statement:—The one million of bales of cotton grown annually in the United States, would produce, with the aid of machinery, and a small proportion of their population, (five-sixths of which might be females and children, as in Great Britain), the amazing sum of three hundred millions of dollars. The spindle and the loom, put in motion by steam and the extensive waterfalls so common in this country, would equip fleets, pay armies, build cities, sustain agriculture, nourish commerce, and spread their influence over the multifarious arts of civilized life.

Immediately connected with this immense mass of floating property, estimated at seven hundred dollars, and with the fixed capital and real estate of the nation,* is a uniform and sound currency, as the instrument of circulation and distribution by means of which sales, purchases and exchanges are effected. Emerging from the war of the revolution, deeply impressed with the baneful effects of a depreciated paper currency, the framers of the present constitution saw the necessity of a fixed national standard of money, and accordingly the sole power to regulate commerce, levy duties and taxes and coin money was vested in congress, and the states prohibited from emitting bills of credit, tendering, or making any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts. The first bank of the United States and the mint were established at the same session. Although the restricted power of the states might fairly have been construed into an interdiction to establish banks circulating paper in the nature of currency, yet the circumstance of the existence of the bank of North America at the period of the adoption of the federal constitution, furnished the states a pretext for extending those institutions, to the manifest perversion of the spirit and meaning of the limitation of power

*The capital invested in manufactures alone, is estimated at 250,000,000, and it is worthy of remark, that the annual consumption of cotton, estimated at 800,000 bales, exceeds all that S. Carolina exports of that article, which last year was but 185,166 bales just referred to. State banks soon multiplied throughout the union, in many of which the states themselves became partners, and thereby more directly violated the prohibitory clause. The expiration of the charter of the first bank of the United States the year previous to the war with Great Britain in 1812, excited a powerful feeling among the state institutions against its renewal, which only failed in the senate by the casting vote of the vice president, so that with the fall of that important institution at the approaching crisis of hostilities with England, all check and control over the issues of notes by the state banks ceased, and the subsequent suspension of specie payments was followed by further and yet more extravagant issues. The effect of those measures it is well known was so to deluge the country with bank notes as to cause their depreciation, and contributed to give that fictitious value to property of every kind, which five years after led to the necessity of chartering the present bank of the United States as the sole means of compelling a return to specie payments. The sacrifice by which this important event was preceded and followed, conveyed a salutary lesson both to the states and the general government, which cannot be lost to the nation. If the principle is to be considered as now settled by long usage, that the state bank notes are henceforward to constitute a part of our circulating medium, experience has also demonstrated the paramount necessity of a great national institution to manage the fiscal concerns of the nation, collect and distribute its revenues, control and regulate its currency, give security and stability to property, and support and assistance to those banks which are prudently managed. Without a national currency, receivable at the most distant points, the union itself would be insecure, and its money concerns with the whole business of sales, purchases, exchanges, and remittances, liable to be again thrown into utter confusion, by the fluctuating and uncertain value of state bank notes, for which no other remedy can be suggested than either a circulating medium exclusively metallic (as in France), or a great national institution, administered on the liberal and comprehensive principles of the present bank of the United States. With a view to some ulterior deductions, the committee present the following comparison between the currencies of the three principal commercial nations in the world, Great Britain, France and the United States.

That of Great Britain and Ireland, consisted of about $320,000,000, half of gold and silver, and half of bank notes.

That of France of about $450,000,000, all specie, excepting about one-tenth.

That of the United States consisted on the 1st of January, 1830, of the bank notes of 330 banks, including that of the United States, the aggregate capitals of which amounted to $145,000,000, their joint circulation in notes to $62,500,000; and their deposits, which must be considered as money, to $55,500,000; making a total of $115,000,000, which is sustained by a sum of only $22,000,000 in specie, deposited in the different banks, making no part of the circulation. It is also conjectured that the silver coins actually circulating in the United States, and which form no part of the above $22,000,000, amount to about $10,000,000. This sum of $10,000,000, is supposed equivalent to the bank notes on hand, and not circulating when the specie is out, so that the aggregate currency is as above stated, about $115,000,000. From these estimates, drawn from Mr. Gallatin's considerations on the currency and banking system, it appears that the currency of the United States is greatly inferior in point of metallic security to that of France, and even less solid than that of Great Britain. Hence the obvious re-cessity, owing to our intimate relations with those countries, and the multiplication of state banks in this country, connected with the misjudged opposition of some of the states to the bank of the United States, of observing a greater degree of caution in a paper circulation now consisting of the notes of 330 banks, and which are going on increasing. A currency so diversified, extending over 24 states, can with difficulty be maintained in a sound condition, by even the controlling influence and vigilant precautions of one great federal institution, which has the arduous duty to perform, of aiding and supporting all the sound state banks, with a view to its own security and the maintenance of public and private credit. The prodigious extent and magnitude of that system, may be inferred from the foregoing data, and the additional fact that during the year ending the 30th June last, the bank of the United States and its branches purchased bills amounting to $44,033,520, and furnished drafts to the amount of 42,123,161, besides transferring $12,460,000, for the government, from one point to another of the Union, and exchanging nearly $100,000,000 with the state banks, constituting an aggregate of about $200,000,000 in the nature of circulation, besides its discounts and loans. In these operations the people of the United States have the satisfaction to behold the security afforded by a sound currency, regulated and sustained by an institution truly national in its origin, its purpose and its management, to the immense mass and value of property constantly in motion, in addition to the fixed capital and real estate of the country. There are however, some highly disadvantageous circumstances connected with the exchanges with foreign countries that require particular notice. As already remarked, France and Great Britain, with which the foreign trade of this country is chiefly carried on, possess a more solid metallic currency than the United States, and are therefore less liable to be affected by a free issue of bank notes or a sudden withdrawal of specie, as often occurs here by over importations, or an unfavorable state of the foreign exchanges. These over importations are the natural consequence of the long credits given on duties on imports, coming of late years principally from England, which on certain goods are equivalent to the first cost; thus a person obtaining a credit in England of twelve months for $10,000, and ten months (the average credit) on the duties here, acquires the use of $20,000 to speculate or trade upon for nearly twelve months. So that if a house in England or the United States becomes embarrassed, relief may be obtained by this easy method, as is well known to the government, which has sustained heavy losses on duties bonded, but never paid. With such inducements and facilities to overtrading, the country is constantly inundated with a flood of goods from England, which being thrown immediately into the hands of auctioneers, are instantly sold, and bills or specie (as may best suit) forthwith remitted. Importations rapidly succeed each other, and the obvious result is, that exchange rises, the banks are drained of their specie to ship to Europe, discounts are curtailed, circulation is diminished, pecuniary distress follows, goods fall for the moment, a deep wound is inflicted on domestic industry, especially on the manufacturing classes, and for this evil the country demands a remedy. Fortunately it is not difficult, and consists in the adoption of the same warehousing system practised in Europe, with the abolishment of all credits on duties. There is yet another evil which contributes with the foregoing to the frequent and sudden disappearance of specie. The gold coins of the United States are rated about four per cent. below the British standard, and consequently, whenever the state of exchange favors the operation, gold is sent in preference to bills, and in truth this inequality, of comparative value with silver, furnishes a never-failing inducement to collect and hoard it up with a view to the European demand.

From this cause the gold coins vanish as fast as they issue from the mint, or what is the same thing, the gold bullion is shipped without being coined. This inconvenience admits of as speedy a remedy as the other. Congress has only to enact a law, raising the value of gold to the same relative proportion to silver that it bears in England. Indeed it is of the highest importance that the standard of value of the precious metals should be the same throughout the commercial world.

Your committee next proceed to the consideration of other points affecting the prosperity and internal commerce of the United States, which though of a less specific character, and not coming strictly within the terms of the resolution under which they act, appear to fall within its general scope and intention.

It is obvious that the unrestricted intercourse among nations, recommended by modern economists, can only be the result of conventional stipulations between the parties, in the form of treaties, or the reciprocal abolition of duties or interdicts on each other's industry, and that such relaxation, if beneficial as a general measure, ought to commence with the governments whose capital, skill, and low rate of wages, place them on the vantage ground, and not from one yet in a comparative state of infancy, and deficient in those essential prerequisites to a perfect equality in the proposed liberal competition for the benefits of free trade. A reference, however, to the actual condition of the commercial world, will show that no such changes have taken place, or are in contemplation, and indicates better than abstract reasoning or theories, the true position of the United States. This will appear to be marked by numerous peculiarities, distinguishing it in a remarkable degree from that of the old world, requiring a distinct policy, and that its industry and efforts should be directed rather into the new channels opening throughout the western hemisphere, than confined to those long clogged and obstructed by the restrictive measures of Europe.

The artificial colonial system of that portion of the globe, can furnish no just rule of conduct for a nation, which having burst the fetters which bound it originally to that system, now finds itself occupying rival and opposite ground, connected with the principles on which that separation was accomplished. A very superficial glance at the origin and progress of commerce and manufactures elsewhere, may serve to elucidate this subject, and fix our contemplation on that new era and condition of the civilized world, in which it found itself placed by the prominent events of the last forty years. After Europe had begun to emerge from the barbarism and ignorance in which it lay buried during the long benighted period of the middle ages, one of the incidents which accidentally contributed to the advancement of civilization and industry, was the chivalrous fanaticism that led to the invasion of the holy land. The return of the crusaders, especially the Venitian and Genoese vessels, from that distant expedition, first introduced into Italy the fabrics of Asia and the East. Manufactures of silk and cloth were thus established in the Italian cities, and an inland intercourse commenced with India. A taste for these luxuries soon communicated itself to Spain, Portugal, Flanders, the Hanseatic towns, and subsequently to France and England; each alternately became the seat of trade, and the rising arts, which changed their abode, or fixed their residence, as adventitious causes happened to attract them. The ambition, rivalry, and competition of the world, have since driven them to and fro, as the winds impel the currents, the clouds and the tempests. It may here be remarked, that this fact is at variance with the supposition that nature designates by soil, climate, or other marked preferences and indications of superior fitness, the exclusive occupation and destiny of every nation. The error is yet more signally exposed by another remarkable fact. The Baltic countries, with their vast mines and foundries of iron, produce notwithstanding its superior quality, no fine cutlery or hardwares, like Birmingham or Sheffield. Spain, with the finest merino fleeces, is not distinguished for her cloths; while England, on the contrary, originally importing her iron, without the fine wool, or cotton of more favored countries, rivals them all in those important branches, and in spite of her inability to propagate the silk-worm, now competes successfully with France in the substance and quality of her silken fabrics; and as if to baffle and refute all calculations on the advantages of original possession, Italy, Spain and Portugal, which took the lead in the discoveries and commerce of India and the Americas, have lost their consequence, and sunk into inactivity and indolence. Finally—manufactures, like commerce, have taken deepest root and flourish most in those countries which were the last to introduce them, and where they seemed likely to abide, until driven or attracted into some new channel.

Your committee cannot here refrain from advertising to that period when England, from whose good stock the American people are chiefly descended, planted this favored land with her discontented sons, who fleeing from political and religious oppression, during the reign of the house of Stuart, brought with them that knowledge of their natural rights and the principles of the British constitution, that hatred of tyranny, which laid the foundation of civil liberty in these States. The circumstances connected with the first settlement of this country, and which attended its subsequent career until its final separation from Great Britain, were so peculiar and auspicious to the inculcation and establishment of constitutional freedom, as to authorise the presumption, if not belief, that no nation in the lapse of ages can ever again arise, uniting so many and such perfect materials with which to build a great and imperishable political fabric. The abolition of the rights of primogeniture—equality of property, allodial or freehold tenures of land, are precious ingredients in the composition of its government, and with the wise and general provision for education, are sufficient to ensure its permanence and security, whilst the greater part of Europe, on the contrary, presents the sad spectacle of a population debarred by its institutions and the feudal origin of its titles, from any prospect of bettering its condition—hence, they feel a stronger interest in the overthrow, than in the maintenance of the peace and order of government—while here, on the contrary, every individual has a direct interest in its support. There is one remarkable difference between this country and the maritime powers of Europe. They possess colonies, the commerce of which they claim a right to monopolize, to the exclusion of American navigation, except as a matter of favor or concession, while the United States, without colonies, have the superior advantage of an extensive yet compact territory, embracing all the varieties of soil and climate, with most of the productions of the temperate and torrid zones. Their distance moreover, secures to them all the benefits of an insular position, free from the dangers of too close a proximity to those who are now more powerful than themselves. This circumstance of situation, which has in latter times materially influenced and even determined the fate of many of the weaker powers, is impressively exemplified in the arrangements of the congress of Vienna, and the important events now passing in regard to Holland, Belgium and Poland, as well as the constant struggle for the maintenance of the balance of power, wherein the U. States have heretofore avoided any connection. With a territory equal in extent to four-fifths of all Europe, comprising most of its productions, and those of its extensive colonies, with a common language, government and laws, encircled and intersected by the ocean, lakes and rivers affording a connected chain of inland navigation, this country is literally, as to all the benefits of agriculture, commerce and manufactures, a world within itself; and were Europe tomorrow sunk in the ocean by a convulsion of nature, these states would flourish with even accelerated rapidity, by the mere intrinsic force and influence of their own internal elements of prosperity. The contiguity of Mexico and the Canadas, the vicinity of South America and the West Indies, with a decided superiority over them all in wealth and intelligence, place their destinies in the hands of the United States, whose distance from the old world renders their navy powerful, in proportion to that distance, for all the purposes of defence at home or annoyance abroad. It is an ominous presage in regard to the future prospects of this hemisphere, that it is equal in size to about one-third of the habitable globe, is the richest in its productions, and more capable of sustaining a numerous population than Europe and Africa combined, and that the population of the U. S. progressing in the ratio of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent., as it has done every ten years since 1790, will in twenty years be twenty-two millions, in forty years, thirty-nine millions, and in sixty years will reach the amazing number of seventy millions.

It is a remarkable feature, which greatly fortifies the pretensions of the United States to future greatness among the powers of the earth, that they embrace within themselves all the substantial elements of a separate and independent existence. No other country combines all these advantages within its metropolitan limits. Here, cotton, sugar, rice, wool, flax, hemp, hides, iron, zinc, lead, copper, and coal, and even gold, abound, beside all the grains, roots, vegetables and woods of Europe, with many others peculiar to this region. Salt and sulphur, now extensively made, with indigo, and raw silk,* the olive and vine, may be added to the list, whenever the necessary stimulants are applied to their production and propagation.

It is a consideration of vital importance to this country, that nations whose exports consist almost exclusively of rude materials, and which have no manufactures; must not only remain dependent on others for many of the necessaries and even comforts of life, but forego all the advantage of multiplying their value by machinery, and of a profitable exchange and commerce with other countries, especially with that portion of the world which is yet their inferior in point of skill, ingenuity, and knowledge of the mechanic arts. Such is, in some respects, the condition of the United States. It is moreover notorious, that a determined and unrelenting spirit of monopoly and exclusion from its colonies, had been originally engrained on the commercial system of Europe, and has since continued to signalize its measures and conduct. Great Britain, especially, had early taken decisive ground, and having wrested the trident from Holland in the war of 1652, the island of Jamaica from Spain, and subsequently the Canadas from France, and thus being mistress of all North America, except Louisiana, she extended her rigorous interdicts even to her own infant colonies, and prohibited their making any article which her own workshops could supply. Even the cattle and salt provisions of Ireland were not allowed to be carried to England. Her legal enactments abound with proofs of an illiberal spirit which sullied all her measures, and finally compelled this country to deny her constitutional right of taxation without representation, and to break the chains of its colonial vassalage.

The want of power and utter incompetency of congress, under the old confederation of 1778, to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the states, by a uniform system of revenue, and a tariff of duties for the purpose of defence and the protection of domestic industry and the shipping interest, was felt severely on the return of peace with Great Britain in 1783. Although the states enjoyed free trade and uninterrupted foreign intercourse, as respected the mere privilege of importing goods and buying in the cheapest market, they were notwithstanding going rapidly to decay, and tending towards dissolution. The government could neither countervail the injurious restrictions of, nor treat for terms of reciprocity with foreign powers; they had no equivalent to offer, nothing to concede in return for the privilege of trading with the ports of Europe and its colonies. In this condition of affairs, after a fruitless experiment of three years, a convention of consultation assembled at Annapolis in 1786, where the seeds of the present constitution were sown, which soon resulted in its successful establishment, and laid the foundation of the protective system in the tonnage and impost acts of 1789. From that period till the year 1793, a prosperous and increasing commerce, springing from the simultaneous occurrence of the war of the French revolution and of the new constitution, raised the tonnage of the United States from 205,000 tons, in 1789, to 627,000, in 1793; but England, jealous of the prosperity of its enfranchised colonies, aimed a blow at their navigation by her orders in council of the latter year, which swept it from the ocean, and eventuated in the treaty of '94, granting partial indemnity for her past spoliation. France next took umbrage at the reconciliation with her enemy, which gradually ripened into partial hostilities; but scarcely was this wound healed, when both belligerents sought fresh pretexts for insulting and violating the American flag; for although the United States enjoyed, on the whole, a highly lucrative trade from that time down to 1806, yet it was insecure, and in a constant state of jeopardy as the premiums of insurance sufficiently prove throughout the entire period. Finally, the affair of the Chesapeake and the virtual blockade of the coast by British cruisers, aggravated by insult and blood, followed by the orders in council, and Berlin and Milan decrees, produced the embargo, non-intercourse, and non-importation measures, which finally resulted in hostilities with Great Britain. On the return of peace in 1815, a more determined policy of protection of manufactures, (the want of which, during the war, had been severely felt), was commenced in 1816, and subsequently confirmed by the acts of 1824 and 1828.

Your committee here resume the course of their explanatory remarks. In the rise and progress of Great Britain herself, originally a Roman colony, afterwards conquered alternately by the Saxons, Danes, and Normans, we behold the phenomenon of a nation advancing through all the subordinate grades of civilization, to the loftiest eminence of power and dominion. She now presents the most extraordinary instance of productive industry in every department of labor, of which the world furnishes any example, all the result of protection. To comprehend her system in all its aspects, is perhaps the most instructive lesson that history affords, to either the statesman or philosopher. With institutions, learning, private virtue, and constitutional freedom, which furnish altogether the best model of human greatness, that the most refined and polished ages can boast; yet is she at this moment so excited and convulsed by attempts to reform the abuses of her complicated political system, as to involve the issue of the conflict in great doubt and uncertainty. If wars of ambition, conquest, and monopoly, in Europe, have led to oppressive taxes, public debts, and all the train of evils that are now undermining its institutions, will the American people consent to contribute and pay a quota of those expenses? Such, however, would be the effect of not countervailing the restrictions and prohibitions of other nations—of refusing full protection to domestic industry!

The colonial system meanwhile is fast crumbling to atoms—Spain and Portugal have lost their most important possessions; St. Domingo is independent; the Canadas will in time probably follow our example; the British West Indies, deprived, by the regulations of the mother country, of a cheap supply of provisions and lumber, have become almost valueless; British India, more remote, is temporarily secure, but will ultimately shake off its allegiance. The tendency of all these changes is highly advantageous to the United States, by giving greater scope to their commercial and manufacturing operations. The governments of the continent are intent on protecting and encouraging their own industry, as essential to their existence; while Great Britain, whose prosperity and power have hitherto been sustained, as regards her external relations, by a monopoly of the supply of others with her fabrics, fostered by her maritime ascendancy, now begins to experience a decline; that is, numerous competitors, and this country among the number, claim the privilege of supplying themselves, as well as a share of the business and profit of the trade of the world. In its present condition, no nation can possess a permanent and lucrative commerce, unless based essentially upon manufactures, and it is equally true, that the countries whose exports are confined to raw materials, are generally poor. The examples of Spain, Portugal, Russia, Poland, Denmark, Sweden, and Turkey, amply justify this assertion. Who are the real receivers of the precious metals, and have been so for more than a century? Not the owners of the mines, surely, but Great Britain and France, who have paid for them with their fabrics, extensively introduced into the mining regions. To the question, have these countries been enriched by that traffic, or has their industry been smothered in the embraces of the mistress of the seas? Their poverty furnishes an impressive answer. Let the United States take warning from these fatal examples. If the stupendous capital and resources of Great Britain are not the offspring of the principle of protection and encouragement of her internal industry, the effect of which is seen in the application of the steam engine to labor-saving machinery, whence are they derived, or what nourishes and sustains her agriculture and wide-spread commerce? It is well known that the astonishing discoveries and improvements made within the last half century, have effected an entire revolution in the productive powers of labor. The mind of man has penetrated and analyzed the long concealed properties of matter. In the arts of peace, as in the science of war, genius, skill, and intellect, commands success, when and wherever they have chosen to assert their way. A wise and provident government, by rewarding and protecting the meritorious efforts and exertions of its people, can awaken and direct at pleasure, its energies and enterprise, and teach it to triumph over obstacles formerly deemed insurmountable. Identity of language and habits with the great and powerful nation from which we sprang, has rendered its knowledge and experience common property for every practical and useful purpose, and both its skill and capital domesticate themselves among us, almost as naturally as in their native soil. The manifest tendency of the whole protective policy is to augment the inducements to emigrate to the United States, for just in proportion to the reduction in the price of goods in England, and difficulty of selling, from the operation of our tariff, is the motive strengthened for removing hither. Its repeal would therefore produce the double injury of crippling the infant establishments of this country, and of preventing the transfer of theirs.

Although your committee have extended their remarks further than they at first intended, yet the great interests involved in the subject embolden them to trespass somewhat longer on the patience of the convention. The philanthropic theory of free trade can only rest on a pre-supposed equality and reciprocity of benefits in the intercourse between nations, and the opinion that man, if left to himself, knows best how to take care of his own interest. If this principle however is analyzed, it will be found as difficult of execution as it is unphilosophical in reference to human nature. In a civilized state man gives up a portion of his liberty the better to secure the remainder—but why restrict liberty and not regulate his conduct in the social compact? Why leave his great and vital interests to shift for themselves, and struggle against rivals who are constantly plotting their ruin? Why guard and cherish the liberty of the subject, and leave his labor unprotected? the duty of government towards both is equally imperative and obligatory. Where both are thoroughly secured, there will they establish their dominion, and exert their influence for the benefit of man; where either is neglected both will perish, for the end and object of liberty is security to life and property—it is to feed, clothe and shelter the people. Not to protect your own industry, is virtually to abandon and subject it to the tyranny and control of foreign nations. The exertions of each to promote and stimulate the energies and enterprise of its inhabitants, augments production, and causes the greatest aggregate prosperity. If the weaker nations neglect this duty, they confer in reality a monopoly on the strongest, who, in that event, impose their own terms and conditions. Each government can enjoy free trade, equality and reciprocity within its own jurisdiction, so far as qualified liberty will allow. The constitution of the United States for instance, provides that all taxes and impost duties shall be uniform throughout the states; but this uniform principle is totally inapplicable to nations in their intercourse with each other, because universal consent and submission to the rule can never be obtained. But its impracticability as well as its impolicy is demonstrable on other grounds. Nations, like men, have their periods of youth, maturity and old age, and the same unbending rule is no more applicable to every stage of their advancement, than a particular food and raiment to the different periods of human life. An old manufacturing country like England, and a young agricultural one like the United States, in its colonial condition, derive mutual benefit from the interchange of the products of their industry—their wants are different, and their traffic reciprocally convenient. In like manner England and her colony of New Holland exchange to mutual advantage, they are both gainers, but this will not continue. New Holland, like the United States, will improve—new interests and wants will spring up as she advances, and she will finally manufacture for herself, and covet independence. Old nations, on the contrary, circumstanced as France and England, have little to gain from each other. They are now friends, but unable to agree on the terms of a treaty of commerce. The French minister lately told the British ambassador that the theory of free trade was very good, but as France was behind England in capital, skill and machinery, there was no equality in it at present, but it might perhaps suit them fifty years hence. So the negotiation proved abortive.

As between the United States and Great Britain the case is nearly the same—fifty years hence, the United States will number fifty-three millions of souls and will then be able to compete with her on even terms. At present England wishes to exchange the labor of her machinery against American manual labor, being in the ratio of its productive powers more than two hundred to one against the United States. This country can, however, exchange advantageously with Spain, Portugal and their former American colonies. They are all yet in a comparative state of infancy as to the progress of industry, manufactures and the mechanic arts, so that both parties will gain by the intercourse.

England (says Mr. Robertson in a late speech in parliament) derives more benefit from her exports of manufactures to Portugal with its two and a half millions of people, than from all her trade with France, Denmark, Sweden and Norway with their forty-five millions untaxed, and supplies her with nearly all her cod-fish at fifteen per cent duty, while the United States pay thirty per cent. This inequality resembles the exclusion of lumber and staves from this country by a prohibitory duty, while these articles from Canada are freely admitted, both into the British ports and West India colonies.—The American government is, however, endeavoring to effect a reduction of the duty on fish by a treaty with Portugal, and may succeed if not prevented by British interference. The plain solution of the friendship of Great Britain for that wretched country is, that she levies five dollars per head on its aggregate population in exchange for annual supply of manufactures and salt fish, and receives payment in some wine and fruit and the balance in specie. Mr. Robertson went on to state “that it was idle to endeavor to persuade other nations to join them in adopting the principles of what was called free trade—they knew that free trade meant nothing more nor less, than by means of the great advantages Great Britain enjoyed, to get a monopoly of all the markets for their manufactures, and prevent them one and all from becoming manufacturing nations.”

Chaplain remarks, that the long wars of Europe have taught nations to cultivate their own resources, and rely less on foreign supply and consumption. A temporary sacrifice in order to secure the acquisition of a valuable manufacture, is as wise and prudent as to expend a few years labor in bringing a farm under proper cultivation with a view to future profit, or to plant an orchard, a nursery or a forest, which is to yield remote benefit. The coincidence of natural and artificial advantages has never before been so strikingly marked as in the United States. The great agents in manufacturing operations of fire and water, with the most important raw materials and unrivalled mechanical genius, are here concentrated, and constitute, as your committee believe, an anomalous case in history. Here moreover, man labors for his own benefit, is lord paramount of the soil he cultivates—is at once sovereign and subject, the governing and the governed—a principle which imparts an elastic energy to the mind, known only in this land of liberty. If knowledge is power, then also is it a more efficient capital than the mere precious metals can supply. It germinates in the mind. Home industry is more emphatically the patent right, the exclusive privilege of every country, but peculiarly so of the American people—it is the very essence and vitality of wealth and power, and let it never be forgotten, of morality and happiness likewise. With a judicious system of roads and canals, it becomes the surest pledge of union and independence,—the sacred link which holds the states together by the ties of one common interest. As well might government infringe and violate the vested right that every man holds in his own invention and discoveries, as permit the interference of foreign with domestic labor, identified as that foreign labor is, with the creations of machinery constantly working in its exchanges against the manual production of raw materials in this country.

In conclusion. As the final extinguishment of the public debt will necessarily lead to a reduction of the revenue with a view of accommodating it to the diminished expenditure of the country, much caution will be required to effect it in such manner as not to lessen the security which it has been the constant policy of government to afford to domestic industry. The cotton and sugar planters, the wool growers and the iron masters have been adequately protected, as well by the duties originally imposed on the raw material, as on the foreign manufactures made therefrom, but your committee are not aware that any thing has been done for the great grain growing region of the United States, as both justice and an enlarged policy would seem to demand. Rice finds a market at all times in Europe, but wheat, corn and flour, are virtually prohibited.

In submitting the annexed schedule of duties, which will not only be repealed without injury to domestic industry, but even beneficially as regards commerce and navigation, they have added the amount of duties which accrued in 1828 on spirits of all kinds, whether made from grain or other materials. Should congress deem it expedient to raise the duty on the last mentioned article to the rate now payable in Great Britain, (that is five dollars per gallon) it would be nearly prohibitory, though not so much as to preclude the opulent and the luxurious from indulging in the use of it. Even England levies 8d. 6s. sterling per gallon on rum from her American colonies, and 20s. sterling from the East Indies, a striking evidence of the wisdom of that government in protecting her own grain with the double view to its consumption by distillation, and in brewing malt liquors. With such admonition, will this country do less for the cultivators of its own soil, and leave them dependent for a sale of their grain on the precarious and uncertain demands of foreign nations? Your committee would further remark, that if a repeal of the duties on wines, fruits, olive oil and silks, should be decided on by government, an opportunity would be afforded for obtaining some corresponding relaxation and benefit by negotiation from France, Spain, Portugal, Sardinia and Italy, which produce these articles.

Sweet or olive oil is the basis of the finest soaps, and its exemption from duty would therefore add an important manufacture, and not interfere with the fish and other oils of this country. All which is respectfully submitted.

N. B. As the partial repeal of the duties on tea and coffee, did not take effect till after September 1830, it does not reduce this estimate.

RHODE ISLAND MANUFACTURES.

The following—(though a mere abstract of the reports of the central committee of Rhode Island to the chairmen of committees selected by the New York Convention, who have not yet reported to the Executive Committee)—is published, to show the important facts and mighty results which are expected to flow from our gatherings of statistical knowledge.

Providence, February 9, 1832.

To H. NILES, ESQ.

Sir: The following are copies of the reports of the state central committee to the chairman of each of the committees of the New York Convention, upon the manufacture of cotton and wool, and also of the reports upon several other branches of manufactures, in the state of Rhode Island, condensed from the actual returns of the sub-committees.

MANUFACTURE OF COTTON.

In this state there are 116 establishments for the manufacture of cotton, containing 235,753 spindles and 5,763 looms, with all the necessary apparatus and preparation for the same.

Cost of the establishments, including land, water power, buildings, improvements and machinery $4,617,340
Floating capital employed, or stock in trade 1,645,000

$6,262,340

These establishments consume annually 10,415,578 pounds of cotton, produced in the United States, and spin from it 9,271,481 pounds of yarn, from number 6 to 50, which is woven into 37,121,681 yards of cloth, from 2 to 5-4 wide, which sells at an average of about 10 cents per yard, four-fifths of it in the United States, and one-fifth in foreign markets.

Of the other leading articles used in these establishments are,

26½ tons of iron and steel of foreign and domestic manufacture, (used for repairs)
61,407 gallons sperm oil from the Pacific ocean;
41,299 pounds leather from New England, N. York and Pennsylvania
1,673 barrels starch from New York and Pennsylvania

Besides these, are a great variety of other articles of foreign and domestic growth and manufacture, amounting to a very large sum, which is annually expended in manufacturing the above cloth.

These establishments are mostly located in small villages, (which have been built up by them), in different parts of the state, and 17,567 persons reside at and are supported by them; 8,500 persons are constantly employed in them, consisting of 1,731 men, 3,297 women and 3,472 children.

The aggregate annual amount of their wages is $1,177,527, of which they save 25 per cent. over and above their expenses of living.

CONSUMPTION OF PROVISIONS.

By the people residing at and supported by these establishments, viz:

12,718	bbls. flour received from the middle and southern states;
90,501	bushels corn received from the middle and southern states;
3,203	bbls. pork our own farms, Connecticut, N. York and Ohio;
2,446	bbls. beef our own farms, Connecticut, New York and Massachusetts;
371,375	pounds butter our own farms, Connecticut, New York and Vermont;
320,525	pounds cheese our own farms, Connecticut, New York and Vermont;
141,132	pounds lard our own farms, Connecticut, N. York and Ohio;
1,176	hhd. molasses N. Orleans and West Indies;
356,764	pounds sugar N. Orleans and West Indies;
617	chests tea, East Indies;
2,158	quintals fish, from the ocean;
7,163	bushels salt, of domestic and foreign manufacture.

In addition to the foregoing there are many articles of provisions, and a general assortment of both foreign and domestic manufactured goods, to the amount of $1,500 for every 1,000 spindles, annually consumed by the people residing and supported at these establishments.

CONSUMPTION OF FUEL.

Factories, containing 141,000 spindles are warmed by 1,410 tons anthracite coal from Pennsylvania—and factories containing 95,000 spindles are warmed by 1,400 cords of wood, from the forests of this state, at the average cost of $4 per cord, at the place of consumption. 18,880 cords of wood are also consumed by the families residing at these factories, viz: 8 cords of wood by each family, and 10 families for each 1,000 spindles.

Computation of the materials and labor for erecting the buildings for the manufacture of cotton, viz.

An establishment of 1,000 spindles requires

200 cords building stones;

35,000 bricks

125 casks lime

25,000 feet of timber

4,000 " " roof boards

12,000 " " under floor boards

12,000 " " lathes

20,000 " " white pine boards from Maine;

7,000 " " white pine planks from Maine;

12,000 " " floor boards from North Carolina;

40,000 shingles from Maine and North Carolina;

20 tons wrought and cast iron;

1 " steel;

8 " nails;

15 windows, 24 lights, 7 by 9 glass, each.

Labor in erecting the buildings amounting to $3,000.

It is also computed that 1,000 spindles, in the manufacture of cotton, will constantly employ 50 tons shipping through the year.

BLEACHERIES.

Immediately connected with, or dependent for employment upon, the foregoing establishments, are 5 bleacheries, the cost of which, including land, water and steam power, buildings, improvements and machinery

$208,000

Floating capital, or stock in trade

20,000

$228,000

These bleacheries constantly employ 300 persons, two-thirds of them men, one-third boys and women—aggregate annual amount of their wages $69,500—

PRINCIPAL ARTICLES CONSUMED IN BLEACHING.

241,556	lbs. pot and pearl ashes from New York and Maine;
153,730	" chloride of lime or bleaching salts, from Scotland;
130,691	" sulphuric acid, or oil of vitriol, from New York and Massachusetts;
231,929	" starch, from New York and Pennsylvania;
121	casks lime, from this state;
730,000	feet white pine boards, from Maine;

5,250	lbs. nails, from this state and Massachusetts;
675	reams paper, from the same;
1,335	gallons sperm oil;
2,525	tons anthracite coal;
320	cords of wood;
Other articles of stock amounting to $6,210.

PRINT WORKS.

There are also 2 establishments for printing calicoes in this state.

Cost of land, water power, buildings, improvements and machinery	$62,000
Floating capital, or stock in trade	150,000
	$212,000
186 persons constantly employed; their aggregate annual wages	$40,000
Principal articles used in printing calicoes, Indigo, madder, copperas, barks and other dye stuffs	$47,375
Chemicals, &c.	18,000
Cost of grey cloth printed	239,000
	$304,375

Also, 22 casks lime, 80,000 feet boards, 1,500 pounds nails, 76 reams paper, 550 gallons sperm oil, 275 tons anthracite coal and 1,400 cords wood. Cloth annually printed 3,100,000 yards.

MANUFACTURES IN IRON AND STEEL.

Connected with the establishments for the manufacture of cotton, (principally), are—

10 foundries and

30 machine shops—

Cost of land, water power, buildings, and machinery

$602,000

Floating capital, or stock in trade

200,666

$802,666

1,242 men are constantly employed—and a much larger number indirectly occupied and supported.

Aggregate annual wages of the former $453,203—

Principal articles consumed—

4,368 tons iron and steel;

2,958 " anthracite coal;

1,000 cords wood;

350,000 feet lumber;

$18,060 worth of charcoal and many other articles.

PRODUCTS.

Principally, machinery for manufacturing cotton, equivalent to 50,000 spindles, preparation and looms, value $927,000—also, 67,400 scythes;

2,000 doz. hoes;

700 " axes;

The foregoing does not embrace several hundred blacksmiths shops and other small establishments, which manufacture a variety of articles, of which iron and steel are the principal materials.

MANUFACTURE OF WOOL.

Cost of establishments for the manufacture of wool in this state, including land, water power, buildings, improvements, machinery, and floating capital, or stock in trade,

$263,000

These establishments annually consume—

425,000 pounds of wool, costing

123,750

Also 545,000 do. cotton for warp, cost'g

70,450

383 persons are constantly employed in these establishments—their aggregate annual wages amount to

68,500

Besides the above, 612 persons belong to the families of the above and are maintained by their wages.

Value of the cloth annually manufactured,

573,000

For particulars of the various articles used in the above establishments, see the original returns.

The same statements, computations and remarks, made with regard to the several articles consumed in the cotton manufacturing establishments, and in relation to the people connected with and dependent upon them, and the consumption of provisions, &c. by these people, apply in proportion to the magnitude of the establishments, respectively, to the bleacheries, print works, machine shops, and foundries, and also the woollen factories—but it is deemed superfluous to repeat them.

MANUFACTURE OF JEWELRY AND COMBS

In Providence there are 27 establishments for the manufacture of jewelry:

Capital employed,	$100,200
232 persons employed—aggregate annual wages,	67,680
Value of manufactures,	228,253

In Providence and Scituate, (Clayville), in the same county, are two establishments for the manufacture of combs:

Cost of stock annually used—153 persons employed,	$31,000
Aggregate annual wages,	31,128
Value of manufactures,	69,500

The following is a valuable report from Mr. Whitaker, the owner of the principal comb factory, showing his estimate and views of the manufacture of combs in the United States.

Providence, Jan. 12, 1832.

To the chairman of the state central committee:

Sir,—Enclosed, I hand you a statement of the Clayville comb manufacturing company, up to the 31st December, 1831. The manufacture of combs has been, and is, an increasing business in the United States. There were but few combs made previous to 1820, and these were of the most ordinary quality. From the best information I can obtain, the amount now manufactured annually—

From horns, exceeds	$ 850,000
“ Tortoise shell,	250,000
“ Ivory,	250,000
	1,350,000

The above stock costs over 600,000 dollars, all of which pays an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. and the same duty is payable on combs imported. The Clayville manufacturing company paid, in the two last years, over 4,000 dollars in duties on the horns used by them. Above 200,000 dolls. worth of combs of all descriptions, but principally horn combs, are annually exported from the United States. Within the last year we have executed large orders for the Cuba markets, which shews that we are competing with the European manufacturers, who have been in the habit of shipping combs to those places.

The manufacture of shell has risen to the highest state of perfection; the finest work is done by females, and they are more profitably employed in the wrought shell and horn comb manufacture, than in any manufactures that I am acquainted with.

The duties on tortoise shell, ivory, horns and sponge, ought to be taken off. Neither of these articles is produced in this country, except horns, and of them, not half the quantity consumed.

Yours, respectfully, JOSIAH WHITAKER.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Yours, truly, BENJ. COZZENS, of the Permanent Central Committee.

WHALE FISHERY.

The following communication, forwarded to the chairman of the permanent committee, by the member to whom it was addressed, was laid before the executive committee, and ordered to be published.

H. NILES, chairman.

Boston, Nov 11, 1831.

SIR:—I noticed among the statements made to the tariff convention recently held in N. York, that every branch of American industry was protected, with but few exceptions; and among these exceptions the fisheries were mentioned. This would appear to be the case to most persons—but to a practical man, who is connected with the business, and has looked to the continuance of the indirect protection with deep solicitude, (so far as regards the whale fishery), it appears quite the contrary; and from the following statements it will be made manifest, that, if the cotton and woollen factories are not sustained by an adequate protection, a large proportion of the ships engaged in the sperm whale fishery must go out of employment, or be thrown upon the freighting business—thus destroying a vast nursery of seamen, and, at the same time, creating a ruinous competition in a branch of industry already represented, by many who are engaged in it, as not worth pursuing. It is a well established fact, that from one-fourth to one-third of all the sperm oil imported, is used in the factories of cotton and woollen goods—averaging about half a gallon to each cotton and woollen spindle; besides what is used by the numerous mechanics connected with factories. By the statement here-with handed, you will perceive the vast increase in the importation of sperm oil since 1815; and the continued increase or diminution is entirely dependent on the protection afforded to the manufactures of the country, and the duty now existing on the importation of olive oil. Of the last mentioned oil, considerable quantities are used in the woollen factories, giving employment to a considerable amount of tonnage—which quantity, no doubt, would be much increased if the duty were taken off—but this reduction of duty on olive oil would be very fatal to a considerable portion of the interest engaged in that valuable branch of domestic industry, the sperm whale fishery, supposing that protection to the woollen manufacture is continued. If, however, that protection be withdrawn, the duty on olive oil may as well be removed as not, as but little will be wanted in the country, (excepting salad oil,) and the law will be a dead letter. To give you an idea of the value of the protecting laws to the ship builders, rope makers, sail makers, coopers, coasting trade, farmers, &c. as well as to the country generally, I herewith furnish you with some of the principal articles which are used by the present fleet of three hundred ships, as often as they are fitted for sea—viz:

36,000 barrels of flour,
30,000 barrels of beef and pork,
18,000 bolts of duck,
3,000 tons of iron hoops,
6,000,000 staves,

2,000 tons cordage and whale warp,
with large quantities of iron for harpoons, lances, spades, blubber-hooks and cambouse grates; much molasses, rice, beans, peas, corn, tea, coffee, sugar, &c. and not less than 6,500 officers and men to man the ships. These ships give more employment to mechanics, of various descriptions—I should think twice as much, as the same number of tons engaged in any other trade. The sperm oil ships require to be coppered every voyage, and the quantity of copper consumed by the 300 ships, will average annually 700,000 pounds, which, with the nails used to put it on, will be equal to three quarters of a million pounds annually. The quantity of sperm oil imported for 1815 was 3,944 bbls. of 3½ gal. each.

1816	7,539
1817	32,650
1818	18,625
1819	21,323
1820	31,708
1821	45,000
1822	42,900
1823	87,230
1824	92,380
1825	62,240
1826	52,840
1827	93,180
1828	73,077
1829	79,840
1830	106,829

and, for 1831, the import of sperm oil will be about one hundred and ten thousand barrels, and the consumption is equal to the supply; ninety-seven thousand barrels have already arrived. The quantity of the common whale oil, annually reported, has been about equal to the import of sperm oil, till this year, when it will exceed that of sperm oil. The whale oil already imported, since January 1, 1831, is one hundred and twelve thousand barrels, and there probably will be a further import of 5 or 6 thousand barrels before the 31st December, 1831. The whale oil is chiefly exported to Europe, as well as the whale bone—the latter amounting to over one hundred thousand pounds. This article is taken exclusively from the common or black whale. The sperm oil is consumed within the United States, as no other country excepting Great Britain, makes much use of it, and she, by her protective laws, excludes the sperm oil from this country by a duty of about 45 cts. on the gallon. But for such duty we should drive the British from the whale fishery, [generally] notwithstanding the bounty paid by their government for its protection. We should also destroy the French fishery, but for the protection afforded by two French governments, in duties and bounties.

The United States is the only government where the people are extensively engaged in the whale fishery which does not encourage this branch of industry by a bounty.

I have not been able to condense my remarks on this very important subject, within a narrower compass. It is a branch of great magnitude in a national point of view; but, I regret to say, that it is very imperfectly understood. It is a better nursery for seamen than any other; as almost every ship carries out from 5 to 10 green hands—whereas, in the merchant service, the ships carry so few men that they are necessarily obliged to take able bodied seamen, to the exclusion of green hands. Yours, very respectfully,

C. W. CARTWRIGHT.

The quantity of sperm candles, manufactured from 100,000 bbls. sperm oil, is rising two and a half millions of pounds. This part of the business came near escaping my recollection. C. W. C.

The editor of the REGISTER takes leave to add a few particulars and remarks.

Great Britain allows a bounty of one pound per ton on every vessel that shall proceed and return from the whale fishery in the Greenland sea or Davis Straits, or the seas adjacent.

Special bounties, some as high as six hundred pounds on a vessel, engaged in the southern, or sperm whale fishery, and bringing home not less than 30 tons of oil, or head matter, have been allowed. The details are too extensive for insertion—but the preceding shows the spirit of the British laws, as to bounties on the whale fisheries.

The protection is in the duties imposed on oil. Train oil, &c. if imported in British vessels, owned in Europe, and navigated according to law, pays a duty of 5s. per tun of 252 gals.—if in vessels owned in certain plantations, from 13s. 4d. to 5l. 10s. 10d. per tun—but if the product of foreign fishing, 22l. 3s. 4d. per tun. And on sperm oil, there is paid on the first class of British vessels, 8s. 3d. per tun, and, if of foreign fishing, 34l. 18s. 3d. per tun. So that the British market is completely shut against American competition. There is no doubt, if the trade were free, that no British ship would be employed in the whale fishery. The industry and perseverance, economy and skill of our fishermen, is without rivalry.

Another gentleman computes the annual product of our whale fishery at 3,500,000 dollars, and the value of the ship at $7,500,000.

The importance of this employment, as a nursery for seamen, may be partially conjectured from the fact—(communicated soon after the event by a distinguished officer of the navy), that among the crew of the constitution frigate, when she captured the Cyane and Levant, were more than two hundred freeholders. They had been fishermen; and the matter stated shows the character of this people.

The communication of Mr. Cartwright passed to the permanent committee through the hands of a woollen manufacturer. He says that he uses 4,000 gallons of olive oil annually, and that, if the duty on that article be a tax, he would save $1,000 a year by taking it off. But he regards such duty as indispensable to the success of the whale fishery, and will not agree to abandon it.

But, if the writer of these additional remarks is not misinformed by those who ought to know all the facts, (and he hopes to show them by references to prices current, at a future period), the price of olive oil has always advanced or declined with the price of sperm oil; the competition of the latter having the usual tendency of increased supply, to keep down the cost of the former.

MANUFACTURE OF CABINET WARE.

The committee to whom was referred the subject of manufacture of cabinet ware, and the materials employed in the same, report—

That from the limited time for making the necessary inquiries, (as the article is manufactured in almost every part of the United States), they find it impossible to offer such a report as might be conclusive. But from the best information they have been able to obtain,—they give the following as the result:

That from the encouragement already afforded by the protecting system, which gives a fair competition with the imported article, the latter has been almost entirely excluded from our market. The article is now manufactured at 30 per cent. less, than for several years past.

It is ascertained, from statistical examination, that there is manufactured in the United States to the amount of $10,000,000

Foreign materials, on which duty is paid 800,000

Foreign and domestic, on which duty is not paid 4,500,000

Number of men employed 15,000

Amount paid for labor 4,700,000

The article, has become one of considerable export. It is carried in American ships to Canton, in China, South America and the West Indies. There are also a number of vessels, from our principal ports, constantly employed in bringing mahogany to this country.

It has also become one of the principal articles of the manufactures of the country, for the employment of vessels in our coasting trade.

Under the existing duty, the committee are satisfied, that this branch of our manufactures will continue to be prosecuted to advantage, to all engaged therein; as also to the interest of the country at large.

They therefore hope, that no diminution of the present duty may be made, as, under the present protection, it affords only a moderate compensation to the manufacturer—the domestic competition reducing profits to the lowest point at which the manufacture can be sustained. Should, however, any reduction be made—the business will be, in a great measure, abandoned, because of the want of certainty in the market, and that distress ensue to the poorer classes of citizens employed, that has already been mentioned in the report on the subject of the manufacture of hats. Respectfully submitted.
